The new tire is an arrangement of independently detachable hollow rubber balls, held in position by a channeled aluminum rim. The balls when inflated will stand a pressure of twenty-five pounds to the square inch. The outer surface touches the ground, and as the wheel revolves three of the balls are always in contact with the surface and bear the weight of the rider. "The great advantage of the ball tire," said the inventor, yesterday, "is that if one is punctured the buoyancy of the others will prevent the tire collapsing. One third of the balls might be punctured without causing a bicyclist to end the trip, for the tire would still be buoyant enough to support his weight. When necessary, a used-up ball may be taken out and a new one inserted with but a few minutes' loss of time."

Considerable interest is developed in the success of the Bicycle Show, which opens on Thursday next. The Mechanics' Pavilion has been secured, all the manufacturers have taken space, and we will have an opportunity of seeing all the very latest in the matter of equipments and improvements. Of course, there are to be races during the exhibition, and we are promised that the track will be in very much better condition than last year.

A new toe clip has just been invented which seems to possess many desirable features not found in other clips. The construction of this new clip is such that when the pedal is not in use, and hanging downward, the toe clip swings out of the way so that the pedal may be caught by the rider's foot without any attention being paid to the clip. The instant the foot is placed upon the pedal, the clip flies up into position where it locks firmly, and when the foot is removed from the pedal it turns with the clip on the under side, the mechanism immediately unlocks of itself, and is at once ready for further use. By the use of this clip the side guards on the pedal may be dispensed with, as the clip is provided with a metal strip which acts as a guard, and which can be made wider or narrower, to suit the rider's foot.

The variety of attitudes at the Park on Sundays is as innumerable as the number of wheels. The scorchers sit forward, the beginners are hunched, the ladies are generally hunched on their cycles. There is one right way to sit in the saddle of a bicycle, and that is the upright position. In this way one has plenty of room in which to breathe, and the benefit of a good chest development follows the habit of deep breathing. The chest ought to be out and the shoulders thrown back and the head held up. The only use for the hands and arms in bicycle riding should be for guiding and balancing the machine. The position of the saddle has much to do with one's correct posture, and while it should not be too far back, but placed so that the movements of the feet should be as nearly vertical as possible, care must be taken that it be not too far forward, and in a position to make the pedaling slightly backward in direction.

THE SURVIVAL OF THE FITTEST.

Furniture moved, stored, packed, and shipped at low rates by Morton Special Delivery. Only experienced men employed. Equipment first-class. Offices—650 Market Street, and 408 Taylor Street.

CLEANLINESS THE WATCHWORD.

In no other city in the world, probably, does there exist an institution parallel or similar to the Lurline Baths. It is simply unequaled anywhere. Aside from the novelty of the fact that one may enjoy a plunge in the water of the ocean, in the heart of a great city; aside from this fact, I say, the institution is most elegantly and completely equipped. There is a gymnasium and all the other accessories needed to build up the constitution, and to reduce surplus fat, to the accumulation of which the inhabitant of this climate is most dangerously prone. Cleanliness is the watchword of this institution. The tubs and tanks and everything about are kept scrupulously white, the water pumped fresh from the ocean every day, and one may enjoy it in any shade or degree of temperature. Rates, 30 cents single ticket, four for $1.00; and for the plunge, fifty tickets $10.00.

Free Scholarships at the University of California, at the Leland Stanford Junior University, and at the Medical Colleges. See "The Wave's" great educational offer on page 16.

Beecham's pills are for bilious-ness, bilious headache, dyspepsia, heartburn, torpid liver, dizziness, sick headache, bad taste in the mouth, coated tongue, loss of appetite, sallow skin, etc., when caused by constipation; and constipation is the most frequent cause of all of them.

Go by the book. Pills 10¢ and 25¢ a box. Book free at your druggist's or write B. F. Allen Co., 365 Canal Street, New York.

Annual sales more than 6,000,000 boxes.

FOR GRIPPE IT'S A DANDY

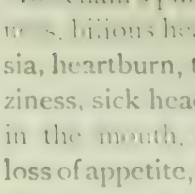
VINA BRANDY

AND

It's Pure! That's Sure!

VINA DISTILLERY CO.
819 Market St., S. F.

MENNEN'S BORATED TALCUM



TOILET POWDER

Approved by Highest Medical Authorities as a Perfect Sanitary Toilet Preparation
For infants and adults
Delightful after Shaving
Positively relieves Prickley Heat, Nettle Rash, Chafed Skin, Sunburn, etc. Removes Blotches, Pimples; makes the skin smooth and healthy.
Take No Substitutes. Sold by druggists or mailed for 25 cts.
SAMPLE MAILED (Name this paper) FREE
GERHARD MENNEN CO., Newark, N. J.

ELECTRIC..

Supplies
Construction
Repairs

CALIFORNIA ELECTRICAL WORKS
....35 MARKET STREET

ZOBBIEST STYLES NEATEST FIT
BEST MATERIALS

Established 1856
Benj. Curtaz & Son
Pacific Coast Agents
16 18 20 O'Farrell St

NEW YORK HAIR DRESSING STORE
MME. L. KESSING, Proprietress
Artistic Hair Dressing and Shampooing. A new preventive for the hair falling out. Superfluous hair removed. 1704 Market Street, San Francisco

PERRIER-JOUET CHAMPAGNE EXTRA DRY "SPECIAL"

Also specially selected stock of Clarets and White Wines on hand.

W. B. CHAPMAN, Sole Agent Pacific Coast
123 California Street

The best Shirt made in CALIFORNIA is the STANDARD. Buy one and compare point for point with any other Home made or Eastern made Shirt. We're not afraid of the result.

TRADE N·B MARK

DRY AIR

is an essential for invalids if they would get well. The continual dampness of the Bay region is a menace to health. It has a depressing effect always, and in some cases is positively dangerous. The dry air of Byron is one of its many advantages; you breathe pure, dry mountain air, invigorating and soothing to the weakened system. Nature provided ideal climatic conditions to give the Springs their greatest curative value. The very atmosphere smacks of health.

BYRON HOT SPRINGS

CONTRA COSTA CO., CALIFORNIA

A HOME PRODUCT

AXLE-EASE

THE VERY BEST AXLE GREASE

Made by—

AMERICAN OIL CO.
SAN FRANCISCO

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of Barthelemi Meric, Deceased

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, A. C. Freese, Administrator of the Estate of Barthelemi Meric, deceased, to the Creditors of, and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said A. C. Freese, Administrator, at his office, Room 9, 3 9 Pine Street, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said estate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California. A. C. FREESE, Administrator of the Estate of Barthelemi Meric, Deceased.

Dated at San Francisco, February 17, 1896.

J. D. SULLIVAN, Attorney for Administrator.

TOILETS.

The day of the large sleeve is passing, and ere another season greets us its reign will be well over. There has rarely been a fashion that has enjoyed the extreme popularity ever accorded the large sleeve. It made the slim woman appear plump, and the woman to whom nature had been too prodigal of her favors, in proportion. The tight sleeve is, at its best, extremely ugly, and carries in its train discomfort. Of course, were the small sleeve just on the loose coat order, it would not be so bad; but, as exaggeration is always the beauty of fashion, the dressmaker endeavors to make the sleeve skin-tight, and it is a physical, mental, and moral impossibility for a woman dressed thus to raise her arms, put on her hat, or exert herself in any fashion. The new sleeve has a flaring ruffle at the elbow, but is tight above and below, ending at the wrist in a bell cuff. This sleeve, the coat and the bishop sleeves, will be the more popular styles during the coming season.

Not every woman will wear at first the small, tight-fitting, and perfectly plain coat-sleeve. It will appear in many and varied designs. One of the new sleeves for tailor gowns is the coat sleeve made a trifle larger than usual. The material is put on the shoulder seam in small plaits, and cut so that the outside arm seam shows all the way down the arm. This seam is then stitched or trimmed with a line of tiny buttons, or in some sleeves the seam is strapped with leather. The bell cuff will be high in favor, and will appear not only on cloth, but silk and organdie gowns. This cuff is exceedingly pretty and graceful, especially if the hand be slender. It may be made to look like a graceful bell, or it may be slashed and trimmed with lace. There is no doubt that before the summer is over the sleeves will all be tight from shoulder to wrist, but as yet the change is a gradual one. Women who do not care to adopt the extremes of fashion will be devoted to the bishop sleeve, which hangs in graceful fulness from shoulder to wrist. The newest bishop sleeves are smaller than ever before, and are made with a variety of different cuffs.

Fancy taffetas, embroidered crépes, soft foulards and moirés are to be immensely popular this year. The patterns are, as a rule, very large. To be sure, there are daintily flowered silks among the novelties, but the distinctly original patterns are large and spreading in character. They are so remarkable that many of them are only suitable when combined with some plain goods or silks. The shot or changeable silks are still worn, but this fabric is now generally used as a foundation, with embroidered flowers and designs upon it. The chiné silks are also popular, but the Pompadour roses are things of yesterday, having been entirely superseded by the more conventional designs. A novelty in silks is cream-colored, with a tiny oval spot in green in it, and embroidered with stiff little baskets of flowers done in old red, something in the style of those worn some fifty years ago.

Stripes are also to be fashionable, both plain, embroidered, and chiné. The graduated stripes appear in new combinations of color both startling and inartistic, but manage to attain a surprising vogue.

There are some pretty conceits for neckwear. Here is one that is especially simple and chic: It has a band of blue ribbon, and over it is a turn-over collar of white embroidered lawn and lace. The ribbon ties in a bow in the back. Another is a turn-over collar, arranged in a high band of white satin beautifully embroidered in gold thread and edged with narrow lace. Under the collar is drawn a scarf of white tulle, which ties in an immense bow under the chin. Tulle is frail at the best, so that the economical damsel had better cut the tulle and fasten the collar in the back. The bow then can be securely sewn and need not be untied.

In the early spring, while fur collars and tippets are still worn, a lace ruche is inserted beneath the rolling collar, or an immense tulle bow with a bunch of violets is worn in front with a delightful effect suggestive of the season.

Some early spring frocks that have recently been imported show a few of the changes in style. An afternoon gown is of fancy green wool, with an untrimmed skirt. The skirt is cut almost straight in front and on the sides, with godets in the back only. The waist has a bertha-shaped empiecement made of green velvet, lined with white satin. This turns away about the bust, showing the white lining. The choker turns over in points on each side, these points being faced with velvet, About the choker is drawn a scarf of white satin, which is caught down in front with a tiny yoke and tied in the back with a fancy bow.

Stockings are very gay this year and are vieing with the rainbow in the brilliancy of their coloring. Black yields precedence to color, and now the fashionable maiden must have her stockings match her frock. Some very charming stockings have the old-fashioned clock instep; others are embroidered with tiny vines or single flowers. More gorgeous stockings have a line of openwork resembling a hemstitched pattern alternating with a delicately embroidered vine. Another new style is ornamented with diamond-shaped bits of open work at intervals from ankle to knee. Of the bright stockings the Scotch plaids are the most popular and the most hideous. A black or brown ground, with hair line stripes in blue, green, yellow, and red is a favorite design.

BABETTE.

The Best of all Cough Medicines is Dr. Acker's English Remedy. It will stop a cough in one night, check a cold in one day, prevent croup, relieve asthma, and cure consumption, if taken in time. It is made on honor, from the purest ingredients and contains neither opium nor morphine. If the little ones have croup or whooping cough, use it promptly.

Three Sizes—25c., 50c. and $1 per bottle. At Druggists.

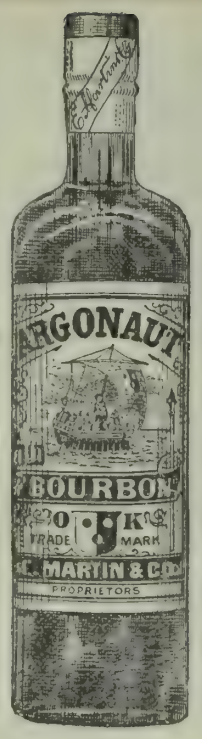
ACKER MEDICINE CO.,
16 and 18 Chambers Street, New York.

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco
33 Post Street, below Kearny, Mechanics' Institute Building
Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000
JAS. D. PHELAN, Pres. GEO. A. STORY, Cashier
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.
DIRECTORS—Jas. D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. P. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.
Interest paid on term and ordinary deposits.
Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.
When opening accounts, send signature.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE
OF LONDON
Incorporated by Royal Charter A. D. 1726
Capital Paid Up, $3,416,100 Assets, $21,584,413
Surplus to Policy Holders, $8,980,251
ROBERT DICKSON, Manager
NATHAN & KINGSTON, San Francisco Agents
501 MONTGOMERY ST.

Sun Insurance Office OF LONDON
Founded A.D. 1710 Cash Assets, $10,270,535
Oldest Purely Fire Insurance Office in the World
The Lion Fire Ins. Co. Ltd., OF LONDON
Established A.D. 1879 Cash Assets, $1,108,095
The Imperial Ins. Co. Ltd., OF LONDON
Instituted A.D. 1803 Cash Assets, $9,362,920
40 Years in Business on the Pacific Coast
Manager for the Pacific Coast, WM. J. LANDERS
205 and 207 Sansome Street, near Pine

Aachen and Munich Fire Insurance Co.
Of Aix La Chapelle, Germany. Established 1805
Capital, $2,250,000.00
Total Assets, $6,854,653.65
United States Department
204 SANSOME STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers



Argonaut OK WHISKEY

IS FIVE YEARS IN WOOD BEFORE BOTTLING

E. MARTIN —AND— CO.

411 MARKET ST.
SAN FRANCISCO

CHARLES S. WHEELER ERNST H. LUDWIG

Ernst H. Ludwig & Co.

THE MODEL AMERICAN CATERERS

Supply Wedding Breakfasts, Luncheons, Dinners, Matinee Teas and Receptions on shortest notice. Also Terrapin Entrees Luncheons and Dinners. Ice Cream, Cake, &c.

Telephone 2388 1206 SUTTER STREET

J. R. SMITH & CO.

230 BUSH STREET
And Room 7, Rotunda, Mills Building

W. HALL, Successor

MERCHANT·TAILORS

Will make garments to order
—At Great Reduction, For Cash—

J. R. SMITH - - Manager

MRS. EDITH E. McLEAN
PHYSICIAN FOR THE HAIR

Has a Canadian Vegetable Tonic for the Hair that will make it grow when all else fails. Dandruff removed. Terms moderate. High-class references.

Office Hours 10 to 12 and 1 to 6. Rooms 45, 58 and 60
ST. ANN'S BUILDING
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

THE GRILL ROOM SERVICE
—OF THE—
PALACE HOTEL

Has been extended to what was formerly the City Restaurant. This immense room, which has a direct entrance from Market Street is known as - - - -

"THE LADIES' GRILL ROOM"

NEW DEPARTURE—CHARACTERIZED BY PROMPT SERVICE—MODERATE CHARGES

$6.50 PER TON DELIVERED

COOS BAY COAL

SOOTLESS
SMOKELESS

Hotel Del Monte

America's Famous Summer and Winter Resort

The Most Elegant Seaside Establishment in the World

"Where a leaf never dies in the still blooming bowers,
And the bee banquets on thro' a whole year of flowers"

G. H. ARNOLD,
—MANAGER—

Monterey, Cal.

Flower Festivals Fiestas Rose Carnivals

. . . and the like, will be the delight of California for the next two or three months.

Santa Barbara Flower Festival, the fame of which is world-wide, and the glory of which, like that of Solomon, is not half told, opens April 15. Queen Flora will reign 3 days an arbitrary and absolute despot.

La Fiesta de Los Angeles, now fixed in the chronology of California feasts, and not less illustrious than its older prototypes, commences April 22, and the riot of fun will spread over 4 days.

The Carnival of Roses, to take place in San Jose, May 6th to 9th, inclusive, though a more recent candidate for favors of the fun-loving world, yet because of the limitless possibilities of the Garden City for anything that is made of roses, is quite as full of promise.

REDUCED RATES

will be made by the SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY for all these brilliant events. Arrange your programmes accordingly, and call on agents for particulars.

COOLGARDIE GOLD FIELDS

(FREMANTLE) AUSTRALIA

ONLY SIX DAYS TO HONOLULU — S.S. AUSTRALIA

First-Class.....$220
Steerage 110
Lowest rates to CAPE TOWN

S.S. "Monowai," via Honolulu and Auckland, Thursday, March 5, 1896, at 2 p. m.

S.S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, March 10, 1896, at 10 A. M.

Special Parties—Reduced special rates for parties, March 10th and April 7th, 1896.

Ticket Office—114 Montgomery St.
Freight Office—327 Market St.

J. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO.,
General Agents

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.

Dispatch Steamers leave San Francisco for ports in Alaska.

For British Columbia and Puget Sound ports, Feb. 19, and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Wednesdays, 9 A. M.

For Newport, Los Angeles and all way ports, every fourth and fifth day, 8 A. M.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Hartford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles (Santa Monica), Redondo (Los Angeles) and Newport, every fourth and fifth day at 11 A. M.

For ports in Mexico, 25th of each month.

Ticket Office, Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.,
GENERAL AGENTS,
10 MARKET ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

THE LICK HOUSE

Occupies the block bounded by Montgomery, Post and Sutter Streets

IT IS—

——scrupulously clean;
——accessible to all street car lines and places of amusement;
——conveniently situated for business men;
——a quiet, model place for a family to spend the winter;
——moderate in price, yet first-class in every particular.

AMERICAN OR EUROPEAN PLAN

K. B. SOULÉ, Manager

ORDER YOUR CARRIAGES AND COUPES OF THE—

PACIFIC CARRIAGE CO.

At Baldwin Hotel
200 Sutter Street, corner Kearny
48 Eighth Street, or
St. Nicholas Hotel, Market and Ninth Streets
Steamer and Train Service a specialty 'Phone 1950

Pacific Towel Co.

Telephone 1780 No. 9 Lick Place, San Francisco

GEO. E. MOORE, Proprietor

Horses Pastured

$1.50 PER MONTH

GOOD FEED AND CARE. Send for circular.

F. A. HYDE, 630 Commercial St.

HIRSCH-KAHN & CO.

MANUFACTURING OPTICIANS

IMPORTERS OF OPTICAL GOODS PHOTOGRAPHIC APPARATUS & SUPPLIES ETC.

333 KEARNY STREET
SAN FRANCISCO CAL.

BAJA CALIFORNIA

DAMIANA BITTERS

"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular.)

NABER, ALFS & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

REMOVAL

Rountrees English Chocolate, Kohlers Swiss Chocolates, and all brands of Foreign and Eastern Confectionery, imported by . . . .

W. L. GREENBAUM,

of 205 SUTTER ST., will, after December 1st, be found in large and commodious quarters at

128 POST ST., Bohemian Club Bldg.

THE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU

510 MONTGOMERY ST., S. F.,

Reads all papers on the Pacific Coast, and supplies clippings on all topics, business and personal.

THE WHITE FLYER IS THE MOUNT FOR '96

BARNES BICYCLES

HOOKER & CO.
16-18 Drumm St.
RETAIL STORE:
1640 Market St.
San Francisco, Cal.

THE WHITE RIMMED HUMMER IS THE COMER

BONESTELL & CO.

Dealers in PAPER

Fine Coated Papers a Specialty

401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

The Latest Italian Winter Goods have arrived

H. S. BRIDGE & CO.

Merchant Tailors

Many Novelties in Imported Wear. Shirts to Order a Specialty.

622 Market Street, San Francisco
(Opposite Palace Hotel)

DR. THOMAS L. HILL

DENTIST

Office, Odd Fellows' Building,
S. W. Cor. Seventh and Market Streets

Office Hours, 9 a. m. to 5 p. m.
Consultation Hours, 4 to 5

GLADDING McBEAN & CO.

MANUFACTURERS

ARCHITECTURAL TERRA COTTA
HOLLOW TILE FIRE PROOFING
SEWER AND CHIMNEY PIPE
PRESSED BRICK, DRAIN TILE, ETC.
1358 & 1360 MARKET STREET, S. F.
MANUFACTORY AT LINCOLN, CAL.

—A—
SAFE GUIDE

No man knows all there is to know about advertising. The subject is too profound, too complex, too perplexing, for any single person, or for any dozen persons, for that matter. The path to success in advertising is full of dangerous places. All business men would do well to engage a safe guide to conduct them past the danger spots—to tell them what to do and what to avoid doing.

PRINTERS' INK

Is a weekly journal for advertisers, published at 10 Spruce St., New York. It is a magazine of ideas, of suggestions, of advice. Advertisers the world over read it and write for it. It is the advertising authority of America—probably of the globe. Business men will find it a safe guide. To secure its services as guide costs $2 a year. A sample copy costs nothing.

THE WAVE CLUBBING LIST

FOR 1896

By special arrangement with the Publishers, THE WAVE is prepared to offer the following list

SUBSCRIPTIONS MUST BE PAID IN ADVANCE

THE WAVE and	CENTURY	$6 00
" "	ARENA	5 00
" "	LITTELL'S LIVING AGE	7 75
" "	ART AMATEUR	5 75
" "	LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE	4 50
" "	MUNSEY'S	3 50
" "	ATLANTIC MONTHLY	5 75
" "	YOUTH'S COMPANION	3 75
" "	NEW ENGLAND MAGAZINE	5 00
" "	HARPER'S MAGAZINE	5 50
" "	HARPER'S WEEKLY	5 70
" "	HARPER'S BAZAAR	5 70
" "	HARPER'S ROUND TABLE	4 00
" "	SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE	5 00
" "	REVIEW OF REVIEWS	4 50
" "	ST. NICHOLAS	5 00
" "	OVERLAND	4 75
" "	COSMOPOLITAN	3 50
" "	FRANK LESLIE'S MAGAZINE	4 90
" "	PUCK	6 50
" "	JUDGE	6 50
" "	LIFE	7 00
" "	LIFE'S COMEDY	3 50
" "	LESLIE'S WEEKLY	5 70
" "	DEMOREST MAGAZINE	4 00
" "	SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN	5 00
" "	SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN SUPPLEM'T	6 50
" "	N. Y. DAILY SUN	8 00
" "	" SUNDAY "	4 50
" "	CASSELL MAGAZINE	3 75
" "	ARGOSY	3 50
" "	PUBLIC OPINION	4 50
" "	SUNDAY WORLD	4 75
" "	CRITIC	5 50
" "	FORUM	5 00
" "	NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW	6 50
" "	TABLE TALK	3 25
" "	NINETEENTH CENTURY	6 25
" "	CONTEMPORARY REVIEW	6 25
" "	FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW	6 25
" "	BLACKWOODS MAGAZINE	6 25
" "	TRUTH	6 25
" "	DELINEATOR	3 50
" "	VOGUE	5 50
" "	TOWN TOPICS	7 50
" "	DAILY JOURNAL	5 00
" "	SUNDAY JOURNAL	3 75
" "	ILLUS. AMERICAN	5 75

TALES OF THE DAY.

A well-known politician, canvassing for votes near Phillippi, in West Virginia, came to a cabin where a young woman was holding a man on the ground by his ears. "Done got enough?" she asked. "I give up," he said. Then the girl released the man, who went away looking very much abashed. "What's the trouble?" inquired the politician. "Thar wa'n't no trouble," replied the girl. "He jus' axed me ter marry 'im, an' I've allus said I wouldn't marry any man I could whop. Kinder looks like I couldn't fin' one. I've tried mos' of 'em 'round hyar, an' none of 'em ain't any good. I tol' 'im all about it, an' I didn' want ter whop this un much, but he jes' went down soon as I tackled 'im. I reckon I'll hev ter be an old maid. I kain't abide havin' no man that ain't mo' of a man than me."

Senator Vest is a plain man—plain in his dress, his likes, and his speech. He went into the Senate restaurant a few days ago. "Dick," said he to the waiter, "I want a plate of cold turkey." "Yes, sir," said the man, as he moved away. "And, Dick," said the Senator, calling him back, "I don't want it decorated with any of that d—— grass, either!"

And so when the plate of cold turkey appeared the usual garnishing of green parsley was omitted.

James W. Morrissey, the inventor of the Emma Abbott kiss and other incidents of dramatic life, tells of an incident in his management of Mademoiselle Rhea. It was at a western junction and the train was late. On its arrival, a polite attendant walked up to the Belgian actress and her manager, and said: "This way to the rear coach." Rhea opened wide her beautiful black eyes, put on her prettiest smile, and exclaimed: "Good gracious! They have named a car for me already! Thank you—thank you!"

Two characteristic stories of Tom Reed's quickness at repartee are told in The Atlantic. When as speaker he was counting a quorum in the House, one angry Democrat strode down the aisle, exclaiming, "How do you know I am present?" Reed replied: "Does the gentleman deny that he is present?" A prosy Democratic member, in the course of a debate, remarked that he would rather be right than be President. "Don't be alarmed," Reed replied. "You will never be either."

"I was in what is known as the 'flag pond' district of Unicoi County, Tenn.," said a traveling man to a Star writer, "when a young man rode up in front of the cabin where I was stopping and spoke to a girl, who was dipping water from a spring.

"'Howdy, Sal.'

"'Howdy, Tom.'

"'Come, jump on the hoss an' go to Erwin with me.'

"'What fur?'

"'Ter git married.'

"'But yo' hain't done co'ted me yit.'

"'I know I hain't, but I've been too pestered with work. I allus intended to marry yer, though.'

"'But I hain't got no clo's,' remonstrated the girl.

"'Well, we'll jess ride on yon side of Erwin to Sister Mag's in the cove, an' I'll git yer a dress.'

"'Sho'ly, Tom?'

"'Sho'ly, Sal.'

"'What kin' of a dress?'

"'Best thar is in Lowe's sto'.'

"Not another word was said. Sal dropped the bucket and jumped on the horse, shouting to her mother:

"'Mam, me an' Tom is going ter git married at Erwin. We'll be by here in the mornin'.'

"The mother started as if to call her back, but the horse was galloping down the lane, and she went and carried in the bucket of water without comment."

The reputation of journalism in France is not high, though there the individual journalist has loftiest standing. At the playgoers' dinner in London recently, Mr. Spence of the Pall Mall Gazette told that when traveling in France in his bachelor days, he used to describe himself as "journalist" in filling up the answers to the hotel-keeper's list of questions, and he noticed that, though his clothes were decent and his luggage was heavy—chiefly with old pewters and brasses—the hotel-keepers would never accept his check. On his first expedition to France after his marriage, he was going to set down "journalist" as his profession, when his wife—partly French by birth, and, therefore, "in the know"—stopped him, and said: "Put avocat instead." He has followed her advice, and never since had any difficulty about getting checks cashed.

Mrs. Anna Fall, the woman lawyer of Malden, Massachusetts, thus defines kissing: "Osculation may be taken to mean, in the eyes of the law, the act of two mouths coming together so as to have a common curvature at the point of contact."

FREE EDUCATION AND PROFESSIONAL TRAINING

"THE WAVE'S" LIBERAL SUBSCRIPTION OFFER.

This is the age of Education. To accomplish aught in business, in the professions, in the arts or in science, training is necessary. In every line of endeavor there is much that the beginner must learn. Would he be a miner, it is better that he know engineering, and it is essential that he study geology, chemistry, assaying. Would a woman become an actress or a musician or an artist—no matter what the degree of her talent and perseverance, it is necessary first that she study and work in some recognized institution. The finest voice, the highest genius, is but the diamond in the rough. To give out its inherent light and brilliancy, it must be cut and polished by skilled workmen. But education costs money; not to every one is it given to enjoy the means by which training may be had. To become a doctor or a lawyer requires years of study, costs for fees and books and instructions. To become a surveyor or an assayer requires less time, but is yet a costly course. To become an actress, an elocutionist, a musician, necessitates study under the best masters.

ALL THIS THE WAVE WILL AFFORD IN RETURN FOR SUBSCRIPTIONS, ANNUALLY AND SEMI-ANNUALLY, OR QUARTERLY.

The proprietors of THE WAVE have made arrangements with the most prominent schools and colleges throughout the State, and are now prepared to offer scholarships and courses in the leading educational institutions free of charge, for all who will obtain subscribers to this popular weekly.

UNIVERSITY COURSES.

A single year's course at the University of California, or at the Leland Stanford Junior University, for 185 annual subscribers. This offer includes room and board, and all other necessary expenses attached to the course. For 750 subscribers we offer a four years' course.

MEDICAL COURSES.

One year at the Cooper Medical College will be given for 125 subscribers. This includes books and incidental expenses attached to the course.

A single term at the Medical Department of the University of California for 100 subscribers.

For 500 annual subscribers we offer the full four years' course at the Cooper Medical College. This offer includes all incidental costs and fees, except board and lodging.

We offer the four years' course at the Medical Department of the University of California, for 400 subscribers.

The two year's course at the State Normal School at San Jose, for 600 subscribers. This offer includes board, lodging, and books. A single year for 160 subscribers.

The course at Hastings Law College for 250 annual subscribers. This includes books and other expenses attached to the College, for a period of three years, and the privilege of studying in a first-class law office.

A three years' course at the Mark Hopkins Institute of Art for 250 annual subscribers. A year's course for 85 subscribers.

A course in any department of Van der Nailen's School of Electricity and Engineering (except Department of Assaying) will be given for 125 annual subscribers. A course in the Department of Assaying) for 20 annual subscribers.

A six months' course in either the Business Department, or the Department of Stenography and Typewriting of Heald's Business College, for 50 annual subscribers.

A nine months' course in the Columbia School of Dramatic Art for 75 annual subscribers.

A three months' course at the Meisterschaft School of Languages for 40 annual subscribers.

The course at the California School of Elocution and Oratory for 35 annual subscribers.

Tuition in music, vocal or instrumental, from Francis Stuart, S. G. Fleishmann, J. H. Dohrmann, Sigmund Beel, Nathan Landsberger, Lesley Martin, or H. J. Stewart. A course of twenty lessons from any of these gentlemen for fifty annual subscribers. For 100 annual subscribers a course of twenty lessons each in piano, singing, harmony, or any other branch of music.

Once in a While

You may have a sudden bilious attack or headache when it is impossible for you to leave your work. If you have a box of Ripans Tabules at hand, a single one taken at the first symptom will relieve you.

Ripans Tabules: Sold by druggists, or by mail if the price (50 cents a box) is sent to The Ripans Chemical Company, No. 10 Spruce St., New York.

Ask your Blacksmith to shoe your horse with
PHŒNIX HORSE SHOES
GIVE THEM A TRIAL

GEORGE E. HALL
Agent and Importer of Foreign Wines
MUTUAL LIFE BUILDING,
222 Sansome Street

Latest Styles in— FINE HARNESS
J. O'KANE San Francisco New York
767 MARKET STREET

CRESTA BLANCA WINES
AWARDED
THREE HIGHEST AWARDS
AT
THE ATLANTA EXPOSITION
OF SIX MEDALS
AWARDED TO CALIFORNIA
Cresta Blanca Wines
OBTAINED THREE
WETMORE-BOWEN CO.
140 Montgomery Street
Under Occidental Hotel

UP-TO-DATE
TAILORING
AT MODERATE PRICES
J. H. HAWES
Mezzanine B, Crocker Building

COTTON SAIL DUCKS
22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard
ALSO
Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks
From 30 to 120 inches wide
Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks
Manufactured by Murphy, Grant & Co.
Mount Vernon Company Baltimore — Pacific Coast Sole Agents

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention
A QUIET HOME CENTRALLY LOCATED
OCCIDENTAL HOTEL
SAN FRANCISCO
WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

ABRAMSON-HEUNISCH CO. (Incorporated)
IMPORTERS AND JOBBERS OF
Brewers' and Bottlers' Supplies, Corks, Druggists' Glassware, Etc.
26-28 Main St. San Francisco

THE WAVE

VOL. XV. NO. 10. SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 7, 1896. PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE WAVE

Is published every Saturday, at the Crocker Building, corner Market and Post Streets, San Francisco.

SUBSCRIPTION, $3 per year, $1.50 six months, $.75 three months. Foreign subscriptions (countries in postal union) $5 per year. Sample copies free on application. The trade is supplied by the San Francisco News Co., 210 Post Street; East of the Rocky Mountains by the American News Co., New York.

THE WAVE is kept on file and is for sale at Brentano's, 17 Avenue de'l Opera, Paris, France; 31 Union Square, New York City; 1015 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.; and 206 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

ADVERTISING rates and all other matters pertaining to the business of the paper, address Rooms 220-221-222 Crocker Building. Eastern Agent, E. Katz, 186-187 World Building, New York.

HARRISON M. PARKER, BUSINESS MANAGER.

Entered at San Francisco Post-office as second-class matter

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY.

SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 7, 1896.

CONTENTS.

EDITORIALS—
Spain, Cuba, and the United States 1
Reason and Unreason 1
Marriage as a Joke 2
The Voice of the Agitator.... 2
The Victory of a Trick..... 3
Pulpit Politicians..... 3
Foster's Federal Constitution 3
STORY—The Lord of the Dynamos—By H. G. Wells..... 4
CAUSERIE—By John Bonner.... 5
THINGS AND PEOPLE—By The Witness..... 6
THE REAL PADEREWSKI — By Etc. Jr..... 7
A CHAT WITH MARSICK—By E. D. H..... 7
BEARDSLEY'S QUARTERLY—By Oracle K. B..... 8
THE THEATERS—By Peg Woffington..... 9
THE WEEK IN SOCIETY — By The Gossip 10, 11
RIPPLES—Presumably Humorous—By Bruno.....12
MUSIC—By P. C. A 13
Spring Fashions—By Babette..14
The Wheel.....14

MISCELLANEOUS.

New Books..... 8
The Magazines..... 8
Dramatic Notes..... 9
Tales of the Day.....16

Recently several cases have been brought to the attention of THE WAVE in which young men, anxious to secure an education, had undertaken to work their way through the University. The spirit that hungers for knowledge is not met with as frequently as one might wish, but the example of the youth in question has led the proprietors of THE WAVE to devise some means by which such persons, either male or female, might secure the education which they sought. On page 16 of this issue may be found an offer of scholarships at either of the two Universities, offers of the facilities of reputable business colleges, medical colleges, schools of electrical, mining, mechanical and civil engineering and architecture, schools of dramatic art, and scholarships at the Meisterschaft School of Languages and schools of elocution and oratory. In addition to these, THE WAVE has been enabled to make arrangements with Nathan Landsberger, S. M. Fleishman, H. J. Stewart, Sigmund Beel, J. H. Dohrman, and Lesley Martin, for courses in vocal and instrumental music, including piano, organ, harmony, and vocal art. This offer is something of a novelty in California, and is not lacking in generous features.

SPAIN, CUBA, AND THE UNITED STATES.

The attention of the world has been called, during the week, to the almost forgotten fact that there is such a country as Spain. A few misguided and riotous students, by tearing the flag of the United States and stoning the American Consulate, have elevated the peninsula into prominence, and made men think of the Spain that was, and contrast her with the Spain that is. It is now almost the twentieth century and Spain occupies even a more insignificant position than she did at the dawning of the tenth century. Her proudest day was that of Charles V., something over three centuries ago; and from the time of his son, Phillip II., her decline has been rapid and her history unworthy, save and except for the gallant and patriotic fight made against Napoleon. Of the entire Western Hemisphere, including both continents, which was hers by right of discovery and most of which she claimed by right of conquest, only two comparatively insignificant islands remain to her. That country, at the threat of which Europe trembled three centuries ago, is now defied by a beggarly army of untrained and poorly equipped rebels in her most important province. And this is the country that prates of proclaiming war with the United States because Congress has requested the President to recognize the Cuban patriots as belligerents! Spain knows we would have no war with her. Not that we would fear such a war or would recede from any position we might take out of sentiment for the land that started Columbus on his world-making voyage, but for the better reason that she is too small, too insignificant, too unworthy the honor. The fighting spirit of Americans is no more aroused over the possibility of war with Spain than would be that of Hercules over the wry face made by some woodland sprite. It must fill the heart of the Spaniard with bitterness to see how different the reception given his threat of war from that given the bluster of John Bull some weeks ago. There is no disguising the fact that we, as a people, are getting somewhat "willin'." We are not looking for a fight, neither are we struggling to avoid one, but when the time comes, we want, as the street gamin would say, "to go up against somebody our own size."

A war with Spain would be exceedingly unpopular in America, even if every student in Spain used the Stars and Stripes as a handkerchief. If we want anything that Spain has, we have money enough to buy it, and Spain would rather have money than a fight in these degenerate days. No excuse for the Spanish war talk has as yet been given. The recognition of the Cuban patriots as belligerents is a right we have, and so conservative an expression is one for which Spain should be grateful. As long ago as 1825, Henry Clay, then Secretary of State under John Quincy Adams, declared that "Even Spain has not such a deep interest in such a multiplicity of forms in the future fate of Cuba, whatever that future may be, as the United States." At that time Cuba was in rebellion and we so far interfered as to instruct our Ambassador at St. Petersburg to urge the Emperor to persuade Spain to give up the hopeless struggle. We even went further, and informed Spain that under certain conditions "the Government of the United States might feel obliged to interpose."

Seventy years, and Cuba is again struggling for freedom. The rule of Spain has been tyrannous, brutal, inequitable, and hated. Prompted by the example of the American colonies and by that of the South American states, and urged by patriotic sentiment and their own future welfare, the people of Cuba have risen in rebellion, declared and established a provisional government, and provided, equipped, and sustained an army which has driven the Spaniards within the walls of Havana. Spain has sent to control its forces a General noted for his inhumanity and ferocity; a wild animal has been turned loose on a people whose only offense is their hatred of tyranny. For one year there has been a popular government in Cuba. Are we premature in recognizing these rebels as belligerents? It has been laid down by the New York Court of Appeals that "when a portion of the citizens of a civil government has rebelled, established another government, resorted to arms to maintain it, and the rebellion is of such magnitude that the military and naval forces of the government have been called out to suppress it, they are to be regarded as belligerents."

All these conditions obtain in Cuba. Why, then, should offense be given if the fact is recognized and these struggling people are called by their right name?

The authority quoted above continues: "To create belligerent rights, it is not necessary that there should be war between separate and independent powers; they may exist between the parties to a civil war. A civil war exists whenever the regular course of justice is interrupted by revolt, rebellion, or insurrection, so that the courts cannot be kept open." The decrees of the Spanish courts are set at defiance throughout the greater part of the island of Cuba; hence, civil war exists, and in recognizing the revolutionists as belligerents, we take no side, but simply recognize a fact. The real meaning of the Senate's resolutions is that Spain must fight Cuba fairly, man to man, nation to nation, and it is to be hoped that the Administration will make the most of this opportunity to further impress on Europe the significance to the American mind of the Monroe Doctrine. We don't want Cuba, as Senator Sherman said, but we do want peace along our borders, and Spain should be made to know that there is a limit to the time we will allow a foreign fleet to lie at our doors killing the commerce we would carry on with a friendly people.

REASON AND UNREASON.

The Kentucky Legislature has refused to repeal the charter of the Southern Pacific Company. Only eight beggarly votes were registered in favor of the repealing Act. There was never anything but a disgraceful hatred and spite behind the movement. Reason was not its prompting spirit. Indeed, the economical and proper management of the railroads, efficiency of service, the safety of the traveling public, all argue strongly in favor of some such central organization as the Kentucky corporation. To have succeeded in this adventure against it, to have deprived it of a corporate existence, would have answered no good purpose. It would have been a victory of malice over reason, of hatred over justice, and of misrule over law and order. Neither the State nor its people would have benefited to the slightest extent by the Act; only a useless and annoying derangement of railway affairs would have followed, contributing to no end but the intense glee of the discharged railroad employees, and other wreckers.

Another happening during the week, and one for which we are profoundly grateful, was the decision in the Stanford suit. Except for the fact that the final determination of the case removes from her the oppressive burden of uncertainty, Mrs. Stanford is not to be congratulated as much over the victory, probably, as is the State itself, its youth, and its unborn children. The store of wealth and benefits impounded by this legal controversy, being let loose, contributes nothing to her individual comfort; but rather multiplies her cares, increases her burdens, and crowds new responsibilities in upon her declining years. Hers, certainly, is a most heroic figure in our history. When the world learns what she has undergone to maintain, unimpaired and undisturbed in its integrity, the great University founded in the name of her dead boy, it will marvel that a lonely and grief-stricken woman should have unmurmuringly sacrificed so much, and levied such onerous taxes on her comfort and her physical health for the well-being of mankind. The motherhood of coming generations will bless her memory, and manhood acknowledge its debt of gratitude to her. The burdens of posterity will be lighter because she has lived. Of the press, it must be said that even the portion of it most given over to abuse was kind and even generous to Mrs. Stanford throughout the litigation. Such an evidence of decency is not without its cheering features.

"The Wave" does not consider the daily press entirely a hopeless lot. True, its policy generally follows along the line of profit. It is sometimes vindictive, and often with premeditation adopts a policy beneath contempt. It is frequently mistaken, often unreasonable, and not seldom flies in the face of decency and assails the interests of the very State, the protection of which it claims to be its highest duty.

There are some interests in this State toward which the daily press appears to be deliberately and intentionally unjust. We believe the condition can be mended, and that, too, without resorting to mean methods. From our point of view, the Railway Company had not yielded enough consideration to the newspaper liar. The Sacramento Record-Union refuses to believe there is any hope for the falsifying scribbler, and is not inclined to accede to the full extent suggested by us that the railway corporation should concern itself with nailing the lies of the daily press in relation to its business. Perhaps there is some basis for its assertion that one cannot corner a newspaper liar. The Record-Union claims it is absolutely useless to attempt to wring the truth from the unscrupulous press, or to crowd a word of verity into its columns, inasmuch as that press feeds upon every denial and vindication for the production of a new batch of viperish untruths. Conceding all this, however, one may at least convict the liar of the crime, and correct the misapprehension he has created among men who desire to be honest and impartial. The constant reiteration of a lie gives to it the color of truth unless denied. The constant, one-sided statement of alleged facts, inimical to the railway corporations of this State, has produced a condition of public mind that is far from healthy, and has often made it difficult for officers influenced by public opinion to render unto the railways even fair treatment. An unhealthy condition of public mind is a detriment to every citizen of the Commonwealth, and the larger the interest involved the greater the benefits that flow from a healthy state of public mind. While it may be impossible to compel a liar to speak the truth, there is something due and owing to decency and to decent men. To refuse to correct the falsehoods so common against it, is to confess a reckless disregard for public opinion, and lends excuse to the opposition of honest men to its undertakings. The public should not be left floundering about 'twixt doubt and belief in a matter of this sort. There is danger to every citizen of the community in the spirit of hatred and malice that is being engendered. We hold to the doctrine that the law insuring to the citizen his life, his liberty, and his property, is the same law which guards and prevents encroachments upon corporate rights. We maintain that if the rights of the individual citizen are ever crippled, whittled down, or destroyed, it will be done in response to some popular demand against some unpopular corporation, and only after the mischief is irreparable will the blunder be discovered. To invade or impair corporate property rights is to imperil the rights of every citizen of the Nation. The integrity of a principle does not depend upon the popularity or unpopularity of the individual evoking its protection. It is the shield of the weak as well as of the strong; the safeguard of the hated as well as of the popular. Holding firmly to these views, we feel that educational efforts in this behalf are not misspent.

So far as our California railway corporations are concerned, it would not be a bad idea for them to educate the men who draw their salaries from the corporation. They more than often believe the falsehoods told of their employer, and are quite as often apologists for their employment. The lack of ability among them to justify or to explain false charges made in their presence frequently gives the color of truth to falsehood. The writer has in mind a gentleman connected with the institution whom the boys of the daily press maintain to be as strongly anti-railroad as they are themselves. They further declare that had he the power, this or that wrong would be promptly corrected and this or that oppression removed. He protects himself from personal assault by appearing to agree with these harpies of the press, but he damns his employer in the doing of it. A short while ago, in a controversy pending before the Oakland City Council, wherein was involved the extension of a street in which the corporation was interested, the railway company was represented, in part, by a division superintendent. Discussion over the subject of the street opening grew warm. A member of the City Council with cheerful irrelevancy announced his opposition to the corporation's desires in the matter of the street because the railway discriminated as to freight rates against Oakland. The officer of the company had no reply to make to this charge, but indignantly declared, "You mustn't punish us for the sins of the freight department. We are not responsible for their discriminations against Oakland." It does not require the assistance of a surgeon to demonstrate that this kind of ignorance is a something which ought not to exist.

The mere presence of a railroad man often suggests the discussion of the railroad question, and it happens only too frequently that the employee, whose interest begins with his salary, and ends there, too, for that matter, when questioned as to the truth of a fresh newspaper lie, is stupidly ignorant, and strongly inclined to admit a wrong where probably no wrong exists. Lack of information is, as often as deliberate intent, the prime cause of railroad animosity. We have in mind an editorial writer whose employment had called from him editorials severely censuring the corporation. He confessed that, until he had read the statement in these columns, he never knew the corporation had set aside a single dollar toward the payment of its Government indebtedness. And this was but one of the confessions he made to an ignorance of facts the contrary to which he had been preaching for years.

There is no good sane reason why a business enterprise in the hands of a corporation should be hated any more than a business enterprise in the hands of an individual. In the abstract, there is nothing to hate about a railroad; ties and rails and fish-plates and spikes are not calculated to conjur up hatred. A man cannot say that he hates a train of cars or the rails it runs upon. These things are, in themselves, developers. They are a benefit rather than a curse, a help instead of a detriment. It is intensely stupid to declare that any corporation is throttling or retarding or destroying the interests of a State traversed by its line of railway. Such an act would be simply suicidal. If any one has an interest in the material development of the State it is the carrier. The mere statement of such a charge answers itself. About the only way that it is possible for a railway corporation to throttle interests or retard enterprise is by charging enormous freight rates, a continuance of which is a constant invitation to a rival railroad to enter the territory and share the spoils where such charges are possible. It is a fundamental rule of railway management that industry and enterprise must be encouraged in the territory through which it runs. It is as necessary to its profits, it is as necessary to its life, that Jones or Green or White, living along the line of their iron highway, should succeed and prosper, as it is to Jones himself; for upon their thrift, upon their industry, upon their success depends the success of the railway itself. It often happens that the enforcement of a general rule will work a peculiar hardship in a given case, and that is so, even in the law, which is supposed to be the acme of justice. It is, no doubt, the application of this general rule that often gives rise to many of the complaints made against the railways, not only here but throughout the Union. They have, in legal practise, a thing called equity, which is a correction of law wherein, by reason of its universality, it is deficient, or may work hardships. Perhaps there is something discoverable in railroad management which might occupy the same relation to it that equity does to the law.

Coming down to the question of animosities displayed in certain quarters toward our California railways, there are reasons existing outside of freight or passenger rates which tend to engender this feeling of hatred. A citizen cannot hate the road itself, and one must look further than the ties and rails for the cause of so much feeling. Large institutions, such as this, must of necessity employ thousands of men. In some neighborhoods, a single individual stands for the corporation. One may well imagine two stations in the San Joaquin Valley, at one of which is an agent, surly, impolite, and over-bearing, unaccommodating to the shipper, and to the neighboring farmer and townsman, while but a few miles distant is another agent of an exactly opposite temperament. These men, so far as the neighborhoods wherein they dwell are concerned, stand for the corporation, represent it, speak for it, and are in point of fact the railway itself. It is easily conceivable that the surly man might breed in the community wherein he lives, a deep hostility, not only toward himself but toward his employer. One need not run to remote possibilities to declare that the feeling of hatred will find expression in the jury-box, at the polls, and in the legislature. While one agent may breed strife, another, but a few miles away, may be responsible for an altogether different and better kind of feeling in the community. Perhaps in the last few lines above written, may be found a reason for much of the anti-railroad feeling. Perhaps it may explain why many are all too willing to believe the evil stories told of the railway managers. Perhaps the surly station agent has been promoted; perhaps he occupies a position bringing him in contact with the great public. Perhaps there is too little thought of public opinion; too little care of what others think; too much recklessness of the rights of others. And perhaps, too, were this evil mended, and the accommodating agent substituted for the surly employee, there might be another and a better feeling; and the every-day citizen, who may now feel the sting of insult ringing in his ears, would then obtain a fair hearing, and go abroad with the knowledge that he had been fairly treated. Perhaps this is where education in railway matters might begin.

MARRIAGE AS A JOKE.

That marriage as a joke is a failure, will probably be conceded by any thoughtful man who takes time to pass judgment upon a question, apparently, so trivial. That any one should explain his own marriage on the basis that it was "only a joke," would naturally be accepted as a frank but round-about confession to being a fool of peculiar and irritating density. Such a groom is now a prevalent curio. He invites attention to himself by many words, and he affords a convenient object-lesson. Having made this use of him, it will be pleasure to bid him farewell, wondering at his luck in evading an asylum where the weak mind is a specialty.

Aside from the circumstance of being born, and the inevitable circumstance of dying, getting married may justly be reckoned the important event of the human career. The marriage ceremony has rightly become invested with a dignity almost sacred. The civil contract is regarded oftentimes as merely an essential part of this proceeding, and yet where the marriage is wholly civil there is in the compact a natural solemnity and effect that does not obtain in the closing of a realty deal or the recording of a mortgage. To step to the altar and take upon oneself vows that it is expected shall remain inviolate until death, is not the fitting climax to a jest. To invite a woman to wed in the same spirit that she might be asked to take a spin in the park, argues a mental void, and her acceptance in a similar spirit shows the foolishness to be mutual. But the groom to announce later that he was joking, adds insult to irreparable and wanton injury. He pleads drunkenness as a mitigating fact, but it really adds to the gravity of the offense. A man who is sober enough to secure a license and pay for it, to hand to the presiding justice the customary fee, and not excite suspicion that an intoxicated soul lurks within his person and guides his unfaltering footsteps, is sober enough to be disciplined. The habit of winding up a mild spree by getting married is not one to be encouraged. It adds a new peril to the mild spree, and establishes a dangerous precedent.

The loose marriage laws of California have in the past been a source of wrong, and a cause of reproach. It has been possible for rogues to make a pretense of getting married in good faith. Children have been enabled to evade parents and guardians, and be made boy and wife. Many crimes can be traced to the fact that marriage has not been hedged about with proper safeguards, and the sweeping away of the statutes permitting practises repugnant to ideas of social propriety, was a beneficent act too long delayed. But marriage pre-supposes the possession of intelligence on the part of the contracting parties. When a man can get married one day, and lightly excuse himself the next on the plea that he was joking, the written law has been violated, and the unwritten law which prescribes decency has been outraged. One incident of this sort would not be so distressing, except that it reveals possibilities. There are, doubtless, other mutton-headed young men who will be attracted by the idea without having an adequate reception of its seriousness. Such an occurrence could only have resulted from a wholly false estimate of the dignity of marriage. Common observation would naturally have impressed this in an ordinary mind, but there are minds not subject to wholesome impressions. Having noted that people rush into marriage with undue haste, this brilliant groom permitted himself to rush likewise. He represents the crystalized teachings of the unwise statutes, now abrogated, but not forgotten. Marriage could not be so lightly held for years, as it was held in California, without producing a demoralizing effect.

The outcome of this hasty and unhappy union—this rare jest of an adolescent wit—will probably be decided in court, unless some indignant father club the joker into a new jurisdiction. The exact outcome is not of public interest perhaps, but it is certain to be so different from that to be expected from a marriage between sane people that it conveys a salutary lesson. The next practical joker who shall feel his blithesome nature struggling to manifest itself in outward and visible sign, would be wiser to precipitate himself from the highest building he could find. In this event his course might be laid to eccentricity or accident, or something else plausible and respectable.

THE VOICE OF THE AGITATOR.

That the laboring men of this country have grievances nobody is inclined to deny. To be without them they would have to be translated to some sphere where human frailty is unknown. But in casting about for remedies for their ills, the workmen often add to their burdens, and in the adoption of radical methods, it is not of record that they have ever lightened the load. One mistake that is common, and yet so palpable that wonder grows it should ever be tolerated, is in listening to the voice of the agitator, an individual who prospers by the distress of those he vociferously pretends to befriend, and who leads into errors from which retreat is impossible, and in which ultimate defeat is assured.

Sometimes willing hands can find nothing to do, and the clamor for an opportunity to earn money merges into an actual clamor for bread. At such times in San Francisco large sums have been raised, not as a charity, but as a justice, and devoted to the hiring of men to do work in the Park—work that otherwise would not, perhaps, have been begun for years. It has not been practicable on such occasions to pay greater wages than a dollar a day, so as to add to the life of the fund. What has been the result? Invariably the agitator has raised his howl of protest at the "cutting of wages," has hung about the crowd of men who were glad to earn a dollar for their families, and has tried to incite among them indignation in place of gratitude. Oakland once devised a similar scheme, a generous citizen donating land which was to be used in filling a marsh. Quickly the agitator appeared on the scene. What! Pay men a dollar a day? Not if the agitator could prevent it; and he could and did. The land was never leveled, the marsh never filled, the money never expended. The agitator triumphed; and the men on hose behalf he howled, continued to walk the streets ngry.

In the same blind way men are led into strikes. here is not here space for anything like a review of cent strikes, but it is instructive to learn from official ports covering last year, that strikes resulted in a rect loss to labor of $35,000,000, and employers st about $29,000,000. There were also many lock-ts, losses being to labor $12,000,000, and to capital lf this sum. To offset these vast totals labor has re and there secured a trifling victory. An intel-gent man has only to glance at these figures to learn at the profit in strikes is in not having them. In ldition to actual loss in money there has been the dis-mfort and expense of battling criminal charges, and veral, perhaps well-meaning, but certainly misguided, en have served, or are still serving time in prison. et the voice of the agitator is ever for war, and the rong hand of labor refrains from smiting him across e mouth. The forbearance is unseemly; patience is ot always a virtue.

Only the other day a man who had been talkative nd otherwise prominent in the Carnegie strike, boasted hat he had since then prevented the Carnegie Com-any from getting a ten-million-dollar contract from Russia, and one nearly half as large from Japan. Will e kindly explain, if this be true, which it probably is ot, what he accomplished by it for the cause of labor, hat, in theory, is so dear to him? Million-dollar con-racts mean the expenditure of large sums in wages. Driving the contracts to foreign lands is an odd thing o boast about. Perhaps the great heart of the boaster earns over the foreign laborer to whose interests he so eadily sacrifices the interests of his fellow citizens. Such spite work is costly and suicidal. Not long ago a San Francisco paper by decrying, and without reason, he work of a local shipbuilding concern, lost to this nstitution the chance of making contracts with a for-eign government, that would have meant to this city the distribution of no less than a million dollars in wages. But the paper is not bragging about its feat. Bragging s left to the professional friend of labor.

There is now a manifest tendency to oppose the pro-posed system of coast defenses on the ground that it is a scheme of the capitalist to farther arm himself against he larger body of men who are not capitalists. Such a charge, of course, falls to the ground by the weight of its own rank idiocy. The coast defenses will involve the expenditure of many millions of dollars for a long term of years. A great part of this sum must of neces-sity be devoted to wages, and the wages go to the laborer of every grade, from the man who uses the shovel to the skilled artisan who casts a cannon. The defenses once completed would defy foreign foes and remove forever the possibility that a hostile fleet could approach our shores and do, by a single onslaught or by a single demand for indemnity, damage amounting to more than the entire cost of the system planned. Directly or indirectly, the citizens of the nation would pay for the work, it is true, but taxes rest lightly on people who are employed regularly at good wages. All the work could be accomplished in its vast entirety without any perceptible drain on the national resources. Then why should the workingman, above all, object to it?

The inclination to think that every move made by Congress is inimical to labor, and calls for opposition, is an inexplicable absurdity, but it is carried beyond this, and applied to every move for public advancement. The charge has even been made in a gathering of work-men in San Francisco that the new charter is aimed against their interests. How can workmen without open indignation listen to such perversion of the truth? The new charter is designed for the protection of tax-payers, for a check upon official greed. It is opposed by every machine politician, by every wicked influence in this city. It is the only hope of the people for a clean municipal government, and the voice of the agi-tator proclaiming the contrary is the voice of an enemy. Yet for the voice to be in evidence and to obtain a hearing is nothing of a surprise. Its reception shows the popular desire to be humbugged.

The workingmen are greatly in the majority. Would they but cast off the meddlesome and conscienceless agitator they could be their own masters. They could, without violence, do the dictating. There is no need for them to wear a yoke, and there is no inclination on the part of anybody to make them wear it. They have simply listened to the agitator, been deluded by his sophistry and fed him for being a menace to their welfare and a nuisance to everybody. He is the real enemy they have to fear.

THE VICTORY OF A TRICK.

There are some things that even a Republican State Central Committee cannot with impunity attempt to do. It cannot afford to stoop to low cunning and deceit; it cannot afford to father brazen falsehoods; it cannot af-ford to open up a Presidential campaign with a lie upon its lips, deceit within its heart, and treachery as its watchword. It cannot afford to do these things upon the opening of a campaign, and at the same time hope to inspire confidence abroad in the integrity of its future undertakings. These unholy attributes belong not to State and National politics. They are the offspring and creatures of the ward clubs in the foulest quarters of the city, and should have their abiding place only among the scum and wreckage of political life. Cer-tainly they have no place in the central political organ-ization of a great National party.

We have not the slightest interest in the political aspirations of Mr. Spreckels, nor, for that matter, have we any interest in any other faction or individual of the Republican Party. No party boss or party lash shall direct our policy during the coming campaign, or devi-ate our course by a hair's breadth, from what we con-sider the way of truth and honesty. It is our purpose to exercise in these columns the functions and preroga-tives of an independent American citizen; and we shall not hesitate to point out, even if found within the ranks of the party whose ticket we may support, the short-comings, the wrongs and evils which may there abide.

It is well known that the Spreckels seek a place in the politics of California, and it is good that this is so. It is well that men of means and leisure should be will-ing to devote themselves to the welfare of the country. To us it is a matter of utter indifference what ambition may move Mr. Spreckels to enter politics. His eleva-tion to political office would afflict us with no pain. He is entitled to decent treatment, and, in the councils of his party, is entitled to hear the truth from the lips of his political associates when matters material to the welfare of that party are at stake. The wrong of which we complain was perpetrated at the initial meeting of the Republican State Central Committee. As is well known among politicians, certain County Committee-men are favorable to the interests of Mr. Spreckels. His enemies sought to strip him of the power that goes with such political control. At the last moment before the late meeting, he was informed that in the official notice of the Republican National Committee calling for the convention at St. Louis, there had been em-bodied certain instructions as to the methods to be employed in the several States for the selection of dele-gates to that convention. He was urged by his asso-ciates to abide by the terms of the instructions issued by his party, even though individually injured. With the full knowledge that to do so would be to cripple his political strength; with the knowledge that such a course would place in the hands of the opposing political fac-tion strength which properly belonged to him; with the instincts of a true National Republican, he cheerfully yielded his personal interest for what he had been in-formed were the wishes of the National Party, as de-fined by its National Committee. No one questioned the motive impelling Mr. Spreckels to this course. It was magnanimous, loyal, and decent; but what shall we say to the miserable tricksters who have imposed upon the credulity of the man and filled his ears with falsehoods; and, with a lie upon their lips, exacted from him a promise that was prompted by the holiest and most honest of political motives. The call of the National Committee says:

"The congressional district delegates shall be chosen at the convention called by the Congressional Com-mittee of each of such districts in the same manner as the nomination of the Republican is made in the same district."

The resolutions which Mr. Spreckels was induced by false representations to support begin with the lying words, "In accordance with the direction of the Re-publican Committee," and winds up with an interpo-lation, unauthorized by the committee, unmentioned in its call, unthought of by its fathers, that strips from Mr. Spreckels political power earned by him, and to which he was rightfully entitled had his associates been less in-decent and deceitful. This infamous resolution adopted by the State Central Committee, while it seems to fol-low the call of the National Committee, contains these words in place of those above quoted:

"The selection of the delegates of the congressional conventions shall be under the direction of the Con-gressional Committee of each district, and all primaries held for the election of delegates shall be held under the exclusive management and control of the Congres-sional Committee."

Any politician reading these two sentences will, at a glance, discover where Mr. Spreckels has been undone when it is considered that friendly to his interest were a number of County Committeemen who, under the practise contemplated by the National Committee, would have had charge of the primaries for the election of delegates. Under the instructions, the Congres-sional Committee was to be given the power of calling conventions, but there is not one word declaring they should have exclusive management or control of the primaries, or of anything else pertaining to the election. Their duty simply begins and ends with issuing the call. To the every-day citizen, the trick here accomplished may not be apparent, but it is a trick, and one which should excite the sympathy of the party for Mr. Spreckels, who so graciously yielded up his personal interests under the false and lying pretenses of his associates, from whom he had the right to expect and ought to have received nothing but plain unvarnished truth.

PULPIT POLITICIANS.

The Christian Endeavorer still insists that the man of religion should be a man of politics; still insists that the words of the Prophet Esaias defined the funda-mental principles of a working democracy, and outlined a wider ministry which includes within its purview politics and the like. We are willing to lay our views beside those of the reverend editor of the Endeavorer, and herewith present his latest screed, cheerfully sub-mitting it to the judgment of intelligent men. The good man declares that "The Wave" makes itself ridicu-lous by posing as a critic of the relations religion should sustain to politics. God knows the pulpit politician does much more than this for religion. He not only degrades his holy office, but repels the seeker after religious consolation from the doorway of the church. In reading the subjoined article, one should remember that the author is a man of God, and a follower of Christ. Picture the Savior fathering the statements here espoused, and ridiculing the idea of peace and tranquility and love in religion.

For some unaccountable reason The Wave and the Endeavorer do not agree. It is true that the editor of our contemporary does not belong to the Christian Endeavor society; he is not an ordained minister; he is not, we would candidly infer, a deacon, and yet he preaches and quotes Scripture and presumes to say who shall and who shall not go into politics. The Endeavorer took exception some time since to an editorial in The Wave which pretended to define religion. This definition would suit every rascal who is in politics for the sake of "boodle," and who should be taken out of politics for righteousness' sake. The editor made reply to our criticism of such an estimate of practical Christianity, in the course of which he gave a picture of his early life. It was very pretty of a "soul aweary ing of worldly strife, ahungering for the solace of that sweet consolation which religion alone can bring, fleeing in despair to the house of worship." Imagine the editor of The Wave fleeing in despair to the house of worship, that is, the church. He then gives us a suggestive picture, which, under the brush of Mr. Keith, would be a work of art as magnifi-cent as The Wave's description is sentimental; an open window, a glimpse of green, and the singing of the wild birds in the churchyard. Churchyards are usually very silent. We wonder what the wild birds were singing! Then he gives a glowing picture of the old divine with sparse form and thin gray hair "that still clings in manhood's memory." What would the dear old gen-tleman say if he read The Wave every Saturday? Behind this tranquil old preacher, the editor, who has been writing on "poli-tics and religion," hides the corrupt officials of San Francisco, every rascal who robs the people, and denies religion its right to seek out and correct public wrongs. Furthermore, he undertakes to inform the editor of the Endeavorer that the quotation from Isaiah, which begins with the familiar words, "The spirit of the Lord is upon me," etc., is not from the lips of our Lord, but from the "Book of the Prophet Esaias." Nobody has supposed that these words were original with Jesus, and we did not say they were. We simply said that Jesus defined his mission and ut-tered the fundamental principles of a working democracy by their apt use in the synagogue at Nazareth. They were a Messianic prophecy of Jesus, which He appropriates to Him-self before His townsmen in Nazareth, and they outline that wider ministry which is the greatest moral force in the world to-day. "The spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted; to preach deliverance to the captives and recover-ing sight to the blind; to set at liberty them that are bruised." That includes the problem of poverty, slavery, misery, ignorance, and the down-trodden. The Wave argues against an applied Christianity, a rational and aggressive pulpit, a religion that touches every phase of life and dares assert its rightful place in the affairs of men; Christians are supposed to be human beings, and a man never gets good enough to surrender his manhood. Clerical orders do not destroy citizenship. Religion is not a sentiment. It is a force, civic, social, and personal. Religion means giving bread to the hungry, and justice to the wronged. It is in conflict with sin. Religion is righteousness everywhere, and the man who fears the application of righteousness is in danger of the judgment, it matters not if he be preacher or layman. The Wave makes itself ridiculous by posing as a critic on the relation religion should sustain to politics. It may be posted on poolrooms, but not on the subject of applied Christianity, and from what we have read in The Wave on the general subject of religion, one suspects that the dear old pastor of the long ago, when the wild birds sang over the graves of the dead, would not be greatly pleased with the orthodoxy of his tranquil teachings as they crop out in the giddy journalism of the San Francisco Wave.

At last we know what constitutes "An Ideal Wife." The Philadelphia Press organized a competition to find out, and Mrs. Blair, a young matron, won the prize with the follow-ing:

"An ideal wife for any man is the woman who understands his particular disposition, and has the tact to cultivate and encourage his good qualities; in some cases overlooking and in others gently helping him to control those of an opposite nature. Such a woman must necessarily be one whom he respects, and, consequently, she will possess as many as possible of the virtues which entitle her to such respect. But be she 'new' or 'old,' dependent or inde-pendent, disposed toward cookery or inclined toward calcu-lus, a woman who has the ability to thus satisfy her hus-band, is to him the 'ideal wife.'"

Mrs. Blossom—I don't understand why daughter's com-pany should talk in such a boisterous manner this evening.

Mr. Blossom—Oh, don't worry about 'em; they're probably having a game of whist.

Freshly (seating himself beside pretty girl in car)—If you have no objection, I will raise the window; I do love the fresh air.

She—Can't say I love your fresh air. Leave the window as it is.

THE LORD OF THE DYNAMOS.

BY H. G. WELLS.

The chief attendant of the three dynamos that buzzed and rattled at Camberwell, and kept the electric railway going, came out of Yorkshire, and his name was James Holroyd. He was a practical electrician, but fond of whisky, a heavy, red-haired brute with irregular teeth. He doubted the existence of the Deity, but accepted Carnot's cycle, and he had read Shakespeare and found him weak in chemistry. His helper came out of the mysterious East, and his name was Azuma-zi. But Holroyd called him Pooh-bah. Holroyd liked a nigger help, because he would stand kicking—a habit with Holroyd—and did not pry into the machinery and try to learn the ways of it. Certain odd possibilities of the negro mind brought into abrupt contact with the crown of our civilization Holroyd never fully realized, though just at the end he got some inkling of them.

To define Azuma-zi was beyond ethnology. He was, perhaps, more negroid than anything else, though his hair was curly rather than frizzy, and his nose had a bridge. Moreover, his skin was brown rather than black, and the whites of his eyes were yellow. His broad cheek-bones and narrow chin gave his face something of the viperine V. His head, too, was broad behind, and low and narrow at the forehead, as if his brain had been twisted round in the reverse way to a European's. He was short of stature and still shorter of English. In conversation he made numerous odd noises of no known marketable value, and his infrequent words were carved and wrought into heraldic grotesqueness. Holroyd tried to elucidate his religious beliefs, and—especially after whisky—lectured to him against superstition and missionaries. Azuma-zi, however, shirked the discussion of his gods, even though he was kicked for it.

Azuma-zi had come, clad in white but insufficient raiment, out of the stoke-hole of the "Lord Clive," from the Straits settlements, and beyond, into London. He had heard even in his youth of the greatness and riches of London, where all the women are white and fair, and even the beggars in the streets are white, and he had arrived, with newly earned gold coins in his pocket, to worship at the shrine of civilization. The day of his landing was a dismal one; the sky was dun, and the wind-worried drizzle filtered down to the greasy streets, but he plunged boldly into the delights of Shadwell, and was presently cast up, shattered in health, civilized in costume, penniless, and, except in matters of the direst necessity, practically a dumb animal, to toil for James Holroyd and to be bullied by him in the dynamo shed at Camberwell. And to James Holroyd, bullying was a labor of love.

There were three dynamos with their engines at Camberwell. The two that have been there since the beginning are small machines; the larger one was new. The smaller machines made a reasonable noise; their straps hummed over the drums, every now and then the brushes buzzed and fizzled, and the air churned steadily, whoo! whoo! whoo! between their poles. One was loose in its foundations and kept the shed vibrating. But the big dynamo drowned these little noises altogether with the sustained drone of its iron core, which somehow set part of the ironwork humming. The place made the visitor's head reel with the throb, throb, throb of the engines, the rotation of the big wheels, the spinning ball-valves, the occasional spittings of the steam, and over all the deep, unceasing, surging note of the big dynamo. This last noise was, from an engineering point of view, a defect, but Azuma-zi accounted it unto the monster for mightiness and pride.

If it were possible we would have the noises of that shed always about the reader as he reads, we would tell all our story to such an accompaniment. It was a steady stream of din, from which the ear picked out first one thread and then another; there was the intermittent snorting, panting, and seething of the steam engines, the suck and thud of their pistons, the dull beat on the air as the spokes of the great driving-wheels came round, a note the leather straps made as they ran tighter and looser, and a fretful tumult from the dynamos; and over all, sometimes inaudible as the ear tired of it, and then creeping back upon the senses again, was this trombone note of the big machine. The floor never felt steady and quiet beneath one's feet, but quivered and jarred. It was a confusing, unsteady place, and enough to send any one's thoughts jerking into odd zigzags. And for three months, while the big strike of the engineers was in progress, Holroyd, who was a blackleg, and Azuma-zi, who was a mere black, were never out of the stir and eddy of it, but slept and fed in the little wooden shanty between the shed and the gates.

Holroyd delivered a theological lecture on the text of his big machine soon after Azuma-zi came. He had to shout to be heard in the din. "Look at that," said Holroyd; "where's your 'eathen idol to match 'im?" And Azuma-zi looked. For a moment Holroyd was inaudible, and then Azuma-zi heard: "Kill a hundred men. Twelve per cent on the ordinary shares," said Holroyd, "and that's something like a Gord!"

Holroyd was proud of his big dynamo, and expatiated upon its size and power to Azuma-zi until heaven knows what odd currents of thought that and the incessant whirling and shindy set up within the curly black cranium. He would explain in the most graphic manner the dozen or so ways in which a man might be killed by it, and once he gave Azuma-zi a shock as a sample of its quality. After that, in the breathing-times of his labor—it was heavy labor, being not only his own, but most of Holroyd's—Azuma-zi would sit and watch the big machine. Now and then the brushes would sparkle and spit blue flashes, at which Holroyd would swear, but all the rest was as smooth and rhythmic as breathing. The band ran shouting over the shaft, and ever behind one as one watched was the complacent thud of the piston. So it lived all day in this big airy shed, with him and Holroyd to wait upon it; not prisoned up and slaving to drive a ship as the other engines he knew—mere captive devils of the British Solomon—had been, but a machine enthroned. Those two smaller dynamos, Azuma-zi by force of contrast despised; the large one he privately christened the Lord of the Dynamos. They were fretful and irregular, but the big dynamo was steady. How great it was! How serene and easy in its working! Greater and calmer even than the Buddhas he had seen at Rangoon, and yet not motionless, but living! The great black coils spun, spun, spun, the rings ran round under the brushes, and the deep note of its coil steadied the whole. It affected Azuma-zi queerly.

Azumi-zi was not fond of labor. He would sit about and watch the Lord of the Dynamos while Holroyd went away to persuade the yard porter to get whisky, although his proper place was not in the dynamo shed but behind the engines, and, moreover, if Holroyd caught him skulking, he got hit for it with a rod of stout copper wire. He would go and stand close to the colossus and look up at the great leather band running overhead. There was a black patch on the band that came round, and it pleased him somehow among all the clatter to watch this return again and again. Odd thoughts spun with the whirl of it. Scientific people tell us that savages give souls to rocks and trees—and a machine is a thousand times more alive than a rock or a tree. And Azuma-zi was practically a savage still; the veneer of civilization lay no deeper than his slop suit, his bruises, and the coal grime on his face and hands. His father before him had worshiped a meteoric stone, kindred blood, it may be, had splashed the broad wheels of Juggernaut.

He took every opportunity Holroyd gave him of touching and handling the great dynamo that was fascinating him. He polished and cleaned it until the metal parts were blinding in the sun. He felt a mysterious sense of service in doing this. He would go up to it and touch its spinning coils gently. The gods he had worshiped were all far away. The people in London hid their gods.

At last his dim feelings grew more distinct, and took shape in thoughts, and, at last, in acts. When he came into the roaring shed one morning he salaamed to the Lord of the Dynamos, and then, when Holroyd was away, he went and whispered to the thundering machine that he was its servant, and prayed to it to have pity on him and save him from Holroyd. And as he did so a rare gleam of light came in through the open archway of the throbbing machine-shed, and the Lord of the Dynamos, as he whirled and roared, was radiant with pale gold. Then Azuma-zi knew that his service was acceptable to the Lord. After that he did not feel so lonely as he had done, and he had, indeed, been very much alone in London. And even when his work time was over, which was rare, he loitered about the shed.

Then, the next time Holroyd maltreated him, Azuma-zi went presently to the Lord of the Dynamos, and whispered, "Thou seest, O my Lord!" and the angry whirr of the machinery seemed to answer him. Thereafter it appeared to him that whenever Holroyd came into the shed a different note came into the sounds of the dynamo. "My Lord bides his time," said Azuma-zi to himself. "The iniquity of the fool is not yet ripe." And he waited and watched for the day of reckoning. One day there was evidence of short circuiting, and Holroyd, making an unwary examination—it was in the afternoon—got a rather severe shock. Azuma-zi, from behind the engine, saw him jump off and curse at the peccant coil.

"He is warned," said Azuma-zi to himself. "Surely my Lord is very patient."

Holroyd had at first initiated his "nigger" into such elementary conceptions of the dynamo's working as would enable him to take temporary charge of the shed in his absence. But when he noticed the manner in which Azuma-zi hung about the monster he became suspicious. He dimly perceived his assistant was "up to something," and connecting him with the anointing of the coils with oil that had rotted the varnish in one place, he issued an edict, shouted above the confusion of the machinery, "Don't 'ee go nigh that big dynamo any more, Pooh-bah, or a'll take thy skin off." Besides, if it pleased Azuma-zi to be near the big machine, it was plain sense of decency to keep him away from it.

Azuma-zi obeyed at the time, but later he was caught bowing before the Lord of the Dynamos. At which Holroyd twisted his arm and kicked him as he turned to go away. As Azuma-zi presently stood behind the engine and glared at the back of the hated Holroyd, the noises of the machinery took a new rhythm, and sounded like four words in his native tongue.

It is hard to say exactly what madness is. I fancy Azuma-zi was mad. The incessant din and whirl of the dynamo shed may have churned up his little store of knowledge and big store of superstitious fancy, at last, into something akin to frenzy. At any rate, when the idea of making Holroyd a sacrifice to the Dynamo Fetich was thus suggested to him, it filled him with a great tumult of exultant emotion.

That night the two men and their black shadows were alone in the shed together. The shed was lit with one big arc light that winked and flickered purple. The shadows lay black behind the dynamos, the ball governors of the engines whirled from light to darkness, and their pistons beat loud and steady. The world outside seen through the open end of the shed seemed incredibly dim and remote. It seemed absolutely silent, too, since the riot of the machinery drowned every external sound. Far away was the black fence of the yard, with gray shadowy houses behind, and above was the deep blue sky and the pale little stars. Azuma-zi suddenly walked across the center of the shed above which the leather bands were running, and went into the shadow of the big dynamo. Holroyd heard a click, and the spin of the armature changed.

"What are you dewin' with that switch?" he bawled, in surprise. "Han't I told you ——"

Then he saw the set expression of Azuma-zi's eyes as the Asiatic came out of the shadow toward him.

In another moment the two men were grappling fiercely in front of the great dynamo.

"You coffee-headed fool!" gasped Holroyd, with a brown hand at his throat. "Keep off those contact rings." In another moment he was tripped and reeling back upon the Lord of the Dynamo. He instinctively loosened his grip upon his antagonist to save himself from the machine.

* * * * * * * * * *

The messenger, sent in furious haste from the station to find out what had happened in the dynamo shed, met Asuma-zi at the porter's lodge by the gate. Asuma-zi tried to explain something, but the messenger could make nothing of the black's incoherent English, and hurried on to the shed. The machines were all noisily at work, and nothing seemed to be disarranged. There was, however, a queer smell of singed hair. Then he saw an odd-looking crumpled mass clinging to the front of the big dynamo, and, approaching, recognized the distorted remains of Holroyd.

The man stared and hesitated a moment. Then he saw the face, and shut his eyes convulsively. He turned on his heel before he opened them, so that he could not see Holroyd again, and went out of the shed to get advice and help.

When Azuma-zi saw Holroyd die in the grip of the Great Dynamo he had been a little scared about the consequences of his act. Yet he felt strangely elated, and knew that the favor of the Lord Dynamo was upon him. His plan was already settled when he met the man coming from the station, and the scientific manager who speedily arrived on the scene, jumped at the obvious conclusion of suicide. This expert scarcely noticed Azuma-zi, except to ask a few questions. Did he see Holroyd kill himself? Azuma-zi explained that he had been out of sight at the engine furnace until he heard a difference in the noise from the dynamo. It was not a difficult examination, being untinctured by suspicion.

The distorted remains of Holroyd, which the electrician removed from the machine, were hastily covered by the porter with a coffee-stained tablecloth. Somebody, by a happy inspiration, fetched a medical man. The expert was chiefly anxious to get the machine to work again, for seven or eight trains had stopped midway in the stuffy tunnels of the electric railway. Azuma-zi, answering or misunderstanding the questions of the people who had by authority or impudence come into the shed, was presently sent back to the stoke-hole by the scientific manager. Of course a crowd collected outside the gates of the yard—a crowd, for no known reason, always hovers for a day or two near the scene of a sudden death in London—two or three reporters percolated somehow into the engine shed, and one even got to Azuma-zi; but the scientific expert cleared them out again, being himself an amateur journalist.

Presently the body was carried away, and public interest departed with it. Azuma-zi remained very quietly at his furnace, seeing over and over again in the coals a figure that wiggled violently and became still. An hour after the murder, to any one coming into the shed it would have looked exactly as if nothing remarkable had ever happened there. Peeping pres-

ly from his engine-room the black saw the Lord namo spin and whirl beside his little brothers, and driving wheels were beating round, and the steam the pistons went thud, thud, exactly as it had been lier in the evening. After all, from the mechanical nt of view, it had been a most insignificant accident—mere temporary deflection of a current. But now slender form and slender shadow of the scientific nager replaced the sturdy outline of Holroyd travel-up and down the lane of light upon the vibrating r under the straps between the engines and the namos.

"Have I not served my Lord," said Azuma-zi, indibly from his shadow, and the note of the great namo rang out full and clear. As he looked at the mechanism, the strange fascination of it, that had n a little in abeyance since Holroyd's death, resumed sway.

Never had Azuma-zi seen a man killed so swiftly and ilessly. The big humming machinery had slain its tim without wavering for a second from its steady ating. It was, indeed, a mighty god.

The unconscious scientific manager stood with his ck to him, scribbling on a piece of paper. His adow lay at the foot of the monster.

"Was the Lord Dynamo still hungry? His servant s ready."

Azuma-zi made a stealthy step forward; then stopped.
e scientific manager suddenly stopped writing, and lked down the shed to the endmost of the dynamos,
d began to examine the brushes.

Azuma-zi hesitated, and then slipped across noise-sly into the shadow of the switch. There he waited.
esently the manager's footsteps could be heard return-
g. He stopped in his old position, unconscious of the ker crouching ten feet away from him. Then the g dynamo suddenly fizzled, and in another moment
zuma-zi had sprung out of the darkness upon him.

First, the scientific manager was gripped round the dy and swung toward the big dynamo, then, kicking th his knee and forcing his antagonist's head down th his hands, he loosened the grip on his waist and ung round away from the machine. Then the black sped him again, putting a curly head against his est, and they swayed and panted, as it seemed, for age or so. Then the scientific manager was im-lled to catch a black ear in his teeth and bite furi-
sly. The black yelled hideously.

They rolled over on the floor, and the black, who d apparently slipped from the vise of the teeth, or rted with some ear—the scientific manager wondered hich at the time—tried to throttle him. The scien-ic manager was making some ineffectual efforts to aw something with his hands and to kick, when the lcome sound of quick footsteps sounded on the floor.
he next moment Azuma-zi had left him, darted to-rd the big dynamo. There was a splutter amid the roar.

The officer of the company, who had entered, stood aring as Azuma-zi caught the naked terminals in his nds, gave one horrible convulsion, and then hung otionless from the machine, his face violently disrted.

"I'm jolly glad you came in when you did," said
e scientific manager, still sitting on the floor.

He looked at the still quivering figure. "It is not nice death to die, apparently, but it is quick."

The official was still staring at the body. He was a an of slow apprehension.

There was a pause.

The scientific manager got up on his feet rather wkwardly. He ran his fingers along his collar thought-lly, and moved his head to and fro several times.

"Poor Holroyd! I see now." Then almost mehanically he went toward the switch in the shadow nd turned the current into the railway circuit again.
s he did so the singed body loosened its grip upon the achine and fell forward on its face. The core of the ynamo roared out loud and clear, and the armature eat the air.

So ended, prematurely, the "Worship of the Dy-amo Deity," perhaps the most short-lived of all eligions. Yet withal, it could at least boast a Martyrom and a Human Sacrifice.

[From The Stolen Bacillus and Other Stories, Methuen & Co., publishers, London.]

THE BIRD'S SONG.

BY DOLLIE RADFORD.

"Because I built my nest so high,
Must I despair
If a fierce wind, with bitter cry,
Passes the lower branches by,
And mine makes bare?
Because I hung it, in my pride,
So near the skies,
Higher than other nests abide,
Must I lament if far and wide
It scattered lies?
I shall but build, and build my best,
Till, safety won,
I hang aloft my new-made nest
High as of old, and see it rest,
As near the sun."

CAUSERIE.

BY JOHN BONNER.

Congress has voted, almost unanimously, that we shall thrust our finger into the Cuban pie. This decision having been reached by the National Legislature, it is the duty of good citizens to acquiesce. But, in the familiar words of Moliere—Que diable avons nous a faire dans cette galère?

* * *

Our propensity to meddle in affairs which do not concern us passes human understanding. We should blaze with wrath if the British Parliament or the Spanish Cortes called us to account for lynchings in this country, and warned us that if they were not stopped, Europe would have to interfere. Yet Congress is not restrained by propriety or delicacy from hectoring England about her dealings with Ireland, and Spain about her administration of her colony of Cuba. Is not this sort of thing both impertinent and ridiculous? Can we wonder that foreigners do not take us seriously, but assume that our politics are run on a platform of brag and bluster?

* * *

As far as the world knows, a majority of the people of Cuba, including nearly all the men of property and intelligence, are content with the colonial condition. The rebels consist mainly of a riff-raff of adventurers, the tagrag and bobtail of cities, and such rural vagrants as, in this country, constituted the industrial army, with no higher aims than the loot of plantations, plunder, outrage, and murder. They know no more about Republicanism than Patagonians, and are no more fit for free self-government than Choctaws. To the great mass of unreflecting Americans, they appear to be fighting for freedom and independence, as the Americans fought in the last century; but there is no more resemblance between them and the soldiers who served under Washington and Knox and Putnam and Lee, than there is between a jackal of the jungle and a Chief Justice of the United States. But Congress has spoken and good Americans will run mute.

* * *

Just about the time bicycles go out of fashion, flying machines will probably come in. Professor Lilienthal of Berlin has invented a sailing apparatus like the outspread pinions of a soaring bird; this he adjusts to his person on the top of a hill or building, and he is able to fly in any direction eight times as far as the elevation is high. He can overcome the resistance of a wind blowing twenty miles an hour. His rate of travel depends on the dexterity with which he manages his machine; thus, one aeronaut may travel faster, and for a longer distance, than another. Two or three years from now he expects to perfect his air-ship so as to be able to undertake long journeys. Thus, about that time, flying machine races from a tower on Nob Hill to an amphitheater in Tar Flat may be expected to be advertised.

* * *

Frederick Warde is something more than the last of the American interpreters of the old classic drama. He has assumed for that drama the office which Old Mortality performed for the tombstones of the covenanters; he has set himself the task of preventing its fall into decay and oblivion. If the time should come—as it may—that audiences will refuse to pay money to see such tragedies as "King Lear," it will be remembered that Frederick Warde consecrated his genius to preserve them from a fate which befell them through the perversion of public taste. One of the fundamental laws of the Theater Français requires that house to produce so many times a year the masterpieces of Corneille and Racine, so that the Parisians shall not forget them. Mr. Warde is doing the same thing for Shakespeare, and doing it at his own expense.

* * *

There are but two actors at the present day who play Lear—Warde and Henry Irving. Young people, whose souls delight at "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray," yawn over the grandest creation of Shakespeare's genius, and the subtlest work of his exuberant imagination. They cannot appreciate such exquisite work without education, and it is only now and then that an actor competent to interpret such a part as Lear condescends to play schoolmaster for their benefit. Madame Modjeska said that she intended to play Cymbeline because she felt it to be a duty not to let so perfect a creation die out of men's memory; so Warde, who could draw much larger houses with pieces from the emotional drama, gives Lear as one of his many contributions to high art, as a proof of his devotional regard for the glory of the drama.

* * *

Perhaps there was more method in Chancellor Yorke's polemics than people have suspected. While the Protestant sects have been wasting their energies in trying to convert the Chinese and Japanese, who cannot be Christianized, and who are imbibing a deadly hatred of the nations whose missionaries infest their homes, the Catholics have been assailing Protestantism in its old strongholds in New England. At a late convocation of Baptist ministers in New York, it was shown on the authority of the census that while the total church membership in New England was 1,769,202, there were 1,004,605 Catholic communicants. The latter have come to outnumber the Protestants in every State. The Romanist priesthood have held their people to the faith better than the descendants of the Puritans have succeeded in doing. Verbum sap.

* * *

The publication, by William Archer, of a translation of Ibsen's prose dramas will enable the American public to form an intelligent opinion of the philosophy of the cynical Norwegian. He is a type of the modern pessimist. He started out from the plane which Thomas Hardy reached in Jude the Obscure, after a life spent in studying human nature. To him everything is bad, weak, false, hollow, and unsatisfying. There is nothing in love or friendship which deserves the attention of an intelligent being; nothing in social laws or religion or family ties or patriotic impulses that will stand the test of a searching analysis. He should take Apemantus' grace for his motto:

Immortal Gods, I crave no pelf;
I pray for no man but myself.
Grant I may never grow so fond
To trust man on his oath or bond,
Or a harlot for her weeping,
Or a dog that seems a sleeping,
Or a keeper with my freedom,
Or my friends if I should need 'em.

* * *

Nearly three centuries have elapsed since Shakespeare made Rosalind declare that love is a form of madness to be treated like other forms of insanity, with the darkened room and the whip; and now, in the American metropolis, philosophers are discussing the question whether "the intoxication of love" should not be classified with other forms of insanity and treated with drugs by alienists. The discussion has been provoked by the curious recurrence of cases in which young men and women, in the ecstasy of love, have taken their lives. We have had some such cases of late in this city.

* * *

Miss Rose Coghlan, being asked her opinion on the subject, says that she has known men who were madly in love with irresponsive girls, and who could neither throw off their passion, nor give it away, nor sell it, nor get rid of it in any way; such persons, she thinks, may fairly be considered insane. Their malady seems to be akin to alcoholism, and calls for a Keeley cure. A hospital exclusively intended for the reception of love-struck patients would be a novelty, to be sure; but this is an age of novelties.

* * *

There is a young lady in this city, beautiful, charming, and sweet-tempered, who, as the boys would say, has made such a mash on a perfect stranger that he is the bane of her life. He haunts the outer door of her house. He follows her in the street. When he finds her at a place of public amusement he glares at her with basilisk eyes. He has frequently tried to kneel at her feet in public, and to pour forth the torrent of his ungovernable passion. Her friends have had him arrested. He submits to his penalty, but on his liberation, he resumes the agony of his perfect love. Now this man is perfectly sane in every respect save his infatuation. Ought he not be considered a monomaniac? Yet he says that no woman's sides are strong enough to beat the wooing of so fierce a love as his.

* * *

Miss Marbury, who is nothing if not practical, says that the intoxication of love, if shared by the two objects, suggests a paradise rather than a madhouse, and that if the feeling is not shared, and the man goes round recounting his woes, an asylum might be built around him, though he might be successfully treated with a club, or another pretty girl. The latter treatment, on the principle of similia similibus, naturally suggests itself to the compassionate mind; though, in history and romance, rejected lovers who are really badly hit, generally acquire a disgust for other members of the sex.

The U. S. Mint at Philadelphia is coining gold at the rate of $150,000 a day. During the month of December $5,807,145 were coined, while the delivery thus far for the present month is $2,722,800. The greater part is being shipped to the sub-treasury in New York. Very little silver is handled, but the output of cents and five-cent pieces has been considerable.

The North Sea-Baltic Canal has stood the test of the first hard frost better than was expected. While navigation was completely stopped in the neighboring firths, sailing vessels passed through the canal without any impediment.

THINGS AND PEOPLE.

IN THE GOOD old pioneer days it was customary to celebrate the National Holiday with a grand banquet at Grass Valley. For that occasion the great men of the youthful State flocked to the little mining town—lawyers, and merchants, and miners—all those who had twenty dollars to purchase a ticket gathered there, and one heard oratory afterwards that was worthy the name. At the last of these Grass Valley spreads a curious episode occurred. As usual, the tables were spread under the oaks in the open, and in the seat of honor was the Governor, who acted as toastmaster. One by one the celebrated speakers of California rose at his behest, responding rhetorically to some patriotic sentiment. Some distance removed from the Executive's eye sat a big, thickset fellow, on whose face a bushy black beard conferred a most formidable expression. Evidently a person of importance, he waited for the Governor's summons to oratory, and by way of drowning impatience and disappointment, he took frequent draughts out of a beaker of whiskey. Finally, the long list was exhausted, and the Executive, rising, invited the gathering to sing "Auld Lang Syne." Convinced at last that he had wilfully been passed over, the stranger, with a fierce cry of "Halt," jumped on the table and strode toward the Governor. In the midst of his triumphant march he stopped, and raising his hand menacingly aloft, shouted.

"May be I'm not good enough to be asked to talk before yez all, and may be you don't know who I am."

"Who are you?" asked a little man in his vicinity.

"I'm the Grand Tioga of North America. I step from star to star, and hew the Universe."

* * *

The memory of the late Justice Baldwin of the State Supreme Court is preserved in many a good story. Years ago a cause of some moment was up before him on appeal from the decision of the lower court. The contest had been bitter, and, in his argument, the lawyer for the defense declared, with much solemnity: "Your Honor, I know of my own personal knowledge that Judge ——— received $5000 for rendering the decision from which we appeal."

Baldwin leaned over toward the excited advocate, and, in a low voice, whispered:

"Why didn't you offer him six?"

Completely surprised and off his guard, the lawyer, dropping his voice to the same key as the Judge's, replied:

"Because, your Honor, we didn't have the coin.',

* * *

CONSIDERING the gravity of the political situation, and the necessities of his revenge, one is permitted to wonder over the continued absence of Colonel Dan Burns. He remains in Mexico—presumably at the Candaleria, and matters of grave import are executed here without his participation. It seems the heirs of Abraham Powell, in whom the original Candaleria title was vested, have appealed from the first decision, which ratified the Colonel's possession. Powell, a lumber dealer of wealth and enterprise, bonded the mine when it was no more than an ancient hole in the ground, and his agents were instructed to complete negotiations. They neglected or refrained from doing so; the bond slipped through their fingers, and the Candaleria was snatched up by Burns. Powell accused his representatives of treachery, and brought the case into court. At that time the Powell interest made conditions in the environment very unpleasant. In Mexico possession is a title more valuable than right, and it is possible that if the great man were absent, now who knows but that a gang of marauders might not assume the control, and laugh at legal processes. Eventually, they would be ousted, but not without bloodshed and cost. With ownership and a decision already entered in his favor, the Colonel expects a secure title, and then, his base of supplies secured, will he enter politics. Apropos of the Candaleria, I believe it ranks among the large silver producers of the world. The ore, however, contains a fair proportion of gold, and it is the latter which enables the continuance of operations. Even though the white metal advances in value, its price is not yet high enough to warrant individual production, save, indeed, of a very high-grade rock.

* * *

Superintendent Daggett, who ranks as one of the skilled mining men of the State, has had his attention directed to the metallic zone of Mexico, and proposes investing and developing there on a broad scale. It is not impossible that he may transfer his attention to Mexico after his term in the Mint is ended, for he is convinced of the immense possibilities of the region. The second car of ore from the Santa Rosalie arrived some weeks ago, and netted some sixteen thousand dollars, I am told, which affords the stockholders a generous dividend on their investment. As an index of the process of reasoning which induced Mr. Daggett to invest in this Santa Rosalie, property, it is interesting to learn what was the evidence on which he purchased. In the environment of the mine are the remains of a town—houses, churches, and stores. For its existence this burg must have depended on the mine. Tradition ascribed to the Santa Rosalie great wealth, and the records of the church told that a congregation of peons with goat-skin bags contrived to keep down the water. No one claimed the property was exhausted. The Spanish owners had abandoned their rights because the water began to gain, and the peons were ineffective against the rising flood. Daggett calculated that with a large hand-pump he might keep the mine dry enough for working purposes, and the idea succeeded. He is developing the property rapidly, and the prospects all indicate a veritable bonanza.

* * *

A ROMANTIC episode in the career of the late Doctor James Ghislein, who died the other day at the Occidental, is of more than passing interest. He emerged from the Civil War with a fine record and the prestige of having served on Sherman's staff. A brilliant future opened before him and he would have had, in due course, the rank of Surgeon-General of the Army. Love intervened, however. He met at Washington a very handsome girl—the sister-in-law of ex-Minister Hirsch of Oregon, and was captivated by her physical and personal charms. She received his attentions with favor, for he was a man of distinction and character, but expressed a strong prejudice against marrying an army man. At first he declined to resign but she remained obdurate and returned to her home in Portland. He resisted for a time the violent temptation to follow, but it eventually mastered his judgment. Desperate, at last, he resigned, traveled post-haste to Portland, pressed his suit vigorously, but was rather coldly received. Alas, for the course of true love—three months later the lady, for whose hand Ghislein had renounced his career, was married to another, a younger, possibly a more attractive, man. It was a crushing disappointment but Ghislein rallied under it, and commenced the practise of his profession in Portland. He prospered exceedingly, soon had the best clientele in town, and, at his death, was worth several hundred thousand dollars. But he never married.

* * *

My story about the English children who had imbibed, contrary to the sentiment of their parents, a feeling of American patriotism, brought to my desk a dozen letters narrating incidents of similar character. The best story of the series concerns a well-known and very respectable English couple at San Mateo. They have a growing family of sturdy boys, at least two of whom are at school, but no attempt at political training has been made by either parent. Last Fourth of July the boys were celebrating with innumerable firecrackers and so much enthusiasm that Mrs. F——, thinking to point a moral, if nothing more, asked her eldest the reason of the general rejoicing, and if he really knew what holiday it was he made so much of.

"Why, mother, it's Fire-cracker Day, and every one shoots off fireworks and things," was the ingenuous answer of the little one.

"Don't you know, my boy, that it is the Fourth of July, the anniversary of the victory of the Americans and the defeat of the English army?"

The youngster reflected a moment; at last he said: "Then it's the day that we whipped you, mother."

* * *

ART IS IN the ascendant again. Not only has Keith sold pictures, but Peixotto is painting portraits to order. Reaser has lectured to such advantage in Oakland that he has been relieved of the necessity of painting. He has organized also a class of ten students to proceed to Holland under his personal conduct, which inaugurates a campaign against windmills, damsels, and dykes, without counterpart in our artistic annals. I am told Matthews employs his talent on an historic painting directed toward the Phelan prize. This afternoon Mrs. Denis O'Sullivan's collection of portraits and sketches will be on view in the rooms of the Art Students' League, and a little later the Sketch Club opens a "Black and White Exhibition," the first of its kind we have ever had here. More interesting, if only equally important, is the exhibition of Walter Stetson's pictures, which W. K. Vickery announces for next week. Mr. Stetson is an artist of distinct individuality, whose canvases have hitherto been displayed in New York.

* * *

Encouraging as this demonstration of artistic interest undoubtedly is, there are mitigating circumstances, such as the departure of Louis Heine, our foremost cellist, who goes East for the reputation he is denied here. Not that his talent lacks appreciation among the musicians, but there is considerable difference between recognition and celebrity. I have no doubt of the honors Heine will win in the East, and when he returns, a few years hence, the Bohemian Club will be tumbling over itself in an effort to do him honor. The difficulty with our community is that it distrusts its own judgment, and is quite without patriotism. It never acclaims aught that lacks the foreign stamp of approval. buys its pictures in Europe, though it has one of the greatest landscape artists in the world in its midst.

* * *

Confusion is no longer confined to the Democrats It has invaded the ranks of the Republicans. The clever trick by which a temporary victory was won over J. D. Spreckels has definitely split the party into hostile camps. Nothing that has happened in years has so awakened sleeping animosities, and as there is on both sides the quality of fighting blood backed by coin which contests bitterly for every advantage, one is safe in believing that fusion and combination are distant expectations. The situation in the Democracy is much better. Certainly the Junta represents the honest element of the party, while that which is led by Buckley is undoubtedly the corrupt and designing section which practises politics for its own ends. Thus there is a clean cut issue between good and bad. On the other side there is no such distinction. Good men are on both sides. Though Buckley may harass his opponents and attempt a diversion, in comparison to the Republicans the Democracy will present a united front. Undoubtedly, there will be consequences from the little entertainment of last Saturday afternoon—consequences its perpetrators had not the foresight to anticipate.

* * *

The proposed retirement of Chief Crowley, following closely after that of Inspector Byrne of New York, suggests an idea. These two men possess a larger knowledge of crime—as practised in the United States—than any two other men alive. They have known personally almost every great criminal, have learned all about his methods, have familiarized themselves with the devices by which he accomplished his ends and evaded detection. Crowley's mind must be a perfect encyclopedia of the criminal art. Why should he go to his grave without giving the public the benefit of his experience The memoirs of Patrick Crowley would command a large a sale as the best novel by Gaboriau. They would have as many readers in this country as the autobiographies of the great Paris policiers had in France. They would not only be intensely interesting they would be instructive, and would constitute a primer for chiefs of police. When Mr. Crowley retires he will have a period of leisure, during which, time may sometimes hang heavy on his hands. Suppose he turns it to account by dictating this story of his police experience to a typewriter.

* * *

The exactions of the Typographical Union promise to create trouble among the journals. When linotypes were first introduced there occurred a complete reorganization of the Union. Rules were made for the government of the operators, a rate of wage definitely settled, and eight hours set as the limit of a day's labors. Experience has shown the publishers that the exaction of these hours is more than the men can stand inasmuch as they are kept constantly at full speed In consequence they reduced the day to seven and one-half hours. Not content with this concession, the Union has reduced to the same limit the hours of foremen, proof and copy readers, and job hands, whose labors are in no sense as excessive as those of the operator. The action has created considerable feeling in the newspaper offices, and is resented as another exhibition of the tyranny of the labor unions.

THE WITNESS.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

THE REAL PADEREWSKI.

ANOTHER PHASE OF THE GREAT PIANIST'S PERSONALITY.

Paderewski left us on Monday morning—left us regretfully. Not because of the fortune he carried away—over $40,000, I believe; not because of the enthusiasm of his audiences, because the population did not really develop excitement until the very last. Rather, he was sorry to go because he had thoroughly enjoyed himself in San Francisco. In an elaborate exposition of the great pianist, which appears in the Ladies' Home Journal, he appears as a musical bird of paradise, a sad-eyed, solemn creature, far removed from the attributes and characteristics of mankind. He is represented an ascetic—melancholy, sober, weary—brooding over the sorrows and disappointment of his early days, dissolving himself in music, and finding there oblivion and tranquillity. It is this aspect of the man which finds currency in the Eastern press. He is almost unapproachable; the interviewers come to his presence trembling and adoring; he is veritably a divinity, to be worshiped with awe and anxiety. My good fortune has enabled me to see something of Paderewski the man.

I met him first in his dressing-room at the California and found a gracious, alert, and magnetic being whose intelligence seemed as quick as his fingers. Quite unpretentious, he talked of men and books, of his audiences here and elsewhere, displaying a breadth of culture rare in one whose heart and soul are devoted to music. But not a trace of the icy ascetic; this was no melancholy Dane brooding over past sorrows, but a charming gentleman whose manner has that penetrating warmth which we call fascination. The agreeable and quite unexpected impression I had gained was deepened by the manner of the great pianist at Mr. Shortridge's banquet. He was full of vivacity that night, quick to recognize the point of the stories which floated round the table, appreciative of complimentary references and quite an accomplished trencherman. In English, which gained a rare touch from his foreign accent, he responded to a toast drunk in his honor and in the subsequent proceedings showed himself equal to all the emergencies of a banquet. It was the revelation of an interesting, an intense individuality, whose intelligence and powers were by no means exhausted by his musical attainments. That night he played at the request of Claus Spreckels, who preferred his petition in German, a language of which Paderewski is very fond. But he went to the piano unwillingly, complaining of the inability to do himself justice after a heavy meal.

A few nights later, Paderewski, Gorlitz, his secretary, and the writer dined at Martinelli's. We walked from the Palace along Montgomery Street, down to an Italian liquor store on Washington Street, where admirable cocktails and the best Chianti in town are sold. Thence up to the restaurant for dinner. It was late. We sat down hungry and tired, and devoured greedily the salads and hors d'œuvres that made their appearance. It was the first solid meal of the day for the artist. He had eaten an egg at noon, and a sandwich with a glass of porter after the performance that afternoon.

"What is the happiest moment in the every-day life of a man?" he asked. "Let us not consider love."

"The exaltation of success, the joy of attainment," I suggested.

"To me," he said, "it is the first bite of food after long abstinence—it unites the gratification of appetite with the sense of reward. I have worked hard and what I now eat I have earned."

We talked of all manner of things and people that night. Nothing escapes those quick blue eyes of Paderewski. Nor does a word or the shade of an expression elude his memory. He was especially taken with D. M. Delmas, whom he pronounced one of the most accomplished men he had ever known, and compared, in the range of attainments and the impressiveness of his manner, with Jules Ferry. Paderewski has one or two languages the advantage of the distinguished lawyer—the pianist speaks Polish, Russian, French, German, and English, together with a little Italian and certain Hungarian dialects. He is most easy and familiar in French and seems to prefer to converse in that tongue.

It was an excellent dinner we had that night, for the chef, in honor, of the distinguished guest, had exerted his talent to the utmost. Indeed, Paderewski insisted he had enjoyed at Martinelli's the best cooking in town. At each course he announced he would eat no more, but first the fish, then macaroni, at which both he and Gorlitz exclaimed, "Benissimo," later, the ravioli, and, subsequently, a squab and an omelet soufflé successively tempted him. We drank Italian wines—Chianti and Spumanti—which went admirably with the repast. Thence we wandered into Chinatown, examined the great temple, the Joss, and sat, until past midnight, drinking tea and listening to the weird strains of a Chinese orchestra, which iterated and reiterated its strange melancholy wailings to his great happiness.

The next gathering was at the Pup on Sunday night after the concert. He was very tired, for the labors of the week had been exhausting and he longed for rest and recreation. The conversation had a general range—music, the drama, Shakespeare. The pianist declared that his ideal Hamlet was that of a German actor whom he had seen in Dresden. Irving, he thought a man of genius. "Irving has moments of real inspiration" he declared. "The performance may drag along; you may rage against the artist's mannerisms but suddenly you hold your breath. You catch a look, an expression that electrifies, that elevates the impersonation out of the ordinary into art. It is the touch of inspiration, of real genius." D'Albert he regards as a great virtuoso but his playing lacks tenderness and feeling. As we retired—at a very early hour in the morning it was—he invited us to meet Marsick the following Wednesday night. The gathering was rather larger then, and included Donald de V. Graham, who immediately after dinner was escorted to the piano. He really sang delightfully, a charming little Creole melody captivating the two artists. Then Paderewski himself sat down and played an Adagio from one of Beethoven's Sonatas.

The final gathering of the series was on Friday night at the Cliff House, whence we drove in a four-in-hand through the Park. It was an imperial night—the full moon rising as we raced through the shadowy avenues, revealing silvery vistas incomparably beautiful. The view from the high balconies of the Cliff, the long beach shining in the white light, the snowy surges, the great dark expanse of water stretching to the horizon, the roar of the surf on the rocks beneath, made a memorable picture.

Hugo Gorlitz told me that Paderewski had thoroughly enjoyed his experience here—he had really entered into the enjoyment of living with more soul and gusto than elsewhere in America. He certainly proved an exhilarating, if a disturbing, influence in the lives of several rather staid and sober gentlemen. But his is an irresistible, an infectious, personality, and, when one knows the man, you are not surprised he makes a piano responsive.

ETC., JR.

M. F. MARSICK.

A CHAT WITH THE PARISIAN VIOLIN VIRTUOSO.

"When the waiting's done, will the music leap
At the bow's light touch, and from silence pass
With a swift, wild sweep, and a pulse of joy,
As a wild fire rides on the prairie grass?
Does it long to rise in the light free way
That the swallows sail in the summer air?
Does it dream of the time when its pleasure grew
Too strong and sweet for the strings to bear?

* * * * * * *

"I wonder, now
If the soul of a violin can cry:
Cry for the touch of the master hand
To free the music deep within."

Until I heard Marsick speak of his violin, as of something well beloved and almost personal, I never realized exactly the meaning of the phrase, "wedded to his art." Just now, the world seems addicted to the violinist. We have, on our own shores, Kivarde, Sauret, Ondricek, and Marsick, all men of note on this instrument, and across the water, the young Russian, Alexander Petschnikoff, a mere boy, and born a beggar, creating the wildest furor in music-loving and music-steeped Berlin. I am devoted to the violin myself, and I have longed to see one of these musical lights with my own eyes, and to hear with my own ears what he had to say of music generally, and the violin in particular. My opportunity came with Marsick's advent in this city. Foreigners dislike being interviewed. They are not accustomed to it, in their own country, and they do not understand it. However, a few polite remarks will usually produce the smile indulgent, and secure all we desire to find out.

Marsick lay back in his chair, hands behind his head—that head which has something leonine about it; large, powerful, and covered with a shaggy mane of iron-gray hair. It may be disappointing to know that it is impossible to ascribe to him the pale and sorrowful aspect generally attributed to musicians of note, or the unkempt, Bohemian appearance which most people believe to be the unmistakable mark of genius. On the contrary, Professor Marsick is alert and vivacious of manner, and bears the stamp of fastidiousness in his attire. His face is sensitive and refined; a trifle haughty, perhaps it is, more properly speaking, masterful in expression. In a crowd, I should select him as a man embodying great energy and will power; The middle face is unusually powerful—not in emotional qualities so much as in combative and concentrative points. His eyes are blue, keen, and kindly.

As he lay back in his chair, his head resting on his hands, clasped behind it, his eyes gazing into space, he said:

"The violin is the greatest of all instruments. It is not only the most difficult to handle, but one has actually two instruments to master in its study. You see," and he brought himself forward in his chair, caressing, as it were, a violin on his left arm, "I play one of them so—" deftly exercising his fingers on imaginary strings. "This is merely mechanism, tedious, monotonous, if you will, but absolutely necessary; but when I want to hear it speak, to draw out its very soul, I use the bow—so"—and with his right arm raised, he lifted the fancied bow, daintily, and drew it tenderly along the strings. "This constitutes an entirely different motion, which must be learned separately, and which creates the voice of the violin—the most human of all musical voices except the human voice itself. Few have the ability to make this voice speak. Many will make it ripple and gambol in a thousand fantasies, but few have the God-given power of speech. It cannot be acquired; it must be born in one. Ah," he sighed, as he dropped his hands to the arms of his chair, "only a few, here and there, now and then, have the great gift, like Vieuxtemps, par exemple."

"And what of Paganini," I ventured.

"Ah! Paganini—[illegible]—well, he had superlative technique, but he was not virtuoso; his was a marvelous acrobatic performance, a magnificent pyrotechnic display, but he lacked magnetism, soul, fire. Now, Vieuxtemps," he continued, "was all soul. I do not mean that he was lacking in technique—far from it; but he made the violin speak to you in such a way that you forgot everything else."

"They say it takes years to perfect oneself on the violin; is it true?" I asked.

"Ma foi, oui," he answered. "All oneslife it is unremitting study. I, myself, entered the Conservatory of Lieges at seven years of age—not to study the violin—[illegible]—as well as," "but for general musical education. My father was an amateur musician, and, as a child, I developed a decided taste for music. Before I was ten, I had taken a prize or two for singing and piano-playing; but I did not begin my work on the violin until I was ten."

"Why did you enter the Conservatory at Lieges? Has it any advantages over the others?

"Oh, no! but I was born in Lieges, in the very home of the violin," he replied.

"How is it the 'home of the violin?'" I asked.

"Well," he went on, "it is a mountainous and rugged country to begin with—uplifting and romantic in character. Then, it is on the border-land of Belgium and that Germanic land, where war and strife have held their sway many years; these several points furnish a thousand themes for composition. Besides, this border-land has produced some of the world's greatest violinists—Vieuxtemps, and others."

"Who do you think the greatest violinist of our time, Professor," I asked.

"Oh! Wieniawski," he replied, without a moment's hesitation. "After him," he continued, twirling his mustache vigorously, "there is Sarasate"—this with a gentle suggestion of shrug, as if he were not to be compared with the first-named—"and Sivori, and there is Joachim; but in earlier days, it was Vieuxtemps the immortal—for touch, soul, irresistible fire, he has had no equal."

"And do you find real appreciation of your art in this country?" I asked.

"Yes, yes"—this with a somewhat indulgent shrug. What would a Frenchman, or a Belgian, as in this case, do without his shrug? "Yes, among certain classes; but not so much in New York, or the East, as in the West. I like it better here. I do not care for the East—it is always business and money-making."

"More so than in the West?" I put in.

"Well, it is so all over your country n'estce pas? Always money, money," he replied.

It is amazing how persistently foreigners insist upon believing that we love our dollars better than all else, when we pour them so generously into their shekel baskets—so I said:

"But how should we get the other things, if we did not make the money. We are made to pay pretty high for them, too, sometimes."

"C'est vrai," he said, "there is something in that."

Then I chatted with him about the English language, and asked him if he found it difficult. He laughed, and said he was hardly competent to judge, as his vocabulary was limited to "how are you?" and "all right"; and, as a knock came at the door just then, I said "good-by" in English, which he repeated, adding, however, with true French politesse, "et, au revoir."

E. D. H.

THE VEILED LADY.

One evening, as Don Manuel, a young cavalier who had come to Madrid to attend the festivities in honor of the baptism of the Infanta, was walking along the street, with his hands on his sword-hilt and his cloak wrapped about him like one in quest of armorous or other adventures, a closely veiled lady, shrouded in a black mantle, suddenly emerged from a house as if in desperate flight.

At sight of Don Manuel, she ran up to him and said: "If you are in truth, Senor, as you appear to be, a cavalier of rank, you will save a lady whose honor and life are both in danger. I have narrowly escaped being surprised by my husband in a compromising situation at the house of one of his friends, of whom he is absurdly jealous. I had only time to seize my cloak and rush for the door. He is following me. Detain him at all hazards, I implore you! If he overtakes me I am a dead and a dishonored woman."

"Trust to me, and fly," said Don Manuel.

He calmly took a seat before the house, and the lady disappeared.

Soon the door opened, and out rushed a man in a disordered dress and a violent passion, swearing and gesticulating wildly.

"Senor," said Don Manuel, bowing very politely and deliberately, "in view of the fact that I have only been in Madrid a few days, it is not at all surprising that I have lost my way in your city, whose size is only equaled by its beauty. You will have the great goodness, I hope, to show me the way to Calle San Bernardino, where it is my good fortune to be awaited by a young lady, who is well disposed toward me and who has promised to open her window as soon as her duenna shall have fallen asleep."

"Let me pass!" cried the other. "Can't you see that I am in a great hurry?"

"But so am I, for the young lady who is awaiting my coming has the most beautiful eyes in the world. But you, perhaps, have some scruples about aiding me in a love affair? I can only admire the delicacy of your feelings, and I am quite desirous of gaining the friendship of so virtuous a gentleman. Never mind the Calle San Bernardino, but at least be good enough to direct me to some church containing relics of peculiar sanctity. I should be glad to pass in prayer the night which I was about to be wicked enough to devote to less pious uses."

"Go to the devil, and let me pass."

"What? You will assist me neither in love nor in devotion?"

"By St. Jago!" exclaimed the exasperated husband, "I believe you are making game of me!"

"If I had been in your place," coolly returned Don Manuel, "I should have discovered that long ago."

Then they drew their swords, and fought like tigers. Their swords flashed and clashed for a long time, for the combatants were brave and well matched.

"The veiled lady," thought Don Manuel, "has surely had time to reach a place of safety."

At this instant his adversary's sword penetrated deeply into his left breast, and he fell to the ground with a loud groan.

"God have mercy on your soul!" exclaimed the victor, turning on his heel.

"One word!" entreated Don Manuel, rallying. "The lady of whom you are in pursuit—is she young and beautiful?"

"How does that concern you?"

"It concerns me greatly. I should be sorry to die for an old hag with yellow eyes and a mustache."

"Know then that Donna Anna is just twenty years old and the most beautiful woman in Madrid."

"Then I die happy!" cried Don Manuel, and his eyes closed forever.—From the French of Catulle Mendes.

BEARDSLEY'S QUARTERLY.

THE MORALS AND MANNERS OF "THE SAVOY."

So this is The Savoy—the much-abused, generously denounced Savoy—edited and illustrated by Aubrey Beardsley, full of contributions from decadent artists and poets. Will my morals survive the shock of opening this pink volume, whose cover presents a gigantic Diana of the Crossways, gazing disdainfully out upon the world, accoutered in an archaic riding-habit, a hunting whip in her gauntleted hand. Before her strides gleefully a tiny Cupid, and behind there is an Italian garden of Queen Anne's time, with inky foliage, a temple, and a sun dial. I breath freely—thus far I am safe. Now for the title page—a characteristic Beardsley production—curtains in flowing lines, candlesticks, and two Japanesque females in strange apparel, decorated with floral wreathes—grotesque, undoubtedly, but very graceful. Next, a huge George III. of a man—an impressive caricature of the typical John Bull, attired in the flowing folds of an immense cloak, ushers the contents table into view.

But let us continue to look at the pictures. First comes the reproduction of a pencil drawing, exquisitely soft and delicate, by Shannon; then "Mandoline," a curious picture by Chas. Conder. I am not up to Conder. But here is a drawing of Regent Street in the fine lines and dextrous touches of Joseph Pennell. Another Beardsley—the "Three Musicians," or rather two of them; the "Polish Pianist" does not appear. Where is the wickedness here? "They are all sensualists these women embodied in Beardsley's fine lines"—you say—"their lips and eyes are carnal." To me, they are merely grotesque, fantastic, often graceful. Look at the slender, dainty foot that peeps from beneath the cobwebby filaments of the lady's gown—who else has a touch so light, so fine? Bathers at Dieppe? Surely there is no incitement to the senses here; it is weird, preposterous, but not seductive. Next, I find a reproduction of F. Sandy's admirable picture of Harold—a tragic figure—illustrating Pennell's "Golden Decade in English Art." Here is a caricature of Beerbohm Tree, the well-known actor. I'll defy any one to find aught decadent in the charming group which follows—"The Norwegian Painter and His Family." The head of a woman, a clever study full of a mystic individuality, looks at me out of eyes that are brooding, rather than amorous.

And here is the "Flight of the Wild Ass" from Voltaire's La Pucelle, etched by Will Rothenstein—a curious affectation that introduces us again to Beardsley, this time the illustrator of his own novel, "Under the Hill." It is the hero, the Abbé Fanfreluche, who confronts us first—the most fantastic of figures—a mixture of Beau Brummel and Count D'Orsay—strangely, wildly becloaked, plumed—the very realization of an eighteenth century prince. Next appears Helen at her toilet, surrounded by figures more fantastic and ingenious than Doré ever embodied. She it is who is so adorably tall and slender, and whose legs are so divinely long.

Thus far my morals are intact. It is undeniable that they are affectations, these strange drawings—that they are meaningless and grotesque, that the faces are those familiarized by gargoyles, that the suggestion of Japanese effects is irresistible. But there is nothing debased or obscene or unpardonable. The prime offense of which Aubrey Beardsley stands convicted is his illustration of Oscar Wilde's "Salomé." His figures and faces have none of the rotundity of outline, the amorous fulness which is commonly associated with seduction. He is certainly singular, but his talent is undeniable. As for the letter press, his novel is but a fantastic fairy tale—high flown, extravagant, chimerical, resembling in the style of its imagery and the cumulation of similes, the fairy stories of Oscar Wilde. It is really very poetic, very imaginative, but makes for no purpose or object, save oddity. The leading contribution is from the pen of George Bernard Shaw, the well-known critic and dramatist, who writes a whimsical essay on "On Going to Church"—suggesting that this relaxation be not denied a man merely because he declines the accepted theories of faith. Frederic Wedmore contributes one of his subjective studies, "To Nancy"—full of an etherealized sentiment, laid in with the utmost refinement of phraseology, in a style reminiscent of Pater's. Ernest Dowson's "Eyes of Pride" is a well-turned story, with considerable constructive value. Arthur Symons writes gracefully of Dieppe, and W. B. Yeats, the new poet, contributes a pretty Celtic tale and two poems. There is much else—a Study of Zola, a paper on criticism by Selwyn Image, a poem by Mathilde Blind—all matter of high literary standard, but in no sense suggestive. ORACLE K. B.

NEW BOOKS.

JOHN VANCE CHENEY'S ESSAYS.

"No man can so write of poetry without having the secret of it." This is what John Vance Cheney says of Emerson, and it applies, in a measure, also to himself, as seen in his Dome in Air or "Thoughts on the Poets and Poetry." A poet himself, he reads with rare insight the poetry of others. From Wordsworth to Whitman, his attitude is sympathetic, not superior.

The Relation of Poetry to Life impresses on us again the fact that religion is the creation of the poets, and that just so surely as the world must always have religion, must it also have poetry and poets. "Our history and our literature, sacred and secular, rest on folk-lore, which is always suffused with poetry, luminous with it, and a minstrelsy, which is song itself." In relation to science, Mr. Cheney points out that the cold facts are of no value to the great mind and heart of man, until the poet changes them by his wondrous alchemy into pure gold. He might have added that the greatest poet, like Goethe, is also the greatest scientist. The style of this essay is full of charm, more poetical than much that passes as poetry. Such expressions, for example, as "the fresh, astonished outlook of the child-man," or this fine sentence, "This sea of happy imaginings, rich with the rose and gold of the rising sun, stretching betwixt us and the old shores of the unknown—this sea is poetry, and it was by the sound of its waters, and in the shine of their waking brightness, that the records of man began." In the other essays the writer seems to catch the style of the poet whom he criticizes, to some extent. The criticism itself is excellent. Of Emerson, Mr. Cheney says: "Sight, imagination, and inspiration standing foremost among his gifts, Emerson was a seer, a reporter, a mighty applier of ideas to life." He finds, with keen insight, the lack of depth in the brilliant Lowell, and his essay on Whittier makes us think of Ambrose Bierce's remark, that "he dared not tell this generation how great a poet Whittier really was." I. W.

[That Dome in Air, John Vance Cheney. McClurg & Co., publishers, Chicago. Price, $1.25.]

After playing Mr. Tyrawley an infinity of detestable tricks, Fate finally makes him heir to a millionaire and the husband of the adorable Nina St. Just. That is the admirable culmination to which the Apotheosis of Mr. Tyrawley refers. He is introduced as an Apollo of a fellow—the type of Ouida's guardsmen—over six feet in height, wavy hyacinthine hair, the complexion of a girl, and the thews of an athlete—the very devil of a chap. But he is terribly down on his luck, makes a precarious living at cards and billiards, hates it, being a gentleman at heart, and is moved to reform by Nina St. Just. The story, which is rather long for the plot, concerns itself with this profligate's redemption. His reputation pursues him relentlessly for some months but he finally tries costermongering in London, fits up a fruit store and is then delivered unto the millionaire as a long lost nephew. Then the scene is changed from orange-selling to luxurious dwelling in silken chambers with wedding bells in immediate prospect.

[Harper & Bros., publishers.]

The irrepressible Richard Harding Davis has been touring for Harper's publications among the Spanish-American Republics, and records his impressions in Three Gringos in Venezuela. One is not impressed with the depth of his observations, nor with the elegance of his literary manner. He is not a Pierre Loti, nor have his tropical descriptions the color and splendor of those in which Lafcadio Hearns typified the beauty and glamour of the West Indies. There is an easy flow to the style; a pleasant, genial babbling murmur, which entertains, while it does not instruct. An element of human interest is always woven into the narrative, and one reads his geography—for it is really a species of geography—as though it were a really a story book. It may be Richard Harding Davis did not tell all he knew about President Crespo, about the Lottery, or about Honduras, but he produces the impression that you are the participant of all his wisdom. You see as much of Venezuela as a properly regulated curiosity ought to demand, and it must be admitted that the story of the lottery especially is done with good coloring and cleverness. It quite escapes the literalness and factitiousness of the ordinary journalist.

[Harper & Brothers, publishers.]

The Spinsters' Scrip is discouraging reading for male or female on the verge of matrimony. It is a species of birthday-book, or year-book, with quotations upon the holy state, the majority satirical, the rest ironic, and all detestable from the point of view of a man in love. The extracts are highly modern, which is an admirable characteristic, and are drawn from J. M. Barrie, George Meredith, Stevenson, Tennyson, Kipling, Marion Crawford, and Zangwill, with a few of the older men sandwiched in to fill up the holes. Altogether, in the little oblong volume, one finds a body of matter at once amusing and entertaining, cleverly compiled, and directed with a fine eye toward the minimizing of Leap Year audacities.

[Macmillian & Co., publishers. For sale by William Doxey.]

The idea of A Self-Denying Ordinance, by M. Hamilton, is the self-denial of a young maiden in a too quixotic determination to save from ruin the lover who threatens to go farther astray than he has already gone, which is quite far enough, Heaven knows. Her sacrifice consists of her entire self, and she surrenders the fearful price ungrudgingly, though without the inspiration of respect for the beneficiary. The latter, after having engaged himself to her, runs away with another woman, and a disgusting liaison ensues. It is at this point on his road to the devil, just beyond this escapade's termination, that the wonderful guardian angel of his former attachment steps in and offers herself as a stem to his wayward drifting. With all his first ("and only!") love revived, he embraces salvation and the girl—most consciously the girl—and starts out at the end of the book to be a better man.

[D. Appleton & Co., publishers, New York.]

THE MAGAZINES.

Surely, Harriet Prescott Spofford wrote "The Godmothers" to fit the beautiful pictures which are presumed to illustrate it. In the March number of the Cosmopolitan, I find a series of charming ladies in archaic gowns, each from the brush of some well-known artist; by themselves an admirable feature, but sadly misrepresented by Miss Spofford. I tried hard indeed to realize the sense of her allegory, but she was too much for me. More interesting is Adam Badeau's article on "The Mystery of Grant," in which there is a successful effort at suggesting a peculiar feature of Grant's individuality, and the strange contrasts which his career presents. His life was made up of the most tremendous successes and the saddest failures, and the explanation seems to have been that he required a cataclysm, virtually, to make him efficient. At thirty-nine, Grant was a little store-keeper in Galena; at fifty he directed a negotiation which averted a war between England and America. The contrast is set forth in an entertaining way, and gives an impression of the bent and tendency of the great General's genius. Jokai's "Last Mass" is hardly an effective study, though the great Hungarian did write it. But Californians will find much to interest them in "Upland Pastures," a description of sheep herding in Mendocino County, which Grace Hudson has cleverly illustrated. There are some excellent halftones of Russian River scenery, and one finds the descriptions very pretty. From an artistic point of view, the finest picture is undoubtedly Albert Sterner's "At Twilight," quite the prettiest colored illustration I have seen in a magazine, except, perhaps, a Japanese picture by Blum, which Scribner's presented a year or so ago.

Ninetta Eames, who writes of "Upland Pastures" in the Cosmopolitan, supplies to the March Harper's Monthly an essay on Arcadian Bee Ranching, in which appear some excellent descriptions of the mountain scenery of Southern California. The ranch described is in the foothills near Ventura, being situated in the Cañon of the Sespe. Colonel Washington is the latest American hero for literary treatment, and one gathers from the article by Woodrow Wilson considerable information about his youth, education, and early career. Besides all this, one can follow Caspar Whitney on "Snowshoes to the Barren Ground," and go to China with Julian Ralph, whose story, "The Boss of Ling-Foo," is entertaining reading. There are also "Personal Recollections of Joan of Arc," "The German Struggle for Liberty," and a good yarn by Owen Wister.

The March Godey's Magazine has a liberal allowance of pictures. This journal runs to brief stories and articles plenteously illustrated. There is much to read and much to interest, though it cannot be said the literary value of the various articles is of particular moment. The latest issue presents a Life of Cecil Rhodes, Pranks of Nature, a Biography of Jagurina, the champion feminine fencer of the world, whom we learn is a resident of Southern California.

Of the literary publications, The Bookman is easily first. Its literary gossip is the most interesting that is published. One learns from it what all the litterateurs are at, whence they come, and the wherefore of their attitude. Besides the gossip, one finds in the March issue an article about Gabriel d'Annunzio, the Italian poet-novelist, by Frederick Taber Cooper. H. C. Bunner considers Brander Matthews. George Gissing's Odd Woman figures among the "neglected books." A number of interesting novels are reviewed. There is some charming poetry, an installment of Kate Carnegie, Ian Maclaren's new novel, and the usual chronicles of the book trade.

The March Pocket Magazine presents as its main feature a story by Brander Matthews, which won the second prize in the Bacheller competition. The "Twinkling of an Eye" is a fairly good yarn, but the editor of The Pocket Magazine ought not to lose sight of the fact that it has been made familiar by frequent publications. First, in the New York Herald, later in Chapman's Magazine, and it is now to be had with Miss Wilkins's story, "The Long Arm," in book form. The booklet contains also a poem by Kipling, stories by Mrs. Burton Harrison, and Robert W. Chambers. It is certainly worth ten cents.

The March Current Literature reprints the Saturday Review's critique of The Red Badge of Courage; a fine chapter entitled "Chonita's Surrender," from Gertrude Atherton's Doomswoman, and "Q's" charming "Visit to the Gunnel Rock," surely a most graceful and delightful idyll. It also reprints a capital article from THE WAVE describing a vintage on a California vineyard. It is impossible even to briefly catalogue the variety of articles which this journal contains, but it is certainly full of most entertaining and readable material.

The life of Cardinal Manning continues to be a theme of controversy in the English literary journals. Cardinal Vaughan has called the biography a crime, and its author a betrayer of confidences. It cannot be said, however that Purcell told more than the truth, for his statements are all substantiated by letters and documents whose authenticity is beyond question. The secret history of the work indicates revenge. Manning, it seems, induced the author to invest a certain amount of money in a Catholic periodical called The Weekly Register. Like many another paper of its kind, the Register prospered not. Purcell lost all his money, and by way of recompense the prelate confided to him diaries and notes with a view of compiling a biography. The executors, in their turn, entrusted Purcell with all the manuscripts and papers which formed the Cardinal's effects, but omitted to make it a condition that the author should submit the proposed life to them when completed. The manner in which Purcell has utilized his material is undoubtedly open to severe censure. He has reprinted all the uncomplimentary refereuces contained in the private letters of the dead Cardinal, in communication with his ecclesiastical subordinates and superiors. Letters dealing with the most private matters are presented without comment, and undoubtedly the character of the great prelate is presented in its most unfavorable light. The executors now announce that they intend to publish a new life upon their own account; but this plan must result in aggravating rather than minimizing the mischief already done.

Mary Abbott, in the Times-Herald, points out a curious resemblance between the plot of Molly Elliott Seawell's novelette, which won the New York Herald's $3000 prize, and a certain short story in Household Words, entitled "The Way I Made My Fortune," published in 1851. Of course, the suggestion is that Mrs. Seawell obtained her idea from the tale in question, and as the details are by no means dissimilar, the accusation may be well founded. Still, it was not because of the excellent plot that the prize was awarded, but on account of the literary treatment—the verve and smartness of the narrative and the piquancy of the dialogue. What matters it if some obscure penman did present an idea similar to the basis of Mrs. Seawell's? Events are continually reproducing themselves. If one artist can give a better setting to a subject another has treated, why deny the privilege?

James Whitcomb Riley has retired from the lecture platform. He gives as his reasons, continually recurring stage fright and a strong aversion to travel. Familiarity with strange audiences and frequency of public appearance did not relieve his nervous tremors, and he suffered as acutely at his last lecture as at the first. Besides, he was utterly unable to understand a railway time-table, and lacking the sense of locality was continually being lost in strange cities.

The Sunday Herald contained an admirable essay on Dumas fils, by Henry James, done in the finest manner of this clever writer.

PAPER GLOVES

would be poor imitations of real kid—Imitations are always poor. The name "DODGE" stands for high-class stationery and engraving.

Our new store—our only one—is at 112 Post St., "The Yellow Store" next the White House. Beware of imitators who use our name.

THE THEATERS.

WARDE AS KING LEAR—CANFIELD AS A FUNMAKER.

This week has added something to Warde's reputation, but not enough, I fancy, to console him for the empty houses he has faced. On the whole, "King Lear" seems, to an outsider, to have been produced mainly for the good of John C. Hickey, for nobody else has gained much by it, while he undeniably made a decided hit as the Fool. I have seldom seen one so artistic and melodious, or more to my fancy; but does it not occur to you that something must be wrong when the Fool is the star in "King Lear"?

To criticise Shakespeare is to lay oneself open to unpleasant accusations, yet I must say that the first act of "Lear" seems to me to need re-writing. I believe that the great William left it much as it was in the old play, which furnished the foundation of his own, for I always have the feeling (even after making due allowance for his age and probably tottering mind) that the King's wrath is all out of proportion to its cause, and that his belief in Regan and Goneril's high-flown expressions of love is preposterous. Still, so the great master has left it, and so Warde acts it, without more ranting and fury than are customary, but with entirely too much to have been excited by such words as:

> "Unhappy that I am,
> I cannot heave my heart into my mouth."

and:

> "You have begot me, bred me, lov'd me; I
> Return those duties back as are right fit,
> Obey you, love you, and most honour you.
> Why have my sisters husbands, if they say
> They love you all? Haply, when I shall wed,
> That lord, whose hand must take my plight, shall carry
> Half my love with him, half my care and duty.
> Sure, I shall never marry like my sisters,
> To love my father all."

And this was said, remember, in "a voice ever soft, gentle, and low." Like Lear, Warde is much cleverer out of his mind than in it. As the mad King, he is excellent; as the angry one, mediocre. In the second act, there is one passage which particularly needs his attention. When Regan orders him to return to Goneril, and says, "Say you have wrong'd her, sir," and he replies:

> "Ask her forgiveness?
> Do you mark how this becomes the mouth:
> 'Dear daughter, I confess that I am old;
> Age is unnecessary: on my knees I beg
> That you'll vouchsafe me raiment, bed and food,"

he failed, it seemed to me, to make the sarcasm of his answer clear. When he kneeled, it had too much the look of an appeal to Regan, rather than an ironical adoption of the attitude she advised him to assume toward Goneril. Taken as a whole, the performance was very fair, though Ernest C. Warde's Oswald was rather improbable, and Fanny Gillitie's Cordelia was anæmic, and her emotion hollow and unreal.

Of course "A Railroad Ticket" is merely "a diversion played on a penny whistle," but it keeps one awake; it will wile away an idle hour. It has no plot, or at least so little that it could never be very much in anybody's way, and did not trouble Canfield and his company at all; they seemed never to think about it, and are altogether the most irresponsible set of fun-makers imaginable. Their abandon is delightful. "What do we care about a plot, or for rhyme or reason; let us kick up our heels and be merry." Without Robert Canfield they would be like a butterfly without wings. He constantly lifts them out of the quagmire of dulness into the region of fresh and infectious fun; they flutter or fall flat with him, and he carries the whole thing on his shoulders. The responsibility does not weigh him down, however; he seems absolutely unconcerned, and as cool and calm as a cucumber; there is no effort. "I just happened to be funny, that's all. I did not mean anything by it," he seems to say with his mild and rather apologetic blue eyes. The women in the outfit are quite attractive, Hattie Waters being the handsomest. She is a wholesome looking girl with a good figure, better features, and fresh lips which part over very regular and beautifully white teeth. Her face lacks the vivacity which some of her companions possess, and her voice, nasal and flat, is enough to undo the charms of a Circe. The unfortunate housemaid, Sallie Stembler, may, in time, do something in the comic line, for her mirth is infectious and she managed to look charmingly absurd, with her gorgeous hat over her eyes and the black smudges on her cheeks, after her unpremeditated descent into the cellar. When you have observed these things, and listened to the songs of the professors, there is not much left to please except a remarkably well filled pair of red stockings (belonging to Huldah, or Lou, I forget which), and little Mattie Lockette's pretty violet-trimmed petticoats.

It is an amusing enough little absurdity, but one grows tired of oscillating between amusing twaddle and imperfectly put on Shakespearian dramas. When are we to have a Daly, a Frohman, or a French who will spend thirty, twenty, or seventeen thousand dollars on a Shakespearian revival, or a new play, and protect it from the Katie Putnams, the Marie Wainwrights, and the Nellie McHenrys of the profession. We can endure being ignored by Duse, the Nethersole, and other celebrities, but to have all the failures, the feebleminded, and vulgar pretenders thrust upon us is insufferable. We ought to refuse to become a home for incurables. Between the first and the last day of May all the large Eastern cities are to be treated to "The Rivals," with Joseph Jefferson, Crane, Nat Goodwin, Francis Wilson, Mrs. John Drew, and Julia Marlowe in the cast. Think of it. We considered ourselves lucky a few years ago to see it given by Jefferson James and Mrs. Drew. Of course we will miss it, but there is some consolation to be gotten out of the five dollars which they say is to be asked for each orchestra seat.

PEG WOFFINGTON.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

A rattling good fun-maker is "The Railroad Ticket" at the Columbia. It has no real dramatic merit, but serves as a conveyance for several good specialty stars, who are at their best in the various parts assigned to them. Canfield is noticeably good in his line of work, and Mattie Lockette does a pretty wing dance. There is a good male quartet, and several song and dance features, which go well. Next Monday "The Wicklow Postman" will be presented.

Morosco's has reveled in another lurid melodrama, the scenic effects of which were an important feature, and were successfully managed without hitch or accident. The Company played well, Mr. Benrimo giving a bit of character acting as Denkle, which was a surprise, and must have been a pleasure to those of his friends who witnessed it. Miss Tittell, who is young, good-looking, and natural, continues to improve. She dresses well, and speaks clearly and distinctly, but is sometimes a little perfunctory in some of her lines. Otherwise, her work is good and promises much. Gilbert and Goldie furnished their share of the fun, during the week, between the acts, and made a hit. "The Silver King," by Henry Arthur Jones and Henry Herman, will be given next week at this house.

Madame Materna who accompanies Ondricek, the court violinist of Austria to this Coast, was Wagner's ideal heroine as Isolde, Elizabeth, and Ortrud. She sat under the instructions of the great master, and it was he who taught her to sing his music, and also taught her why it should be sung in a certain fashion; he took her into the secrets of his mind, and added much to the certainty, the force, the dramatic quality, that make her the great singer she is. Ondricek himself, is spoken of by many of the leading journals of the world, as incomparably the most gifted and accomplished violinist of to-day, or since Wilhelmj. Mr. Isidore Luckstone, the well-known English composer and pianist, will also accompany Ondricek to this city. They will give two concerts at the Auditorium, under the management of Friedlander, Gottlob & Co., March 12th and 14th. The prices charged will be less in San Francisco than charged in any of the cities of the East. A reception will be given to Ondricek, Materna, and Mr. Luckstone upon their arrival at the Palace Hotel, March 11th.

Paderewski's father was a Polish patriot, who was banished to Siberia in 1863. After many years he was allowed to return, and his broken spirit is another of the burdens the young musician has to carry.

The De Fillippis from Le Moulin Rouge, at Paris, have favored the Orpheum audiences with a good bit of dancing, entitled "Sur le Boulevard," this week. There are some other new faces there, also,—among them the Andersons in their rough plantation sketches, and two travesty stars, Norma Wills and Montie Collins, in a little sketch called "Pygmalion and Galatea-up-to-Date," who have scored hits. Some champion club-swingers and jugglers have also added interest to the program.

Carleton's Opera Company, at the Alcazar, has furnished lovers of music with some very good entertainment this week in two operas. The first three nights of the week, "Fra Diavolo" was presented, with Carleton as the Fra, which suited him well. Miss Rena Atkinson made a very pretty Zerlina, and Hamilton and Ricketts provided plenty of fun. The last days of the week the company provided a change of bill in "The Bohemian Girl," which was prettily staged and well sung.

Rumors are afloat that Maurice Barrymore has signed a contract with W. A. Brady, by which he will star next season under the latter's management. The play used is one of Mr. Barrymore's own composition, entitled "Roaring Dick and Company," a strong society drama. Barrymore will play Roaring Dick, a part similar to Captain Swift.

February 28th the Bostonians celebrated the two thousandth performance of "Robin Hood," at the Broadway Theater, with Reginald de Koven leading the orchestra and Harry B. Smith as stage manager.

The management of the Baldwin announce Hoyt's farce comedy, "A Milk White Flag," for next Monday. To-morrow night, Marsick, the violinist, will give a grand orchestral concert at the Baldwin Theater. Seats from 50 cents to $1.00.

"Rip Van Winkle" has proved a drawing card at the Tivoli this week. The title role is one of Hartman's best—and Carrie Roma's reappearance has been greeted with enthusiasm by her old friends, who find her voice much improved. Little Gertie Carlisle and Pearl Landers make pretty features of the play as Hans and Meenie. The next opera will be "The Hoolah."

Mme. Patti was asked recently whether she intended to return soon to the United States, and, according to a reporter of the Paris Figaro, her answer was. "I am never going back to America. It is too fatiguing. Mr. Pratt of Chicago offered me $200,000 for forty concerts, but I would not accept it."

Every time Mme. Calvé appears at the Metropolitan Opera House she receives $1500. She has under consideration a proposition from Oscar Hammerstein to return to America next season to give fifty performances of Carmen through all the great cities. He offers her $2400 for each performance, or $120,000 in all—terms which Patti alone excelled, and alone justified. But not one of these artists ranks against Paderewski whose tour this season will net him at least $200,000.

IT IS A FACT.

LOUIS ROEDERER CHAMPAGNE IS THE ACKNOWLEDGED POPULAR WINE.

THIS DELICIOUS WINE NOW, AS EVER, THE FINEST OF ALL BRANDS.

As civilization advances, the tastes of the people grow more fastidious, and in no one point more so than in the selection of a brand of champagne. To retain the lead, a wine must, indeed, possess intrinsic merits, and it can unhesitatingly be stated that the famous Louis Roederer Champagnes have to-day the call amongst select circles, not only on this Coast, but in the East and all over Europe. Every true lover of champagne well knows that a high grade wine is dependent on its absolute uniformity year in and year out, and this is one of the many strong points in favor of Louis Roederer Champagne, and the connoisseur in ordering Brut, Extra Dry, Grand Vin Sec, Dry and Carte Blanche knows exactly what to expect, and always receives it. Of late, there has been a great deal of discussion in the refined circles as to which are the very best wines to serve at dinners. All have been tried, but as things now staud the Louis Roederer wines unquestionably stand without a rival. These wines not only stand first in America, but also in Europe, where no dinner seems complete without bumpers of Louis Roederer.

Good Appetite

Is restored and the disordered Stomach and Liver invigorated by taking a small wineglassful, before meals, of the celebrated . . . . . .

Peruvian Bitters

In a Vice.

Feet feel that way in stiff, hard shoes. Goodyear Welt shoes are easy, flexible, comfortable. All dealers sell Goodyear Welts, all people may wear them.

GOODYEAR SHOE MACHINERY CO., BOSTON

THE AUDITORIUM

Cor. of Eddy and Jones Sts.
Friedlander, Gottlob & Co. Lessees and Managers

The Greatest of all Musical Events Engagement Extraordinary of

MATERNA

The World Renowned Wagnerian Singer

ONDRICEK

The Great Bohemian Violinist

ISIDORE LUCKSTONE

Pianist

TWO CONCERTS ONLY....

Thursday Evening, March 12th
Saturday Matinee, March 14th

The sale of seats will begin at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s Music House on Monday Morning, March 9th, at 9 o'clock.

Reserved Seats 50c, $1.00 $1.50 and $2.00

BALDWIN THEATRE (AL. MAYER AND CO. INCORP'D PROPS.)

To-morrow Sunday Night, March 8th

MARSICK

IN GRAND ORCHESTRAL CONCERT

Next Monday, March 9th
Three Weeks Only

HOYT'S A MILK WHITE FLAG

will wave in the breeze of popular success. Great Popular Cast. New st Catchy Music. Pretty Girls—The Laughable Triumph of the Year. Fifty People.

Columbia Theatre.

FRIEDLANDER, GOTTLOB & CO. LESSEES AND MANAGERS

One Week Only
Commencing Monday, March 9th
Matinee Saturday
The Legitimate Comedian Eugene O'Rourke
In the Greatest of all Irish Comedy-Dramas

The Wicklow Postman

A story of Irish life true to nature. Special conjunction with this massive production John L. Sullivan, Champion for 12 years, and Paddy Ryan, Ex-Champion of America, will appear in a three-round exhibition of boxing, introduced by Charles E. (Parson) Davies.

March 16th A TEXAS STEER

TIVOLI OPERA HOUSE

MRS. ERNESTINE KREELING, Proprietor and Manager

To begin Monday, March 9th
Every Evening

The Merry Opera

..THE HOOLAH..

Bright music. Lovely costumes. Beautiful scenery.

Next Opera—MARITANA

POPULAR PRICES - 25 and 50 Cents

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE

Handsomest Family Theatre in the World
WALTER MOROSCO, - Sole Lessee and Manager

Last Performances of—The Midnight Flood
A Marvel of Realism

MONDAY, MARCH 9th
The Jones-Herman Masterpiece

THE SILVER KING

The Greatest Drama of the Century

ORPHEUM

O'Farrell Street, between Stockton and Powell

Week of Monday, March 9th
More Celebrated People
Choicest Selection from the Best Talent

The Famous Athos Family, The greatest acrobatic quintet before the public.
Chas B. Ward—The well-known ballad writer and singer, in his latest success, "The Bowery Boy."
Return engagement of Rachel Walker, the favorite Creole Nightingale, for one more week only.
Wills and Collins Alburtus and Bartram
The De Fillippis, and our Magnificent Company.

Wedding Invitations are properly engraved and in correct form, at ROBERTSON'S

SOME FOLKS think that the cards we print from your plate for One Dollar per hundred are of inferior quality. This is not true; try us, or ask some one that has.

PIERSON BROS.
225 Kearny St.

SPLASHES.

THE MATRONS of to-day who would rank as successful entertainers, do not judge of their ability by the appreciation lent their efforts by clubmen, but, rather, by the attention tendered them by the débutantes. Bereft of her illusions ere she is half-way through her teens, as captious as a dyspeptic, and critical as an unappreciated author, the débutante of the waning of the century requires a continuous round of novelty. The entertainment that pleased to-day, to-morrow palls—the success of yesternight becomes the failure of the morrow. One must be audacious, indeed, to attempt to dine a débutante, as it requires not alone a most artistically devised menu, but some post-prandial surprise. To sit around, sing a little, and pass an hour in conversation is voted a bore. This exotic of our day demands to be amused, regards conversation as an anachronism, amateur performances an abhorrence. To please these modern damsels the dinner dance and the theater party were inaugurated. But these are now entered among the list of the Twice-Told-Tale series, and are succeeded by the Cliff House supper, the final achievement of the enterprising matrons. After the consumption of a lengthy dinner the matron, accompanied by a bevy of maids and men, boards the cars or a four-in-hand for the Cliff House, where, having whetted their appetites by strolling around and contemplating the beauties of the ocean, they partake of an elaborate supper, and then return to town. With the approach of spring the popularity of these parties will be redoubled, and some of the buds are suggesting the advisability of starting a coaching line to the Cliff, as it would be much more fun than riding on the cars with the oi polloi. Mrs. Davis gave one of these dinners last week to a party of young people, and, later, they went out to the Cliff and had a splendid time. I hear of numberless similar affairs in contemplation, so we are compelled to conclude that the dinner of the future will be incomplete without this culmination.

* * *

Society seems to have settled down to its customary Lenten calm. Prevailing dissipations are of the mildest kind. There have been a few dinners, a luncheon or two, and an occasional card party, but with the departure of Paderewski, the last legitimate excuse for a theater party vanished. Of the dinners, an unusually pretty pink dinner was given by Mrs. W. E. Dean, in honor of Mr. and Mrs. J. Woodside MacBride of Brooklyn, N. Y. Mr. and Mrs. MacBride are on their way to Japan, where Mr. Mac Bride has large interests in the tea plantations. Another large dinner was given by Colonel Fred Crocker to Baron and Baroness Von Eng'emuller, on Friday evening. Of the minor events are the Timothy Hopkins dinner, the Samuel Knight card party, a very informal affair, and the luncheon given by Mrs. Robert Fry in honor of Miss Sherwood of Tacoma.

* * *

In spite of the number of children who are seemingly indulged, children's parties are rare events. Whether it be because parents in general dread the noise of the little ones, or whether they doubt their ability to amuse them, the fact remains that these affairs are as far between as angels' visits. It is undoubtedly quite an undertaking, as the children are apt to quarrel, to get hurt, and meet with countless woes; besides, there is always the danger of their over-eating and being laid up for the ensuing week. Apropos of children's parties, an enterprising matron who has several offspring gave a Christmas party in San Jose, and no less than eleven of her youthful guests caught the whooping-cough. It appears that one of the children had already contracted the disease, and speedily affected the crowd. A very large and successful party was given by Mrs. Fry to her little son, Douglas, on Thursday afternoon. About seventy-five children were invited, and spent the time playing games and at the Punch and Judy show, which caused them great amusement.

* * *

MOST IMPRESSIVE was the gathering of foreign celebrities at Burlingame on Saturday. Frenchmen, Austrians, and Italians gave quite a cosmopolitan air to the assemblage that witnessed the steeplechase. Baron Von Englemuller and his handsome wife, Count Cini, Raoul Duval, De Beckmore, and Marsais, together with the young Lazards, formed an imposing European contingent. And those whose French was less than perfect, found themselves out of the general conversation. Indeed, the prevailing talk that day was a strange mingling of Ollendorff, Meisterschaft, and other methods. However, the steeplechase was a rattling good show. It was over the same course as that of last week, and was handily won by Harry Simpkins on Aladdin, though Raoul Duval, on Galloping Dick, gave him a hard tussle. The prize was a beautiful and very expensive loving cup presented by the Duke D'Abruzzi, whose generosity is certainly not the least commendable of his characteristics. He must have expended nearly $2000 on cups for the benefit of Burlingame. This one goes to Dick Tobin, I assume, since both Aladdin and Galloping Dick are his property. By the way, the foreigners pronounced Simpkins's riding admirable, and overwhelmed both Tobin and himself with congratulations. Walter Hobart destroyed his chances of success by the manner in which he rode Brandy in the start. He took his fences with a terrific dash and rush, and winded his pony before the course was half completed. The race was quite a pretty one altogether, and had as its audience half of San Mateo County, besides the Burlingame Clubites in numbers.

* * *

Altogether, Saturday was a great day at Burlingame. The entertainment commenced with a scratch pigeon shoot in which members alone participated. At lunch the crowd divided itself off into parties. Dick Tobin had a number of foreign celebrities. Fred Crocker had Baron and Baroness Von Englemuller. The Baroness is a tall, handsome blonde, a member of a swell Polish family. Joe Grant entertained Prince Luigi, together with a number of friends. And Walter Hobart had Miss Williams, Miss Hobart, and Miss Alice Hoffmann, whom he drove down from town on his drag. Later on in the afternoon there was an exciting polo game, won after a severe tussle by the team composed of Lawson, Simpkins, Hobart, and Thomas.

* * *

Among the notable foreigners in town are Raoul Duval, who is well known throughout America as the representative of Dagoret Champagne. He is accompanied this trip by De Beckmore and Marais, who are wine merchants on a large scale in Paris, and are here on business and pleasure. Teddy Holden, a London wine merchant and well known in the smart set, has returned, after seeing the California elephant. He was especially delighted with his visit to Del Monte.

* * *

Willie Macdonough is receiving congratulations on the latest addition to his stable, a colt by Ormonde out of the celebrated mare Jongleuse. The offspring is a frisky, brisk, and healthy horselet, with all the indications about limbs, head, and shoulders of his aristocratic breeding. By the way, three other colts by Ormonde are expected this season.

* * *

THE TOPIC under discussion around the tea-tables is the engagement of Miss Hannah Williams and Mr. Walter Hobart. Rarely has any betrothal caused so much genuine satisfaction. Both are popular—the prospective bride especially so; besides, she is the belle of the season, and Mr. Hobart, from several points of view, the best match. Ever since their meeting at Del Monte, where the young people met, Mr. Hobart has never wavered in his allegiance, and, although the engagement was only announced on Friday evening at the Hobart dinner, it was a fait accompli since Miss Williams passed the New Year at the Hobart home in San Mateo. That it was not anticipated sooner was chiefly due to the friendship existing between Miss Ella Hobart and Miss Williams, which made her brother's attentions lack any especial point. I understand that the marriage is to take place very soon after Easter.

* * *

One of the smartest events of the week was the card party given on Thursday by Mrs. Wm. P. Morgan, assisted by Miss Ella Morgan. Forty guests, chiefly married people, were invited. Another interesting affair was Miss Jennie Catherwood's farewell tea on Saturday afternoon. In the evening, Miss Catherwood and several of the young people went to hear Sousa's band.

* * *

The death of Mrs. H. J. Stewart is most regrettable. She was a woman of musical intelligence and personal energy, and had been admirably educated. Personally, she was a kindly and most generous lady, whose genial manners and generous heart had won her a circle of faithful friends. At the time of her death, Mrs. Stewart was organist of Rabbi Nieto's synagogue. She was a graduate of the Conservatory of Music in Paris, and also of Trinity College, London.

* * *

THE VEREIN JINKS, on Saturday night last, gathered the many forces of the institution within the clubhouse. It was a combination entertainment, the Calliopeans assisting materially with their brightest lights. Dr. Abrams was Sire, and introduced the various features in brief epigrammatic addresses. There were innumerable personalities, of course; there always are at jinks, but every one accepts the jokes in the spirit of their giving. Max Blum's poem, Ben Davis's imitation of Carroll Johnson, a duet by Louis Greenebaum and Joe Sloss, a duologue between Joe Hirsch as Adolph Sutro and Sandy Walter as C. P. Huntington, were amusing and interesting features, though one must not forget Mr. Dinkelspiel's imitation of Paderewski, and the comic sketch by Manney Brandenstein and Sim Meininger. It would also be unwise to omit mention of Edgar Peixotto's rendering of Father Time, which created a good deal of laughter and hurt no one's feelings in particular. This is really the most successful affair of the kind the Verein has had. It has never in the past been so successful in its jinks as the Concordia. The general results, however, were much more satisfactory, and the affair was certainly amusing.

* * *

A coming event is the Bal Poudre, for which the Verein has issued invitations. In the institution are any number of brunette beauties whose countenances and complexions will be admirably set off by a powdered coiffure. There is limitless liberty allowed in the matter of fancy dress, and, while the Empire costume will doubtless prevail, the girls are invited to appear in whatever guise they choose. It was first the desire that the men, in the matter of habiliments, should give their fancy play, but it did not meet with a very generous reception, and ordinary evening dress will be en regle.

* * *

Miss Jennie Schwabacher is the recipient of many congratulatory entertainments over her betrothal to Mr. Rosenbaum. On Monday night, Miss Minnie Schwabacher gave, in her honor, a box party at the Columbia, and subsequently a supper at the Maison Riché. There is to be another entertainment to-morrow night. Two marriages of moment are to be celebrated in this month: that of Alfred Simon to Miss Stella Greenebaum on the evening of the eleventh, and that of Mr. Abe Brown and Miss Ruby Lowenberg on the twenty-fourth. Both will be elaborate affairs, even though the invitations are confined to the relatives of bride and groom.

* * *

A very interesting wedding was that of Joseph W. Jacobi and Miss Selma Altmeyer, who were married by Dr. Frier in the new Bush-street Temple. It was the first matrimonial ceremony performed there. Another marriage was that of Miss Reine Nettle and Henry Yale Witbeck of Chicago, celebrated at the home of Mr. and Mrs. H. W. Blume on Golden Gate Avenue, on Sunday last. The groom is the only son of J. W. Witbeck, a millionaire banker of Chicago. He is a graduate of Yale, and a direct descendant of the founder of that college.

* * *

The Fortnightly Club's first meeting at the Willie Crocker's was thoroughly successful. The next affair is at the McNutt's. There is a strenuous effort at keeping all mention of the entertainments out of the press, and this proves easier because the organization is down to a working membership. No longer are there spectators to carp or applaud at the wrong time. The critics must all subject themselves to the ordeal of appearance, and the Golden Rule proves an adequate softener of verdicts.

* * *

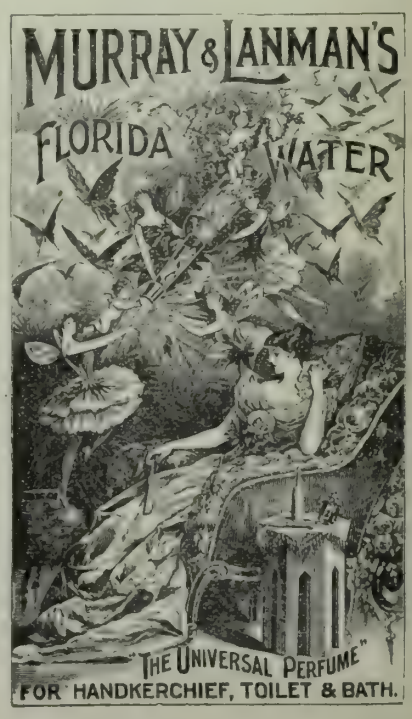
Sad news to communicate—a rift in the harmonious relations between Talbot Clifton and the Burlingame Club. No longer is Clifton regarded with favor there. Not because of his personal eccentricities, nor on account of his weird taste in clothes; nor yet because of his strange and daring horsemanship; nor even because of his love for White Hat McCarthy; but all on account of Bob. Bob is a setter, whose intelligence and education Clifton is fond of exhibiting to his friends. The dog is treated with tremendous consideration, and when master and Bob are at Burlingame both must be provided with separate apartments. But this policy does not harmonize with the directors' sense of the fitness of things, and quite recently they intimated to Clifton that he must find some other quarters than the Club for Bob. He responded that Clifton and dog were inseparable and that the expulsion of one meant the resignation of the other. Of course, this was a sad alternative to present to any institution, but the condition had to be met, and in consequence Clifton is now looking for quarters over at San Rafael, and proposes, I believe, transferring Bob and himself to the shadow of Mt. Tamalpais.

* * *

There is a new importation in slang, which hails from New York, and is the latest catch phrase in all the clubs there. It is, "Just

The Original Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter Street, stands without a rival and has stood the test for years. The most delicious meals are served by gentlemanly attendants, and the management takes pride in having everything orderly. It is just the place for business men and ladies out shopping to lunch.

Chew Adams' Pepsin Tutti-Frutti. It is sovereign for Indigestion and agreeable to the taste.



tell them that you saw me," and is the first line of the refrain of a popular ballad. Everywhere you go, from Broadway to the Bowery, you are greeted with it, and it is fast ousting the popular "Chimmie Fadden" phrases which, until now, have reigned supreme. It is rather interesting to note the rise of a slang phrase. It usually hails from some theatrical show, and is adopted by the "Brownie," who uses it so constantly that very soon his sisters p'ck it up, and after awhile the mother of the family, who abhors slang, finds herself falling into the way of it. The school girls are, as a rule, most apt in picking up a phrase, and in some cases one hardly recognizes their idioms; it is Greek to the uninitiated, and often meaningless to themselves.

* * *

THE MUSICIAN'S CLUB is much aggrieved over the refusal of Paderewski to accept the banquet it tendered him. The eminent Pole is not given to formal festivities and availed himself of the privilege of his genius and refrained from the attentions of the several social organizations which yearned to do themselves honor at his expense. The banquet took place in the absence of the anticipated guest, however, but if his ears burned that night, he may know it was not without cause. He was actually accused of ingratitude, for the speakers succinctly dwelt on their own labors at plowing where he had reaped. One of them wanted to know where Paderewski would have been without them, and the answer was like that to the famous riddle about Moses and the extinguished candle — in the dark. The club flourishes and gives the musicians a chance to show they are not nearly so bad as they paint each other.

* * *

At the first session of the new Forum Club, on Monday afternoon, Fred. Warde talked of Shakespeare, and said some excellent things about the Bard of Avon, for which he was generously applauded. Besides the lecturer, there was but a single male present, and Warde is said to have caused him to blush by addressing the audience as "Ladies and Gentleman."

* * *

The Society of the Colonial Dames met on Tuesday last at the home of Mrs. Maddox, on Sacramento Street, and spent the afternoon discussing the affairs of the organization. At each meeting new members are added to the list, and the Society bids fair to assume formidable proportions. Thus far, there has been a fortunate absence of bickering, though, it must be admitted, that when the names of new members are sent in, the archives are not searched too closely. In Washington, recently, when one lady's name was proposed, another of the dames stood up and vetoed it, saying that her escutcheon was stained by the brand of illegitimacy some three generations back. This created a tremendous disturbance, and, it was feared, would break up the Society. The invitations are very dainty conceits, written on vellum in old English, and sealed with antique stamps. The next meeting is to take place at Mrs. Gibbons's home.

* * *

A few seasons ago, calling was among the tabooed pleasures of Lent, but this year marks a decisive change. No one formerly dreamed of remaining home on the stipulated reception days during the holy season. Now the parlors of the fashionable matrons are crowded with myriads of maids bent on fulfiling their social duties. After four o'clock, there is a general dispersion in the direction of church; but I hear that, although many of the girls set out with the idea of going to afternoon service, few carry their intention into execution. Indeed, the services are not so well attended as they were last year, and the worshipers, as a rule, do not belong to the ranks of the fashionables.

* * *

The god of Discord has entered into the Century Club and riot rages within. The Club is divided against itself, and two bodies, each fighting for supremacy, are causing sad havoc within the ranks. Owing to the air of mystery that surrounds the workings of this august body, only the most veiled hints are thrown out, but dark frowns hover on the brows of the Directorate. It appears that the first omen of disruption was given when Mrs. Whitney and her friends retired from the sacred band and started the Forum Club. Tired of the eternal secrecy and dull conservatism, which are the predominant features of the constitution of the Century Club, they proposed to form a society whose work should be for the public eye, and whose deeds should not seek the cover of silence.

* * *

Quite a considerable degree of interest is being shown among the older ladies in the Maria Kip Orphanage. Miss Gwin, Mrs. Evan Coleman, Mrs. Gibbs, Mrs. Kip, and a number of others meet every week and make clothing for the orphans. The latest fad among them is the manufacture of the old-fashioned rag carpet, and it is very diverting to watch them cutting, tieing, and weaving the rags into this form. After the sewing, the ladies attend the services at Reverend William Kip's church. Mr. Kip has recently organized a retreat for the clergymen of the Episcopal Church, which is causing much comment and has quite a vogue among the more progressive members of that faith.

* * *

AS THE LENTEN SEASON progresses, and the maidens already ennuied by their irksome idleness are endeavoring to find fresh fields to conquer, chafing-dish parties which formed so popular a Lenten relaxation a year ago, are being revived. The most devoted adherents of this club are the Jackson-street set — the Knowles, Watts, Miss Alice Grimes, and Miss Nellie Chabot, all of whom are quite clever cooks and manipulate the dish with much skill. There is a pleasing rivalry, too, with regard to the concoction of untried delicacies, and each maiden vies with the other in setting forth some novel plat. Last season different girls prided themselves on their skill in cooking deviled lobster, each claiming the superiority of her own recipe. Another successful dish was creamed shrimps, while the more ambitious tried frogs and terrapin stews. This year the young people propose meeting every Saturday evening. These parties are informal and enjoyable, and the merriment caused by the mistakes of the cooks, the overturning of dishes, and the breaking of plates adds much to their popularity.

* * *

One of the most enterprising of the bachelor hosts is Mr. Fred Magee, who has been busy for some time past in acquiring a reputation as a giver of successful dinners. He gave a very jolly little dinner at his home in San Francisco, to a number of the Deux Temps girls on Monday last. Covers were laid for twelve, and afterwards all went to the Glee Club concert. Among those invited were Miss Belle Mhoon, Miss Jessie Glascock, Miss Florence Dunham, Miss Myra Prather, Mr. Allen Wright, Mr. Alick Baldwin, Mr. Frank King, etc.

* * *

In Oakland the Lenten luncheon is at the height of its popularity and the various maids and matrons are kept busy exchanging hospitalities. Thus far these affairs do not develop a distinct degree of difference from luncheons which occurred before the fasting season commenced. Unlike the Eastern maidens, who are ambitious for a little touch of novelty, the Oaklanders have not even attempted the fish and fruit luncheon which is the correct Lenten diversion in New York. Of the recent events in Oakland, the pink and violet luncheon given by Miss Blix Smith on Thursday in honor of the engagement of Miss Mamie Pope, was a very enjoyable affair. About fifteen girls were invited. Miss Pope is to be married immediately after Lent. I hear that the wedding is to be quite an event, and is to take place at the Church of the Advent, East Oakland. Miss Pope is a pretty girl and exceedingly popular. After her marriage she is to go to San Diego, where her future husband is engaged in business. The bridesmaids are Miss Hawkhurst of Livermore and Miss White.

* * *

A young married ladies' luncheon that was rather dainty was given last week by Mrs. Grayson. The decorations were in pink La France roses and maiden-hair fern. Among those invited were Mrs. Chas. Allen Mrs. Will Ralston, Mrs. Harry Hinckley, and others. Another pretty luncheon was given on Tuesday by Miss Ella Goodall to a number of San Francisco girls. Miss Goodall has almost totally forsaken Oakland this winter, as so many of her friends have gone to San Francisco for the season, among them Miss Coleman and Miss Minnie Houghton.

* * *

A jolly festival was given on Tuesday afternoon on board the "Monowai," by Miss Violet Carey, to the "Terpsichorean Club." The event took place in the afternoon, and was chaperoned by Mrs Jouett. Quite a number of the older men appeared, among them several officers from the Presidio.

* * *

Several of the ladies who have been rather quiet during the gay season, announce a series of receptions in March. Among them are Mrs. Irving Lewis and Mrs. Giles Eaton, who entertain on Monday afternoons. Mrs. Lewis and Mrs. Eaton were, when the Misses Phillips, among the most popular of Oakland maidens, and considerable disappointment was felt when the younger Miss Phillips married Mr. Eaton and went East to live. She is now out here on a visit, and anticipates spending some time with her sister. Another reception to be given on Saturday afternoon is by Mrs. Hayes in honor of Miss Blanche Castle, whose engagement has recently been announced. The afternoon is to be passed in playing some new games which are being introduced in Oakland.

* * *

It is a matter of some surprise, considering the number of wage-earners among women in the United States, that there are so few who have attempted to play the organ, and still a lesser number who have achieved distinction as organists. Miss Virginia de Fremery, who has recently returned from abroad, made her debut as an organist at the First Congregational Church on Monday afternoon. It was an invitation affair, and the church was filled with a musical and appreciative audience. The best numbers were Bach's Fugue in g minor and the Symphony No. 5 in F, by Chas. M. Widor. Miss de Fremery plays well, her technique is excellent, and she shows a keen appreciation of the phraseology and meaning of her selections.

* * *

The Annex to the Encinal Boat Club, which was opened about a month ago with a dance, affords much amusement to the Alameda ladies, who are becoming even more enthusiastic patrons of the clubrooms than their husbands. Every night, parties are formed, who go to play billiards and pool. Some of the ladies are beginning to show considerable skill in wielding their cues, and are becoming quite formidable rivals to the male members of the Club.

* * *

The Alameda Orchestral Society and the Ladies' Choral Society are working very hard to make their concert a successful social event. They have engaged Mr. and Mrs. Marquardt to give harp and violin solos, and Donald de V. Graham has promised to sing several selections.

THE GOSSIP.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Diamonds, Pearls, and Colored Precious stones in great variety offered at cost on account of contemplated retirement from the retail business.

A. HIRSCHMAN,
113 Sutter Street.

THE WHEEL.

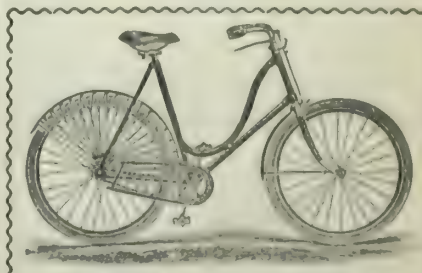
The action of a number of accident insurance companies, recently, in deciding to raise the rates of premium or reduce the amount of indemnity in case of accident to bicyclists, is only one of those incidents in which advantage is sought to be taken of a popular practise. A study of the causes of accidents published in the annual reports of many of these companies reveals the fact that a far greater number of casualties result from every other form of locomotion than from cycling. The accidents occurring while walking are fully twenty to thirty per cent greater than those happening while bicycling. Some of the leading companies have made haste to disavow any intention of charging a higher rate to cyclists.

The average gear on wheels this year is about sixty-six and one-half to sixty-eight. For ordinary riding purposes the gear should certainly not be higher than this, as it will be found hard to propel the wheel up a hill or against a strong wind. Do not let so much of the talk about how easy it is to acquire speed with a high gear lead you into ordering your wheel too highly geared. The saving in the number of pedal revolutions on a very high gear is not nearly so great as is commonly supposed, and it can be set down as a truth that if you wish to go fast you must pedal fast, while it is also true that the exertion required to make each revolution of the wheel increases proportionately to the height of the gear. The best average gear, it has been found from experience, is sixty-six and one-half.

Madeline Kilpatrick, the clever trick rider now performing in New York, is a small, delicate blonde, whose soft, curly, brown hair and big brown eyes suggest the ingenué, rather than the clever acrobat. But her slight figure is very muscular, and there is nothing she is afraid of. Speaking of wheeling, she commends the pursuit for women, advises them to wear bloomers, but attributes all dangerous ailments to bad positions. She said to a Sun reporter:

"In the first place, every woman should learn to adjust her wheel to suit her, and then, instead of sitting perfectly straight so that her backbone rests on the saddle, she should bend very slightly forward so as to take the weight from the backbone, and she should also learn to support her weight in part on the pedals and handle bars. She can stand more jar and weight on her feet and arms than she can on her backbone. Now, when I advise you to bend a little forward, I do not mean that you shall hump over like a scorcher, but, with shoulders erect, assume an easy, graceful attitude. If a woman sat up all afternoon in a carriage as straight as a ramrod, with her weight thrown entirely on her backbone, she would be completely worn out. Another mistake that women are apt to make is in riding too much. A woman will kill a horse much quicker than a man will, and I think that she has no more consideration for a wheel, or, rather, in this case, for herself, than she has for a horse."

French eye specialists have recorded numerous cases of visual disturbances among bicyclers. The most common form of the trouble is found in those who ride at a very rapid pace and climb steep hills. Riders are usually seized with severe vertigo, and a sudden diminution of vision in one or both eyes. When the eyes are examined by an oculist, traces of retinal hemorrhage are usually found. The heart also suffers as a result of scorching and long-distance racing. From over-acting it may become dilated and very much enlarged, causing serious trouble.



THE LADY STERLING—'96 MODEL

Girls

drop us a postal card and we will send you, free, the handsomest catalogue this season. The STERLING is the "Swellest" Wheel made and costs just $100. When you see our catalogue you will surely

Ride Sterlings

Sterling Cycle Works

WM. V. BRYAN, Manager

314 Post Street, S. F.

Adams's Tutti-Frutti Chewing Gum for Indigestion.

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist, 806 Market St.

RIPPLES.

STRICTLY BUSINESS.

A young man who had served his apprenticeship on a country weekly, recently came to the city and was engaged on one of the metropolitan dailies as a general rustler to gather in items of news and any advertising that he might stumble upon. His first day out brought in the following:

"What came near being a serious accident this morning was fortunately averted by the prompt and brave action of one of our leading citizens.

"It appears that while Mr. Schemem, of the well-known real estate firm of Schemem & Soakem, whose office is situated in the Bills Building, room 1297, 27th floor, Main Street, accompanied by Mr. L. A. Collarbox, the well-known haberdasher, of 428 Mud street, where can be found at all times the latest creations in neckwear, etc., at reasonable prices, was driving down Rug Street, in one of those stylish turnouts of Feedem and Oattis, of 317 Fell street, the popular livery-stable-men, where can be found at all times the most stylish rigs in the city, which, by the way, were imported specially for the firm of F. & O., by the well-known house of Buggie and Traps, 327 Narroway Street, from the Booster Manufacturing Co., of Toledo, Ohio, on their return from the suburbs, where Messrs. Schemem and Soakem have many magnificent lots for sale in the Hard-times Track, which can be purchased on easy terms at prices ranging from five hundred dollars upward, (maps of the property and further information cheerfully furnished upon application), and while passing the popular grill and lunch room of Mr. Polivar, familiarly called "Dad," by his acquaintances, who can give for less money better meals than any one in the city; who keeps open all night and makes a specialty of rooms for ladies and their escorts, the horse, for some unknown reason became unmanageable, and, in some unexplained manner upset the buggy. Some of the by-standers claim that the horse observed a man on the opposite corner who was never known to advertise, and, naturally swerved to one side on seeing the unfortunate freak, which threw Mr. Schemem and Collarbox into the gutter. Dad Polivar observing the accident just as he was in the act of lighting a fragrant Colonel Jones, known by connoisseurs to be the best six for a quarter smoke this side of Tophet, (sold everywhere; G. Max, sole agent, 714 Mercial Street), ordered one of his gentlemanly-colored-twelve-dollars-per-month waiters to catch the bridle of the brute. By so doing Dad saved the lives of two of his most valued customers. The horse certainly would have dragged the occupants of the rig to their death over the rough cobbles of the street. The streets of this city should be paved with Pavers Patent Compound Blocks. This company's office is on the top floor of the Bills Building. The firm also solicits orders from private parties for sidewalks and garden walks. Give them a trial.

"As it was, however, nothing more unfortunate occurred than the ruination of Mr. Schemem's silk hat, which he immediately had replaced by Block, the hatter, 1127 Midway Street, who, by the way, has just received direct from the factory a large assortment of the latest styles of spring headgear. Mr. Block understands his business, and knows what the public wants. Give him a call and you'll never regret it.

"Of course, congratulations were in order, on the narrow escape of the two gentlemen, and the last seen of them was on the well-patronized boot-black stand of Antone Angelica, the reputed champion bootblack of the city, who can polish leather to answer the purpose of a mirror for the small sum of a nickel a shine. No extra charge for tanned shoes.

"The ever popular Bob Blivens, the accommodating agent for the Getoffshove Cycle, when informed of the accident, stated emphatically that the accident would never have occurred had the gentlemen been riding his Getoffshove Bicycles instead of the rig they had used. Bob was chewing a piece of the well-known brand of Jawbreaking gum at the time of his interview, and he stated it is the best. This we can substantiate, as we have chewed it often. The trade will be supplied by the well-known hardware firm of Rails & Nails, 777 Last Street."

NOT IN IT.

Snaggs (confidentially)—Say, Snipps, have you a loose thousand in the corner of one of your pockets?

Snipps—You must have a loose brain to imagine anything like that.

Snaggs—Haven't you five or six hundred then?

Snipps—Your suspenders must be very badly twisted, Snaggs.

Snaggs—Well, can't you raise a hundred?

Snipps—What do you take me for—a portable saving and loan society?

Snaggs—If I had only a few dollars I could make hundreds. Come, Snipps, put up your watch. You ought to be able to get at least ten dollars on it.

Snipps—Why, man, I put it up on your account a few months ago, and have hardly been able to pay the interest on the loan, leaving alone taking the watch out.

Snaggs—If you will raise for me an even hundred inside of five minutes I will promise to pay you everything I owe you before seven o'clock this evening.

Snipps—What do you intend doing with the money?

Snaggs—I have a straight tip on the races. The horse Staythere is selling for ten to one; only two other horses in the race: Skate and Roarer. It's a dead cinch.

Snipps—All right; I'll get the money for you. Come with me.

Snaggs (to pool-seller a few minutes later)—One hundred straight on Staythere.

Pool-seller (to assistant, after writing out ticket one thousand to one hundred)—Rub out the odds on the second race. Make Skate even money, Roarer two to one, and Staythere (pause) fifty to one.

TAKING NO CHANCES.

Bloomer (to Irishman, whom he has met on a side street while on the way to the office)—Say, my man, have you a match? I neglected—

Irishman (drawing an old-fashioned pistol as he springs into the middle of the street)—No, yez don't, be hivins!

"Here, man, don't point that blamed thing at me; it might go off."

"Be hivins, it will if yez don't!"

"What do you mean, man?"

"Oi manes yez can't be playin' any o' yez shabby thricks on me."

"You don't think I intend to harm you?"

"Yez are roight; Oi don't. Not phwile Oi holds this resolver in moy hands."

"Come, man, put up that gun and tell me what you feared."

"Oi'll not put up th' gun, but Oi'll tell yo' phwat. Whin Oi waz walkin' along this same street th' other noight about elevin o'clock, Oi met two chaps. One of 'em, he sez to me, sez he, 'Have you a motch?' sez he. 'Oi have,' sez Oi, and wid that he hits me over the ear wid a club as big as a telegraph pole, and phwhich knocked moy sinses out entoirely. It waz a dhirty, shabby thrick, after axing a mon for a motch. Oi'll have none of yez dhirty thricks, so move on, or, be hivins, you'll foind me th' most sulphureous motch you ever tried to sthroike."

WHAT HE WOULD DO.

She (bidding him good-night as the clock strikes twelve)—I hate to have you go, Fred.

He—It won't be for long, darling.

She—Yes, I know; but it is so dark.

He—I'm not afraid of the dark, darling.

She—I know you are not; in fact, you seem to prefer it when you call on me.

He—Well, don't you, also?

She—Of course I do; but, Fred, there are so many footpads on the street at night that I'm afraid something might happen to you.

He—Oh! I'm not afraid.

She—Have you a pistol?

He—No, not even a cane.

She—Suppose a bad man should stop you while on your way home; what would you do?

He (bravely)—What would I do? Well, I'll tell you what I would do, darling; I would run.

A LONG FELT WANT (?).

Slick (to superintendent of laundry)—I have come, sir, to ascertain if you would like to purchase one of my new machines——

Superintendent—No, we don't want any of your machines; we have all the machinery we can use.

Slick—But, my dear sir, no laundry is complete without one of my machines.

Superintendent—What is it; a mangler?

Slick—No, sir; your manglers and ironers are not in it when my machine gets to work.

Superintendent—What is your machine for?

Slick—It's a machine made expressly to take buttons off garments. When it strikes a button, it removes the same in a twinkling and rips the garment from end to end.

Superintendent—Young man, you have a brilliant future before you. You may send half a dozen of your machines to the laundry at once.

BRIGHT BOY.

Teacher—Where is the North Pole, Tommy?

Tommy—Don't know, ma'am.

Teacher—Don't know where the North Pole is?

Tommy—No, ma'am; if I did there wouldn't be any use in sending explorers to look for it.

EXACT.

Mrs. Blossom—How many times did you drink to-day?

Mr. Blossom—Didn't drink any times, (hic).

Mrs. Blossom—Your breath smells as though you had.

Mr. Blossom—Oh, (hic), those ain't times, (hic), those are whiskies.

LATE VERSE.

POEMS BY BEARDSLEY AND SYMONS FROM THE NEW DECADENT QUARTERLY.

The Savoy, from which the following poems are culled, is the new decadent magazine formed by Aubrey Beardsley and Arthur Symons, when both were excluded from The Yellow Book. The allusion to Paderewski (a Polish pianist) is unmistakable, and a good pen picture. The twain met in London and were mutually impressed. Symons is among the Symbolists, and was a friend of Verlaine's, from whose verses "Mandoline" is a translation. He wrote the obituary of the French poet which the Saturday Review published.

THE THREE MUSICIANS.

Along the path that skirts the wood,
The three musicians wend their way,
Pleased with their thoughts, each other's mood,
Franz Himmel's latest roundelay,
The morning's work, a new-found theme, their breakfast, and the summer day.

One's a soprano, lightly frocked
In cool white muslin that just shows
Her brown silk stockings, gaily clocked,
Plump arms and elbows tipped with rose,
And frills of petticoats and things, and outlines as the warm wind blows.

Beside her a slim, gracious boy
Hastens to mend her tresses' fall,
And dies her favor to enjoy,
And dies for réclame and recall
At Paris and St. Petersburg, Vienna and St. James's Hall.

The third's a Polish pianist
With big engagements everywhere,
A light heart and an iron wrist,
And shocks and shoals of yellow hair
And fingers that can trill on sixths and fill beginners with despair.

The three musicians stroll along
And pluck the ears of ripened corn,
Break into odds and ends of song,
And mock the woods with Siegfried's horn,
And fill the air with Gluck, and fill the tweeded tourist's soul with scorn.

The Polish genius lags behind,
And, with some poppies in his hand,
Picks out the strings and wood and wind
Of an imaginary band,
Enchanted that for once his men obey his beat and understand.

The charming cantatrice reclines
And rests a moment where she sees
Her chateau's roof that hotly shines
Amid the dusky summer trees,
And fans herself, half shuts her eyes, and smooths the frock about her knees.

The gracious boy is at her feet,
And weighs his courage with his chance;
His fears soon melt in noonday heat.
The tourist gives a furious glance,
Red as his guide-book grows, moves on, and offers up a prayer for France.

—Aubrey Beardsley, in The Savoy.

MANDOLINE.

The singers of serenades
Whisper their faded vows
Unto fair listening maids
Under the singing boughs.

Tircus, Aminte, are there,
Clitandre is over-long,
And Damis for many a fair
Tyrant makes many a song.

Their short vests, silken and bright,
Their long, pale, silken trains,
Their elegance of delight,
Twine soft, blue, shadowy chains.

And the mandolins and they,
Faintlier breathing, swoon
Into the rose and gray
Ecstasy of the moon.

—Arthur Symons, in The Savoy.

SONNET.

BY LOUIS A. ROBERTSON.

Belike thou art a temptress come from hell,
The devil often dons a fair disguise;
And yet I like the laughter in thine eyes,
And for thy lips, I love them wondrous well.

They do remind me of an ocean shell
With all its murmurous melody of sighs:
Sweet luring logic—captive to thy spell,
What seemeth truth, may be love's perjuries.

Nay! Nay! I do thee wrong: Have I not felt
The rosy rebels into sweetness melt,
And seen thee swoon beneath my warm caress?

What matter if thy lips the word withhold;
In the mute music of thy pulses bold,
Thy love grows voluble and doth confess.

thin?

Thinness is often a sign of poor health. A loss of weight generally shows something is wrong. If due to a cough, cold, any lung trouble, or if there is an inherited tendency to weak lungs, take care!

Scott's Emulsion

of Cod-liver Oil, with Hypophosphites, is a fat-food and more. It causes such changes in the system that the gain is permanent and improvement continues even after you cease taking it. Sound flesh; rich blood; strong nerves; good digestion; aren't these worth a thought?

SCOTT'S EMULSION has been endorsed by the medical profession for twenty years. (Ask your doctor.) This is because it is always palatable -always uniform—always contains the purest Norwegian Cod-Liver Oil and Hypophosphites.

Insist on Scott's Emulsion with trade-mark of man and fish.

Put up in 50 cent and $1.00 sizes. The small size may be enough to cure your cough or help your baby.

FOR GRIPPE
IT'S A DANDY

VINA BRANDY

AND

It's Pure! That's Sure!

VINA DISTILLERY CO.
819 Market St., S. F.

J. F. Cutter
EXTRA
Old Bourbon

has been a staple family and medicinal whiskey for a quarter-century

E. MARTIN
—AND—
CO.
411 MARKET ST.
SAN FRANCISCO

GEO. GOODMAN
Patentee and Manufacturer of—Artificial Stone
Schillinger's Patent — In all its branches
SIDE WALK and GARDEN WALK A Specialty
Office, 307 MONTGOMERY ST. Nevada Block, SAN FRANCISCO

Beecham's pills are for biliousness, bilious headache, dyspepsia, heartburn, torpid liver, dizziness, sick headache, bad taste in the mouth, coated tongue, loss of appetite, sallow skin, etc., when caused by constipation; and constipation is the most frequent cause of all of them.

Go by the book. Pills 10¢ and 25¢ a box. Book free at your druggist's or write B. F. Allen Co., 365 Canal Street, New York.

Annual sales more than 6,000,000 boxes.

THE WHITE FLYER IS THE MOUNT FOR '96
BARNES BICYCLES
HOOKER & CO.
16-18 Drumm St.
RETAIL STORE:
1640 Market St.
San Francisco, Cal.
THE WHITE RIMMED HUMMER IS THE COMER

A CARLOAD OF '96
PIERCE CYCLES TRIED AND TRUE
JUST RECEIVED
Many Superior Improvements. Ask to see the
Pierce Crank Hanger
Holbrook, Merrill & Stetson
Pacific Coast Agents
MARKET and BEALE STREETS
SAN FRANCISCO
Ask for Catalogue

THE FAMOUS
HUMBER
BICYCLE
····IS HERE····
It is a favorite wheel among the "ultra-fashionables" of Paris, London, New York, Boston, Philadelphia and Chicago. Why not San Francisco, too?
HUMBER QUALITY IS THE STANDARD OF EXCELLENCE THE WORLD OVER
ST. GERMAIN BILLIARD CO.
GENERAL AGENTS
55 & 57 FIRST ST, NEAR MARKET

GLADDING McBEAN & CO.
MANUFACTURERS
ARCHITECTURAL TERRA COTTA
HOLLOW TILE FIRE PROOFING
SEWER AND CHIMNEY PIPE
PRESSED BRICK, DRAIN TILE, ETC.
1358 & 1360 MARKET STREET, S. F.
MANUFACTORY AT LINCOLN, CAL.

A. D. CHESHIRE, Pres. and Manager
W. O. MACDOUGALL, Secretary
CALIFORNIA UNDERTAKING CO.
Fine Funeral Furnishers
Telephone, Main 971
123 STOCKTON ST., Cor. Geary
Finest Funeral Parlors in the city
Embalming a specialty
Open day and night

REMOVAL
Rountrees English Chocolate, Kohlers Swiss Chocolates, and all brands of Foreign and Eastern Confectionery, imported by . . . .
W. L. GREENBAUM,
of 205 SUTTER ST., will, after December 1st, be found in large and commodious quarters at 128 POST ST., Bohemian Club Bldg.

MUSIC.

IMPORTANT CONCERTS BY SOUSA, MARSICK, AND PADEREWSKI.

MARSICK-PADEREWSKI.

On Sunday evening last, the Baldwin Theater was filled to suffocation with lovers of music who had come to hear Marsick for the first time and Paderewski for the last time. Indeed, holders of seats experienced no little difficulty in getting through the dense masses that blocked the aisles.

The two celebrities were warmly greeted. The opening number on the program was Paderewski's violin and piano sonata. It was not a particularly homogeneous performance, for obvious reasons. M. Marsick, with a tone which, even in the most impassioned moments, never rises above mezzo-forte, was plainly no match for the warm-blooded Pole, whose frequent outbursts almost smothered him. The sonata is good, scholarly music, but it leaves no particular impression and is rather long, besides. Paderewski has written better things—the "Cracovienne Fantastique," for instance, which he played later in the evening. M. Marsick was heard to better advantage in the "Vieuxtemps d minor Concerto," a work that gave evidence of careful study. The technical difficulties were easily surmounted, but there was a lack of breadth and power. Tone is M. Marsick's weakest point. The purity of that he has is often marred by the excessive use of the vibrato, which many critics define as French. Perhaps it is, but it is not good French. M. Marsick was best in the second movement of the concerto, where delicacy and tenderness are the chief requisites. The rhythmically difficult scherzo was omitted. The artist was vociferously recalled, and finally gave Godard's 'Adagio Pathetique." The "Laub Polonaise" and Wieniawski's "Airs Russes" were not given with the dash and abandon necessary to make them interesting. The harmonics in the latter number were often blurred and the intonation faulty. But Marsick played his own "Adagio" charmingly. In justice to the violin it must be stated that M. Marsick, excellent artist though he be, is not one of its great masters. He has many admirable qualities, aside from a good technic. But even an impeccable technic would not make him great, for his is not a great individuality. Nevertheless, every musical person is glad of the opportunity to hear the noted Professor from Paris.

Of Paderewski, suffice it to say that on this evening he was a veritable god. Everything he did was ravishingly beautiful; and after the Liszt Second Rhapsodie, which he gave as an encore to his final group of solo numbers, the cries of "bravo" and thunders of applause fairly shook the theater. It was a scene long to be remembered by those present.

SOUSA CONCERT.

Over two thousand people greeted Sousa and his excellent band at the Auditorium on Friday evening, February 28th, when the first of a series of four concerts was given. The program was decidedly popular in character, the Liszt Rhapsodie being the most ambitious number thereon. Great enthusiasm prevailed, and encore after encore was demanded. Especially were the opening measures of a Sousa march the signal for a spontaneous outburst of applause. A very good overture, "Thüringian Festival," by Lassen, opened the concert. After several encores came the well-known Second Rhapsodie of Liszt. It was faultlessly played, and showed the strength of the clarinets in particular. But the arrangement is by no means equal to that of Müller-Burghan's for orchestra. Mr. Arthur Pryor is a great trombone player. His tone is beautiful and his technic comparatively Paderewskian. Fleeting scales, arpeggios, diminished sevenths, etc., he rendered with apparent ease. His 'Air Varie" is not a particularly interesting composition, but it is better than "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep." Mr. Pryor was recalled, and gave a popular song with beautiful tone and finish.

There is not a great deal of material in the "Three Quotations," but the instrumentation is admirable. However, Mr. Sousa is not merely a composer of good marches—some of his larger works are very meritorious. Miss Myrta French has a fair soprano voice of considerable power, and she sings musically. In the "Delight Valse," by Luckstone, her voice blended well with the reeds and French horns. For an encore, she gave a bright little song with great charm of manner. The "Water Sprites" (Kenkel) is a grateful composition of the gavotte order, for the wood-wind alone. Of course, Sousa's "King Cotton" march brought forth several of the more familiar ones.

The extremely pretty violiniste, Miss Carrie Duke, chose Sarasate's familiar Ziguenerweisen for her initial appearance. Miss Duke has a full, rich tone and a goodly share of temperament. Her technic, too, is good, but hardly equal to the demands of the difficult Ziguenerweisen. Nevertheless, she immediately won the audience and was several times enthusiastically recalled. Miss Duke is an important adjunct to the Sousa Band. A Humoresque, "The Band Came Back," closed the concert. In this, the popular leader has given utterance to musical, as well as amusing, things. The oboe, left quite alone, sings in its plaintive voice, "You Can't Play in My Yard." Soon the second oboe enters, playing an obligato and eventually a counter-melody. The other instruments come in sections, playing familiar airs of various descriptions. Of course, tunes that amalgamate are chosen, but they are cleverly handled. The work allotted to the clarinets is dazzlingly brilliant and the French-horn quartet is of great beauty. The programs of the subsequent concerts were of a higher order than the first. The Auditorium was always crowded and many were unable to gain admission.

CARR-BEEL.

The fiftieth Carr-Beel concert, given last Saturday afternoon at Golden Gate Hall, was in the nature of a jubilee, and was attended by the largest audience of the season. To give half a hundred chamber concerts in a city no larger than San Francisco is an accomplishment of which Mrs. Carr and Mr. Beel may well be proud; for no branch of music receives less encouragement from the general public than this, the highest. During five seasons over two hundred important chamber works have been performed, embracing writings of the earliest and most modern composers. Saturday's program is a good illustration:

1. String Quartet in F..... Dvorak.
2. Group of Songs..... Schumann.
3. Il Trillo del Diavolo..... Tartini.
4. Septet for Strings, Piano, and Trumpet..... Saint Saens

The usual participants were assisted by Mr. Chas. J. Dyer, vocalist; Mr. Keller, trumpet; and Mr. Spiller, contra-bass. The beautiful quartet was finely played. Especial praise is due Mr. Heine, the cellist, for the heavenly manner in which he gave the closing measures of the slow movement. Mr. Dyer, tenor, has not a great voice, but he sang the Schumann group of songs quite charmingly. The "Frulingsnacht" was given with much expression, and "Die Beiden Grenadiere" with plenty of spirit Mr. Dyer rendered as an encore still another Schumann song. Both his enunciation and his German are good. Mr. Beel, violinist, was given a warm reception as he came forward to play the very difficult Tartini sonata. It was admirably executed, for Mr. Beel has a remarkable trill. He was three times recalled, and finally gave the well-known sextet from "Lucia," cleverly arranged for violin alone. This he did not play so well. The septet for piano, strings, and trumpet was, for the most part, charmingly played. Only, in the last movement, where the subject is given out by the piano rather staccato, it was too broadly answered by the strings. The effect of this was not pleasing.

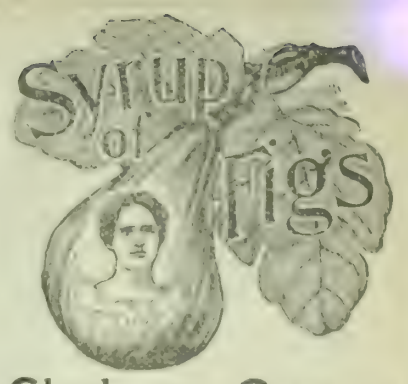
LORING CLUB CONCERT.

The Loring Club gave its third concert of the season on Friday evening, February 27th. As usual, every one who was fortunate enough to receive an invitation was present. The soloists were Miss Ardella Mills, vocalist, and Mr. Bernhard Mollenhauer, violinist. The Club did its best work in the first number—"Vintage Song," Mendelssohn, and "The Parting," Isenmann, and in Dudley Buck's uninteresting "Nun of Nidavos." Mr. Desmond did the tenor solo of the latter number very nicely. Miss Mills was evidently suffering from nervousness, as she is said to have sung better at the last rehearsal than on this occasion. She gave Gounod's "Clinq Mars," and received an encore. Mr. Mollenhauer, the violinist, came late and played badly. Judging from the way the "Ziguenerweisen" of Sarasate went, he practised but little, if at all, with his accompanist, Mrs. Willard Bachelder, for there were several breaks perceptible to the most casual listener. His second number, an a and a b, went much better. The concert closed with "The Signal Resounds" from "Afar" (Buck), sung by the Club. Mrs. Carmichael-Carr, accompanist of the Loring, did her work admirably. Mr. Hughes was the conductor.

P. C. A.

IN THE DAYS OF RALSTON.

One's memory need not run back to any great length to recall the days when Ralston and Reese and other of our prominent citizens walked to North Beach for the sake of an invigorating salt water plunge. That era, happily, has gone by. The Lurline Baths provide the best imaginable facilities for swimming, and the institution is almost in the very center of our city. The latest feature which the Olympic Salt Water Company has added to the luxuries of its menage is a Russian bath which is now being constructed. This is a pleasure which has only to be tried to be appreciated. It has all the latest improvements, which include needle-showers, steamrooms, etc. The pumping facilities have recently been so improved as to enable the emptying and filling of the great tank in the space of an hour, and whoever cares to witness the operation may do so any evening of the week.



Gladness Comes

With a better understanding of the transient nature of the many physical ills which vanish before proper efforts, gentle effort, pleasant efforts rightly directed. There is comfort in the knowledge that so many forms of sickness are not due to any actual disease, but simply to a constipated condition of the system, which the pleasant family laxative, Syrup of Figs promptly removes. That is why it is the only remedy with millions of families, and is everywhere esteemed so highly by all who value good health. Its beneficial effects are due to the fact, that it is the one remedy which promotes internal cleanliness, without debilitating the organs on which it acts. It is therefore all important, in order to get its beneficial effects, to note when you purchase, that you have the genuine article, which is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only, and sold by all reputable druggists.

If in the enjoyment of good health, and the system is regular, then laxatives or other remedies are not needed. If afflicted with any actual disease, one may be commended to the most skillful physicians, but if in need of a laxative, then one should have the best, and with the well-informed everywhere, Syrup of Figs stands highest and is most largely used and gives most general satisfaction.

TRADE N.B. MARK
Cut out by experienced cutters; sewed by expert seamstresses; skilled labor at every step. That's why they FIT. Large factory, large output, long experience; that's why they are LOW PRICED. Best materials, honest workmanship; that's why they WEAR. Home industry; money stays HERE. These are reasons enough why you should buy
STANDARD SHIRTS
Neustadter Bros., Mfrs

Dr. Sigismund
SUTRO
the eminent London physician, says: "Half a grain of peroxide of iron is worth more than four times the quantity of iron in the form of iron supplied by druggists."

The only "Iron Spring" in California containing "Peroxide of Iron" is at Byron. It is a sure cure for all blood diseases.

Byron Hot Springs
Contra Costa Co., Cal

Danger Signals

More than half the victims of consumption do not know they have it. Here is a list of symptoms by which consumption can certainly be detected:—

Cough, one or two slight efforts on rising, occurring during the day and frequently during the night.
Short breathing after exertion.
Tightness of the chest.
Quick pulse, especially noticeable in the evening and after a full meal.
Chilliness in the evening, followed by Slight fever.
Perspiration toward morning and
Pale face and languid in the morning.
Loss of vitality.

If you have these symptoms, or any of them, do not delay. There are many preparations which claim to be cures, but Dr. Acker's English Remedy for Consumption has the highest endorsements, and has stood the test of years. It will arrest consumption in its earlier stages, and drive away the symptoms named. It is manufactured by the Acker Medicine Co., 16 and 18 Chambers St., New York, and sold by all reputable druggists.

CHARLES S. WHEELER ERNST H. LUDWIG

Ernst H. Ludwig & Co.

THE MODEL AMERICAN CATERERS

Supply Wedding Breakfasts, Luncheons, Dinners, Matinee Teas and Receptions on shortest notice. Also Terrapin Entrees Luncheons and Dinners. Ice Cream, Cake, &c.

Telephone 2388 1206 SUTTER STREET

Health and Beauty

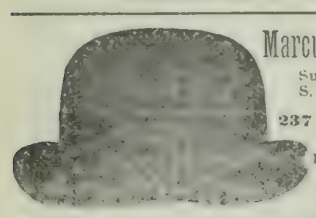
: : is a book valuable to all who desire to be attractive and healthy. It tells how fat folks can be made slender, and thin people made plump; how baldness may be avoided; wrinkles removed; faces bleached; red noses restored to natural color; forms improved; flat chests filled out, bust enlarged; dyspepsia cured and chronic diseases avoided.

Other Valuable Information.

Any one of the many prescriptions is worth more than price of book. Mailed, sealed in plain wrapper, $1.00.

ORR AND REED,
Box 545. Grand Rapids, Michigan

ZOBBIEST STYLES NEATEST FIT
BEST MATERIALS



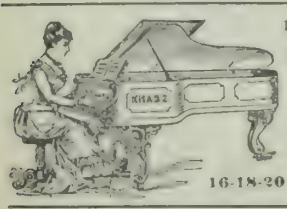
Marcus S. Harloe
Successor to S. W. Dixon
237 Kearny St. S. F.
Phone, Red 361
Fine Hats A Specialty

ITO, SOTOMI & CO.

JAPANESE GOODS

ART POTTERY,
CURIOS AND RUGS A SPECIALTY

116 Sutter St. Bet. Kearny and Montgomery San Francisco, Cal.



Established 1856
Benj. Curtaz & Son
Pacific Coast Agents
16-18-20 O'Farrell St

MRS. EDITH E. McLEAN
PHYSICIAN FOR THE HAIR

Has a Canadian Vegetable Tonic for the Hair that will make it grow when all else fails. Dandruff removed. Terms moderate. High-class references.

Office Hours 10 to 12 and 1 to 6. Rooms 45, 58 and 60 ST. ANN'S BUILDING SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

NEW YORK HAIR DRESSING STORE
MME. E. KESSING, Proprietress
Artistic Hair Dressing and Shampooing. A new preventive for the hair falling out. Superfluous hair removed. 1704 Market Street, San Francisco

FASHIONS AND FRIVOLS.

There is no sensation of pleasure so keen to the true woman as that of contemplating exquisite confections in millinery. There is something about these dainty trifles of lace, ribbons, flowers, and feathers that appeals to the feminine soul, and I have yet to meet the woman, no matter how progressive, who failed to become enthusiastic over some dainty bonnet. I dropped into Annie L. Stone's new store 217 Post Street the other day and was simply charmed by the beauty and neatness of the novelties which she has just brought with her from New York. Such is the array of exquisite creations in bonnets that it would tempt a Saint Rose from dreams of heavenly bliss, also hats that would be in themselves a compensation for the delights of a hidden stage.

The store is, in itself, a pleasant place in which to wile away an hour or two, apart from the contemplation of its treasures. Its ceiling is oval and is decorated with white and gold. From the center and from the sides are hung electric fixtures, the like of which are not to be seen in San Francisco, for Miss Stone brought them from New York. Its walls are upholstered in silk of a soft olive hue, and the floor is carpeted with the most exquisite carpet on which are scattered, here and there, rugs of rare design and beauty. On the walls there are octagon French plate mirrors which reflect back one's image and show off the hats from every point of view. The furniture in the store is particularly beautiful, it being of white enamel with gold trimming. At the end is a cozy corner fitted up with cushioned divans so that a frail woman need not tire herself standing while she fits on her hat. The decorations, as a whole, are beautiful, and every one who drops in to the opening, which is to be next Monday, should not fail to notice them, for I am sure their like is not to be seen outside of New York.

Now to describe the hats. The general effect of the new millinery is broad, especially in the back, and it would seem that the rainbow had been robbed, so many are the colors used in the trimming. The rough straws seem to be the more fashionable, although there appears to be quite a vogue for the Neopolitan and pineapple straws. A perfect love of a bonnet is in mohair lace and jet, with broad back and round in front, and trimmed with magenta geraniums and black poppies—a most perfect combination. A picturesque hat that I particularly admired in Miss Stone's has a wide brim, on the order of the Joshua Reynolds, and is of strawberry mottled rough straw. The trimming was quite novel. In the extreme a straw bow, and in the back high tips standing up, and one plume falling over on to the hair. Straw trimmings appear to be one of the novelties, and although it sounds stiff, it is really very striking. Another bewitching hat in Miss Stone's store was in black and tan Milan straw with a Tam O'Shanter crown garlanded with cerise roses, and trimmed with black and white aigrettes and violets.

The milliners are all busily preparing for their openings, and in the preliminary display are all sorts of fantastic shapes and curious combinations of color. There are both large and small hats with fluted brims, and many colors mixed in the glossy straw braid; others have chenille interwoven with the straw to soften the effect. There are bonnets with wide ribbon strings to fasten under the chin, and the old poke bonnet modernized has again been brought to light. It is very large, with the usual wide strings, and rather quaintly picturesque. Some of the earlier spring hats intended for immediate use have winter touches. A pretty one is of green velvet and straw trimmed with holly leaves and berries. An effective hat has a broad brim of black lace with crown of fancy black and white mixed straw; it is trimmed with bunches of violets and a scarf of white tulle. The greatest novelty in hats is the horsehair toque, made of finely woven horsehair with sometimes black or white lace figures inserted in it; it is also combined with straw, being either used as a crown or trimmings of the horsehair. Shapes called Louis Quinze and Louis Seize appear, and are turned up very high at the back and trimmed with a profusion of flowers and a high standing bow of ribbon on one side. Flowers are massed together in wide garlands around the crown this season, and wired to stand very high at the back or side. Ribbon five or six inches wide is used in the bows, which sometimes have seven or eight loops, and black and colored ribbons are often combined on one hat, the black in front, the color behind, or vice versa. Hats are all worn well over the face, with one or two exceptions. The toques bid fair to supersede all other hats in popularity, and there is no woman to whom some shaped toque is not becoming.

Of the cotton materials I notice a great variety of Japanese crêpes. For the women whose weekly washing is performed at home and who can personally supervise the doing up of their garments, this material is infinitely the most desirable. Japanese crêpe gowns are simply washed and pressed, not ironed nor stretched, and are among the most economical and comfortable of the cottons. They have all the good qualities of the ducks without their accompanying demerits. The Japanese crêpes do not shrink to any material extent nor do they fade. They are quite as warm as the ducks and peculiarly adapted for shirt waist or outing suit.

The dimities were never prettier, and the variety of design in these light cottons is simply wonderful. This season, too, the dotted swisses and organdies show various novelties in striped and flower effects.

Piqués, ducks, and light serges and alpacas are made up with the eternal coat waist, which is slightly varied this season by being cut loose, almost in blouse fashion, and belted with a narrow belt of leather, elastic, or folded ribbon. Gold ribbon, which is both flowered and plain, and comes in very narrow widths, is also used for belts. The coat opens in front with the usual revers, except that they are large and draped in effect, while the collar which turns down above is very wide.

Bands of ribbon put on bretelle fashion over the shoulders will be a feature of the waist trimming this season, and in dimity dresses they may extend to the knee or hem, ending in a bow. Valenciennes lace and insertion are to be much used for trimmings with large collars of alternate rows of colored ribbon and lace insertion. Some of the thin dresses are made with a low neck under bodice of white lawn, finished with a narrow edging, and the high-necked waist has the usual stock collar of ribbon. Another fancy for trimming dimity gowns is to set insertions of lace so as to form large plaits over the entire waist and sleeves. Dimities with colored grounds with scroll designs in white are very stylish, when made up over white dimity and trimmed with lace and white satin ribbons.

Among the neck trimmings and gewgaws for spring I saw some charming ideas. One in cerise velvet was composed of two puckered ribbons united in the middle and covered with black spotted tulle. At the back of the neck is placed a bow of cerise velvet very tight in the middle, composed of four rosettes with ends. Similar bows are placed on either side of the fastening in front, but on a smaller scale. Another neck trimming was made of green and violet Mechlin tulle, forming a kind of shot ruche composed of ten rosettes. A dainty ruche is of shot black and white taffeta silk with small stripes forming a wide ruching, stiffened to keep it upright. It is opened at the back, and at the fastening is placed a bow of the same material, also stiffened. Both ruche and bow are edged with mousseline de soie.

Some of the new petticoats are perfectly charming affairs. One I liked is made of striped white satin and black velvet. The satin stripes on a white ground are covered with printed flowers in the Louis Quinze style, connected by bands of blue ribbon. The petticoat is trimmed around the bottom with three flounces. The first is of accordion-plaited pink taffeta silk; the second also of pink silk, plaited and edged with satin, and over these a wide flounce of lace. The white petticoats trimmed profusely with lace and ribbon are very popular, and most American women prefer them for indoor wear. They are always so delightfully fresh and clean looking, and look so attractive.

The most fashionable note paper is stamped this season with a round circle about three-eighths of an inch in diameter. Within this disc is placed the monogram in raised gold letters on a white background. White paper is considered in better taste than even the very delicate shades.

BABETTE.

Irritation of the throat and hoarseness are immediately relieved by "Brown's Bronchial Troches." Have them always ready.

When you are selecting a wedding present, go to S. & G. Gump's, 113 Geary Street. They have a magnificent variety to choose from.

Keeping abreast of the times is essential in the hair-dressing business. That's what I do, and that's why I am considered the most up-to-date hairdresser in the city. All kinds of coiffures for all occasions. G. Lederer, 111 Stockton Street.

AHEM! AHEM!
E. H. M.

SPECIAL

The best WHISKEY for family use and Medicinal Purposes

RECOMMENDED

By all first-class Physicians. Sold everywhere.

E. H. MICHELS
Sole Controller
406 SANSOME ST. SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Keeps Men Poor.

The clerk might be "boss" if he had the head for it. The brains are there, but they don't seem to work. The trouble is often in the stomach. Indigestion keeps men poor because they don't know they have it, but imagine something else.

Ripans Tabules insure sound digestion and a clear head.

Ripans Tabules: Sold by druggists, or by mail if the price (50 cents a box) is sent to The Ripans Chemical Company, No. 10 Spruce St., New York.

A HOME PRODUCT

AXLE-EASE

THE VERY BEST AXLE GREASE

Made by—
AMERICAN OIL CO.
SAN FRANCISCO

CERTIFICATE OF COPARTNERSHIP.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, } ss.
COUNTY OF MARIN. }

WE, the undersigned, hereby certify that we are partners transacting business in this State, at the County of Marin, and in the City and County of San Francisco, under the firm name and style of The Novato French Cheese Factory; that the names in full of all the members of such partnership are James Newlands, Jr., Hermann Rudolff, and George Prinz; and that the places of our respective residences are set opposite our respective names hereto subscribed.

JAMES NEWLANDS, JR., San Francisco, Cal.
HERMANN RUDOLFF, Novato, Marin County, Cal.
GEORGE PRINZ, Novato, Marin County, Cal.

In witness whereof, we have hereunto set our hands, this twenty-sixth day of February, 1896.

JAMES NEWLANDS, JR.,
GEORGE PRINZ,
HERMANN RUDOLFF.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, } ss.
NOVATO, MARIN COUNTY. }

On this twenty-sixth day of February, in the year one thousand eight hundred and ninety-six, before me, J. Q. A. Haven, a Justice of the Peace in and for the County of Marin, State of California, personally appeared James Newlands, Jr., George Prinz, and Hermann Rudolff, known to me to be the persons whose names are subscribed to the within instrument, and acknowledged that they executed the same.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, at my office in said County of Marin the day and year in this Certificate first above written.

J. Q. A. HAVEN,
Justice of the Peace of Novato Township, County of Marin, State of California.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS
Estate of Barthelemi Meric, Deceased

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, A. C. Freese, Administrator of the Estate of Barthelemi Meric, deceased, to the Creditors of, and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said A. C. Freese, Administrator, at his office, Room 9, 319 Pine Street, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said estate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California. A. C. FREESE, Administrator of the Estate of Barthelemi Meric, Deceased.

Dated at San Francisco, February 17, 1896.

J. D. SULLIVAN, Attorney for Administrator.

HALE & NORCROSS

STOCKHOLDERS WHO ARE TIRED of official extravagance and consequent unnecessary assessments, and who desire a radical change in the present management, will please write or call immediately at Room 21, Exchange Building, Pine Street.

JEREMIAH LYNCH.

Hotel Del Monte

America's Famous Summer and Winter Resort

The Most Elegant Seaside Establishment in the World

"Where a leaf never dies in the still blooming bowers,
And the bee banquets on thro' a whole year of flowers."

G. H. ARNOLD,
—MANAGER—

Monterey, Cal.

Flower Festivals
Fiestas
Rose Carnivals

. . . and the like, will be the delight of California for the next two or three months.

Santa Barbara Flower Festival, the fame of which is world-wide, and the glory of which, like that of Solomon, is not half told, opens April 15. Queen Flora will reign 3 days an arbitrary and absolute despot.

La Fiesta de Los Angeles, now fixed in the chronology of California feasts, and not less illustrious than its older prototypes, commences April 22, and the riot of fun will spread over 4 days.

The Carnival of Roses, to take place in San Jose, May 6th to 9th, inclusive, though a more recent candidate for favors of the fun-loving world, yet because of the limitless possibilities of the Garden City for anything that is made of roses, is quite as full of promise.

REDUCED RATES

will be made by the SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY for all these brilliant events. Arrange your programmes accordingly, and call on agents for particulars.

COOLGARDIE GOLD FIELDS
(FREMANTLE) AUSTRALIA

ONLY SIX DAYS TO HONOLULU — S.S. AUSTRALIA

First-Class.....$220
Steerage 110
Lowest rates to CAPE TOWN

S.S. "Monowai," via Honolulu and Auckland, Thursday, March 5, 1896, at 2 p. m.

S.S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, March 10, 1896, at 10 A. M.

Special Parties—Reduced special rates for parties, March 10th and April 7th, 1896.

Ticket Office—114 Montgomery St.
Freight Office—327 Market St.

J. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO.,
General Agents

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.

Dispatch Steamers leave San Francisco for ports in Alaska.

For British Columbia and Puget Sound ports, Feb. 19, and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Wednesdays, 9 A. M.

For Newport, Los Angeles and all way ports, every fourth and fifth day, 8 A. M.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Hartford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles (Santa Monica), Redondo (Los Angeles) and Newport, every fourth and fifth day at 11 A. M.

For ports in Mexico, 25th of each month.

Ticket Office, Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.,
GENERAL AGENTS,
10 MARKET ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

HIRSCH-KAHN & Co.
MANUFACTURING OPTICIANS
IMPORTERS OF OPTICAL GOODS
PHOTOGRAPHIC APPARATUS & SUPPLIES ETC
333 KEARNY STREET
SAN FRANCISCO CAL.

BAJA CALIFORNIA

DAMIANA BITTERS

"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular)

NABER, ALFS & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

THE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU

510 MONTGOMERY ST., S. F.,

Reads all papers on the Pacific Coast, and supplies clippings on all topics, business and personal.

Horses Pastured

$1.50 PER MONTH

GOOD FEED AND CARE. Send for circular.

F. A. HYDE, 630 Commercial St.

BONESTELL & CO.

Dealers in PAPER

Fine Coated Papers a Specialty

401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

THE LICK HOUSE

Occupies the block bounded by Montgomery, Post and Sutter Streets

IT IS——
——scrupulously clean;
——accessible to all street car lines and places of amusement;
——conveniently situated for business men;
——a quiet, model place for a family to spend the winter;
——moderate in price, yet first-class in every particular.

AMERICAN OR EUROPEAN PLAN

K. B. SOULÉ, Manager

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention

A QUIET HOME
CENTRALLY LOCATED

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL
SAN FRANCISCO

WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

THE GRILL ROOM SERVICE
—OF THE—

PALACE HOTEL

Has been extended to what was formerly the City Restaurant. This immense room, which has a direct entrance from Market Street is known as - - - -

"THE LADIES' GRILL ROOM"

NEW DEPARTURE—CHARACTERIZED BY PROMPT SERVICE—MODERATE CHARGES

$6.50 PER TON DELIVERED

COOS BAY COAL

SOOTLESS
SMOKELESS

—A—
SAFE GUIDE

No man knows all there is to know about advertising. The subject is too profound, too complex, too perplexing, for any single person, or for any dozen persons, for that matter. The path to success in advertising is full of dangerous places. All business men would do well to engage a safe guide to conduct them past the danger spots—to tell them what to do and what to avoid doing.

PRINTERS' INK

Is a weekly journal for advertisers, published at 10 Spruce St., New York. It is a magazine of ideas, of suggestions, of advice. Advertisers the world over read it and write for it. It is the advertising authority of America—probably of the globe. Business men will find it a safe guide. To secure its services as guide costs $2 a year. A sample copy costs nothing.

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco
33 Post Street, below Kearny, Mechanics' Institute Building
Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000
JAS. D. PHELAN, Pres. GEO. A. STORY, Cashier
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.
DIRECTORS—Jas. D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. P. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.
Interest paid on term and ordinary deposits.
Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.
When opening accounts, send signature.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE
OF LONDON
Incorporated by Royal Charter A. D. 1726
Capital Paid Up, $3,446,100 Assets, $21,584,413
Surplus to Policy Holders, $8,980,251
ROBERT DICKSON, Manager
NATHAN & KINGSTON, San Francisco Agents
301 MONTGOMERY ST.

Sun Insurance Office OF LONDON
Founded A.D. 1710 Cash Assets, $10,270,535
Oldest Purely Fire Insurance Office in the World
The Lion Fire Ins. Co. Ltd., OF LONDON
Established A.D. 1879 Cash Assets, $1,108,095
The Imperial Ins. Co. Ltd., OF LONDON
Instituted A.D. 1803 Cash Assets, $9,362,920
40 Years in Business on the Pacific Coast
Manager for the Pacific Coast, WM. J. LANDERS
205 and 207 Sansome Street, near Pine

Aachen and Munich Fire Insurance Co.
Of Aix La Chapelle, Germany. Established 1805
Capital, $2,250,000.00
Total Assets, $6,854,653.65
United States Department
204 SANSOME STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

Ask your Blacksmith to shoe your horse with
PHŒNIX HORSE SHOES
GIVE THEM A TRIAL

GEORGE E. HALL
Agent and Importer of Foreign Wines
MUTUAL LIFE BUILDING,
222 Sansome Street

DR. THOMAS L. HILL
DENTIST
Office, Odd Fellows' Building,
S. W. Cor. Seventh and Market Streets
Office Hours, 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.
Consultation Hours, 4 to 5

ABRAMSON-HEUNISCH CO. (Incorporated)
IMPORTERS AND JOBBERS OF
Brewers' and Bottlers' Supplies, Corks, Druggists' Glassware, Etc.
26-28 Main St. San Francisco

Pacific Towel Co.
Telephone 1780 No. 9 Lick Place, San Francisco
GEO. E. MOORE, Proprietor

TALES OF THE DAY.

It was during an exceedingly exciting scene in a congressional committee of investigation on elections. A witness for the Democrats was under examination when a Republican Congressman, with a decidedly nasal intonation, asked a question. The Democratic Congressman said, with emphasis, "I object." The Republican answered: "Why, I thought that Brother —— always wanted the trewth." The Democrat rapidly replied: "Yes, I want the truth, but not through your nose."—Youths' Companion.

When Mr. Edmunds was Senator, he gave as cruel a blow as was ever struck in Congress. A distinguished Western lawyer was speaking on a question in which Mr. Edmunds was interested on the other side. The Senator stopped the speaker long enough to call his attention to the Supreme Court decision in what are known as the "head money cases." "I know nothing about those cases," shouted the excited jurist. "I beg your pardon," said Mr. Edmunds, in a tone of pained regret; "it was entirely unintentional. I supposed all lawyers were familiar with that decision." And he went back to his seat as though he could never forgive himself for so heedlessly wounding one who deserved his commiseration.

Another Senator, in referring to a well-known public man of New England, remarked that "the poor fellow had a mind like a Scotch farm—poor by nature and ruined by cultivation."

The Reverend Rogers, an old London clergyman, was reproved by his bishop for neglecting to pray for the clergy and the royal family. "Ah, my Lord, I assure you I did; but you slept during the service." On another occasion, when Doctor Temple, the present bishop, whose temperance principles are well known, was present at a service, the Reverend Rogers took for his text: "Drink no longer water; but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine own infirmities."

An Englishman, Frenchman, and German were at a dinner party, and were invited to make toasts. The Frenchman got up and said, "Here's to France, the sun of the world." Then the German arose and said, "Here's to Germany, the moon of the world." The Englishman sat silent a moment, and then, rising, said, "Here's to England, the Joshua of the world, who commanded the sun and moon to stand still."

A small boy, who had heard a good deal of conversation on the progress of civilization, went up to his grandfather and said: "Grandpa, tell me what is the difference between barbarism and civilization?" "Barbarism, my boy, is killing your enemy with a hatchet a distance of a step; civilization is killing him with a bombshell twelve miles away."

"Why," asked the Judge in a French Court to the man who had been caught stealing provisions, "did you attempt to rob this poor baker?" "It was hunger that forced me to it," answered the man. "When the forest wolf is hunted from the woods by starvation, he takes his prey where he can seize it—" "Hush," said the Judge. "He does nothing of the sort; he endures his ills, repents, and becomes an honest man!"

An Irishwoman sent for her lawyer in great haste, saying she wanted him in court at once. The woman's son was on trial for burglary. On his entering, the woman rushed up to him, and said, "Mr. B., Oi want ye to get a continuance for my Jimmie." "Very well, madam, I shall do so if possible, but it will be necessary to give some reasons. What shall I say?" "Shure, just tell the Court that Oi want a continuance till Oi can get a better lawyer to speak for the boy." The lawyer dropped the case.

The Bishop of Newcastle, while journeying toward the north, lost his bag. It was fortunately discovered before the train left, and handed into the carriage by a brother clergyman. The Bishop was absent-mindedly thinking of something else, but murmured his thanks, and, extending his hands, pressed a coin upon the astonished curate.

A woman of Thüringia went out into the fields to gather turnips, and was accompanied part of the way by her little boy, aged six, who was on his way to school. While busy, she was taken ill, and on her return home gave birth to a little girl. When the boy returned home, he was met by his father, who gave him a slice of bread and butter and told him he had a little sister. The child was delighted, and rushing to his aunt's house in another part of the village, told her the news. "How pleased your mother must be," observed the aunt. "Oh, she doesn't know yet," said the lad, she is busy in the fields digging up turnips."

FREE EDUCATION AND PROFESSIONAL TRAINING

"THE WAVE'S" LIBERAL SUBSCRIPTION OFFER.

The proprietors of THE WAVE have made arrangements with the most prominent schools and colleges throughout the State, and are now prepared to offer scholarships and courses in the leading educational institutions free of charge, for all who will obtain subscribers to this popular weekly.

UNIVERSITY COURSES.

A single year's course at the University of California, or at the Leland Stanford Junior University, for 185 annual sub-cribers. This offer includes room and board, and all other necessary expenses attached to the course. For 750 subscribers we offer a four years' course.

MEDICAL COURSES.

One year at the Cooper Medical College will be given for 125 subscribers. This includes books and incidental expenses attached to the course.

A single term at the Medical Department of the University of California for 100 subscribers.

For 500 annual subscribers we offer the full four years' course at the Cooper Medical College. This offer includes all incidental costs and fees, except board and lodging.

We offer the four years' course at the Medical Department of the University of California, for 400 subscribers.

The two year's course at the State Normal School at San Jose, for 600 subscribers. This offer includes board, lodging, and books. A single year for 160 subscribers.

The course at Hastings Law College for 250 annual subscribers. This includes books and other expenses attached to the College, for a period of three years, and the privilege of studying in a first-class law office.

A three years' course at the Mark Hopkins Institute of Art for 250 annual subscribers. A year's course for 85 subscribers.

A course in any department of Van der Nailen's School of Electricity and Engineering (except Department of Assaying) will be given for 125 annual subscribers. A course in the Department of Assaying) for 20 annual subscribers.

A six months' course in either the Business Department, or the Department of Stenography and Typewriting of Heald's Business College, for 50 annual subscribers.

A nine months' course in the Columbia School of Dramatic Art for 75 annual subscribers.

A three months' course at the Meisterschaft School of Languages for 40 annual subscribers.

The course at the California School of Elocution and Oratory for 35 annual subscribers.

Tuition in music, vocal or instrumental, from Francis Stuart, S. G. Fleishmann, J. H. Dohrmann, Sigmund Beel, Nathan Landsberger, Lesley Martin, or H. J. Stewart. A course of twenty lessons from any of these gentlemen for fifty annual subscribers. For 100 annual subscribers a course of twenty lessons each in piano, singing, harmony, or any other branch of music.

CRESTA BLANCA WINES
AWARDED THREE HIGHEST AWARDS AT
THE ATLANTA EXPOSITION
OF SIX MEDALS AWARDED TO CALIFORNIA
Cresta Blanca Wines
OBTAINED THREE
WETMORE-BOWEN CO.
140 Montgomery Street
Under Occidental Hotel

J. R. SMITH & CO.
230 BUSH STREET
And Room 7, Rotunda, Mills Building
W. HALL, Successor
MERCHANT TAILORS
Will make garments to order
—At Great Reduction for Cash—
J. R. SMITH - - Manager

UP-TO-DATE TAILORING
AT MODERATE PRICES
J. H. HAWES
Mezzanine B, Crocker Building

The Latest Fall and Winter Goods have arrived
H. S. BRIDGE & CO.
Merchant Tailors
Many Novelties in Imported Wear. Shirts to Order a Specialty.
622 Market Street, San Francisco
(Up-stairs, opposite Palace Hotel)

COTTON SAIL DUCKS
22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard
ALSO
Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks
From 30 to 120 inches wide
Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks
Manufactured by Mount Vernon Company Baltimore
Murphy, Grant & Co. Pacific Coast Sole Agents

ORDER YOUR CARRIAGES AND COUPES OF THE
PACIFIC CARRIAGE CO.
At Baldwin Hotel
200 Sutter Street, corner Kearny
48 Eighth Street, or
St. Nicholas Hotel, Market and Ninth Streets
Steamer and Train Service a specialty 'Phone 1950

THE WAVE CLUBBING LIST
FOR 1896

By special arrangement with the Publishers, THE WAVE is prepared to offer the following list

SUBSCRIPTIONS MUST BE PAID IN ADVANCE

THE WAVE and CENTURY	$6 00
" " ARENA	5 00
" " LITTELL'S LIVING AGE	7 75
" " ART AMATEUR	5 75
" " LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE	4 50
" " MUNSEY'S	3 50
" " ATLANTIC MONTHLY	5 75
" " YOUTH'S COMPANION	3 75
" " NEW ENGLAND MAGAZINE	5 00
" " HARPER'S MAGAZINE	5 50
" " HARPER'S WEEKLY	5 70
" " HARPER'S BAZAAR	5 70
" " HARPER'S ROUND TABLE	4 00
" " SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE	5 00
" " REVIEW OF REVIEWS	4 50
" " ST. NICHOLAS	5 00
" " OVERLAND	4 75
" " COSMOPOLITAN	3 50
" " FRANK LESLIE'S MAGAZINE	4 90
" " PUCK	6 50
" " JUDGE	6 50
" " LIFE	7 00
" " LIFE'S COMEDY	3 50
" " LESLIE'S WEEKLY	5 70
" " DEMOREST MAGAZINE	4 00
" " SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN	5 00
" " SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN SUPPLEM'T	6 50
" " N. Y. DAILY SUN	8 00
" " " SUNDAY "	4 50
" " CASSELL MAGAZINE	3 75
" " ARGOSY	3 50
" " PUBLIC OPINION	4 50
" " SUNDAY WORLD	4 75
" " CRITIC	5 50
" " FORUM	5 00
" " NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW	6 50
" " TABLE TALK	3 25
" " NINETEENTH CENTURY	6 25
" " CONTEMPORARY REVIEW	6 25
" " FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW	6 25
" " BLACKWOODS MAGAZINE	6 25
" " TRUTH	6 25
" " DELINEATOR	3 50
" " VOGUE	5 50
" " TOWN TOPICS	7 50
" " DAILY JOURNAL	5 00
" " SUNDAY JOURNAL	3 75
" " ILLUS. AMERICAN	5 75

THE WAVE

VOL. XV. NO. 11. SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 14, 1896. PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE WAVE

Is published every Saturday, at the Crocker Building, corner Market and Post Streets, San Francisco.

SUBSCRIPTION, $3 per year, $1.50 six months, $.75 three months. Foreign subscriptions (countries in postal union) $5 per year. Sample copies free on application. The trade is supplied by the San Francisco News Co., 210 Post Street; East of the Rocky Mountains by the American News Co., New York.

THE WAVE is kept on file and is for sale at Brentano's, 17 Avenue de l' Opera, Paris, France; 31 Union Square, New York City; 1015 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.; and 206 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

ADVERTISING rates and all other matters pertaining to the business of the paper, address Rooms 220-221-222 Crocker Building. Eastern Agent, E. Katz, 186-187 World Building, New York.

HARRISON M. PARKER, BUSINESS MANAGER.

Entered at San Francisco Post-office as second-class matter

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY.

SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 14, 1896.

CONTENTS.

EDITORIALS—
The Teachers of Anarchy.... 1
The Press and the Law..... 1
American Aristocracy..... 2
The Call's Error..... 2
One American Novel..... 3
The Man Whom Strikes Strike..... 3
The Oakland Tragedy..... 3
STORY—"In the Window-seat"—By Juliet Wilbor Tompkins. 4
MME. MATERNA—An Interview by E. D. H..... 4
CAUSERIE—By John Bonner.... 5
THINGS AND PEOPLE—By The Witness..... 6
WALTER STETSON'S PICTURES. 7
THE LATEST VILLAINS—By J. W. T..... 8
THE THEATERS—By Peg Woffington..... 9
THE WEEK IN SOCIETY—By The Gossip.....10, 11
RIPPLES—Presumably Humorous—By Bruno.....12
THE LATE BILL NYE—Characteristic Expressions of the Humorist's Humor.....13
HUNTINGTON'S MANSION—Details of the Wedding of Burke Holladay and Miss Carrie Huntington.....13
Fashions and Frivols—By Babette.....14
MISCELLANEOUS.
The Latest Verse..... 5
Public People..... 7
A Question of Temperament... 7
The Magazines..... 8
Dramatic Notes..... 9
Shearings..... 12
Tales of the Day.....16

Recently several cases have been brought to the attention of THE WAVE in which young men, anxious to secure an education, had undertaken to work their way through the University. The spirit that hungers for knowledge is not met with as frequently as one might wish, but the example of the youth in question has led the proprietors of THE WAVE to devise some means by which such persons, either male or female, might secure the education which they sought. On page 16 of this issue may be found an offer of scholarships at either of the two Universities, offers of the facilities of reputable business colleges, medical colleges, schools of electrical, mining, mechanical and civil engineering and architecture, schools of dramatic art, and scholarships at the Meisterschaft School of Languages and schools of elocution and oratory. In addition to these, THE WAVE has been enabled to make arrangements with Nathan Landsberger, S. M. Fleishman, H. J. Stewart, Sigmund Beel, J. H. Dohrman, and Lesley Martin, for courses in vocal and instrumental music, including piano, organ, harmony, and vocal art. This offer is something of a novelty in California, and is not lacking in generous features.

THE TEACHERS OF ANARCHY.

During the week that part of San Francisco not better employed listened, when applause permitted, to a debate concerning the relative deserts of anarchy and socialism. This remarkable episode took place in Bersaglieri Hall, the principal speaker was an Italian named Gori, the chief decorations were red, and the enthusiasm was evoked mainly by the incendiary sentiments of Gori, who is a stranger to the English language and tongued the doctrine of desolation into foreign ears. The affair did not, even by the frequent quoting of one Nieuwenhan as an authority, savor strongly of Americanism. The anarchist won the victory; whether from the vigor of his remarks or the flaming scarf worn where others of his kind have worn hemp, does not appear. Certainly he did not win on the merits of his cause, for it has no merits.

When anarchy is being openly preached, it is well to realize what it is—the absence of all law, all order, all authority, all government; a condition impossible to civilized men, impossible to savages, impossible to the beasts of the jungle, wholly unnatural, wholly repugnant. It is the expression of the incipient mob gathering to riot, the thief of itching palm, the hope of the cowardly cut-throat. It is the mad protest of the criminal against the hangman. It is evil demanding license as a necessity, violence objecting to restraint. There is about it no element of justice, nothing that admits of defense. And yet an alien unable to speak the language of the statutes he insults comes to this country to spread the creed of destruction, and finds listeners. Anarchy is a frenzied desire for change and a confession of despair of peaceful reform. It would raze Society, blot out property rights, and found upon the ruins—what? Even the most blatant howler of all who are permitted to howl dares not say. He only knows that he hates the present, and if he can hurl it to ruins cares not for the future. Perchance as existing institutions fell some booty might come into the unclean hands of the anarchist. It is not to see the downtrodden uplifted that is his hope, but to see the prosperous crushed. On this point he has become a maniac.

Mr. Gori explained that he had expected to refute argument and was aggrieved instead to be confronted with accusations of bomb-throwing. But it would seem that an accusation of bomb-throwing, well sustained, constitutes the most unanswerable argument against anarchy. At least it is not one to be swept away in a flood of fiery speech. It served the excellent purpose of sending one batch of Chicago anarchists to the gallows. It has sent others to the guillotine. What threw the bombs that slew scores of innocents at Barcelona? Anarchy. What caused a series of fatal explosions in France only a few months ago? Anarchy. What drove a knife through the heart of Carnot? Anarchy. It is not strange that Gori should have resented accusations. Yet, fire, dynamite, and assassination are the avowed weapons and methods of the anarchist, and he had no logical right to take exception to the truth. He knows that the anarchist who dies for the cause, or who gets into prison, is looked upon as a glorious martyr. And he ought to know that his own fellow who has by listening to Gori keyed himself up to the point of throwing a bomb or wielding a blade, generally becomes upon detection a shrinking, shrieking coward, begging piteously for the mercy he denied to others more worthy. Nothing honorable, nothing reasonable can be expected from one who proclaims himself an anarchist, for he is above all else vicious, beyond all else a fool. One who knows what the doctrine is, and still promulgates it, becomes accessory to every stealthy murder done in the name of the demoniac system. That Gori finds order repellant and restraint galling is not strange, but that on American soil he should find at any time an audience willing to hear, anxious to applaud, and to hiss every sentiment of decency expressed in opposition to his ravings, is more than strange; it is a marvel; it speaks of the inexplicable patience of the nation that not only accepts the riff-raff of other nations, but permits this riff-raff after its arrival to enjoy a liberty it never had at home and to which it has no right in any land where human conduct is regulated by law. Gori is one of the vipers upon whose neck belongs the heel of intelligence. The only legitimate use for the anarchist is to kill him. As a horrible example, dangling from the gibbet, he may fill a place in the great scheme of things. As an independent and unhampered entity he deserves no more consideration than a rabid dog, whose slavering is disgusting, whose snarl is a menace, and whose fang is deadly. To ask us to maintain an attitude of respect for the active anarchist, or to meet him in debate is too much. No argument is so faultless as to be able to withstand a bomb. No armor of logic can turn aside the point of the stilletto.

And more than all this, the red hag-virgin of anarchy—Louise Michel, is about due. She is not needed. Gori was not needed. America's most noted anarchists are under the sod. They wave no more the crimson flag and their friends are chary about sowing explosives. However, there was no great demand for their importations. It was bad enough that there should be a Gori, but worse if there must be the unspeakable Michel. She is the most dangerous of women because her perverted intellect is powerful, and because of her heart there remains a contradictory remnant not devoid of human feeling. Born in the wickedest period of French iniquity, growing up in an atmosphere of unrest, familiar with atrocities, it may be that her infant mind received impressions that turned it awry. In the days of the Commune she reveled in the crimes that made Paris a place of horror. It was then standing in gutters that ran blood, and amid circling flames, that she received her baptism. She was deported, but mistaken clemency allowed her to return. She has never repented. Her hand withers with age, but still it is against every man, and the only flag she acknowledges is the hateful rag that anarchy has chosen, fit emblem of itself. Shall Americans be taught by this screaming creature of terror? Gori may be regarded as little more than a jest. There is reasonable hope that he may shout himself to death, perishing with a final gurgle of contempt for all that is good. Nobody who thinks can for a moment take the gibbering of an idiot seriously; it is merely offensive. Michel is a more somber anomaly. A sexless woman, with an endless tongue, and a nature seething with bitterness, and yet with the magnetism that attracts followers, is something to be dreaded.

THE PRESS AND THE LAW.

The fever in the blood has broken out in a fresh sore, in a new place. Our journalistic friend, who once capered joyously through columns of nonsensical stuff in the Examiner concerning the judiciary, seems now to have quit the scenes of his early exploits and to have gone over to the Call. If it is not the selfsame chap who is responsible for a recent article in the latter journal concerning the powers of a judge, then it is some other fellow who is uncomfortably and unfortunately very like him, and the mantle of juridical lore formerly worn by the Examiner man has fallen upon the lean and fatless shoulders of an equally stupid and witless fellow. This chap, whoever he may be, would create a newspaper sensation out of the driving of Adam and Eve from the Garden of Eden if some one was indiscreet enough to tell him of that occurrence. Last week he had an article in the Call headed as follows:

"THE POWERS OF A JUDGE.

"DECISION OF THE SUPREME COURT IN PEOPLE AGAINST KNUTTE.

"THE THIRTEENTH JUROR.

"CARROLL COOK SAYS IT WORKS ONLY IN THE INTERESTS OF THE DEFENDANT.

"DISCUSSED BY THE LAWYERS.

"GREAT INTEREST OF THE LEGAL PROFESSION IN JUSTICE VAN FLEET'S OPINION."

One would imagine from the article that the legal fraternity had gathered in excited groups to discuss in heated phrases a decision which capsized every principle of jurisprudence handed down since Justinian's time. The article opened in this very serious vein:

Wherever two or more San Francisco lawyers met yesterday, whether in the nearly deserted courtrooms, at luncheon, at the Bar Association, or the club, if the conversation became at all general, it touched upon the decision of Justice Van Fleet in the case of the people against Christian Knutte as reported in The Call.

And usually it more than "touched" upon this topic; it discussed quite thoroughly and often at considerable length the merits or demerits of the decision.

How stupid this must all appear to Attorney Shortridge (brother to the editor) if he but knows the facts of the case. The truth is, Justice Van Fleet's decision followed a well-beaten judicial path, a path hedged in by law and marked out by well-defined lines laid down in older cases, and which not only found support in a multitude of authorities but was and is maintained by the very statutes of the State as well as by universal rules of justice.

It seems that an individual named Christian Knutte was tried for the offense of obtaining money under false pretenses. After the prosecution had introduced its evidence and rested, and before the defense had opened, the Court advised the jury to acquit Knutte for the reason that the evidence was insufficient to support a verdict of guilty. This advice was given in the exercise of a clear judicial function; power for which is found in Section 1118 of the Penal Code, which declares that if, at any time after the evidence on either side is closed, the Court deems it insufficient to warrant a conviction, it may advise the jury to acquit defendant. The evidence of the State had closed. The Court deemed it insufficient to warrant a conviction, and so instructed the jury. Thereupon, that very wise body, with the exasperating perversity which seems to be natural to the average qualified juryman, returned a verdict of guilty. This cool indifference to the judicial instruction is, unfortunately, also warranted by the same section of the Code (1118) which says that "the jury are not bound by the advice" so given by the Court. (There seems to be no statutory provision running to the suppression of stupendous asininity in the deliberations and conclusions of a jury.) After entering this contrary, ill-considered, and unexpected verdict, the Court very promptly, and very naturally, too, entered an order setting it aside and granting defendant a new trial. From the latter order appeal was taken. It was this order the decision of the Supreme Court affirmed, in all of which the lay press claims to have discovered a judicial usurpation of the functions of a jury, and declares that the decision enunciates a new and dangerous doctrine of jurisprudence. The truth is, there is absolutely nothing new in the opinion. It follows a time-worn principle which holds that where the evidence adduced by the complaining side is not, in the judgment of the Court, sufficient to warrant a judgment for the plaintiff or a verdict of guilt in criminal proceedings, then the defendant is, in a civil case, entitled to a nonsuit, or, in a criminal case, to an instruction for acquittal. In one form or another, this rule has obtained ever since the inauguration of trial by jury. It is always within the province of the Judge not only to decide what is evidence in the case, but also to determine whether all the evidence of the complaining side taken together would warrant a judgment. This is not a question of fact in any sense. It is a question of law pure and simple. The jury might quite as well sit without a judge if it is to pass upon this point, for in so doing it would pass upon both the law and the fact. Even should the Court deny a nonsuit in a civil case, or refuse to instruct for acquittal in a criminal case, the duty would lie heavily upon it to grant a motion for a new trial if the evidence was "insufficient to justify the verdict or other decision," or the verdict "contrary to the evidence." One of the grounds, and one of the principal grounds, too, upon which courts must grant new trials in civil cases is stated in Section 657 of the Code of Civil Procedure to be > Insufficiency of the evidence to justify a verdict or other decision.

>
> In criminal cases a new trial must be granted
>
> When the verdict is contrary to the law or evidence.

These are the identical words used in the opinion of Judge Van Fleet, and which this sad and witless young man of the daily press prints in bold-face type, as though they announced a something startling in our jurisprudence calculated to make the hair of affrighted justice stand on end. In the case under discussion, the Judge had already given voice to its opinion as to the insufficiency of the evidence. How, then, could he refuse a new trial when the statute plainly states his duty as to verdicts not sustained by the evidence? He could not fly in the face of his own judgment already expressed to a dull-witted and non-responsive jury. The only weak point in his action in the matter would appear to be his haste, prompted perhaps by well-founded indignation. The statute directs that a new trial may be granted upon the grounds stated upon the application of the defendant.

The daily press has been much given to criticising the judiciary for delays. One of the singular features of the case under consideration is that the trial court, instead of waiting for a formal presentation of the motion for a new trial, avoided that delay by disposing of the matter upon its own motion. Whatever else may be said of it, it certainly was an action looking to the speedy clearing of the criminal calendar. The practise in English courts is held up to American judges as an example to follow. In England, judges are vested with much wider powers than here. They not only grant nonsuits and instruct juries to acquit upon a failure in the evidence of the complainant or the prosecution, but they comment upon testimony adduced during the trial with a view of directing the jury to acquit or return a verdict for either party in a manner expressly forbidden by our laws. Any encroachments approaching the English practise would serve to reverse the lower court with us. Yet these very powers, now denied our judiciary, are the necessary means of expediting litigation. The recent disapproving criticism upon this decision, which to our mind proceeds from an entirely erroneous point of view, indicates that the Judge is not safe from attack if he exercises the little power stingily vouchsafed him in speeding matters of litigation.

Since the above was placed in type, in an article, "An Opinion Modified. Judges Must be Careful in Instructing Juries to Acquit," the same stupid reporter intimates that the Supreme Court has much modified its decision in the Knutte case by another and a later opinion, a statement for which there is not the slightest foundation. Mr. Shortridge should suppress the young man responsible for these articles, or let some competent physician inject the microbe of intelligence beneath his cuticle. The Call has recently enjoyed a reasonable degree of commendation for a reasonable degree of intelligence, which should not be sacrificed in such an unholy cause.

AMERICAN ARISTOCRACY.

On the eighteenth of next month Miss Florence Pullman, "daughter of the palace car millionaire," is to be married to Frank O. Lowden, "son of an Iowa farmer." So "The Wave" is informed in a circular letter issued by a progressive newspaperman of Chicago who offers a handsomely illustrated article on the marriage which will tell of:

1. Miss Pullman's former marital engagements and how they were broken; one of her discarded suitors is the nephew of the Emperor of Austria.
2. Her great wealth, actual and prospective, and how it is used.
3. George M. Pullman's detestation of foreign fortune hunters, and his insistence that his daughter's husband must be an American citizen.
4. Selection of an Iowa man, without wealth, receives parental sanction.

Here is outlined a most attractive article which is specially offered for the "woman's page," the price for the same being $3, illustrations and all.

It is only a newspaperman's advertisement of his wares, but it talks and talks loud to the American. Here is a rich American girl who is to marry a poor American man, and it seems necessary to the observant newspaperman to explain why so strange a thing is to come to pass. That it may not be thought for a moment that the girl could not have "done better," we are told that she refused the hand of the nephew of the Emperor of Austria. Being without the satisfaction of being herself addressed as "Princess" or "Duchess," Miss Pullman will find no end of satisfaction in having the world know that she might have enjoyed that luxury if she had but wanted to, or, rather, if her father had allowed her. Along with the announcement of his marriage to the woman who is supposed to love him better than all other men, Mr. Lowden is to have the pleasure of reading of the many other affairs of the heart his wife has had, and how she broke one engagement after another till reaching his arms. A glimpse is given of the wealth this young lady has, and is to have, and then the father is introduced, the man of millions, who refuses to allow his daughter to marry a foreign nobleman.

Where is the Thackeray to do this subject into a novel? Where the Sardou to make it into a play?

SCENE I. American girl surrounded by bags of gold. Enter European princes and dukes from all sides who beg for her hand. American girl willing.

SCENE II. Girl introduces princes to Patriotic Father and asks consent. Patriotic Father refuses consent and drives princes out. American girl disconsolate.

SCENE III. Farmer's son from Iowa appears. American girl repents of her folly, throws her arms around farmer's son. Patriotic Father appears and gives his blessing. [Tableau.]

What were the sufferings of the early Christian martyrs compared to those of this young heiress? Is Lear such tragedy? Forced by a cruel father to discard the titles of Europe and accept a farmer's son! What noble self-sacrifice! What beautiful subjection to parental control! What a fine old Roman of a father!

This is the matter of which women's pages are made up to day in the papers of Democratic America. Where is Thomas Jefferson with his high ideal of a Social Democracy? Where is the simple life of fifty years ago? What has become of the old idea of equality,—is it a discarded glove or old boot? Has it come to this, that an explanation must be made when an American girl marries a poor man?

It is no longer to be doubted that we are developing an aristocracy. The snob has come to stay. Europe has demoralized us. Perhaps, after all, it is not Europe that we are aping, for it may be that classes and caste are natural things, and in creating the rich into a class removed we are but following some innate law of snobbishness that sooner or later must show itself in all peoples. It seems to be the law, first, the plain people, poor and unaffected, then the upper class—call it what you will—rich, proud, and pretentious. But as we are to have an aristocracy, let us have one of American make. Away with the constitutional prohibition against titles! If American girls want titles, let them be not forced to go abroad. Give the Iowa farmer's son a chance to compete with the nephew of the Austrian Emperor without making necessary the interference of the patriotic father. If American women want to read of dukes and princes—and every American paper proves that they do by the amount of such gossip printed—give them to read of Count Carnegie, Prince Belmont, and Lord Vanderbilt. These are as good names as any others, backed by histories quite as creditable as most of those which now sustain such titles. If we are to worship snobbishly, let us worship ourselves, and so maintain the devotion of our women and decrease the export of good American gold. Who doubts but that a popular sale of titles would do more to replenish the Federal surplus than a popular sale of bonds?

The serious fact called to our attention by the circular letter from the Chicago writer is this, that the tone of the American people touching all questions of caste has undergone a most decided change within twenty years. Contrast any daily paper of to-day with one of a few years ago and the change is at once noticed. Coincident with the development of a very rich class and more intimate association with Europe has come not only a consideration for titles of rank and nobility which did not before obtain, but a recognition of all sorts of social gradations and distinctions which were before unknown. Social life is no longer simple, social equality is repudiated.

THE "CALL'S" ERROR.

The morning Call was good enough to reprint an editorial from these columns last week in which reference was made to the opening atrocity of the Republican State Central Committee. The Call wrongfully, hastily, and, we fear, without the slightest corroborating evidence, attributes the crime of which we made complaint to the operations of the railway managers. It has become a common California custom, if one has a a grievance, to declare the railway responsible therefor, in the hope of strengthening the cause by gathering about it the railway hater, and injecting his spirit of animosity into the quarrel. Before the era of railways in California Providence was blamed for local misfortunes. The railways have served to relieve the Almighty from some of the blame. If business is bad, or salt rheum or rheumatism comes suddenly upon some unfortunate Californian, it is quite fashionable to hold the railway answerable for the affliction. It is a cheap and unworthy character of diplomacy. Possibly our contemporary has given way to this weakness. Possibly it believes the charge to be founded upon truth. "The Wave" does not; in fact it doubts it most strongly; and denies it as even a remote possibility. In late proceedings of the Republican State Central Committee the hand of the railway has not been at all apparent. Certainly, it could ill afford to indulge in performances such as marked the opening proceedings of the Committee. The whole proceeding was indecent and inexcusable, and included not only cunning treachery, but forgery as well is charged. In the absence of distinct and incontrovertible proof to the contrary, we must steadfastly refuse to believe and must deny that the railway corporation had any connection whatever with the miserable affair. Colonel Crocker, who is now in charge of railway matters in California, is a man of high integrity, and our acquaintance with his character gives us the knowledge that he would not stoop to an act so contemptible; nor would he permit others to do for him a thing so highly distasteful and repellant to an honest man. The railway company stands accused of a good many political offenses which, like the other charges made against it, are more frequently false, malicious, and unfounded than true; but seldom has it been charged with anything quite so grossly, wantonly, and deliberately contemptible as this. No excuse can be offered in palliation of treachery and deceit, forgery and falsehood, within party lines, that one faction might secure advantage over another; and it is a serious matter to lay such a crime at the doors of any institution. Men capable of such performances as this are not politicians; they are mere tricksters, dignified by chance, to whom sinister design for personal advancement is the holiest purpose of political parties. They would sacrifice the honor of their party, imperil its welfare, and jeopardize its success, rather than yield up the idea of dominating the thing cursed by their allegiance. Republicans cannot view with unconcern the reputation which the Mahoneys are affixing to their State Central Committee, and there must be some method by which the leading spirits, the honest members of that party, may give voice to their protests and evidence their indignation at this assumed direction of their affairs. From the daily prints it appears that Senator Mahoney is more largely in evidence in these proceedings, concerning which we complain, than any other one man. To say that Mahoney represents the railway company is to declare that the barnacle represents the pile, the leech the patient, or that the parasitic growth sapping the lifeblood from the sturdy oak represents the tree. When Mr. Mahoney sweeps his skirts through the Republican State Central Committee rooms, he brings with him a concentrated extract of the odor of the slime and dirt and filth of politics. He represents all that which is the worst in politics. He is the Sontag and Evans of political life, and politically occupies about the same relation toward the railway institution as did those two worthies.

Thus far, the only evidence we have seen that would lend excuse for connecting the railway institution with a kindly interference in these unholy practises, is the apparent distaste with which an occasional contributor to the daily press seems to regard our article of last week. It is not incumbent upon the railway company to disprove the charge made in the Call, but it certainly is incumbent upon the Call to offer some evidence to substantiate so serious an accusation against the corporation.

ONE AMERICAN NOVEL.

The recent American novel, The Honorable Peter Sterling, seems not to have been written without effect. Out in Des Moines, it is now proposed to license drinkers. There is pending before the General Assembly of Iowa, a bill prohibiting persons from drinking in barrooms who are unable to display a license issued by the proper authority giving them permission to drink. This very ingenious proposition originated in the novel, The Honorable Peter Sterling, written by Paul Leicester Ford, in which he makes his hero give voice to the following sentiments, in answer to a suggestion that it would be better to stop the sale of wine everywhere:

"That is neither possible nor right," says Sterling. "You can't strengthen humanity by tying its hands. It must be left free to become strong. I have thought much about the problem, and I see only one fair and practical means of bettering our present condition. . . . So long as a man drinks in such a way as not to interfere with another person's liberty, we have no right to check him; but the moment he does, the public has a right to protect itself and his family, by restraining him as it does thieves or murderers or wife-beaters. My idea is, that a license—something, perhaps, like our dog license—shall be given to every one who applies for it. That before a man can have a drink, this license must be shown. Then, if a man is before the police court a second time for drunkenness, or if his family petition for it, his license shall be cancelled, and a heavy fine incurred by any one who gives or sells that man a drink thereafter. . . . It would soon be so much a matter of course that it would be no more than showing your ticket to prove yourself entitled to a ride. It solves the problem of drunkenness."

Our local milk inspector, Dockery, who has been waging such a vigorous and righteous warfare against impure milk, might have found an example for his work in the same book. Sterling's first adventure with the corruption of New York was in the milky way. His initial appearance was in the cause of pure milk. From this, he rose in political life and achieved the gubernatorial chair as his crowning victory.

The writer has, at various times, presented fully twenty copies of this novel to as many judicial and civil officers. The verdict returned by them was unanimous in its favor. It is a novel calculated to fascinate even men who never read. While it makes political success come easy to the hero, and while the practical politician may find much to criticize within its covers, the influence of such a work, if widely read, can hardly fail to be decidedly elevating. Indeed, its influence is already apparent. It will be too bad if its author stops here. His pen might give us a series of American novels puncturing the fallacies and evils peculiarly American. He might give to us a novel upon American Labor Unions, the wrongs they visit upon American youth, the prohibitions they place upon the ambitious wage-earner, their political ingratitude, the insincerity of their leaders, and their proneness to follow the false cry of the agitator and the demagogue.

THE MAN WHOM STRIKES STRIKE.

If organized labor would best attend to its own interests, it must first expel from its ranks the infesting demagogue. His work is to set employer and employee against each other, to make foes of friends, and blind the laborer to the fact that the interest of one is the interest of both. The agitator is earning his money just now. He has used his tongue to lash up the strife on which he thrives. Not alone the music of his voice, nor yet the desire for glory, actuates him. He seeks fatness for his own ribs. Peace is his enemy and contentment a crime against his happiness. His selfishness can be understood; but the fact that he can delude others into following him, into plucking from the fire of needless controversy the unearned chestnut for which his small soul yearns, must ever remain a mystery.

It was only last week "The Wave" gave some figures demonstrating the inexpensive inutility of strikes. At that time the voice of the agitator was seeking the ear, but there was no suspicion that it was being listened to with a faith unshaken by the shock of repeated deception and almost uniform failure. Since then there has been a strike among painters and decorators, with members of other crafts hesitating about joining in the movement. "Surely," says an astute observer in a daily paper, "nobody would quarrel with his work unless jobs were plentiful." That writer is too sanguine. He goes on to argue that a strike is a sign of prosperous times. It is, and it is generally farewell to such times. It is apt to be a sign that prosperity is being driven away. It is the closing of the hand against the receipt of wages, and the doubling of the hand into a fist to shake menacingly at the wage-giver. Whether there be no work, or whether there be work, and men refuse to do it, is the same in effect. The laboring man voluntarily out of a job is as badly off as though he vainly hunted for one.

The strike is often unfair. It takes contractors by surprise after they have undertaken enterprises perhaps at scanty margin, basing their estimates upon current wages. All at once they are ordered to pay greater wages. Sometimes they cannot do this. Sometimes the demand comes in so insolent a form that they are bound in self respect to decline to acquiesce. In such instances unions defeat themselves by asking too much or by asking improperly. They set a certain scale at which members shall be permitted to work, and men not members, they decree, shall not work at that scale or any other. The unions, objecting to dictation, must not arrogate that right to themselves. Saying that every man shall be his own master, they cannot consistently claim to make every man a slave. A course so illogical tends to create a prejudice against the cause of labor.

While striking for $3 per day the painters are losing $2.50 per day. This is a total loss and it can no more be regained than a wasted moment can be recalled from the eternity of which it has become a part. Even if after long contention they shall win their point, they have struck a blow at the common welfare. A strike continued to a considerable length almost invariably leads to violence. Already in local affairs there has been brutal interference with men who dared to work without first obtaining the sanction of a union for the promotion of labor's rights. Such interference is always unjustifiable. The union has the privilege of withdrawing from any uncongenial field. It has in equity no privilege of telling others to keep out of that field. It becomes a paradox when it constitutes itself a monopoly. Furthermore the mere prospect of a strike is a threat sufficient to check capital and place a stay on improvements, in this way losing to labor far more than it can expect will be counterbalanced by an advance in wages.

The question at issue now is not one of half a loaf or no bread. Sometimes men are so ground down that there is nothing for them to do but rebel, and when they do rebel they have the sympathy and the support of every honest man be he rich or poor. Their triumph, if so be they secure one, is hailed as a public benefaction. But the painters, who inaugurated the prevailing trouble, were receiving good wages; not so good as they wanted nor so good as people who do not pay them would be glad to see them receive. They chose to give up these wages. At this point, regrettable as it may be, their rights end. In all probability no work day could be made so short and no wages so munificent as to abolish the strike. It is as inevitable as measles, but it tries the patience. At one time there will be a lament: "No work." When the work is forthcoming there will be a new cry that the pay is insufficient. This is invariable. The spirit of discontent cannot be smothered under plenty. It is so assiduously nursed that it is always alive and alert for a pretext. It was this spirit that permeated the printers' union for years, making it a terror to the employers, whom it ruled with iron hand. It was to be rid of this hard task master that the employers were glad to welcome the type-setting machine, that, with all its faults, is not an unappreciative tyrant.

The man who strikes himself into a long period of idleness often has confidence in the future because of a dole handed out by his union. But this is a small sum, and the stock of money is not unlimited. It has been contributed by the man and his fellows while they had positions. Virtually, he feeds himself while loafing. The bear lives on his own fat, but the bear emerges from the process without any fat. The man who does not know that the profit in striking is non-existant, is incapable of learning. The record of strikes has been kept. It is a record long and big with disaster. Under the whole burden of disaster, prone, helpless, may be observed the laborer, the man who struck.

THE OAKLAND TRAGEDY.

They were the only children in the family. Kate was ten and Ida half of that in years. Both were merry little tots, given to dolls and other childish fancies. Both were brimming over with sparkling, innocent fun. But a few moments before the accident they had kissed mother and gone forth to play, purposing, as was their wont, to meet their father returning by the evening train from his San Francisco place of business. Hand in hand, laughing and talking as only children do, and as only children can, they started across the street, first waiting for one electric car to pass, and then, darting behind it, came in front of another car passing in an opposite direction, and were dashed to instant death beneath its wheels. In the twinkling of an eye the merry, childish peal of laughter became a cry of despair, a wail of pain, a fluttering sigh of dissolution, and two little souls were ushered into another world. As the crowd gathered about the mangled forms, the father stepped from his train but a block away. He looked about for the infant faces of his baby girls, who usually ran with eager haste to welcome him. They were not there. Moving homeward, he approached the crowd to discover the cause of the excitement. He looked upon the first prostrate form, the mangled face was unrecognizable; but suddenly observing the other baby he cried, "My God! It is Ida!" The ring, the dress, the wearing apparel of the larger child soon told him that the body with the mangled, unrecognizable face, with the head of curly hair all matted o'er with blood, was that of his daughter Kate. Blinded by tears, racked by a mental anguish under which no man could live for long, he staggered from the wondering, awe-struck crowd and hurried homeward, but a few steps away—hurried to the stricken home to prepare, with all the gentleness and skill his great, overwhelming grief would permit, the mother, his wife, for the dreadful shock. The news had preceded him. . . . The prostrated and stricken sit alone in their cheerless home. Laughing babies out on the street, for a moment, deceive their senses, and for one brief moment they feel it all may be a horrid dream. Two little mounds out at "Mountain View" tell another tale—speak of realities—speak of what was and what is.

Briefly the foregoing sets forth the sad story of the sudden killing of the two daughters of Mr. Frank Booth in Oakland, one day early in the week. The story must appeal to every human heart, for it is pregnant with most distressing features—features that summon up a world of sympathy, even in breasts strangers to such tender sentiments. It is hardly an hour to draw a moral from this sad happening; but yet, what time is more appropriate so to do than while the awful fatality is still fresh in mind? The lesson is one that goes home to parents as well as to the corporation and its employees. It means, Care, Heedfulness, Caution, mutual and universal. It means nothing else. No one was wholly to blame, no one wholly blameless. This is the lesson, Care.

Six lines of the lost early English "Tale of Wade," which Chaucer makes Pandarus tell Cressida before introducing Troilus to her, have been discovered in a Latin homily of the thirteenth century, in the library of Peterhouse, Cambridge.

Mr. Rider Haggard has gone to South Africa—not in search of health, but in search of fresh material for a story. The original of Mr. Haggard's "Jess" is said to be a lady of Pretoria whose husband at the time of her marriage was quite wealthy. She was, however, forced to leave him, and he is now a journalistic hack in Johannesburg. He went through his fortune in a short time, and then fell back upon his wife's earnings, she having taken a position in a South African opera company which afterwards failed.

A Calendar of Scripture Quotations has just been issued by Messrs. Horace Marshall & Son. It is not often that real genius is devoted to the compilation of works of this class, but such seems to have been the case in this instance. The author has undertaken to provide an appropriate text for every day in the year. This is the way he does it:

January 16th Lady Hamilton died, 1815.
"Her sins, which are many, are forgiven, for she loved much."—Luke vii. 47.

January 17th. Siamese Twins died.
"In their death they were not divided." 2 Samuel i. 23.

February 1st. Swinburne born, 1837.
"Now will I sing . . . a song of my beloved."—Isaiah v. 1.

February 25th. Inconvertible Greenbacks issued by the United States, 1862.
"Silver and gold have I none, but such as I have give I thee."—Acts iii. 6.

February 29th. Leap Year Day.
"In that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying, 'We will eat our own bread and wear our own apparel; only let us be called by thy name, to take away our reproach.'"—Isaiah iv. 1.

April 7th. Royal Titles Bill carried through Parliament by Mr. Disraeli, 1876.
"Exalt her and she shall promote thee; she shall bring thee to honor."—Proverbs iv. 8.

May 14th London Museum of Geology opened.
"Stumble not among the stones."—Ecclus xxii. 20

July 3d. Dog Days begin.
"Deliver my darling from the power of the dog."—Psalm xxii. 20.

August 4th. Army Regulation Act passed, 1871.
"Promotion cometh neither from the east nor from the west nor from the south."—Psalm lxxv. 6.

September 18th. George I. landed in England, 1714.
"The Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever He will, and setteth up over it the basest of men."—Daniel iv. 17.

October 12th. First Social Science Congress, 1857.
"No doubt but ye are the people, and wisdom shall die with you."—Job xii. 2.

December 5th. Gladstone's Ministry assumed office, 1868.
"When the righteous are in authority, the people rejoice."—Proverbs xxix. 2.

IN THE WINDOW-SEAT.

BY JULIET WILBOR TOMPKINS.

They danced once around the rooms, threading their way skilfully, then were brought to a halt by a little group standing around a girl. She leaned easily against the wall, keeping them all in eager attention to herself and good humor with one another without the slightest apparent effort. There was no strained vivacity, no shouted repartee, just a word to one, a suggestion to another, a humorous reply to a third, and a smile for all.

The girl who was dancing glanced at the group with a little look of satisfaction. She was proud of her sister and exulted in the ever-present throng, even though her own glory was but reflected light, due to her good taste in being the sister of the most fascinating girl in town. A little jealous pain might creep in once and a while, to be promptly snubbed and thrust out again; but not to-night. She turned to her partner, radiant:

"It's too crowded," she said. "Let's sit down and talk."

"Here's a window-seat just made for us," he answered, piling up the cushions for her. "We weren't a second too soon. There were three couples headed for it."

She leaned back and stared contentedly at the gliding, weaving multitude. Fluffy skirts brushed past them. A burst of laughter came from the group around her sister.

"It's queer how we always shake down into our positions, isn't it?" he began. "How the ones that ought to know each other always do in time."

"Don't you believe it's just chance?" she said. "Besides, we never know what we have missed, the congenial spirits that we have passed without recognizing in the crowd."

"I believe that sooner or later we find them all," he answered. "Do you know, I almost never try to meet people or to see anything of them any more, no matter how much they attract me, I am so certain that, if we are really congenial, fate will bring us together some way."

"But that may mean waiting so long," she said, a little wistfully.

"But it is twice as good when it does happen," he said. "I like things to come about naturally. They lose half their value when they are forced."

"I'm not patient enough for that," she said. "When people attract me, I want to rush in at once."

"Where fools might fear to tread?" he added. "You spoil your illusions too quickly when you do that. I like to keep mine for a little while, and pretend that they are really about to come true. Dread of disenchantment is stronger in me than impatience."

"But as long as I can believe real enchantment possible, I can forgive any number of disappointments," she answered. "Oh, if I were a man, I would go forth and find day and night!"

He turned to her half impulsively.

"All this winter there has been some one who has attracted me more and more every time we were thrown together, yet I have hardly made one effort to know her better," he said, taking her fan and opening it stick by stick.

"But why not?" she asked, half under her breath.

"How could I suppose she would want to know me? She has always so many," he said, looking up from the fan with a sudden smile. A little laugh broke from her, quickly checked, but leaving its traces around the corners of her lips.

"The idea of descending to a conventional commonplace like that," she said. "Tell me honestly why you didn't try to see more of this girl—it was a girl, I suppose?"

"It was, and is, a girl," he answered, gravely. "I suppose it was one part fear of disappointment. She looked as if she were natural and straightforward and sincere and not given to watching effects, and that seemed too good to be true."

"One part that—" she said, with a quick breath.

"And one part—you won't believe it, but it's true—diffidence," he went on.

"You—diffident!" she exclaimed, shaking her head.

"Oh, I don't blush and put my finger in my mouth and fall over chairs," he said, "but there are other kinds than that."

"Well, I thought I had experienced every kind that ever existed, but I don't believe I know yours," she acknowledged.

"Perhaps it's a kind of vanity," he said, reflectively. "It all comes down to, What will I be to her, anyway? Where will she put me on her list? I am not willing she should be of such importance to me while I am merely one of a crowd to her."

"I should say you were the sort of man who chooses his own place on the list," she said, with shy honesty.

"No; I only choose whether I will be on it at all or not," he answered, with no thought of compliment given or exchanged, for which she was grateful.

"Are there any more reasons?" she asked, presently.

"Well, I suppose there was a dash of laziness in it, too," he confessed with a laugh. "I am always indolent about beginnings, though after they are once made—" He broke off, and they both stared thoughtfully out into the brilliant room. The music came swinging across to them with rollicking abandon. She smiled to herself as another man joined the group around her sister. The mean, ignoble, little pang was vanquished for all time.

"Well, I hope your theory of fate is true," she said, at last. "Now, I should think you might tell me who the girl is?"

"I should think you might guess," he said. They both laughed, and she again turned her shining eyes toward her sister. "Yes, you have guessed," he added, following her glance. "Your sister has more fascination for me than any woman I have ever known."

She was silent a few seconds, looking fixedly across the room, a smile on her lips.

"Don't be afraid to go on," she said, at last. "I don't think you will spoil your illusions. It is rather draughty here by the window. Shall we finish the dance?"

MME. MATERNA.

REMINISCENCES OF A MUSICAL CAREER. WAGNER AS A TEACHER.

Over the threshold of the humble little home which had witnessed her birth and sheltered her girlhood, in the quaint, old town of Gray, in Austria, Amalia Materna, at the age of fifteen, took her first step into that world, which has since acknowledged her one of its great vocalists, and the only interpreter of his genius whom Richard Wagner ever really recognized and believed to have been created for the impersonation of his great heroines.

Motherless from early childhood, her father's recent death had left her, with education but barely begun, dependent upon her own efforts. Like all children brought up under the wing of the Church, her first thought was to seek advice of the good old father, whose kindly voice and hand were familiar friends, and through his influence it was that she stepped into the ranks of those "soaring voices" of the old church choir—the voices which take up and carry the refrain, one after another, in the quaint, old Catholic Cathedrals. It was Herwegh, manager of the famous "Theater au der Wien," who, noting the quality of this young girl's voice, some years later, made her an offer of engagement, and it was under his management she made her first bow to the public; although her real début was in "Fidelio," at the Royal Opera House in Vienna. At the latter house she remained a number of years, counting among her managers such well-known names as Richter, Jahn, and others. It was while here she met Scaria, who first brought her to Wagner's notice, but of that later, in her own words.

When Mme. Friedrich-Materna arrived at the Palace, Tuesday night, it was late and she was tired and dusty, but, notwithstanding, she presented a bright, smiling face to those who were there to meet her. She was as pleased as possible to be at her journey's end.

"Ach!" she exclaimed, in her demonstrative German way. "So much dust, so much noise—I am so glad to get off the cars; we have come straight from Chicago—that is a long trip—all at once, nicht wahr? I am really in no condition to meet any one," she added. "I have had no time to bring myself—what do you say in English—together?"

"To collect yourself," I suggested. "Let us go over to this corner," and I pointed to a retired spot. "There we can be quiet, and then, presently, you can slip away."

So we settled ourselves on the sofa in the corner of her little parlor, and finding that she had some little difficulty in expressing herself in English, owing to her tired, excited state, although usually she speaks the language quite smoothly and with a pretty accent, I assured her she could resume her own native tongue and I would understand her. Thus, having made things easier, she spoke of her former visit here, and her present trip, and then, naturally, we lapsed into conversation about her musical association with Wagner.

"Was it not Scaria who first brought you to Wagner's notice?" I asked.

"Yes, Scaria, the great basso," she answered. "We were in Vienna at the same time. He knew that Wagner was seeking a voice to suit his great heroines, you know—Brunhilde, Isolde, Ortrud, Kundry,—but, above all, for his Brunhilde, in the Trilogy—the "Walküre," "Siegfried," and the "Goetterdaemmerung." So Scaria wrote to him, sending my picture. Wagner sent back the answer—'I cannot use her for my heroine of the Trilogy,' but Scaria insisted, and finally he induced me to go to Bayreuth with a letter to Wagner."

"And how did he receive you?"

"Well, in the first place," began Mme. Materna, "I had some difficulty to make him believe I was the same person as in the picture. Finally he sat down to the piano and I sang the great aira from "Tannhäuser," and he could not finish—you know, he was like a child in many ways—quick, excitable, and enthusiastic. He jumped up and after dancing around the room, he rushed toward me, and taking my two hands he cried out: 'At last I have found my Brunhilde—I have found my Brunhilde!'"

"And did you remain at Bayreuth, and begin your work with him then?" I asked.

"Yes," answered Materna, "I placed myself in his hands—I owe everything to him. He taught me how to sing his music; he took me, as it were, into the workings of his own mind. How often," she continued, "he would turn to me, when we had been running over a piece together, and say: 'How did you know that it must be sung so? I, myself, do not know how these things come to me, and yet, you sing them just as I would have them sung.' It is true, you know," she resumed, "he could not explain how he composed his works. He would say that he did not study them out—they came to him. It was inspiration, and we worked together so harmoniously that he really came to believe I had been created for the express purpose of interpreting his works. Oh! he really believed this," and she shook her head convincingly. "And while I am proud of my career," she continued, "and pleased with the honor shown me, yet I know that in my heart nothing makes me so proud as the fact that the greatest master of music himself proclaimed me, to all the world, his ideal heroine," and the tears stood in her eyes as she said this.

"Was not Wagner very difficult to please?" I ventured to ask. "I have heard he was irascible and vain."

"Vain? Irascible!" she exclaimed, with some resentment in her voice. "Ach, nein—er wahr so einfach—like a child, so simple and quiet; he was easily excited, but never irascible; oh, no," reproachfully.

"Perhaps I made use of the wrong word," I hastened to explain, searching in my foreign vocabulary for the right one. "Was he not often impatient with his pupils?"

"Oh, no." She shook her head slowly, with a little incredulous smile spreading over her kind face. "Where do people get such ideas? He was patience itself; he would go over a part again and again, and then he would say: 'Es war sehr gut,' so, and rubbing his chin" (Materna imitated her beloved master), "and then he would give his own idea, always as a suggestion—oh, no, impatient, never; he was delicacy itself, in his fear lest he should hurt another's feelings, and he was far too wrapped up in his music to be vain; he was all music."

Mme. Friedrich-Materna is a tall, fine-looking woman, of powerful frame and well-rounded figure. She is, in coloring, a brunette of pronounced type, of olive skin and dark hair. She has soft, dark eyes, affectionate and vivacious, and always very expressive, Her features are somewhat irregular, bespeaking the warm-hearted and impulsive temperament. Her mouth has good lines and expresses talent. The middle face shows all the lines of sympathy, and sensibility well developed. While her face is not one that would be called handsome, it is one you would turn to look at once, twice, and again—a remarkable face—attractive because of the combined strength and gentleness of it.

"The mind, the music, breathing from her face,
The heart, whose softness harmonized the whole."

And the charm of her manner and conversation are such that one might be easily pardoned for forgetting the hour as I did, when the clock startled me. I rose hastily, with apologies for keeping her so late, and with a parting "Auf Wiedersehn" in my best German, I left.

E. D. H.

France's fastest express trains are: On the Nord Railway, the Paris-Lille train, whose speed, excluding stops, is 52¾ miles an hour; the Calais express makes 51 miles; on the Est, Orleans, Paris-Lyon Mediterranee, and Midi Railways, the trains from Paris to Nancy, Bordeaux, and Marseilles, and from Bordeaux to Cette, whose speed is 45¼ miles, and on the Ouest line, the Paris-Havre express, making 41½ miles. The law of 1853 limiting the extreme speed at any point to 75½ miles an hour is still in force.

Experiments made with electricity on the toxins on disease by MM. d'Arsonval and Charrin show that the effect is to attenuate the toxin, converting it into a useful antidote. The toxin of the diphtheritic and the pyocyanic bacilli was subjected to the physical action of currents of high frequency. The current had no direct influence on the vitality of the microbes themselves, but modified the liquid in which they live so as to render it noxious to them. The action of the current, it is asserted, is not chemical, but purely physical. In twenty minutes a virulent poison can be turned into vaccinating matter. Electricity is to be tried on animals infected with the toxins, to see whether the effect is the same on living tissue.

Verestchagin has been holding exhibitions of his new paintings at Moscow and St. Petersburg, and has aroused great indignation among Russians. There are eleven large canvasses representing in his realistic manner scenes of the French invasion of 1812, which offend Russian patriotism, while three shock orthodox religious feeling by depicting the French desecration of churches.

CAUSERIE.

BY JOHN BONNER.

What Morgan of Alabama expected to gain by badgering Mr. Huntington in the style of a police court attorney, it is not easy to see. If he imagined that his browbeating would coerce the President of the Southern Pacific to confess the secrets of the Contract and Finance Company, he must be very simple indeed. That style of examination may be effective in dealing with the robber of a henroost in Alabama; but in a committee of the United States Senate, with one of the foremost financiers of the country on the stand, it was pure vulgarity and foolishness.

* * *

The Civil War not only wrecked the Confederate States, but it seems to have wrecked the intellect of every one of their prominent leaders. For many years a strong desire has prevailed among the democracy to run a Southern man for President; if the right man could have been found, he might have been elected. But no ex-Confederate has ever loomed up whom either Democrats or Republicans felt that they could safely trust with power. Morgan is, perhaps, not a type; but he thrusts himself forward, so that he has come to be regarded as a type of an arrogant bully, full of the old plantation truculence, loquacious beyond human bearing, combining the spirit of a filibuster with the instincts of a demagogue and the habits of a sot; he appears to have been created in order to foster the delusion that the noble race of Southern gentlemen, who furnished this country with its ripest statesmen and loftiest types of manhood, is indeed extinct.

* * *

Spain is setting us an example by which we ought to profit. While Senators of the United States and Members of Congress are repeating lies about the Spanish attempts to suppress the rebellion, and the behavior of General Weyler; while our newspapers are vituperating Spain in the language of the blackguard, Senors Castillo, Sagasta, Castelar, and their compeers discuss American interference in Cuban affairs with calmness and respectful consideration, and the Spanish newspapers make excuses for our ebullitions of temper in phrases such as gentlemen use in intercourse with each other. Spain may be a benighted country, while the United States are eminent for culture and civilization; but somehow, in this Cuban business, we seemed to have changed places.

* * *

The silverites have justified their existence by bolting on the tariff question, and killing the bill which was intended to restore protection. Thus one set of blockheads has neutralized another set. And after all, come to look at it, how can you blame the honorable members from Silverdom? If the McKinley party may shape the fiscal policy of the Nation so as to put money into the pockets of the manufacturers of Ohio and Pennsylvania, why should not the representatives of Colorado and Idaho insist upon laws which shall tax the rest of the country for the benefit of the silver miners? In the game of grab, every player is entitled to thrust his hand into the bag.

* * *

Another intolerable invasion of American industry by the Japanese is reported in the papers. Certain nefarious individuals, secretly minded to destroy the prospects of the native hemp crop, have imported a variety of Japanese hemp, which is discovered to be exactly adapted to our soil. It will grow to a height of twelve feet, whereas the native hemp seldom reaches six feet, and each acre will yield two tons, worth eight cents a pound. What is to become of the native product if it has to face such competition? Now is the time for Senator Perkins or Congressman Grove Johnson to introduce a bill making it a penal offense, punishable with fine and imprisonment, to introduce Japanese hemp plants into this State.

* * *

Mrs. Susan B. Anthony, and Miss Anna Shaw are to lead the fight for woman's suffrage in this State this fall. They may win it if they go about the work warily and wisely. On this question voters are lukewarm to the point of indifference. The men who are ready to bestir themselves to defeat woman's suffrage are a mere handful, but on the other hand the men who are willing to work for the reform can be covered with a single blanket. What Mrs. Anthony and her friends must try to do is to inbue women with so profound a conviction of the advantage of female suffrage that they will lay an irresistible stress on the males of their household to vote for it. That can be better accomplished by a still hunt for votes than by campaign speeches. In the average man there is so much of the old Adam left that the voice of a female stump-speaker jars on his ear. The less she demonstrates on platforms, the better her chances of winning her case.

* * *

Paris papers are full of the saddest reminiscences of poor Paul Verlaine. He was a poet of the first order, whose verses will live when the follies of the author are forgotten. But he was a man of infamous habits: he had served more than one term of imprisonment; he was a drunkard and a masochist; he led a life of squalid crapulence. His poverty was so abject that he was often compelled to deny himself the solace of a cigarette, because he had not two or three sous to buy tobacco. He would often have starved but for the loyalty of a few friends. Yet when he appeared at a literary gathering, Ministers of State crowded round him, and such men as François Coppée were his constant visitors. During his last days, he lived on absinthe, which he drank till he relapsed into the insensibility of intoxication.

* * *

Fred Warde's inimitable performance of "King Lear" awakened theater-goers to their folly in not crowding the Baldwin during his short season. They may not soon have another such chance of seeing high art. Warde played Lear without the emendations which other actors introduced. He probably thought that if he began to alter Shakespeare, he might travel as far in that direction as the Manager of the Hof-Burg Theater at Vienna, who, in obedience to a hint from the Censor that it was treasonable to represent a King as dying insane, made the old English monarch pass away comfortably in his bed to slow music surrounded by weeping courtiers.

* * *

The opening of the Sutro Baths is an event in the history of San Francisco. It is the first serious endeavor to turn to account natural beauties which are unequaled in any other city in the world. There is no other city which offers the traveler a palace of pleasure on the edge of the broad Pacific, approached through a park gorgeous with perennial flowers, and made splendid by a combination of the marvels of Nature with the triumphs of art. Even Monte Carlo, with all its charm, is less attractive than Sutro Heights. There is nothing in all Europe like the seal rocks.

* * *

The opening day exhibits the new edifice in a rudimentary stage. It contains convenient baths, a restaurant which promises joys to the gourmand, balconies with noble ocean views, a museum with a fine collection of birds and beasts and curios and Japanese waxworks; but the true elements of a casino are still wanting. There should be a ballroom, where, every week, to the music of perfectly trained orchestras, assemblies could be held. The son of Belial thinks that there should be quiet, noiseless resorts, where a gentleman could trifle with a card and a pocketful of eagles; but God forbid that THE WAVE should commend such sinful doings.

* * *

The Sutro Palace is evidently intended not for the pampered aristocracy, but for the people. The price of admission to the baths is ten cents; dinner, including wine, is seventy-five cents. When assemblies are given, Jimmy may bring his Jessamy in a plain calico, without kotowing to a high-born Committee for a ticket of admission. When the casino is complete, it will be a place of general resort, where the crowd can enjoy a holiday, and, after a wash in waters flowing from the ocean, can eat a pleasant meal and drink a glass of native wine in sight of the breakers on one side and waving palms on the other, to the sound of music, which soothes the ear and inclines the gastric juice to perform the work of digestion.

* * *

One Sykes, a farmer in Florida, received notice from "regulators" that he must leave the country where he lived under pain of death. Instead of going, Sykes turned his cabin into an arsenal, and when the regulators came, he killed four and wounded six, so they are like to die. Sykes remarks that he proposes to stay where he is, if he has to kill every man in the country. Good for Sykes.

* * *

Miss Harraden's new novel will not appear till the fall. In the meantime, Blackwood will begin next month a series of California stories from her pen. Her health is so poor that she cannot live anywhere but in Southern California.

* * *

Amelia B. Barr says that discontent is bound up in the heart of women; that it is her original sin. She declares that housekeeping has fallen into disrepute, and that this is simply a revolt against natural duties. Some women fret if they have no children, others because children come. Then there is a great army of discontented women who clamor, justly enough, for their share of men's work and wages, they clamor for the same wages as men, forgetting that equal pay means equal work. Here are texts for the Women's Congress.

THE LATEST VERSE.

A ROUNDEL OF RABELAIS.

BY A. C. SWINBURNE.

Theleme is afar on the waters, adrift and afar,
Afar and afloat on the waters that flicker and gleam;
And we feel but her fragrance and see but the shadows that mar
Theleme.

In the sun-colored mists of the sunrise and sunset that steam
As incense from urns of the twilight, her portals ajar
Let pass as a shadow the light or the sound of a dream.

But the laughter that rings from her cloisters that know not a bar
So kindles delight in desire that the souls in us deem
He erred not, the seer who descried from the seas as a star Theleme.

The Pageant.

IN PROGRESS.

BY CHRISTIANA ROSETTI.

"Ten years ago it seemed impossible
That she should ever grow so calm as this,
With self-remembrance in her warmest kiss
And dim dried eyes like an exhausted well,
Slow-speaking when she has some fact to tell,
Silent with long unbroken silences,
Centered in self, yet not unpleased to please,
Gravely monotonous like a passing bell.
Mindful of drudging daily common things,
Patient of pastime, patient at her work,
Wearied, perhaps, but strenuous certainly.
Sometimes I fancy we may one day see
Her head shoot forth seven stars from where they lurk
And her eyes lightnings and her shoulders wings."

SONG.

BY W. E. HENLEY.

Oh, have you blessed, behind the stars,
The blue sheen in the skies,
When June the roses round her calls?
Then do you know the light that falls
From her beloved eyes?

And have you felt the sense of peace
That morning meadows give?
Then do you know the spirit of grace,
The angel abiding in her face,
Who makes it good to live?

She shines before me, hope and dream,
So fair, so still, so wise,
That winning her I seem to win
Out of the drive and dust and din,
A nook of Paradise.

-The Pageant.

A FEBRUARY ROUNDEL.

BY ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE.

The heavy day hangs in a heaven of lead,
Sick-hearted, like a blind hurt beast astray,
On paths where light scarce lightened ere it fled
The heavy day.

The hollow darkness holds the light at bay:
Cloud against cloud, reluctant, yet makes head:
Hour against hour, wing-broken yet makes way,

Time hath no music in his darkling tread,
The wind no heart to wail, the sun no sway,
Ere night with starry shadow swathes her dead,
The heavy day.

—Saturday Review.

TWO SONNETS.

BY HON. MAURICE BARING.

Because she listened to the quiring spheres,
We thought she did not hear our homely strings;
Stars diademed her hair in misty rings,
Too late we understood those stars were tears.

Without she was a temple pure as snow,
Within were piteous flames of sacrifice;
And underneath the dazzling mask of ice
A heart of swiftest fire was dying slow.

She in herself, as lonely lillies fold
Stiff silver petals over secret gold,
Shielded her passion, and remained afar
From pity: Cast red roses on the pyre!
She that was snow shall rise to heaven as fire,
In the still glory of the morning star.

You were the Queen of the evening, and the skies
Were soft above you, knowing you w re fair,
With Sunset's dewy gold about your hair,
And Twilight in the stillness of your eyes.

You did not know your dear divinity,
And, childlike, all unconscious that you walked
In a high, mystic space, you smiled and talked,
And stooped to pluck a rose and give it me.

As at the gate of Heaven an angel-child
Might wonder at an outcast's pleading gaze,
An outcast kneeling at the golden bars,
And say: "Come be my playmate, here the days
Are longer and the ways outside are wild,
And you shall play with suns and silver stars."

—The Yellow Book.

Mascagni's new opera, one act, "Zanetto," taken from Coppee's "Le Passant," is described by the composer as his most original work. It begins with a chorus without orchestra behind the curtain as a prelude. The scene is the terrace of a Florence villa at night, and there are but two parts, a soprano and a mezzo-soprano, one dressed as a man. It will be given on March 1st at Pesaro. He is writing another opera, "Vestilia," one of the scenes in which will be a Roman amphitheater, with the episode of turning down the thumbs as the signal for death.

THINGS AND PEOPLE.

IN THE PROSAIC days among which we have fallen the acquirement of wealth is the basis of romance. The world belongs nowadays to the rich; to be poor is to be without consideration. Its financial return is the measure of professional ability or literary talent. Courage or heroism in fiction is rewarded with the love of an heiress; the value of a great achievement, the possession of beauty, are the opportunities of marrying money. During the regime of the Louisiana Lottery, murder and scandal paled in interest before those seductively worded interviews with men and women prize winners, which were then a feature of journalism. We are all striving, all working. Even at Burlingame the degree of leisure is modified by American conceptions. Pleasure has not yet become a profession. So it is not abnormal, this readiness to listen avidly to the tales of suddenly acquired fortune, this desire to glut our ears with the good luck of our acquaintances, or of the indifferent wayfarer, whose name stands out in the headlines as the discoverer of a mine, or the inventor of a device. For instance, there is E. A. Wiitse, who but three years ago left San Francisco practically penniless. A skilled engineer, versed in the details of mining, he found no opportunity of exercising his acquirements in our own great gold-bearing region. So he went to South Africa, found employment at a good salary, rose in the estimation of Rhodes, invested his savings in mines, and is on the way to San Francisco, now, forever relieved of the cares of wealth, possessed of half a million in gold. But he has done better than his associates, none of whom have acquired fortunes, though they are all well-to-do.

* * *

The manner in which the Fickle Dame pursues her protéges, persisting in attentions which they elude or mistake, is illustrated in the life of an American named Camden, who for many years kept a wayside inn near Redding called the Lower House. There is in that region a great mass of ore—a blending of copper, silver, and gold—called, I believe, the Iron Mountain. It came into Camden's hands in lieu of advances to the prospector who had located the property and, for over a score of years, he occupied himself in a vain attempt at selling it. There was never a question as to the rich possibilities it presented for the capitalist, but we all know how discredited the mining industry of California has been. First, two Boston men negotiated its sale and obtained a bond for $14,000 cash, promising the balance of $20,000 more in six months. Back, in due course, came the Iron Mountain to Camden—the speculation had been unsuccessful. Some years later another syndicate, attracted by fabulous stories of the wealth of the property, essayed the sale and after much bargaining closed a deal for $30,000 in cash with other instalments to follow. A fair time was given for the prosecution of their undertaking, but it fell through. Camden again became solitary owner of his Iron Mountain. Nearly a decade later a London engineer and a Colorado miner stopped at the Lower House and engaged their host talking of mines. He told them of his property and bewailed its vicissitudes; it was impossible to dispose of it, though he had been assured by competent experts of its immense value. The twain became interested, prospected the place, the Englishman had rich connections, and lo! a new company was formed, and, in exchange for $300,000, Camden finally relinquished control and retired from business. It is this company that has set about the development of the Iron Mountain. Already it has built a railroad and a huge smelter; it has run shafts in every direction, and there is exposed a huge body of rich ore, which must yield enormous dividends for twenty years to come. At least three million is being put into the property, and it is the fond expectation of the investors that they will all grow richer. Had Camden's first transaction been successful, his last would have been impossible, but the Fickle Dame protected her favorite, and finally endowed him with a fortune.

* * *

The romances of commerce are more improbable in their details that those of imagination. There is the fortune of the borax millionaire, F. M. Smith, for instance. The novelist who used the incidents of his rise to riches as the basis of a tale would be laughed at for a weaver of fairy yarns. When he dared the great borax deal he was poor but courageous. The opportunity he recognized, and he had the audacity to execute it. According to the terms of his bargain he was to pay $4,000 down, $96,000 after sixty days, $100,000 six months later, and the third $100,000 at the end of the year. A huge undertaking, if you have neither a bank nor a London millionaire to draw upon. It devolved on him to get the money out of the property, and he worked with such energy that at the end of sixty days he met his obligation, being aided materially by a rise in the price of the commodity. The second payment was made with greater ease, and before the term had expired, Smith had completed the purchase, and was the possessor of some $295,000—all the result of a year's operation. The Smith fortune is one that continually expands, for borax is practically a monopoly, and the use of the commodity is on the increase. No one is better able to afford magnificent mansions and the luxuries of travel.

* * *

The path of the foundryman is strewn with golden opportunities. To him the prospector who has found a mine turns for a mill. Even before the capitalist is approached, he is appealed to, and if the blood of speculation runs in his veins, he is sure to invest—supplying machinery in return for an interest. That is how Daniel E. Hayes of the Fulton Iron Works came to be interested in the great Kennedy Mine, which has made his own fortune and that of his associates. He is interested with Captain Griffith in the Tahoe Mine of Mexico, said to be the richest gold-bearing property in the territory of President Diaz. He controls the Anita, a new mine on the mother lode which shows splendid developments, and has also a fifth of the South Eureka, which is down only a thousand feet, and is in fine gold-bearing rock. Indeed, this is prospectively another Kennedy.

* * *

Considering his education and disposition, together with the fortune to which he was heir, the death of young Mr. Rideout is especially sad. He had the things which make life worth the living, and, moreover, was steady, cautious, and clear-headed. Withal a loose stone in the shaft of the Magalia mine ended his aspirations, his career, all in a moment. Rideout attended to the interests of his father at Marysville and gave general attention to the affairs of the Magalia in which J. B. Haggin and Rideout, Sr., are partners. Opening the mine has proven an expensive operation but there has just been completed a shaft to the channel which makes possible the exclusion of water. Operations were just about to begin on an extensive scale when the accident happened, for there is a splendid showing of gold. Mr. Rideout, though not a professional, had the mining sense, and his loss will be a considerable one to his father who must again take up the reins of business which he had resigned into the strong young hands of his son. There was plenty of character reserve and sturdy sense about Norman Rideout which might one day have adorned high political office.

* * *

WILL his retirement from the management of the London and San Francisco Bank diminish the elegance of Arthur Scrivener, I wonder? After many, many years' service, he leaves that institution to William Steele, and will either enter business here or return to London. By no means undeserved was the reputation Scrivener so long sustained of being the best dressed man in San Francisco. Not that he sinned in the direction of conspicuousness, nor did his attire ever suggest the extremes of fashion. The characteristic is extremely good taste—the fastidious elegance of a gentleman. But his clothes were always worn with an air; and, though I don't believe his tailor's account is half as heavy as that of certain clubmen—at least, his habiliments gave one the impression of fit and freshness, of which the secrets are a competent cutter and a careful valet. There are the usual rumors accounting for the change. The bank is certainly less prosperous than in other days. It lost custom heavily in the panic of '93, when the London Paris and American made such a winning. Besides, it has been handled in a careful, conservative way, which, while it makes for safety, does not develop prosperity. Mr. Steele is related, I believe, to the managing director of the London office. He is as violent a contrast to Scrivener as any one could imagine—rough where his predecessor is elegant, and quite regardless of the clothes question. He has lots of energy and vigor, however, and knows the tricks of banking quite as well as any of his competitors.

* * *

Every one regrets the misfortunes of Barney Murphy. The soul of generosity and kindliness, he is really the most popular of all Californians, and is esteemed from one end of the State to the other. The gift of a vigorous negative was not among his endowments, though the gods gave him character, intelligence, and wealth. That defect is responsible for the complications which have just culminated, for he ever yielded to the kindly impulse which bade him grant a request rather than refuse one. No man ever lived more tender and considerate of the feelings of others. However, it is not necessary to feel any fears as to his ultimate prosperity, for it is land-poor Barney Murphy is. He has broad acres in plenty, which, in due course, will supply him with funds for the relief of his necessities. Illustrative of his character and popularity, many a good story is told. For three terms he served as Mayor of San Jose. A committee came to him, insistent that he should again be a candidate, threatening, in the event of a refusal, to elect him in spite of himself.

"That is just what you did last time, gentlemen," said Barney. "I told you then I would not serve. This time I promise you that if the slightest move is made toward renominating me, I'll pack up instanter and go to Europe for a twelve-month; now go ahead."

That is the sole reason why Barney Murphy is not still Mayor of San Jose.

* * *

To the ranks of the balloonists has come a new aspirant for aeronautic honors—the third of the Adair sisters. She arrived from Honolulu the other day where she had the distinction of provoking a Cabinet Council and the wrath of President Dole. This daring young woman had brought a balloon from Melbourne and announced an ascension which promised to be a financial success. But there is among the authorities a strong prejudice against aeronautics since the death of poor Van Tassell whose air ship toppled him among the sharks in the harbor. So the project was forbidden. Not abashed and quite determined to have her way, Miss Adair had the balloon carted to a place near by, called Prince City, and up she went as comfortably as though the starting place had been Kansas City rather than a Pacific islet. However, President Dole was much enraged when told of the evasion of his rule, and at the Cabinet Council, next day, it was made a misdemeanor for balloonists to operate in Hawaii.

* * *

If the Buckley following expects to have its lamentations heeded by the State Central Committee, it will, in presenting its grievances, admit the jurisdiction and agree to be bound by the decision of that organization. For instance, it is not probable the Committee will waste its time listening to Mr. Nealon and other disciples of the Blind Boss, if, when its conclusions are announced, they are free to dispute them. However, their cause is doomed, for the State Central desires the exclusion of Buckley, and there is ability enough in the Junta to guard the Convention against his assaults. I am told of the active campaign which the Democratic leaders propose waging here. So, I assume there will be plenty to talk about.

THE WITNESS.

MATERNA-ONDRICEK CONCERT.

Ondricek proved a most agreeable surprise, for he is the greatest violinist who has visited San Francisco of recent years. While he has scarcely the power of Ysaye, he has a greater technic and is as thoroughly musical by nature and as artistic. The privilege of hearing a new man—at least new to this city—was decidedly refreshing.

The difficulties of the harp minor concert of Ernst were scarcely appreciated by the audience, although the great Bohemian was a pronounced success from the very first. Nothing could be more beautiful than his rendering of Schumann's "Abendlied," arranged by Joachim. It was simply heavenly. And the "Witches Dances!" What octaves, tenths, and double harmonics! Verily, this Ondricek stands on the dizzy heights with the few. After such a performance, even Sauret will have to look to his laurels. His bowing is well-nigh perfect. Such a quick, clean, and telling staccato is rarely heard. As for Marsick, comparison is entirely out of the question. His advent should tend to put an end to this nonsensical cant about French "schools," in fact, "schools" of any description. No musician, listening to Ondricek, could tell whether he had studied in Germany or France. As a matter of fact, he was a prize pupil of Massar, of the Paris Conservatory.

Materna, the once glorious "Isolde" and favorite of the immortal Wagner, is still able to show what an incomparable artist she must have been in her prime. Although the voice is no longer what it was, the art is still hers and it is a pleasure to any one familiar with Wagner's music-dramas to hear her in the strains in which she was once so famous. Her manners are charming, and she is eminently at home on the stage.

Mr. Isidore Luckstone came too soon after Paderewski to arouse much enthusiasm as a solo pianist; but he is a most sympathetic and musicianly accompanist.

P. C. A.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

PICTURES.

THREE IMPRESSIONS OF WALTER STETSON'S ART.

A slender young female of the esthetic type, whose accentuated features were rendered more significant by the prominence of her dark, yearning eyes, was gazing, utterly absorbed, at the picture of "Susanna and the Elders." The canvas is in the Vickery gallery and is the leading note in the Charles Walter Stetson exhibition of paintings.

At the spectacle of her interest, I was attracted to its object and as earnestly riveted my eyes on Susanna, who stands naked and quite unashamed between two ancient Hebrews. They are costumed with a careful eye to the perpetration of a sensational color effect, these aged elders, for one wears garments of red and the other is in yellow. The luminous whiteness of Susanna's flesh is contrasted against a background of pale gold; above her head hang oranges and a blue sky.

"How beautiful—how very lovely!" murmered the esthetic maiden. "How inimitable the reflection! How gracious the modeling."

Her admiration being evidently of the kind that required exterior assistance, I ventured to suggest that the attitude of Susanna's legs and thighs was contradictory to the expression of her face.

"How can you utter such an atrocity! it is above criticism," she announced. "How soft, exquisite, the lucid tones of the flesh! How subtly caught the sad melancholy of that beauteous face!"

"Mademoiselle," I interrupted, "that Susanna is a freak. The unfortunate elders are not gazing at her limpid limbs, but at the strange distortions of her physical structure. She looks toward the right, and yet her thighs are facing the audience. Besides, she seems amenable to their inspection, though one leg is inexcusably bent and her arm is modeled antagonistic to the instruction of anatomy."

The expression of cold dignity on the face of the esthetic female would have adorned the sign-post of an ice house. At that moment, just as she was about to leave me alone to realize the enormity of my criticism, Boothby entered and greeted her with the approach to cordiality, which characterizes his manner toward second-rate artists. Boothby buys pictures when he can afford it, and his opinion is accepted as a criterion of value by two millionaires. A moment later I had been properly presented to Miss Arraden, and we moved to the contemplation of "Delilah." This lady is curled up in an impossible attitude on an impalpable couch, her limbs (if she really has legs) covered by a skirt of vivid red, which sets off the lines of her breast and shoulders in rather more relief than their seductions warrant. In her hands is a plaited lock of ginger-colored hair, which the catalogue tells us is the hair of Samson.

"It's a libel on the biblical Sandow," I ventured to observe.

"She's adorable," corrected Miss Arraden. "Such a dear, delicious, little Hebrew—dark-eyed, fascinating."

"But the woman who could sit thus, does not live," I persisted. "Besides there is neither modeling nor bone beneath the pink-white of those shoulders. Look at the cheap turquoise ring on her finger and the single toe peeping out beneath the red rug. Why, it is as preposterous as 'A Sapphic' (No. 3) which is merely a raw blue sky, a bluer sea, and, by way of punctuation, a naked woman, who looks like a note of admiration on a blank page."

"My boy, the color is good—that blue is good, good enough without the girl there," said Boothby.

"So is paint good," I answered, "and whitewash and green grass, but they cannot help it."

"I know you will like this, Mr. Boothby," the esthetic maiden put in. She had become blissfully unconscious by this time of my existence.

We stood in front of a lengthy canvas—an aisle in a forest. Between the trees and against the sky two women stand—one in red, the other in the shade of yellow called cadmium—certainly an audacious combination, but with no real beauty or value.

"My, my," murmured Boothby, "why will clever fellows do this kind of thing. It has neither art nor sense nor originality. I'd rather hang up a crazy quilt than that. But here is something beautiful," he added, pointing to "An Easter Offering," (No. 2).

This canvas represents a field of calla lilies by moonlight, their pale petals shining softly in the silvery blueness of the atmosphere; behind, an admirably painted sky—deeply, darkly blue, and a clump of foliage softly outlined, breaking the horizon line. Really a poetic picture with the feeling of moonlight in its subtle shadows and transparent dusk.

"That is fine," he muttered. "I must have that."

"Here is a second almost as fine," I suggested. "'A Pasadena Moonlight'" (No. 10).

"See what good example may achieve," commented Miss Arraden, sarcastically. "Though I'm prejudiced in favor of consistency."

"It is the misfortune of some people to imagine a difference of opinion the result of prejudice," I corrected. "'The Moonrise' is a beautiful, a poetic picture, painted with strength and delicacy, just as 'Blossoms' is a charming bit of color and 'A Memory of Music' is harmonious in its tapestry-like effect, but that does not counteract the banality of 'The Chaste Susanna,' a lank and timorous backed damsel supported on a marble bench, one limb in full, if slim, evidence and the other, a vague and ungracious outline tucked quite out of sight and evidently out of the artist's mind."

"Quite right," commented Boothby, much to the maiden's chagrin. "There is undeniable talent here—the lilies are charming—but look at this 'The Church and the World,' monks filing down a chasm and naked girls with harps on the rocks above. Neither allegory nor imagination, and no semblance of sense—the canvas is ridiculous, though it is not so crude in its attack on the optic nerves as 'Water Play,' which is more unmitigatedly blue than 'A Sapphic.' I am ready to admit further that Stetson is clever at portraits. For instance, that is a good head, solid texture, firm surface, though a bit hard in outline—still right enough."

"You are both against me," bewailed the esthete. "To me the coloring at which you rail is full of audacity, daring as nature's self. These effects you call garish, are, to my mind, accurate and realistic. The contrasts you call improbable, are to me familiar."

"Nonsense," interrupted Boothby. "It's an affectation. But, my dear, even you won't say Stetson's drawing is good."

She has not yet. FTC., JR.

A QUESTION OF TEMPERAMENT.

As he sat beside her at the dinner-table, of what was, perhaps, the most beautiful house in London, he reflected that his future wife was a woman of whom any man could be proud, whom no man, having once seen, could ever forget. Even if, which, Heaven forbid, she ever ceased to love him, he felt that his feelings for her would never vary one iota from their present white-heat of passion, that she had engrafted herself into his existence so deeply that without her—or at least without the memory of her—existence would be purely impossible.

He was a peculiarly sensitive man, and little things that would not have caused others a second thought irritated him in an extraordinary degree. So it came that most of the women he had met, when they did not bore, annoyed him.

The wise ones of his country knew him for one of the greatest diplomatists the world has ever seen. The skilful way in which he had twice staved off a war with the most scheming of European nations was ample evidence that he was a perfect master of the arts of his profession. His extraordinary tact was the theme of journalistic comment and universal wonder; but, indeed, the man could not have acted otherwise than he did. He was a diplomatist by instinct, not only by profession. His career was but the outward index to his temperament. If his public acts had proclaimed him a diplomatist, his inner self confessed him one. There was no more strenuous opponent of the bludgeon form of argument, and outspokenness to his mind was the eighth cardinal sin. In society, his manner was instinct with old-fashioned courtesy, and it was the exception to come across a woman who did not vote him perfectly charming. But women, as has been said, generally bored him. Those who preserved a conventional frigidity he found dull, those who were youthfully inexperienced enough to give free rein to their natural impulses, offended his sense of the fitness of things in the first five minutes of their conversation. In truth, where women were concerned, he was obviously a difficult man to please.

How had he come at last to yield himself to this woman's charm? His own explanation of the phenomenon was very simple, and it was the only explanation possible. Accustomed as he was to constant analysis of his sensations, he had but little difficulty in perceiving that this women alone, of all the women he had met, of all the women he could imagine, realized his ideal of what a woman should be. Long experience of the sex had taught him exactly what he did not want in a wife. The rest was simple. As soon as he had chanced upon a woman who exhibited none of the traits that he had come to regard as inevitable feminine characteristics, the revulsion of feeling he experienced was at once extraordinary and overmastering. He fell in love with her at once.

For the moment she was engaged in an animated discussion with their host. The conversation had assumed a political turn, thanks to the news promulgated in that morning's Times that the Government was anticipating a defeat in the division on the question of the East African Expedition. The host thought that if beaten they were bound to resign. She differed. Her knowledge of contemporary politics was remarkable, and as he kept putting forward fresh arguments to support his opinion, she demolished them one by one with a flow of ready language, and a wealth of facts that spoke volumes alike for her eloquence and her memory.

Her lover took pride in her resources, but thought the host might have found a better opportunity for the discussion. It had monopolized her for the last five minutes. The fact irritated him. He was on the point of taking part in this duel of words himself, in order to bring it to a speedier conclusion, when, by an adroit thrust driven well home, she silenced her adversary, who, gracefully acknowledging his defeat, sought refuge in more champagne.

"Thank heaven," whispered the girl to her lover behind her fan, "that's over at last." A sudden impulse seized her. She glanced furtively round the table. For the moment, as it chanced, no eyes were cast in her direction.

With a quick dexterous moment her hand slipped into his. "I do love you so! Tell me you love me, darling," she murmured, between her half open lips.

He heard her—he must have heard her—but his lips did not move. There came over his face a strange look, half anger, half surprise, and the hand that lay within hers twitched sharply, as she released it. The next moment the ladies, at the customary signal from the hostess, were sweeping out of the room, and she had to submit to defer the question that had been on her lips.

* * * * * * *

The wine went round, glasses were filled and refilled, tongues loosened, the old stories retold, and in the general buzz of conversation his silence passed unnoticed. His life had been devoted to the concealing of his emotions, and the habit stood him in good stead now. The mask-like, impassive face gave no sign of the storm that raged wildly within the man's soul, yet he knew beyond the possibility of doubt, that between him and this woman all was over, that the idol he had worshiped had been shattered in a few whispered words. With a man of different temperament it might, nay doubtless would, have been otherwise. —Pick-Me-Up.

PUBLIC PEOPLE.

Paderewski is very kind in the matter of autographs. It is said that he has never once refused a request for his signature. A Richmond girl, hearing this, thought to go the autograph fiend one better. She waited till the great pianist arrived in town and sent him her banjo, with a request that he would write a short musical sentiment on the sheepshead. Of course, the courteous Pole complied with the request, and this is the sentiment to which he attached his signature: "I have not the pleasure of being a performer on this beautiful instrument. I am only a piano-player. I. J. Paderewski."

Cecil Rhodes had such decided anti-matrimonial views that he will not have any but bachelors as members of his private staff. He recently made the announcement that "marriage is a more difficult game than politics."

M. De Levandiere has written a most readable and chatty review of the French snobs of the nineteenth century. The following reminiscence of Count d'Orsay, the inveterate duelist, is given: The Count was dining one day with a certain agnostic, who told a story insulting to the memory of the Virgin Mary. D'Orsay called him out on the pretext that he would never hear any woman spoken slightingly of in his presence.

King Otto, the insane monarch of Bavaria, recently celebrated his forty-seventh birthday—or rather it was celebrated for him. Since his accession to the throne, the mad sovereign has never left the Castle of Fuerstenreid. Once a year his Prime Minister pays him an official visit in accordance with a certain law. His latest report says His Majesty's physical condition leaves nothing to be desired, but that his mental condition is simply pitiable.

Within a year Lady Henry Somerset has attended 115 meetings and 27 conferences, traveled over 8000 miles, and spoken in 20 different countries to over 200,000 people.

Qeeen Victoria will wear none but black gloves since her widowhood, and those of only the two-buttoned length. Her Majesty's glove bill for an entire year is less than $100.

Doctor Jameson is not an ideal jingo, either in appearance or character. He is quiet, reserved, and thoughtful in appearance, without theatrical mannerisms. He looks like a dreamer, rather than a resolute man of action. He is not the sort of individual who naturally fits in with melodramas like "Cheer, Boys, Cheer!"

The secret of Fitzsimmons's knockout blow is his enormous shoulder power. He has the largest and longest shoulder-blades, probably, of any man on earth. The muscles which grow over, and under, and about those huge shoulder-blades are worked with a giant lever of bone. His chest is nearly as fully developed as his back.

Europe is ruled by old people. Queen Victoria is approaching her seventy-seventh birthday. Lord Salisbury, her Prime Minister, is sixty-five. Prince Hohenlohe, the German Chancellor, is seventy-one, and Prince Bismarck, who still advises in the government of the empire, is eighty-one. Count Kalnoky, who has just resigned the office of Austrian Chancellor, is seventy-two, and his successor, Count Galuchowsky, is sixty-five. Prince Lobanoff, the Russian Chancellor, is sixty-seven, and Signor Crispi, the Italian Prime Minister, is seventy-seven. The most wonderful ruler of all is the Pope, who is eighty-six years of age. Then there is Mr. Gladstone, who is also eighty-six years old, and the influence of whose vigorous mind on British politics is still great.

Joseph Chamberlain, the politician who now fills the public eye in England, and is talked of as future Prime Minister, never suffered from bashfulness. When he was a new member of the House of Commons, he modestly asked an old and much-respected parliamentary hand to favor him with criticisms or hints on his speeches in the House. The old member reflected for a time, and then said: "It is all very nice, very nice, indeed, Mr. Chamberlain, but if you could occasionally manage to break down, the House, I assure you, would take it as a great compliment."

Mr. Mark Twain, who is now in India, or was the last time he was heard from, says that he works from eleven in the morning till it is time to dress for dinner, and then he doesn't stop of his own accord, but because his family drags him away from his desk. Mr. Clemens does not call writing hard work. He says: "The mere physical work would not hurt me or any one else—you can sleep that off; the mental part of it is nothing but amusement—it is not work." All the time he works he smokes, and he says that he could not work without smoking. He did not stop once for over a year, but in that time he did no work.

It is said that the Dowager Empress of Germany contemplates residing permanently in England. As far as the German Emperor is concerned the arrangement is said to be perfectly satisfactory—even more so. But the German Chancellor has yet to give his consent, which is unlikely, unless the Empress Frederick consents to give up part of her German allowances. Queen Victoria, with her proverbial thriftiness, refuses to consent to such an arrangement, and so the matter remains in statu quo. From England the Empress Frederick receives an allowance of $40,000 a year. But from Germany she receives, "all told," a larger allowance than comes in the coffers of Queen Victoria as reigning sovereign of England.

John Oliver Hobbes announces her lineage as follows: "My father, John Morgan Richards, is a son of the late Reverend James Richards, and grandson of the late James Richards, D. D. (Yale), both Presbyterians of the old school. My father is a first cousin of Judge Field, of the Supreme Court of Washington, and the Reverend Henry Y. Field, My mother was a Miss Arnold, and is connected with the Quaker family of Richardson."

Consorting with municipal officers is evidently as dangerous in the old country as in America. Lord Ranfurly recently had the Dungannon town council to dinner, and after they left found that a valuable heirloom, a gold snuff-box presented to John, Earl of Bute, by George II., had disappeared.

While the quality of Bordeaux and Burgundy wines this year is unusually good, the quantity, 600,470,415 gallons, is less than three fourths of last year's vintage, and almost one-half that of 1893. It is the smallest vintage since 1889. The yield of the other European countries for 1895 is: Italy, 551,250,000 gallons; Spain, 385,875,000; Austria and Hungary, 131,962,000; Germany, 82,000,000; Roumania, 700,500,000; Turkey, 58,000,000; Portugal, 44,000,000; and Greece, Switzerland, Bulgaria, Servia, and Russia, between them, 125,325,000 gallons. Algeria and Tunis produced 95,000 000 gallons wine

THE LATEST VILLAINS.

A FRANK DISCUSSION OF THE CHARACTERISTICS OF CERTAIN NEW NOVELS.

"The villain still pursues us," said the man of letters, throwing down his book. "I suppose a novel of English high life wouldn't go without one, but such a weak-kneed, easily settled villain I never struck."

His wife laid down her embroidery to look at the book.

"Successors to the Title, Mrs. L. B. Walford," she read. "What is it about?"

"Absolutely nothing," answered the man of letters. "There's a foolish little doll that doesn't get compromised, and a simpleton who makes no blunders, a parvenu couple who are taken up and petted by the aristocracy, a course of true love that runs perfectly smooth, and a villain who hardly causes a moment's anxiety. The book has no excuse for existing."

"Well, I hate to be harrowed all through a book for fear something unpleasant is going to happen," said his wife, absently doing a violet in rose pink.

"This villain is so afraid he won't be found out, that he brings a friend up from London and takes him behind the shrubbery, on purpose to have him say, 'and sets you free to spoon with the little countess? ha, ha, ha!' and to tell him in a loud tone of voice that the countess who is, of course, on the other side of the shrubbery) is a jolly little thing, as green as they make 'em. I never saw a man take more pains with his downfall."

"I noticed you read the book through," said his wife.

"Well, I know it," admitted the man of letters. "And I don't see why, now that I've finished. The love affair is the tamest, most commonplace thing, and you aren't even let in to the proposal. It was probably too flat."

"Then why did you finish it?" she persisted.

"Well, Mrs. Walford has a box in which she keeps some very fair character touches and little realistic details, and she takes a handful out for each novel and sprinkles them through it," he said, thoughtfully. "I suppose one reads on from one of these to the next, as if they were milestones. And then she has a way of interesting you without the slightest excuse. But I can't forgive her that milk-and-water villain."

"Read Stone Pastures, by Eleanor Stuart," said his wife. "Quarry is wicked enough for anybody."

"Yes, Quarry is the genuine article," he answered, with some satisfaction. "When he wants to marry another fellow's fiancée, he lets the man get himself blown up by a blast, and everlastingly blinded and maimed. No milk-and-water about him."

"Rather gin and water," she said, ripping out the pink violet. "Still, Quarry, too, managed to get overheard and frustrated in the end."

"But he doesn't deliberately go behind the shrubbery for it," answered her husband. "Anybody might think he could talk freely in the next room to a man he supposed incurably deaf. Quarry is a first-class villain. The book deals with low life, but it's real life. Everybody in it is vitally real. The author has lived in Soot City and gone among the Swedes, and watched the glowing cinder flow down the trough to the cinder hill."

"Yes, it's a true book and a clever one," she said, thoughtfully, "but it's so unhappy, in spite of ending well. There is such a sense of dreary, dragging misery about it, with Quarry coming home drunk and making love to Emma and stealing her money."

"I didn't understand her letting him go to the purse," said the man of letters. "She was too shrewd for that—a woman who could always tell when Jerry Black had been to the city, he had 'such an extra green look.'"

"She was dazed with anxiety," said his wife, wondering if marguerites done in blue would pass as cornflowers. "She is splendidly drawn, anyway. I'll tell you a villain that would suit you—Dan in The Parson's Proxy."

"By Kate W. Hamilton? Oh, I know; Southern dialect, girl from the North, energetic young engineer, railroad opposed by natives, illicit whisky still—"

"No, it's a counterfeiting plant," interrupted his wife.

"So it is. Those Southern stories are all about the same," said the man of letters.

"It is only the setting of this that is hackneyed," she insisted. "The proxy idea is really original. A man unwarrantably injures a clergyman so that he can't preach for awhile, and, as atonement, preaches in his stead, and becomes a splendid character. I liked Nate."

"He got his religion too easy," answered the skeptic. "Just taking a sudden course of the Bible and telling others their shortcomings isn't going to cure a man of drinking, and turn him into a self-sacrificing saint all in a few weeks."

"I should think it might have, alone there in the mountains," she said. "Besides, he wasn't meek and mushy. Don't you remember how he says, 'Common sense an' a pow'rful fist is made for use?' I suppose Dan would have held himself very much above Quarry, in Stone Pastures, but I think he was a great deal worse, kicking his enemy's horse and terrifying his little sister. Quarry never pretended to be anything but a rascal."

"Dan isn't a very interesting villain," said the man of letters. "He is the kind that is inevitably punished in the end. You feel it from the first second. Now, Quarry might have lived to a peaceful and drunken old age, if they hadn't happened to shoot him."

"Yes, I didn't feel easy till he was really dead," she agreed.

"There are plenty of dark and evil deeds in this book of Frederick Moncreiff's, The X Jewel," said the man of letters, "though there isn't any specific villain."

"Everybody is one, except the hero," said his wife.

"Well, he is a good deal of a duffer," added the other. "He just floats around doing anything anybody tells him to, provided it is dangerous enough. I don't believe he knew half the time what was the purpose of his actions. I'm sure I couldn't find out."

"Nor their results, either. Historical novels are so apt to be confused," she said, "and this one is worse than most. I do hate maneuvers that no one could possibly understand without a chart. I think the author must have had a great deal in his mind that he forgot to put in his story."

"Most of the point of it, in fact," he added. "How is this new one of Rebecca Harding Davis's?"

"Dr. Warrick's Daughters?" she said, slowly. "It isn't a significant book?"

"Insignificant, then?"

"Yes, rather. It isn't effective. Milly is natural, with her struggles between marrying for love or for money, and her little fits of contempt for herself."

"Which wins?" he asked.

"Oh, money, of course. Her love for John was merely a little flash of sentimentality, without much of the spiritual in it, and never would have lived to grow up if she had married him. Marrying the other man idealized it."

"And did you like the book? Did it interest you?" he asked, turning over its leaves.

"Why, rather, in a quiet, Sunday-afternoon-in-my-wrapper sort of a way," she answered. "Yet not one of the characters has an attractive personality. Anne begins fairly well—vivid, impressionable—but she rather drops out of the story, and you leave her at the end explaining her model dairy and lecturing on different grades of milk. She makes Brooke a fine wife, of course, but the commonplace atmosphere she cried out against in the beginning is around her on every side. Anyway, I never liked her after she went to a dance in a high-necked black silk dress with a linen collar and cuffs—I don't care if her party dress had been left behind."

"Vanity, vanity!" said the man of letters.

J. W. T.

THE MAGAZINES.

The firm of Stone & Kimball, which has had such a remarkable success in the publication of belles-lettres, has divided itself to the extent that Mr. H. Ingals Kimball is to represent the institution in New York, while Mr. Stone, who edits the Chap Book, is to remain in Chicago, spending, however, three months of every year in London. Stone & Kimball have connections with the New Review, and are privileged to obtain stories from all of W. E. Henley's young men.

The Harpers have decided to send Richard Harding Davis to Russia for the Czar's coronation. Thence he goes to Athens to witness the revived Olympic games. However objectionable Mr. Davis may be in the role of the great novelist, he cannot be denied a happy descriptive faculty. He is light, interesting, and graphic, and can give a swing to an event even better than any of the journalists. His description of the Yale and Princeton football game, which the Journal published, is as good a piece of work of its kind as there is in football literature.

The English circulation of The Century Magazine has been increased from 8000 to 16,000 copies under Macmillan & Co.'s management, with the help of Mrs. Ward's new story. Fisher Unwin's Cosmopolis has been a successful venture from the outset; the second number, is strong and interesting.

What is literary fame after all? The Chap Book is authority for this melancholy story of mistaken identity: "Miss Ellen Terry and Mr. Richard Harding Davis recently met at a reception. Miss Terry wanted to be nice, and remarked pleasantly: 'I have read several of your books, Mr. Davis; in fact, nearly all, I think—except the last one, the one that has been most talked about, you know—Jimmie Fadden, isn't it?'"

The Chicago firm of Stone & Kimball has made a reputation by the publication of poetry of the minor order in admirable typographical style, and is also responsible for the Chap Book. Editor Stone of that periodical tells of the visit of a gentleman who is a familiar figure in the offices of all London publicators. Seated in the editorial rooms one afternoon, and wishing to speak of a private matter, he looked doubtfully at the janitor's assistants who were engaged cleansing the windows, and asked: "Shall I go on freely? These men, are they—are they poets?"

BOOK TALK.

The discovery of Stephen Crane is an honor shared by W. D. Howells and Hamlin Garland. At the age of twenty-one he wrote a little book—Maggie, a Girl of the Streets—signed it Johnstone Smith and published it at his own expense. Though but a few copies were printed, Hamlin Garland obtained one and prophesied for its author a future. Indeed, he called public attention to the book in the Arena. Maggie is a Bowery girl who uses "langwudge" not intended for ears polite, but she does not resemble Chimmie Fadden, thank heaven. The book is to be re-published by the Appletons, having been revised in the meantime. It is to appear simultaneously with The Third Violet, a story of Bohemian life in New York—not the Bohemia of luxurious studios but of art life in the Student Quarter. Crane is at work on a new war story, With the Regiment, which is promised to McClure's Magazine. In the meantime, the young author is living with his brother at Hartwood, in Sullivan County. He spends much of his time out of doors but writes as little as possible. The story he contributes to the New Review called "Horses," has not found as many admirers as his Red Badge.

The second marriage of Amelie Rives is the text of a lengthy article in the New York World, in which there is attempted a demonstration that The Quick and the Dead and Barbara Deering are autobiographical. The first is supposed to represent the courtship of John Armstrong Chanler, who is the Jack of the novel, while the latter traces the consequences of the union. Mr. Chanler, it seems, was able to appreciate the physical charm of his bride, but could not sympathize with her mind. He longed for a tigress, and Amelie, it seems, was only the tigress of his desires in certain of her moods. Prince Pierre Troubetzkoy unites the dual role, for he is two inches over six feet in height, with a superb sweep of shoulders and chest. But he is also gentle; his face is frank and courteous; he paints portraits, composes music, and is altogether a charming fellow. The twain met at the Troubetzkoy villa on Lake Maggiore, where Mrs. Chanler was visiting Prince Pierre's mother, an American. The happy man speaks English as his native language.

The picture craze is invading the London dailies. One paper had two large pictures illustrating Jameson's raid in the Transvaal, another has illustrated Dr. Nansen's Arctic explorations. A series of Parliamentary sketches in a third, have caricatures by Harry Furniss. These pictures are all by celebrated artists, and certainly mark a new epoch in English journalism.

An interesting addition to the Stevenson literature is promised by the Scribners. It seems that Lloyd Osbourne and Mrs. Strong kept notes of the author's conversations at Vailima, and whenever he said a memorable thing, they jotted it down. These extracts have made a charming book, Vailima Table Talk, which is to appear very shortly.

George Moore has a new novel under way, treating the sex problem from his own somewhat inartistic point of view. There is no denying the great power of the author of Esther Waters. What a pity it is he cannot be taught how to write.

The latest story about Kipling proves that his verbal command is not obtained without effort. It is alleged he lies hours and hours in front of the fire, with an open dictionary, studying adjectives. Then it is his practise to take a sentence just written and rewrite it over and over, employing each time a different adjective until finally he discovers that which best expresses his meaning. Kipling is especially careful in the choice of titles, and holds that a name should be suggestive of the tale. Among the selection he has carefully put away for further use, is "At the End of the Vigor of Man."

Mr. Stephen Crane's Red Badge of Courage is already in its fourth edition in this country, which indicates no lack of American appreciation of strong American work.

Mr. Crockett's new novel, Cleg Kelly, Arab of the City: His Progress and Adventures, is said to open new ground, and to be the most effective of his books in incident and humor. It is to be published immediately by D. Appleton & Co., with several illustrations.

Mr. Howells is said to be dramatizing, with the help of Mr. Paul Kester, one of his best and best-known novels, The Rise of Silas Lapham, which Mr. William Crane will probably produce.

Nietzsche, the German philosopher, who so sagely remarked, "One cannot get the people to shout hosannah unless one rides into the city on an ass," is to have his works Englished, and the Macmillans promise the volumes early this year. He is safe to be misunderstood and misrepresented, even as Ibsen was. The Paragraph translates several of his aphorisms as follows:

Not infrequently one meets with copies of great men; and, as with paintings so also here, most people like the copies better than the original.

We do not place a special value on the possession of a virtue until we have noticed its total absence in our opponent.

We are promised, by Roberts Bros., Robert Buchanan's new novel called Effie Hetherington.

Robert H. Sherard says of Paul Verlaine that he was much piqued at Max Nordau's personalities. He tells a story of seeing Verlaine spend two hours at the "François Premier" Café with a foreign poet who was a great and brilliant talker. Afterwards, he asked Verlaine what they had spoken of; he replied, "I don't know what he was talking about, but he smoked all the while, and, though I was without tobacco, he didn't offer me a bit."

The new Chap Book has a really good story by W. J. Locke, entitled, "A Fool's Honor." The leading article is a description by Miss Evelyn Nordhoff of "The Dove's Bindery," where Mr. Cobden Sanderson, the most eminent of English bookbinders, does his work. There is also a poem by Stephen Crane.

An interesting letter written to a lady by the late Alexander Dumas, has just come to light, in which he announces positively that women should enjoy absolutely the same privileges as men. The "new woman" will be pleased to learn that the author of La Dame Aux Camélias considers woman superior to man.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

"Successors to the Title," by Mrs. L. B. Walford. D. Appleton & Co., publishers, New York. For sale by Wm. Doxey.

"Kitty's Conquest," by Captain Chas. King. J. B. Lippincott Company, publishers.

"Stone Pastures," by Eleanor Stuart. D. Appleton & Co., New York. For sale by Wm. Doxey.

"The Parson's Proxy," by Kate W. Hamilton. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., New York.

"Dr. Warrick's Daughters" by Rebecca Harding Davis. Harper & Brothers, New York, publishers.

"The X Jewel," by Frederick Moncreiff. Harper & Brothers, New York, publishers.

MARSICK.

A second or a third hearing of M. Marsick but confirms the assertion that he is not one of the world's great violinists, despite his many artistic traits and his excellent musicianship. His playing is marked by a refinement verging on effeminacy, which accounts, in a measure, for the rather disappointing impression made.

In a certain sense, M. Marsick's art is one-sided; for he seems to think more of violin effect than of the spirit of the composition. He has a decided partiality for the works of that greatest of all violinist-composers, Vieuxtemps, which tend to display his best points, including a remarkable staccato bow. The "Kreutzer Sonata" (Beethoven) is not very interesting in his hands, except the violin variation of the second movement, which he bows beautifully. The most satisfactory playing M. Marsick did while in San Francisco was Sarasate's "Ziguenerweisen," the 'Czardas of Hubay," and two of his own compositions. His "Scherzando" is a decidedly good composition. It is well made, and the themes are by no means commonplace. The Parisian violinist may not have done himself full justice at any of these concerts, for he was certainly more or less hampered by both the piano and the orchestral accompaniments. As has often been stated, Marsick has a good technic; but Sauret, who is to play in this city in the near future, will demonstrate far more forcibly what violin technic really is. Indeed, it is doubtful if any violinist now before the public, excepting Caésar Thomson, possesses greater technic than Sauret. P. C. A.

WEDDING

Invitations always correct when engraved by

DODGE'S
New Store

Our new store—our only one—is at 112 Post St.,

THE THEATERS.

Three cheers for the "Milk White Flag," for it is dedicated to fun—clean, refreshing fun—and though undeniably a farce, its lack of sanity—which it shares in common with other farces—is always amusing and never insulting. Possibly this is because it is so liberally streaked with comedy and vaudeville. Whatever the cause, the audience Monday night was in the best possible humor throughout the entire evening, and it is plain to be seen that the Baldwin will have full houses so long as it holds these battle-scarred veterans and their pretty vivandieres. Coming as they did after gloomy Shakespearian plays and some things too bad to mention, these jolly comedians in their setting of seductive women are doubly welcome. One wonders at the collection of attractive girls; there are several who absolutely stand opera-glasses and close scrutiny, that is, if one likes pretty dolls; even if one doesn't it is pleasant to look at such shapely figures and dainty costumes, and one of the vivandieres has a throat so soft, smooth, and young that it suggests cream and snow and doves. One expects her to say "coo," but she doesn't. Her little lips never part except to smile, and she exists like the other vivandieres, to strut about with a fetching little swagger and wear the prettiest combination of red, white, and blue imaginable to even the most patriotic citizen. The letter on her cap, I think, is D, but it may be B; anyway, B and D are the prettiest of the vivandieres, and wear their dark hair tucked neatly back under dear little black bows, and infuse into their swagger a certain daintiness which the others lack.

Clarissa Agnew, the star, I suppose, of the female part of the troupe, is a pretty, blonde, little woman, who looks irresistibly fresh in her white muslin baby gown and bonnet. She walks in her baby slippers in the enchantingly springy, melodious fashion which is possible only to the wearer of shoes with no heels or very low ones. The flowing motion of her pink tights and her delightfully elastic step ought to teach the deluded wearers of high heels a lesson. But it won't. When the slippers with five-inch high heels, to be found now in New York shops, appear here every woman in town will want a pair. Aside from the flexibility and smoothness of motion, I can't say that the little woman gave me much pleasure, though there was an occasional note in her baby-song-and-dance act which tickled me.

The brunt of the play was very properly borne by the men, who were all very good; George A. Beane, as the "Dear Departed" (the sham corpse), being funnier than even Hoyt could have imagined. Some of the situations are irresistible. When the private, for an instance, rushes in and says, "The funeral procession is licking the band," every soul in the house shouted, and continued to shout all through General Hurley Burley's active demonstration of the difference between an officer of the regular army and those of the militia. How the brick-bats did fly, and who but Hoyt would have thought of such a ludicrous, yet forcible, illustration of the idea. From beginning to end there are puns a plenty, and they are laughable, but when the wife of the deceased haggles with the undertaker over his charge, and says: "The dear departed only weighed 153 pounds, and I think a dollar a pound is enough," we did not laugh very hard over the undertaker's "Madame, we don't bury people by the pound," for it was too gruesome.

We stood the price of a corpse (fifty dollars) being considered "dead cheap" by one man and "a stiff price" by another; but the application of butchers' methods to undertakers' charges was too much. The "Dear Departed," though, was amusing, even if his wife wasn't. When, after shamming death, he comes out with his face pinched by cold and every sign of violent influenza, and plaintively asks his accomplice, the undertaker: "Why did you let them put me on ice?" even a confirmed dyspeptic would have laughed.

"Where," he continued, "did you get that hearse-driver; he stopped at eight saloons on the way home, and I was on ice! Once he left me on a railroad track and the train in sight! Oh!"

Throughout, fun is poked at the militia, and the play takes its name from the flag which was presented the Ransome Guards "a flag which they would never desert," the milk white flag of truce. The "whistling superlative" was not superlative, but good, and the imitation of a train very clever.

The program at the Columbia this week did not deserve even one full house, but I suppose John L. Sullivan and Paddy Ryan continued to attract a small crowd toward their end of the performance even as they did Tuesday night. Their three-round exhibition of boxing was, of course, no more like a prize-fight than was the embrionic chicken fight in the first act of the wearisome "Wicklow Postman," which formed the piece de resistance of the program. This so-called "comedy drama" is more like a quarrel between a cook and a garbage man enlivened by the wit and humor of a dull and vulgar housemaid and a vulgar and dull policeman, than anything else, and I, for one, can say with O'Rourke "Arrah, go on, go way," etc.

It did one's heart good to see the old gray-headed fellows applauding "I dreamt I dwelt in marble halls," "The heart bowed down," and "When other lips and other eyes," last week at the Bohemian Girl at the Alcazar. The younger generation sat dignified and quiet, but wherever you saw a gray head or a bald spot, there you saw satisfaction and unveiled approval. The rest of us, I fancy, felt rather depressed and empty, though the voices are fair, Rena Atkinson pretty, and Sara Carr and Ricketts possessed of considerable histrionic ability. It struck me, though, that the Gypsy hero ought not to have worn a "boiled shirt," but maybe I'm wrong.

The Tivoli has not done well this week, for though "The Hoolah" is well staged and the costumes are bright and pretty, the opera is thin, oh! so thin, and Ferris Hartman is forced to be funny over absolutely nothing at all. Altogether, excepting the "Milk White Flag," the theaters have been poor. But cheer up, oh, ye theater-goers—next month, the eighteenth, I believe, brings us the charming Ada Rehan and her company for three weeks. They will give "The Taming of the Shrew," "Twelfth Night," "The School for Scandal," "The Belle's Stratagem," "The Honeymoon," "The Last Word," and "The Countess Gucke." They say that Miss Rehan is especially delightful as Countess Gucke, that she has given new proof of her cleverness in comedy. The New York Tribune says: "The warmth and light of the character, the mellow richness of it, the buoyant manner, the incessant animation and sparkle, the variety and piquancy, the cordial generosity of spirit, and at times the deep tenderness, revealed through rippling glee—are things possible only to an exceptional woman and to a comedy actress of the first order. Enthusiasm as to acting has usually been prone to stray from home, and especially to seek its idols among those who speak foreign tongues—but very much the best acting that has been done upon the American stage this season has been done by our own players, and especially, among women of the stage, by Ada Rehan and Ellen Terry. The boring for tears that goes on in various quarters is an industry that requires very little talent. 'Emotional' players have always been numerous. They come by the string—like onions; and they are equiped to produce the same watery effect. The actress of comedy is extremely rare, and the observer of Ada Rehan's acting will have to let his memory run back many years before he will recall any actress so powerful, so brilliant, so sumptuous, and so completely satisfying in this art."

All of which is very true though powdered too profusely with adjectives.

The Eastern papers have had a good deal to say lately about Marie Studholme's proportions. She is an English beauty playing in "An Artist's Model," and though not the model in the play, has often been one in real life. Hers must be the beauty of length of line, for she is five feet five inches tall and weighs but 120 pounds, her bust measure is 36 inches, her waist 20 inches, and her hips 38 inches, which seems to me rather unsymmetrical. What do you think about it, O fair and fat San Franciscans?

PEG WOFFINGTON.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

"The Wicklow Postman," at the Columbia, has been a good comedy drama, played to fairly good houses. Of course, many were attracted to the theater by the announcement that John L. Sullivan and Ryan would spar three friendly rounds after the play, all of which was carried through in friendly spirit and made a very amusing farcical boxing match. Next week Hoyt's "A Texas Steer" will be presented at this theater.

Hoyt's farce, "A Milk White Flag," has seemed to go with decided spirit at the Baldwin this week, and, from beginning to end, seemed to create a laugh. Some of the men are clever, and most of the women pretty. There were some good songs and skilful dancing, and a good evening's entertainment.

The Tivoli Company has been busy with "The Hoolah" all the week, and have entered into their work with considerable spirit. Much new material, in the way of songs and dances, was introduced, and Hartman had the title role, which means that it was thoroughly well handled. Next opera, "Maritana."

The Orpheum bill has been an excellent one, including the Athos Family, who did a a capital bit of acrobatic work; Rachel Walker, the creole singer, who sang a few new songs, and a very good vaudeville company to fill out the program in other directions.

The "Silver King," at Morosco's, a well-known standard melodrama, has been very well presented by the stock company and Darrell Vinton, who was specially engaged to play Wilfred Denver, which he did in a forceful and effective manner. There was some very deep-dyed villainy in the play, which found an able exponent in Fred Butler. The part of the faithful Jaikes was taken by Frank Hatch and was a very excellent bit of character acting. Miss Tittell made a very sweet Nellie Denver, and Julia Blanc made a good thing of her part as the "Spider's" wife. The piece was beautifully staged. Next week, "Hoop of Gold."

Miss Anna Eva Fay comes back to the Auditorium for an engagement of seven nights, commencing next Monday. This return visit was arranged owing to the very successful results, both financially and artistically, of last week. There is much talk regarding Miss Fay's wonderful tricks and mind reading. It seems an usher circulates through the audience with slips of paper on which people are invited to write their names and questions. These they keep possession of. Then the medium, blindfolded and covered with a linen sheet, announces the name and sense of each message, even though they be hidden in the pockets, and answers them to the best of her ability. It is certainly a remarkably clever trick and is admirably performed.

The Ondricek-Materna combination on Thursday evening, opened to a full house at the Auditorium, and was warmly received. They will give another concert this afternoon at 2 P. M., and their farewell performance to-morrow night, the fifteenth.

Edwin Milton Royle returns to San Francisco for a two weeks' engagement at the California on the sixteenth. On this occasion Mr. Royle will present his latest production, entitled, "Captain Impudence, or A Modern Petrucchio." The play has special scenery brought here showing the courtyard of the Mission Dolores near Saltillo, and also the fortifications at Chapultepec, with a view of the City of Mexico in the distance.

By a contract recently made, Sarah Bernhardt is to receive $8,000 annually, for five years. This contract runs through summer and winter, the actress pocketing her $1500 every Saturday night. Calvé gets $1200 for each of her performances, but, then, her contract lasts only five months, during which time she sings, perhaps, three times a week, and then she returns to the moderate salaries of Europe. Melba receives $1500 a night in this country, but in Paris she has to be satisfied with $300 a performance.

The little Alcazar will open next week with a continuous performance modeled after those now running in New York at Proctor's and Hammerstein's. Popular prices are to prevail.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

Diamonds, Pearls, and Colored Precious Stones in great variety offered at cost on account of contemplated retirement from the retail business.

A. HIRSCHMAN,
113 Sutter Street.

Some Shoes

hurt feet. Goodyear Welts don't. Feet rest with comfort in them. All dealers sell them. All ages, both sexes, may wear them. 49

THE AUDITORIUM

Friedlander, Gottlob & Co., Lessees and Managers

Seven Nights Only
Commencing Monday, March 16th
Closing Sunday, March 22d

RETURN
Owing to the recent great success of

- ANNA EVA FAY -

The Fair Mahatma

Don't miss it this time

Coming BOB BURDETTE

BALDWIN THEATRE

To night and all next week
HOYT'S greatest success, the spectacular, military and musical satire

A MILK WHITE FLAG

50 PEOPLE 50

Columbia Theatre.

The Best of the Vaudeville Olio This Week Only
Commencing Monday, March 16th
The Eminent Vocal Character Singing Comedian
MR. TIM MURPHY
IN HOYT'S
Best Comedy A TEXAS STEER
The Laughing Success of the American Stage.
Mr. Murphy and a superior Vaudeville the original excellent company of twenty people who have appeared in their respective parts more than 1,600 times.
March 23d—Henderson's SINBAD

CALIFORNIA THEATRE

Beginning Monday, March 16th
First time here of the picturesque new romantic
Capt. Impudence or Mexico
By Edwin Milton Royle, author of Friends
Management of Arthur C. Alston
Carload of special scenery, costumes, properties,

TIVOLI OPERA HOUSE

MRS. ERNESTINE KELLING, Proprietress and Manager
Last Night of "The Mascot Opera Bouffe"
THE HOOLAH
A Trip through the Midway Plaisance

Next Monday Evening
Wallace's Beautiful Ballad Opera
..MARITANA..
Cast: Emma R. L. Steele, Rose Well, Martha Pryor, Lulu Glaser, Frank Hartman, W. H. West, Marcel Perron in the cast
New Scenery, Correct Costumes
POPULAR PRICES 25 and 50 Cents

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE

Handsomest Family Theatre in The World
WALTER MOROSCO, - Sole Lessee and Manager
The Silver King
Which has caught the town

MONDAY, MARCH 16th
Mortimer Murdoch's Masterpiece
....HOOP OF GOLD

ORPHEUM

O'Farrell Street, between Stockton and Powell

Week of Monday, March 16th
Celebrities from all climes
LA SWEDE 4
BASCO & ROBERTS
The Inimitable Burlesque Comedians
FRANK LA MONDE
The Celebrated Head Balancer and Juggler
THE C RAY BROS
Grotesque Horizontal Bar Experts
THE KINSNERS
Exemplique Balancers from Europe
CHAS B WAYD WILLS & COLLINS
ALBURTUS & BARTRAM
RACHEL WALKER
and Our Great Vaudeville Company

SPLASHES.

AFTER A LONG PERIOD of happy exemption from newspaper attention, the Burlingame Club is back in the dailies. This time it is up for treatment because of some fifty or more resignations, and the suggestion is that the institution totters to a fall. We all know, however, that nothing helps a good club like a fight, and that there are factions at Burlingame no one will deny. The two hundred odd membership which it enjoyed last year was artificially propagated. A number of influential men organized the institution, and they persuaded their friends into its ranks. Many of those who joined lacked sporting proclivities and never went near the club house. In due course, not especially valuing their membership, and never having paid an initiation fee, they dropped out. This accounts for a certain degree of the recession. Prior to the last annual meeting the club was in the hands of certain prominent business men, who handled it and its funds with rather more strictness than its character demanded or its members relished. They kept a tight hand on the sporting crowd, and so irritated that set that vengeance was vowed and wreaked at the next election. Prior to that event there was much canvassing and discussing, and as the By-Laws of the club permit voting by proxy, the younger men were active enough to persuade all their friends to vote the ticket which they favored, with the result that the old crowd found itself snowed under when the votes were counted. The check was a very unwelcome one, was denounced by the vanquished as a trick, and was speedily followed by the resignation of certain of the directors, who, in due course, persuaded their friends to follow.

* * *

Since then various derogatory tales have been circulated about the condition of the institution. It was alleged that it did not pay its bills, that certain favored parties were allowed to pile up debts, and that the management was careless and insufficient. The facts, according to the statement of Secretary Carolan which has just been issued, show the exact contrary. Instead, the club is in a better condition than at any time in its history. It has systematized its affairs, increased its assets some thousand dollars; its monthly balances show a profit on the right side. All this in the face of the loss in membership. Under Mr. Brewer's direction, the stable, which was the main source of loss, now meets its own cost; and the Sharon estate has modified its arrangements with the club, affording the use of the grounds and the property for $125 per month, which represents about five per cent on the amount the estate originally advanced for buildings, etc. It still retains the privilege of purchase on the same basis as before. It is true there is some floating indebtedness, but this is expected in every new club, and is due to the dilatoriness of certain members who have been a bit careless about settling their accounts. They are all wealthy young men, however, who are well able to meet such liabilities, and already a demonstration toward a general settlement has been made. In order to prevent a re-occurrence of this condition, the directors have just adopted a rule which compels the settlement of monthly bills by the twenty-fifth, and after that date the credit of those in arrears is cut off. Failure to pay before thirty days later means suspension.

* * *

THE TIME has gone by when it was good form to jeer at Burlingame and its English characteristics. The fact is, the Country Club is a boon to the State. It keeps here and furnishes with amusement a number of wealthy young men who, in its absence, would certainly betake themselves to Eastern cities or the continent for that outdoor sport which the youth of the day craves. It has established a standard of good taste in matters equine, and if that standard happens to be similar to one which exists in England, it is merely because England has discovered the most practical way of governing and arranging all outdoor pleasures. To call Burlingame English, is as preposterous as it would be to call it Italian, French, or New York, as the standard of all taste in amateur sport, especially in that which pertains to the horse, is much the same throughout the world. It is often said that patriotism and good taste demands our men to ride in Spanish fashion, but after all, to what end? The carpers and critics would declare it theatrical, and it would certainly be without utilitarian purpose. There are other country clubs, of the same character as that at Burlingame, in Cleveland, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, St. Louis, and New York. There they play polo, golf, and kindred games. The men wear riding breeches and leggings, but the mere fact of belonging to a country club does not make a man any less an American or more an Englishman. The establishment of Burlingame has really been a boon to California, for it furnishes a capital place for the entertainment of visitors, who can enjoy the sports which they are accustomed to at home. Such men as Prince Luigi of Savoy, Count Cini, and all our French and English visitors are loud in their demonstrations of approval of the club; nor is the fact to be passed over lightly that these gentlemen are liberal patrons and generous in their expenditures. Burlingame keeps money in California, furnishes fun, and with the recent horse shows has done more to give the State social prestige in Europe and the East than aught else it possesses.

* * *

WHO WAS RESPONSIBLE for the revealing of the Fortnightly Club's secrets to the press? That organization has ever prided itself on keeping out of the papers, and lays special stress on the privacy of its entertainments, yet it is evident there is a leak in its holiest of holies, and its events are blazoned to the world in a most unseemly way. The resignation of Mrs. Kauffman from the directory is certainly a loss, for she has long figured as the organizing spirit of the institution. Under the circumstances, there was nothing left to her but to withdraw, as she has reason to feel her authority was not held in proper estimation. The entertainment at the McNutt house last week was a species of vaudeville, owing to the absence of a proper program. A little comedy was given with Frank Owens and Miss Hobart in the leading roles. There were also recitations, a speech by Mr. Phelan, and some singing. The next meeting is at the Houghton's. The cabinet is secrecy itself as to its intentions. Considerable effort is being made to induce Mrs. Kauffman to withdraw her resignation, but though the relatives of the offending party have proffered apologies, the ex-Regent is thus far obdurate in her determination not to return.

* * *

There is an opposition ticket in the field at the Bohemian Club. It is a little late in making its appearance and the members are not sure whether it is to be taken au serieux. "Ned" Hamilton is at the head of it and no man ever placed himself so literally in the hands of his friends. He is letting them do all the electioneering for him, and scarcely shows himself even in the newly decorated barroom or the café where election talk and other things are brewed. It is certain, however, that a strong man has been chosen and "the opposition" could not have selected any one calculated more surely to divide votes with Dr. Chismore. The latter represents the older element in the club, and all admire his skill as versifier and speaker and his genial manner as much as they appreciate the oratory, rounded, sonorous phrases of the brainy and companionable Hamilton. The second place on the ticket headed by the newspaper man, is accorded to Louis Sloss, Jr., whose opponent on the Chismore ticket is Peter Robertson. As Larry Bunton says, "it's a hard choice, for Peter is a Scotchman and Louis such a nice little fellow." One man figures on both tickets, and bouquets may be sent to him now, for it seems to be the desire of the club that William Sproule, the railroad man, should be a director.

* * *

Not only will the change of administration in the Bohemian Club bring the return of William Greer Harrison to membership, but it will call to the front once more the sire of many jinks, and one of the finest speakers, if not the best, the Club claims, in the person of General Barnes.

* * *

The new red carpet and the cafe-au-lait tinted walls of the Bohemian Club dining-room have been duly inspected and criticised. Scarlet-lettered invitations warned the Clubmen that the doors of their newly decorated dining-room would be re-opened, and on Saturday last no less than eighty-one men sat down to the round tables. There was nothing of the formality of even the monthly Club dinner (now a more or less lapsed institution); but there was an abundance of bright, informal talk, so that Horace Platt never presided at a more jovial gathering in the whole of his two terms of office.

* * *

Though the new Bourne house is up to half a story, its aspect must not be considered indicative of the structure which promises to be one of the handsomest and most imposing on Pacific Heights. It is the first real basement house we have, and is to be finished in clinker brick and brownstone similar to that of which Melrose Abbey is built. The style cannot be called colonial, Renaissance, or Gothic, but it is composite and individual, and emphasizes Willis Polk's originality as a designer. I believe the house, with its gables, is to be some sixty-three feet in height. The salon, or drawing-room, should make a magnificent apartment, for it is to stretch the entire width of the front, and will be lavishly furnished.

* * *

The new Dimond house is completed and the decorators are putting the finishing touches to the halls. It is a very beautiful interior. The drawing-room is in old colonial style, with arches at each end and a big open fireplace between. The reception-room is finished in ivory enameled woodwork and green brocaded silk. The hall is paneled in redwood; but the most striking apartment is the dining-room, done in oak stained a dark green. The ceiling is composed of heavy beams, the walls are paneled to the dado, and the general effect is medieval. Indeed, the apartment suggests the state dining-room of an old French chateau.

* * *

I was in the Grill Room at noon yesterday and counted a score of men who in other days never thought of lunching out of their clubs. The Pacific-Union seems to be the main sufferer, though the Bohemian was well represented, and there was a sprinkling of 'Varsity men also. Indeed, the attendance at the noon meal in the clubs has been seriously minimized by the Grill Room, which has the advantage of proximity to business and of rapid service.

* * *

The next Fiesta, I suppose, will be much after the fashion of the last for it has been bravely advertised. I have here a heavy paper invitation from Her Majesty, The Queen, which announces the date of the celebration to be April 21st to 25th, and it is presumed notable things will happen. There should be some fun over the choice of the presiding divinity, and possibly an entertaining development of minor jealousies.

* * *

The artistic set was well represented at the exhibition of Elizabeth Curtis-O'Sullivan's pictures, at the Art Students' League, Saturday afternoon. She showed quite a number of canvases, pastels, and sketches, all of which had that certain style inseparable from her work. In the pastels her ability is at its best. They have the quality of sketchiness, and are decidedly clever and suggestive. Of the portraits, that of Mr. Curtis is quite the best. The painting of the head and face is capital—being careful and finished, which is rather more than I would care to say of the other portraits. This artist has adopted a peculiar manner of washing in her heads, which, though dexterous, has rather a careless effect. Of the other pictures, I especially admired the Holland sketches, which are really charming. Mrs. O'Sullivan will return to London, where her husband is winning great kudos in the musical world.

* * *

Baby parties are the latest social diversion. Mrs. S. B. Johnson had one up at the Colonial the other day, and there was an admirable assemblage of infants under and over three months to gladden the occasion by their presence. The decorations were appropriate consisting of almond blossoms and roses arranged in wicker cradles, and, of course, there was a silver spoon for each of the newly arrived youngsters. I am inclined to think, however, that the babies were an adjunct rather than the event, for the young mothers had a thoroughly good time to themselves, a capital lunch, and found they had a single topic in common.

* * *

THE CATHOLIC ARISTOCRACY gather round the Madames of the Sacred Heart once a week, and sew vestments and altar cloths for the missionary churches. It is a fashionable assemblage that celebrates the Lenten season in the parlors of the Convent on Ellis Street. Reverend Mother O'Mera presides; the formula followed is to serve out the work, sew at it during the afternoon, take it home and bring back the task completed at the next meeting. It is returned to Madame O'Mera, who scans each stitch and objects frankly to all "scamped" work. There is no respecting of personages in this gathering; every one is similarly treated. Combined with the sewing is intellectual diversion in the shape of reading, a lecture by some of the priests of the diocese, and sometimes a little music.

* * *

Another Catholic sewing engagement is the Franciscan Society which meets at the St. Ignatius Church under the patronage of Father Varsi and his brother Jesuits. Here a great deal of good work is accomplished, and the ladies are diverted by addresses from the Fathers.

* * *

It is proper to count all Lenten entertainments as informal. One hears of informal luncheons, teas, and musicales. However, Mrs. S. D. Fry's luncheon in honor of Miss Sherwood last Saturday hardly figures in the "informal" connection. This was quite Swain's, at 213 Sutter Street, is the only place in the city at which one can find first-class pies, cakes, and confectionery.

Chew Adams' Pepsin Tutti-Frutti. It is sovereign for Indigestion and agreeable to the taste.

Dainty and Refreshing
PAR EXCELLENCE
"THE UNIVERSAL PERFUME"
For the Handkerchief, the Dressing-table and the Bath.
Murray & Lanman's
FLORIDA WATER
Its fragrant, lasting sweetness exerts a subtile charm and never tires or cloys.
Ask your Druggist for the genuine Murray & Lanman's.

a sunny affair, with girls in spring costumes, the table decorated with wild flowers, and the delicacies of the spring season on the menu. An informal musicale was given by Mrs. Judge Meyrick on Friday.

* * *

The young Lazards continue on their trip around the world in the "China" on the 14th, and on the same steamer Harry Bowie, who is building a Spanish villa at El Cerrito, goes to Japan for a brief sojourn.

* * *

The engagement of Harry Babcock and Mrs. Favre can hardly be called a surprise, though the announcement was somewhat unexpected. Mrs. Favre is a very charming woman who, though she has lived in San Francisco in recent years, is not a Californian. She comes from New York, and her sister is Mrs. Lawrence Poole, whose name is familiar to readers of Gotham society notes. Mr. Babcock is a man of character as well as social standing. He is an active sportsman, a capital shot, an enthusiastic angler, and is at the head of one of the largest and strongest family connections in California. His father, the late William Babcock, was a partner in the banking business of the late John Parrott.

* * *

Frank Belcher, who in the olden days was one of the most popular of Olympic Clubmen, and who went into the world on the strength of a very deep toned base voice, is to have a concert in the Native Sons' Hall on the night of March 19th. He has been with Hallen and Hart for some nineteen months past, and has recently spent some time in New York, where he has studied under Madame Sarah De Lande, the noted teacher. He had been recommended to go to Paris to study for Grand Opera, and if this idea receives the sanction of his most circumspect friends, he will probably be found on the other side ere long. At his concert Mr. Belcher is to give the two latest songs, "Honey, Does Yo' Love You' Ma'am?" and "A Nigger With a White Spot on His Face," which are said to be bigger successes than "The New Bully" and "I Want You, Ma' Honey."

* * *

There was a gay gathering at the Schwabachers' Saturday night, the entertainment being directed at celebrating the engagement of Miss Jennie Schwabacher and Mr. Rosenbaum. A feature of the mansion is the great hall, which is admirable for entertaining in. In this a stage had been built and a vaudeville performance was given under the direction of Phil Hastings. A very fashionable audience attended and rapturously applauded the specialties. The Diata Brothers from the Orpheum did an act; R. Mitchell rendered his newest negro tales with much effect; Jimmie Swinnerton perpetrated caricatures of the various guests; and Phil Hastings, dressed as Paderewski, rendered familiar melodies with illimitable gestures. There was a splendid supper, and afterwards a dance.

* * *

Mrs. Roos sustained her reputation as a hostess by the very elaborate luncheon which she gave in honor of Mrs. Max Oppenheim of New York, Miss Schwabacher, and Miss Ruby Lowenberg, whose engagement has recently been announced. The tables were spread in the great basement dining-room, which was beautifully decorated with eschscholtzias and all manner of ferns and palms, and the tables were charmingly adorned with lavender and wild oats. Covers were laid for fifty. The menu was really admirable, for the Rooses have one of the very best chefs in town. There was music, of course, and all other accessories.

* * *

The first of the March weddings was that of Miss Stella Greenebaum and Alfred Simon, which was celebrated at the home of the bride, 1914 Pacific Avenue. The family connection is a very large one, comprising Slosses, Gerstles, and numerous families of Greenebaums, and it was well represented at the affair. The identity of the contracting parties is mainly the circumstance that distinguishes one wedding from another, so there is really not a great deal to be said save recording the event, except, indeed, that there were charming decorations and much magnificence in the matter of costumes. Doctor Voorsanger performed the ceremony in a bay-window decorated with apple and peach blossoms. Miss Annie Simon was the maid of honor, and Miss Greenebaum was accompanied by her brother. They are to reside at the Palace Hotel.

* * *

The greatest interest is manifested in the Bal Poudre at the Verein to-night. Hairdressing will prevail all day, for the number of professional artists is limited, and it is safe to believe that powdered coiffures will be a feature of many households from morn until late at night. One can easily imagine that the general effect will be very beautiful, for I am told of strenuous efforts in the direction of costumes. Miss Sadie Hecht has a dinner of twenty-five preceding the ball, and the party go from the Hecht mansion on Washington Street to the club house en grand tenue.

* * *

The engagement of Baron D'Euchtritz, Chamberlain of the German Emperor, and the Cleveland heiress, has been denied by her father, though the parties most concerned stoutly affirm its continuance. Of this designing nobleman rather a funny tale of his matrimonial chase is told in Vanity. It seems when he first came to America he announced the intention of discovering a lady worthy the honor of rehabilitating the fortunes of the Euchtritz family, as it devolved upon both himself and his elder brother to obtain coin in matrimony. He scouted New York and Newport, and then came afield to San Francisco, but all in vain, and returned to Berlin intending to suspend hostilities until the brother had captured some golden prize. Imagine his disgust to discover the hope of the family married to a poor little American music teacher, who had gone to Berlin to study and live economically. I am told the Baron is known among his American friends as "Dutch Treats."

* * *

THE CHARACTERISTICS of the Jackson-street set make for serenity. Lent, for them, means simply an extension of leisure. For instance, lunch parties are rather in abeyance during the holy season; and being good, rather than pious, they don't take generously to church. Among the several sets which compose Oakland Society, the Jackson-street clique is noticeably exclusive. Its men, it is true, dance with the girls of other streets, but the men of other sets do not seem to intrude themselves on the Jackson-street girls. It is a privilege to which they are either not admitted or have not the courage to seek. Indeed, these young women keep very much to themselves. They dine and lunch each other sedulously, but their parties are noticeable for sumptuousness, rather than for interest. There is more menu than movement, and the costumes are better than the conversation. Last year the wheel was in vogue among the Jackson-street maidens. For several months they cycled steadily. Some went on expeditions to Haywards; the more daring went down to San Jose. But this year one hears little or nothing of bicycling. The latest diversion of Jackson Street is physical culture. I don't think there is any ambition among its members to develop into Amazons, but, in a mild way, the fascination of exercise is on them, and once a week they are put through their paces by a muscular instructress. Being highly informal, these lessons are not dignified by costumes, and the exercises prescribed are rather Delsartean than violent.

* * *

The Chafing Dish Club is under way now. It is composed of the Jackson-street set together with certain maidens from East Oakland. The girls gather every Saturday night at some one's mansion, and each member is required to execute some plat or other, which they do with varying success. The chafing dish is nowadays a feature of civilization, and a very useful adjunct to life in Oakland, for the restaurants there are more numerous than pardonable, and the partaking of iced soda is still a popular afternoon diversion.

* * *

Lent is being observed with more or less formality in Berkeley. From that region of enlightenment there comes but little to record in the society way, save a dinner given by Mrs. Spears for her son on Wednesday last—a birthday dinner, I think it was. There were blue and gold decorations, violets and buttercups, the usual array of students, and the same bevy of popular girls who may be found at all Berkeley festivities.

* * *

Lent is having a fine run in Oakland these latter weeks. Every one is sedulously engaged in doing nothing, and success crowns all their efforts. It is extraordinary that no enterprising woman has organized either lectures or classes. Even the sewing-circle, that popular panacea for unnecessary leisure, has but little vogue. Mrs. Charles Webb Howard, who is ordinarily a motive power of several intellectual diversions, is so deeply interested in educational projects that she has no time left for society. And Miss Maud's energies are projected in the same direction. Mrs. Howard is giving her mind to the cause of manual training, and is deeply interested in the effort to capture the Wilmerding school for the local Athens. I believe Mr. Shafter Howard's marriage to Miss Mollie Hunter is to be celebrated in the early spring.

* * *

The Unitarian Church is the scene of Mr. Reaser's art lectures. As I stated last week, he is arranging for a tour to Holland, and among those who will accompany him are a number of Oakland girls who have artistic aspirations. The Unitarain Church was also the locale of Mr. Frank Belcher's song recital, which was quite well attended. Mr. Belcher has just returned from a tour with Hallen and Hart, and he proceeds in the immediate future to Paris, where he is to study for grand opera. New York experts have pronounced favorably upon his voice, which is a very deep bass, and predict for him a brilliant future.

* * *

Mr. and Mrs. Requa and Miss Requa return from New York next week. Their enjoyment was interfered with by the serious illness of Mr. Requa, though Miss Requa was quite generously entertained, and succeeded in deriving considerable enjoyment from the experience.

* * *

An interesting engagement is that of Miss Maisie Blow and Leo Wild. This is a love affair of some standing, of which announcement has just been made. Miss Blow is a daughter of the late Walter Blow, and a niece of ex-Mayor Glascock, and Mr. Wild is a son of the composer of "A War Time Wedding," the opera which "The Bostonians" produced here recently. He is engaged in the Oakland Savings Bank. Miss Blow is an accomplished musician, and plays the piano very well, and Mr. Wild is also given to music, and sings in the choir of the Episcopal Church. So it may be presumed that this is matrimony founded upon music.

* * *

Miss Lou Bromwell and Mr. Shelby Martin were married at the Bromwell residence, Wednesday last. The bride really looked charming in her wedding garments. Miss Bromwell is a very pretty girl, and, moreover, is really nice, and very popular in the best way. Mr. Martin is teller in the Union Savings Bank, of which his father is president.

* * *

The only social event with pretensions to be elaborate that presents itself for record, is the tea which Miss Lucy Hayes gave in honor of Miss Blanche Cassel. This was quite a gathering. Mrs. Hayes, who is quite a clever and well-informed lady, has returned recently from Europe with many of the spoils of travel. She is an enthusiastic hostess, and was prettily gowned in yellow mull and white lace. Miss May, her sister, and Mrs. Henshaw, assisted her to receive the guests. The entertainment consisted of a new game which is played by means of cards, on which floral conundrums are propounded. This is supposed to need much suggestive talent, and is rather good fun. Progressive euchre followed. Miss Hilda Cassel recited; and there were music and refreshments, of course.

* * *

There was a very jolly evening at the Walls's Sunday night, the leading diversion, of course, being music. Mr. Dyer was heard to advantage in several Schumann songs. Mr. Bank Summers and Mr. Peterson sang, and Miss Bessie Wall played selections by the new composer, Rudolph. Miss Grace Barstow and Miss Wall rendered a sonata by Grieg in capital style. Miss Barstow is the step-daughter of ex-Judge Rhodes, and is one of the most accomplished violinists in San Francisco, a pupil of Joachim, and possessed of a technic which is far ahead of that of most professional artists.

* * *

There is quite an exodus to Europe this season. Miss Julia Heynemann accompanies Mrs. Curtis O'Sullivan to London, where they propose to open a studio. Miss Jessie Peixotto, a very clever and a very pretty girl, after her post-graduate course at the University of California in economical science, goes to Europe to finish her studies. She intends spending some time in Lyons. Miss Evelyn Shepard, daughter of the well-known Oakland capitalist, has gone East for a vacation, accompanied by her sister. Mr. and Mrs. Morris Casey, Miss Dillon, and Miss Cosgrave leave for Europe at the end of the month, to be absent at least two years.

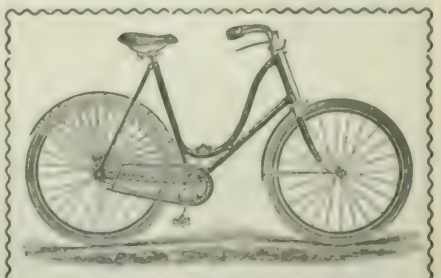
* * *

An engagement of much interest to Oakland people is that of young Mr. Selby and Miss Glen of the Glen ranch, Colusa. They are to be married very soon after Easter.

THE GOSSIP.

The oldest shipping house at Port St. Mary's, Spain, is the well-known one of Duff, Gordon & Co., shippers of the Duff, Gordon & Co. sherries.

Deutz & Geldermann's "Gold Lack" is, without doubt, the finest dry champagne imported. No connoisseur should fail to try it.



THE LADY STERLING—'96 MODEL

Girls

drop us a postal card and we will send you, free, the handsomest catalogue this season. The STERLING is the "Swellest" Wheel made and costs just $100. When you see our catalogue you will surely

Ride Sterlings

Sterling Cycle Works

WM. V. BRYAN, Manager

314 Post Street, S. F.

Adams's Tutti-Frutti Chewing Gum for Indigestion.

Dr. C. W. Docker, Dentist, 806 Market St.

Kelly's Corn Cure never fails. 25 cents. 102 Eddy Street.

RIPPLES.

UNCLE ISAAC.

"Vell, I'll advance yo' den tollars on th' vatch. Vat? It cost yo' er hundred? I bed yo' if dot vas dose cases, yo' von it in er vatch glub. Vat? Vell, I vonder! Vell, if yo' doesn't vant dot den, I doesn't vant dot vatch. Vat? Yo' t'inks yo' ought to have twoventy for it. Vat? Holy Abraham! Vy doesn't yo' t'inks yo' ought to get er hundred? It doesn't costs yo' any mores, and yo' stands yust as a better chances for gettin' it for vich. Don't talks, mine frient; dis vas not an orphan asylums for dose charities. Vat? Yah! All dright, take it to Einstein, and see vat he gifs yo'. I pet yo'r lifes he gifs yo' no more as two dollars and er helaver, and vill charge yo' dirty dree and er dird ber cent ber month. Vy, dot mans vas a regular hair cutters, he vas so stingy. Vy, dot mans vas such er son-of-er-sea-cooks dot he charges yo' twoventy ber cents for der brivileges o' breathin' in dot stores o' his for vich. Vell, I vonder! Vat, vat, vat vas dose? Er-her, yah! Yo' pets yo'r lifetimes. All dright, ve vill make it twoelve and er quarvarter, but I charges yo' den ber cend ber veek. Vat? Vell, I vonder! Goot by. Gall again ven yo' vas in vant of moneys. Yo' pets yo'r lifetimes yo' vill find yo'r Uncle Isaac always villin' to helb dose vorthy ven dey have dose good securities. Vat? Vell, I vonder!

"Yah, I have blenty of dose foolishness fellers like dot feller gome here for pusiness. Oh, yah, somedimes dey comes pack and somedimes dey doesn't comes packs. Oh, dese Christian ploods know so liddle aboudt pusinesses! Vat? Vell, I vonder!

"Vat? Yo' pets yo'r lifetimes dot vas er nice tiamont r-r-ring. Vell, I vonder! Ven I looks at dot r-r-ring it makes me smiles vid mineselves. Erboudt von year ago von of dose young fellers gomes in here and showed me dot r-r-ring. Ven he showed dot r-r-ring I said to him dot it vas a lady's r-r-ring. He said I vas mistaken; dot it vas his r-r-ring. I tolds him it vas a lady's r-r-ring, all der sametimes. Ven I said dot he got mat vid his face, and said it vas no lady's r-r-ring; dot it vas his r-r-ring, and dot no lady or voomans vould ever get dot r-r-ring. I told him if dot vas der gase, I vould advance him dirty dollars on dot r-r-ring. He tolds me dot the r-r-ring gost him von hundred and twoventy-fives. I told him dot I could not help dot; but I vould gives him dirty dollars on it if der r-r-ring only gost him den dollars. Ve had gonsiderable pusiness talks about der amount, and I bretty soons told him I vould advance him fifty dollars. Dot made him feel goot, and he told me his trouples. He vas engaged to be married, and porrowed some moneys from ernudder feller to puy dot engagements r-r-ring, and then he introduced dot feller to his girl. Dot girl vas ernudder frauds. She shook dot first feller and took up mit dot udder feller, and er few veeks afterwards dot first feller got vord to hurry cavick and pays dot moneys to dot udder feller, and dots der reasons vy he gomes to me for some moneys. Dot vas yo'r Christian vas do dot. Yo' pets lifetimes a Jew vould not do sometings like dot. Vat? Do yo' suppose a Jew vould pe so foolishness as to let dot girl return dot r-r-ring? Vell, I vonder! Dot girl vould have kept dot r-r-ring, and dot udder feller vould have got his moneys yust der same.

"Ikey, vat are you doin'? Vat? Yo' vas gold, vat? Vy doesn't yo' take your slate an' practise interest and forget yo'r troubles? Vat? Yo' vas tired, vat? Holy Abraham, vat dis risin' generations vas becomes vith demselves? Go next door to dot candy store, Ikey, and ask dot ladies to give yo' von of dose bebberment gandies; dot vill varm yo'r up goot. Vat, vell I vonder! Er-her, yah, 'um!"

THE NEW WOMAN.

First New Woman—Let's shake for th' drinks.

Second New Woman—What shall it be, razzle-dazzle or poker?

"Poker; one rattle out of th' box; no horses."

"Roll 'em out."

"You shook a straight."

"Isn't that nice (counting the spots), one two, three, four, five, six."

"Now, it's my flop."

"You shook a stiff."

"So did you."

"I did not. I shook a straight."

"Well, what's the difference?"

"I beat you, and you pay for the drinks."

"Well, I guess not. My shake was as good as yours."

"Well, let's shake it all over again."

"All right. Here goes. Ah, two twos."

"And I've shaken two ones. I've beaten you; ones are high."

"Why, no, they're not; twos are high."

"Oh, you don't know how to shake."

"If you say that again, I won't play."

"Well, let's shake it all over again."

"All right. You roll 'em out first."

"No, you roll 'em first. You want me to shake first every time."

"What's the difference? It doesn't give me any advantage over you."

"Why, yes, it does. You see what I shake and then you beat me."

"Why, how foolish you talk. I can't shake what I please."

"Well, you shake first, then."

"No, I won't."

"You're a mean thing, and I won't shake ——"

Barkeeper (interrupting)—Here, you two bloomers, shake yourselves out of here. We've had enough of your talk.

WHY NOT?

First Sack Sawdust—How do you feel?

Second Sack Sawdust—Fine.

HEAVENLY.

Mrs. Blossom—I dreampt last night I was in Heaven.

Mr. Blossom—What was it like?

Mrs. Blossom—An immense dry goods store, and I didn't have to do anything but shop. And, oh, Joe, you should have seen the bargain counter! Why, they had goods marked at ninety-eight cents that would cost a dollar here.

AS IT IS.

Wife—No, George; I can never be anything more to you than what I am: your wife.

Husband—Won't you be my friend?

WELL FIXED.

Sympathizing Friend—Didn't your husband leave a will?

Widow—Oh, yes; he left a Will, Tom, John, Bob, Mary, and myself.

THINK NOT.

"Do you believe the world is round?"

"I know it isn't square."

DIDN'T KNOW IT.

"Poor Jones is dead and he doesn't know it."

"How's that?"

"He lives in Oakland."

CURED.

"How did Blobbs stop drinking; did he take the cure?"

"No; he moved to a University town."

THAT'S RIGHT.

John L.—Say, Paddy, what can I do to elevate the stage?

Paddy R.—Keep off it.

! ! ! ? ? —— ! ? ? —— —— ! ? ? —— ! ! ! —— —— —— —— —— ——

A FREAK.

"I see Squibbs is going on exhibition in a dime museum."

"As what?"

"The only humorist who hasn't written a joke on the X rays. BRUNO.

SHEARINGS.

"Have you fastened the windows, dear?" she asked, as they were about to retire for the night.

"No; what's the use? I gave you the last dollar I had to buy that hat, and we needn't fear burglars."

"But they might sit down on my hat, you know.—Detroit Freee Press.

Bacon—Isaacs made his initial speech at the dinner, last night.

Egbert—What do you mean by his initial speech?

"Why, nearly every other word was I."—Yonker's Statesman.

She—I don't care if the men do say such hateful things about big hats at the theater. It's a woman's prerogative to attract attention, and if she can't do it one way, why, then, she must do it another way.

He—I see; on the principle of "better be damned than mentioned not at all."—Boston Transcript.

Walls—There goes Swelton and his wife.

Stalls—His wife? Is that all?

Walls—What more did you think she was?

Stall—Well, from the way that he steps around when she speaks, I thought she must be his typewriter.—New York World.

"You say you believe there's a place for everything?" said the bright girl.

"Ya-a-s," stuttered the dude.

"Well, why don't you go home?"—Yonker's Statesman.

Mrs Taddells—Let's see! Susie Dimling is about twenty years old, isn't she?

Mrs. Wiffles—Susie Dimling twenty! Susie Dimling will never see twenty again if she lives to be eighty.—Judge.

Mattie talks in her sleep. It was this that led her little brother to say to her, the other day, while she was taking her morning nap:

"Hush, Mattie, not so loud, or you'll wake yourself up."—Pittsburg Bulletin.

"So you want to marry my daughter? Well, what can you do for her?"

"I can support her comfortably, sir."

"That won't do! I'm looking for a son-in-law who can support us both comfortably."

And the young man rode off on his bike and married an orphan.—Detroit Free Press.

Buzzfuzz—That saying, "Marry in te, has repent at leisure," is all wrong.

Sizzletop—Think so?

Buzzfuzz—Certainly. After a man marries he has no leisure.—Puck.

"Look here! did you say I was a liar?" demanded the angry man.

"Calm yourself, sir. What I said was that you had mistaken your vocation. You ought to have been a diplomat."—Judge.

"Patrick, why do you join in the strike now, when you refused to go out with the men six months ago?"

"Shure, the ould woman wasn't at wurruk six months ago."—Norristown Herald.

Briggs—Miss Litehed worked hard last summer at the seaside to catch her husband, I understand.

Diggs—Yes, and she is working harder at typewriting now to keep him.—New York Herald.

Chappy—What's the latest thing in trousers?

Tailor—The bloomer-girl.—New York World.

Jack Asker—If a man threatened to kick you, what would you do?

Lay Conie—Sit down.—Philadelphia Item.

We may often learn a valuable lesson from the stubborn mule, and guard against the too protuberant use of our own ideas in opposition to other powers against which it is useless to contend. It may be wrong for giant powder to blow the top of a man's head off without cause, but repeated contests have proved that even when giant powder is in the wrong it is eventually victorious.

His Serene Highness, Prince Raoul-Joseph Wrede, the new Austro-Hungarian Minister to the United States, is a man of about fifty-three years of age, and a widower. His family is of Westphalian origin, but owes its princely title to Bavaria.

Joseph Howard says that when he first met Bill Nye, the humorist, he averaged about thirty dollars a week. Later on, his income aggregated between twenty-five thousand and forty thousand dollars a year. He had not only the faculty of making money, but the rarer gift of saving it.

Good Appetite

Is restored and the disordered Stomach and Liver invigorated by taking a small wineglassful, before meals, of the celebrated . . . . . .

Peruvian Bitters

NATIVE SONS HALL

Mason Street, between Post and Geary Streets

Thursday Evening, March 19th, 1896
at 8.30 o'clock

Grand Concert and Vaudeville Entertainment

Given by FRANK H. BELCHER

Assisted by Miss Carrie Roma, Mrs. Olive Reed, Mr. Frank Coffin, Mr. Fletcher Tilton, Mr. Dan Ward, Mr Sam Tucker, Mr. Robt. C. Mitchell, Mr. James Swinnerton, Dr. W. H. Siebelst, and Dr. Arthur T. Regensberger.

Mr. Eugene A. Beance, Stage Mgr.

Admission, 50 Cents

Tickets, including reserved seat, 75c. On sale at Sherman, Clay & Co's on and after Tuesday Morning, March 17th, 1896, at 9 a. m.

Wedding Invitations are properly engraved and in correct form, at ROBERTSON'S

DID YOU EVER try the Visiting Cards that we print from your plate for One Dollar per hundred? Others have, and they always re-order. Try and be convinced.

PIERSON BROS.
225 KEARNY ST

Storms

The Weather Bureau employs a skilled force of men, supplied with the most delicate scientific instruments, to foretell the weather. Perhaps you know when a storm is brewing without any word from the papers. Your bones ache and your muscles are sore. Your chronic muscular rheumatism gives sure warning of the approaching storm.

Scott's Emulsion of Cod-liver Oil, with Hypophosphites, would be a most valuable remedy for you. The oil, with its iodine and bromine, exerts a peculiar influence over the disease, and the hypophosphites render valuable aid.

SCOTT'S EMULSION has been endorsed by the medical profession for twenty years. (Ask your doctor.) This is because it is always palatable—always uniform—always contains the purest Norwegian Cod-liver Oil and Hypophosphites.

Put up in 50 cent and $1.00 sizes. The small size may be enough to cure your cough or help your baby.

FOR GRIPPE
IT'S A DANDY

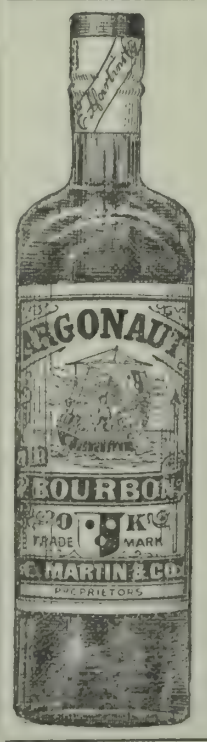
VINA BRANDY

AND

It's Pure! That's Sure!

VINA DISTILLERY CO.
819 Market St., S. F.



Argonaut OK WHISKEY

IS FIVE YEARS
IN WOOD BEFORE BOTTLING

E. MARTIN
—AND—
CO.

411 MARKET ST.
SAN FRANCISCO

GEO. GOODMAN
Patentee and Manufacturer of—Artificial Stone
Schillinger's Patent In all its branches
SIDE WALK and GARDEN WALK A Specialty
Office, 307 MONTGOMERY ST. Nevada Block, SAN FRANCISCO

Beecham's pills are for biliousness, bilious headache, dyspepsia, heartburn, torpid liver, dizziness, sick headache, bad taste in the mouth, coated tongue, loss of appetite, sallow skin, etc., when caused by constipation; and constipation is the most frequent cause of all of them.

Go by the book. Pills 10¢ and 25¢ a box. Book free at your druggist's or write B. F. Allen Co., 365 Canal Street, New York.

Annual sales more than 6,000,000 boxes.

THE WHITE FLYER IS THE MOUNT FOR '96
BARNES BICYCLES
HOOKER & CO.
16-18 Drumm St.
RETAIL STORE:
1640 Market St.
San Francisco, Cal.
THE WHITE RIMMED HUMMER IS THE COMER

A CARLOAD OF '96
PIERCE TRIED AND TRUE CYCLES
JUST RECEIVED
Many Superior Improvements. Ask to see the
Pierce Crank Hanger
Holbrook, Merrill & Stetson
Pacific Coast Agents
MARKET and BEALE STREETS
SAN FRANCISCO
Ask for Catalogue

THE FAMOUS
HUMBER
BICYCLE
····IS HERE····
It is a favorite wheel among the "ultra-fashionables" of Paris, London, New York, Boston, Philadelphia and Chicago. Why not San Francisco, too?
HUMBER QUALITY IS THE STANDARD OF EXCELLENCE THE WORLD OVER
ST. GERMAIN BILLIARD CO.
GENERAL AGENTS
55 & 57 FIRST ST, NEAR MARKET

McCUNE CYCLES
Moderate in price—
—As good as the best
ARMES & DALLAM
COAST AGENTS 230-232 Front St.

A. D. CHESHIRE, Pres. and Manager
W. O. MACDOUGALL, Secretary
CALIFORNIA UNDERTAKING CO.
Fine Funeral Furnishers
Telephone, Main 971 123 STOCKTON ST., Cor. Geary
Finest Funeral Parlors in the city
Embalming a specialty Open day and night

REMOVAL
Rountrees English Chocolate, Kohlers Swiss Chocolates, and all brands of Foreign and Eastern Confectionery, imported by . . . .
W. L. GREENBAUM,
of 205 SUTTER ST., will, after December 1st, be found in large and commodious quarters at 128 POST ST., Bohemian Club Bldg.

THE LATE BILL NYE.

CHARACTERISTIC EXPRESSIONS OF THIS HUMORIST'S HUMOR.

It is quaint humor, that of the late Bill Nye—rejoicing in queer turns, droll descriptions, and odd characterizations. His attitude is that of the commonplace observer who mentally and laboriously exaggerates the whimsical phases of daily life. There is nothing essentially funny about a refractory cow, but the misadventure of the man who attempts the milking of such a cow gravely, nay, solemnly narrated, does make one smile. Or it is a goat about whose oddities of behavior we are seriously and pedantically told—the goat bucks into a mirror and marches down the street, its head in a frame—which affords the opportunity of descanting on goats in general, their odors, and mannerisms—which may not appeal to the risibilities of the lawyer or the journalist or the college professor, but which tickles the memory of Farmer Hayseed and his kindred out in the country, to whom such episodes are familiar. The fact is, Bill Nye was not a humorist of the cities but of the country, and his column was read by the plain folk of the ranch. There lay his popularity and his strength. The plain folk rarely tire of their favorites, and Bill Nye commanded a wide circle of readers among those to whom the grace and wit of the Police Gazette, for instance, would make no appeal.

An erroneous phrenologist once told me that I would shine as a revivalist, and said that I ought to marry a tall blonde with a nervous, sanguinary temperament. Then he said, "One dollar, please," and I said, "All right, gentle scientist with the tawny mane, I will give you the dollar and marry the tall blonde with the bank account and bilious temperament when you give me a chart showing me how to dispose of a brown-eyed brunette with a thoughtful cast of countenance, who married me in an unguarded moment two years ago."

He looked at me in a reproachful kind of way struck at me with a chair in an absent-minded manner and stole away.

A man works twenty years to become known as a scholar, a newspaperman, and a gentleman, while the illiterate murderer springs into immediate notoriety in a day, and the widow of his victim cannot even get her life insurance. These things are what make people misanthropic and tenacious of their belief in a hell.

Young man, do not stand lounging on the threshold of the glorious future, while the coming years are big with possibilities, but take off your coat and spit on your hands and win the wealth which the world will yield you. You may not be able to write a beautiful poem, and die of starvation; but you can go to work humbly as a porter and buy a whisk broom, and wear people's clothes out with it, and in five years you can go to Europe in your own special car. As the strawberry said to the box, "There is always room at the top."

I never saw you, but I can picture you in my mind's eye sitting there in your three-legged chair, with your feet up on the hat rack and your coat tails in the cuspidor.

"Spokane Ike," the Indian who killed a doctor last summer for failing to cure his child, has been hanged. This shows the onward march of civilization, and vouchsafes to us the time when a doctor's life will be in less danger than that of his patient.

A Colorado burro has been shipped across the Atlantic and presented to the Prince of Wales. It is a matter of profound national sorrow that this was not the first American jackass presented to his Tallness, the Prince.

Health journals are now asserting that to maintain a sound constitution you should lie only on the right side. The health journals may mean well enough, but what are you going to do if you are editing a Democratic paper?

THE WILD COW.

When I was young and used to roam around over the country gathering watermelons in the light of the moon, I used to think I could milk anybody's cow, but I do not think so now. I do not milk a cow now unless the sign is right, and it hasn't been right for a good many years. The last cow I tried to milk was a common cow, born in obscurity. I remember her brow was low, but she wore her tail high, and she was haughty, oh, so haughty.

I made a commonplace remark to her, one that is used in the very best of society, one that need not have given offense anywhere. I said "So"—and she "soed." Then I told her to "hist" and she histed. But I thought she overdid it. She put too much expression in it.

Just then I heard something crash through the window of the barn and fall with a dull, sickening thud on the outside. The neighbors came to see what it was that caused the noise. They found that I had done it in getting through the window.

I asked the neighbors if the barn was still standing. They said it was. Then I asked if the cow was injured much. They said she seemed to be quite robust. Then I requested them to go in and calm the cow a little, and see if they could get my plug hat off her horns.

I am buying all my milk now of a milkman. I select a gentle milkman who will not kick, and feel as though I could trust him. Then, if he feels as though he could trust me, it is all right.

HUNTINGTON'S MANSION.

DETAILS OF THE WEDDING OF BURKE HOLLADAY AND MISS CARRIE HUNTINGTON.

I do not know in all luxurious New York an interior comparable to that of the C. P. Huntington house, at Fifth Avenue and Fifty-seventh Street, into occupancy of which the family entered the other day on the occasion of the marriage of their niece, Miss Carrie D. Huntington, to Mr. Edmund Burke Holladay of San Francisco, who bears a cognomen well known on the Coast. There have been many speculations on the gray stone mansion, with its closed windows, and people have wondered what Mr. Huntington was going to do with his white elephant, and have even gone so far as to reckon the cost of it all, and to cast up the interest which it was losing. The truth is that the house has been practically finished for a long time. But the lord thereof holds to the very common superstition about what happens to a millionaire who moves from house to palace, so Mr. Huntington dreaded the flitting, and offered the building for sale. But even in billionaire New York people who can stand this sort of a mansion are rare, and finally Mr. Huntington braved the unknown and took possession, propitiating the gods by a sumptuous wedding feast. All this by-play was not known to the wayfarer, and still less did he know the treasures shut from his gaze by the impassive gray walls. Imagine a staircase of Mexican onyx circling from basement to roof, five stories of it, glowing in its veins and reflecting from its polished surface. It is rather hard trying to picture to one's mind such a gorgeous staircase, but just such a staircase there is in the Huntington palace, and it is impossible to give an idea of its glories on paper. After wandering and wondering about the state apartments, so to speak, and marking the fact that the ceiling of each room is painted by one of our best known men—Vedder, Frank Lathrop, and the like—we entered the great dining-room where the wedding breakfast was served. The magnificence of this room is really staggering. The ceiling or plafond picture is by Vedder, the ceiling itself being in squares of carved wood done in color and gold, after the fashion in which the French Renaissance furnished so many notable examples. The room is hung throughout its vastness with Gobelin tapestries, spoils of a French chateau on whose venerable walls they had hung for nearly two centuries. Beautiful and rare and priceless as is this tapestry, I couldn't help thinking of some grewsome microbe bacteria investigations recently made on antique carpets and arras, and speculating on how unpleasant it would be to have a sixteenth century disease leap forth and seize one by the throat. However, that is another story, and such thoughts are quite unworthy of a marriage feast.

The very beautiful scene of the ceremony was the white and gold Louis XV. drawing-room, whose domed roof, with its delicate coloring, is a joy to look upon. Everywhere there were masses of ascension lilies, white azaleas, white roses and lilies-of-the-valley. Before a small altar composed of large lilies and greeneries, the Reverend Frank M. Clendenin, of historic St. Peter's, at West Chester, performed the ceremony. The bride wore the traditional white satin gown trimmed profusely with point lace, and had her veil of tulle held in place by a small coronet of orange blossoms. She also wore some very handsome diamond ornaments, gifts from the groom and her uncle. There were neither bridesmaids nor ushers, the bride being attended only by her maid of honor, Miss Yager of Oneonta, and the groom's attendant, or best man, was Mr. Edward H. Pardee. Included among the guests, who were confined to the immediate friends of the family, were Mrs. Solon Huntington, mother of the bride; Mrs. Holladay, mother of the groom; Mr. George Parsons Lathrop, Mrs. John Sherwood, Miss Lucy Gaylor, Dr. and Mrs. Hillhouse, Mr. and Mrs. Gates, and Judge Ord of Washington.

Mr. C. P. Huntington's pictures are known to be well selected, but it is not generally known what a perfect collection he has been quietly gathering together, and how full and complete it is in various schools. Indeed, it is said to be the most perfect in the country. The superb picture gallery in the new house is a worthy background of all these treasures. For example, modern French art is at its best in the Geromes, Corots, Meissoniers, Viberts (the collection contains the best of all the Viberts, "The Missionary's Story"). There are several last century great English examples—Gainsboroughs, and Reynoldses, and Lelys, three of them—in short almost every painter of note in the past or modern times is represented by some world-known masterpiece.—N. Y. Journal.

The most fashionable millinery opening which will take place during the next week will be that of Sahlein, the Bon Ton Milliner, of 133 Kearny Street, on next Tuesday.

Gladness Comes

With a better understanding of the transient nature of the many physical ills which vanish before proper efforts—gentle efforts—pleasant efforts—rightly directed. There is comfort in the knowledge that so many forms of sickness are not due to any actual disease, but simply to a constipated condition of the system, which the pleasant family laxative, Syrup of Figs, promptly removes. That is why it is the only remedy with millions of families, and is everywhere esteemed so highly by all who value good health. Its beneficial effects are due to the fact, that it is the one remedy which promotes internal cleanliness, without debilitating the organs on which it acts. It is therefore all important, in order to get its beneficial effects, to note when you purchase, that you have the genuine article, which is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only, and sold by all reputable druggists.

If in the enjoyment of good health, and the system is regular, then laxatives or other remedies are not needed. If afflicted with any actual disease, one may be commended to the most skillful physicians, but if in need of a laxative, then one should have the best, and with the well-informed everywhere, Syrup of Figs stands highest and is most largely used and gives most general satisfaction.

7 —Famous Mineral Springs— 7 cures for 7 times 7 diseases. Speedy cures for Rheumatism, Dyspepsia, Liver, Kidney, Blood and Skin Diseases. Cures aided by the perfect climate. Send for booklet.
BYRON HOT SPRINGS
Contra Costa Co., Cal

DOCTOR
Acker's
ENGLISH
Remedy
for Coughs, Colds, and Consumption is beyond question the greatest of all modern medicines. It will stop a Cough in one night, check a cold in a day, prevent Croup, relieve Asthma, and cure Consumption if taken in time. "You can't afford to be without it." A 25c. bottle may save your life! Ask your druggist for it. Send for pamphlet. If the little ones have Croup or Whooping Cough use it promptly. It is sure to cure.
Three Sizes—25c., 50c. and $1. All Druggists.
ACKER MEDICINE CO.,
16 & 18 Chambers St., N. Y.

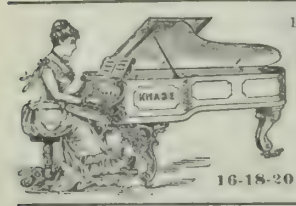
CHARLES S. WHEELER ERNST H. LUDWIG
Ernst H. Ludwig & Co.
THE MODEL AMERICAN CATERERS
Supply Wedding Breakfasts, Luncheons, Dinners, Matinee Teas and Receptions on shortest notice. Also Terrapin Entrees Luncheons and Dinners. Ice Cream, Cake, &c.
Telephone 2388 1206 SUTTER STREET

Health and Beauty
: : is a book valuable to all who desire to be attractive and healthy. It tells how fat folks can be made slender, and thin people made plump; how baldness may be avoided; wrinkles removed; faces bleached; red noses restored to natural color; forms improved; flat chests filled out, bust enlarged; dyspepsia cured and chronic diseases avoided.
Other Valuable Information.
Any one of the many prescriptions is worth more than price of book. Mailed, sealed in plain wrapper, $1.00.
ORR AND REED,
Box 545. Grand Rapids, Michigan

ZOBBIEST STYLES NEATEST FIT
BEST MATERIALS

Up-to-Date Ideas.....
In HATS
Spring and Summer Styles. now in
AT HARLOE'S
237 KEARNY ST. PHONE, RED 361

ITO, SOTOMI & CO.
JAPANESE GOODS
ART POTTERY,
CURIOS AND RUGS A SPECIALTY
116 Sutter St. Bet. Kearny and Montgomery San Francisco, Cal.



Established 1856
Benj. Curtaz & Son
Pacific Coast Agents
16-18-20 O'Farrell St

MRS. EDITH E. McLEAN
PHYSICIAN FOR THE HAIR
Has a Canadian Vegetable Tonic for the Hair that will make it grow when all else fails. Dandruff removed. Terms moderate. High-class references.
Office Hours 10 to 12 and 1 to 6.
Rooms 45, 58 and 60
ST. ANN'S BUILDING
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

NEW YORK HAIR DRESSING STORE
MME. E. KESSING, Proprietress
Artistic Hair Dressing and Shampooing. A new preventive for the hair falling out. Superfluous hair removed. 1704 Market Street, San Francisco

FASHIONS AND FRIVOLS.

Here, at last, is a practical bicycle skirt—the invention of a smart English woman who sold the patent rights in it to a New York firm. It unites three different possibilities:

First of all, it is a trim, circular walking-skirt, closefitting over the hips and measuring about three yards at the hem. To adapt this skirt to the "drop frame" bicycle, the middle of the front breadth is pulled up by means of a shirring string run down the front seam between the lining and a narrow casing. This string is drawn through an opening at the waist, where it is fastened by means of a clasp under a neat pocket flap. The shirring reaches a short distance above the knees, leaving the skirt neat and smooth fitting about the hips and actually forming two loose bags in which the knees work up and down without the slightest dragging and pulling at the waist-line, which is the sad and daily experience of the women wearing the ordinary skirts.

The third possibility of this unique garment is developed by working the cords that run up the back seam and find an outlet under a tailor-made flap just over the hip. The pulling of these two side cords converts the skirt into a pair of neat and graceful bloomers that will permit the fair rider, in case of an emergency, to mount a "diamond frame" bicycle with all the grace and agility of a masculine wheelman. By the use of four square leads in the hem of the skirt the instant the strings are unclasped and the rider stands erect, the bloomers again become a wa king skirt. There is no pulling of the garment into shapes or adjusting of belt necessary. Simply press the clasps and the act of dismounting does the rest.

Undoubtedly, a new cut of skirt will prevail this spring, and the Parisian dressmakers are all eager for the honor of being its originator, but it is really too early yet to assert with confidence just what form the new skirt will take. Among the new gowns those of fancy silk are conspicuous. The patterns are so lovely and rich that a great deal of trimming seems quite unnecessary. Any amount of lace is used. A pretty frock of a fancy pink and green silk, arranged in hair stripes with embroidered leaves of white scattered over it, has the skirt trimmed about the bottom by fans of white chiffon, starting from under bows of lavender and green ribbon. The bodice has a coat-tail back arranged in little full godets which are lined with a deeper shade of green than occurs in the silk. The front of the bodice has a soft vest of white chiffon pouching out over a soft scarf belt of the silk, which is confined on each side by a series of little square bows of the two shades of ribbon. The sleeves, while they are practically almost tight—for they are simply wrinkled loosely about the arm from shoulder to elbow—have over them a winglike butterfly of chiffon, stiffened probably, and arranged with bows and loops of ribbon.

A correspondent writes about the gowns she saw at church on Ash Wednesday in Paris:

A great many of the skirts worn had narrow panels of another material at the left side or in the front. There was little, if any, fullness at the front or sides of the skirt, and at the back the fullness was plaited fan-fashion. The materials, too, are new. There isn't nearly as much crépon to be seen. The materials that are the most popular are the smooth glossy ones. Dull mohairs of all shades have made their appearance, and a fashionable couturier the other day told me that mohair would undoubtedly be the popular material of the spring gowns.

There is manifested in aristocratic circles in London a disposition to curtail the period of private mourning as much as possible. The London correspondent of Vanity writes:

Formerly it was understood that while crepe was worn all social relaxations should be prohibited. It seemed incongruous to appear at gatherings of a more or less festive character arrayed in the habiliments of wo. Society has rebelled against this rule, and to-day crepe is not worn at all in ordinary mourning. In the deepest of mourning it is worn, but much less conspicuously than formerly, even here where its use has never gone to the extremes deemed proper in the United States. Widows, of course, still wear it, but even this class lighten the gloom of the "livery of wo" as much as possible. "Complimentary mourning," as it is called, being of the least possible significance, so far as "going out" is concerned, is worn for connections and not relatives when a fortnight is the longest period and a week often suffices. As to those who are in deeper mourning (widows alone excepted) it may be said that invitations may be accepted when one-third of the period of mourning has elapsed. This is the accepted etiquette of to-day in London, and it will doubtless be copied in due time on your side of the Atlantic, for the rule is a sensible one, and all social etiquette is, primarily, based on common sense.

The most novel hat of the present season is made entirely of peacock feathers. It is a square turban shape, covered closely with the fine breast feathers of the bird. Resting upon the top of the crown is the peacock's head. The brim of the turban turns up at the back, and here pink roses are massed. This peacock hat is to be worn between seasons, before the straw hat is purchased.

The new chiffons for the summer girl look like painted gauze. They are exquisitely embroidered in fine silk threads, and cost $2 a yard. One of the most effective designs shows a careless vine of maiden-hair fern embroidered in green silk threads outlined with silver upon white chiffon, This design, made up over a green taffeta foundation, would make an ideal summer dancing frock.

An oddity in the way of hosiery is a stocking of cobwebby fineness and woven of cotton. They are exceedingly costly, but wear better than either lisle thread or silk. In silk the stockings are most elaborate. An entire instep composed of chantilly lace is one of the novelties. Another has a design in lace medallions outlined in seed pearls. So that there is no limit to woman's extravagance even in hosiery.

Green will be par excellence the color of the season, and it comes in several new shades. A stone shade of green which has not been seen for many years appears again, and all of the bluish greens, including turquoise and peacock blue, are conspicuous. There is a new green quite indescribable, called Normandy green, and there are numberless shades of foliage greens.

A street costume for Lent is made of dark Robin Hood faced cloth, the coat in a lighter shade than the skirt trimmed on the edge with tiny balls of green silk, copper, and oxidized tinsel. The yoke is of the light green cloth, outlined with mixed embroidery, and a vest below of Oriental silk.

High collars are as fashionable as ever and any amount of ingenuity is used in devising new shapes. A choker that is always popular, and may be added to any dress, has a tight band with a series of double ribbon loops falling over it. The flower collars are immensely popular in New York, and bunches of violets and forget-me-nots are used with tulle rosettes with most charming effect.

Printed velvets are very much used for blouse waists, some of them are cut out in the neck, which is filled in with a yoke of satin wih black or white lace frilled over it. Coloredtmoiré silks, which are watered in such a manner that there is a distinct pattern, are very popular for waists, and are also used for revers and collars on gowns and cloaks.

The latest craze in Paris among women who lavish their time and affection on pet dogs, is the worthy ambition of supplying their canine friends with a wardrobe almost as complete as their own. The dog tailor is consulted, and the result of their interviews is a full outfit consisting of reception toilets of silk, fur overcoats, waterproof bathing dresses for the seaside, and nightgowns of fine batiste and silk!

The spring hats are to be mainly trimmed with rosettes and aigrettes. The rosettes will be principally of ribbons and lace, the new watered effect being given to this blurred blossom ribbon. Black laces will be much worn and will be used as wings and also in Van Dyke points forming a coronet effect. An ecru gauze lace appliqued will be used in many fetching ways in the summer hat.

Queen Victoria's health is causing considerable anxiety in court circles. She has lapses of extraordinary weakness that require instant medical attention. It is said that Prince Henry of Battenberg's death was an awful shock to her.

One of the remarkable careers of United States army officers was closed the other day when First Lieutenant Swift shot himself, in Nebraska, leaving his books in a very bad state. He started in life as a telegraph operator in a small town in Virginia; entered the army as private, and soon rose to lieutenant. His telegraphic knowledge stood him in good stead, and he became instructor to the signal corps. He was ambidextrous, and would receive and copy a message with one hand and write and send a second with the other. He wrote beautifully with either hand and was one of the most skillful and rapid telegraph operators in the world.

Miss Lucile begs to inform the ladies that she will have a fine display of Hats and Bonnets on Tuesday and Wednesday, March 17th and 18th, 139 Post Street, Liebes Building.

"BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES" are a simple yet most effectual remedy for Coughs, Hoarseness, and Bronchial Troubles. Avoid imitations.

When you are selecting a wedding present, go to S. & G. Gump's, 113 Geary Street. They have a magnificent variety to choose from.

If giving careful attention to detail and keeping constantly in touch with the very latest ideas in London, Paris, and New York has anything to do with artistic hairdressing, Mr. Lederer, 111 Stockton Street would seem to be San Francisco's best coiffure-maker.

IN THE DAYS OF RALSTON.

One's memory need not run back to any great length to recall the days when Ralston and Reese and other of our prominent citizens walked to North Beach for the sake of an invigorating salt water plunge. That era, happily, has gone by. The Lurline Baths provide the best imaginable facilities for swimming, and the institution is almost in the very center of our city. The latest feature which the Olympic Salt Water Company has added to the luxuries of its menage is a Russian Bath with Needle Shower. This latest improvement is now in working order, and proves a great attraction. The price for the above, which includes the Swimming Bath, has been established at the low rate of fifty cents.

PERRIER-JOUET CHAMPAGNE EXTRA DRY "SPECIAL"

Also specially selected stock of Clarets and White Wines on hand.
W. B. CHAPMAN, Sole Agent Pacific Coast
123 California Street

ELECTRIC..
Supplies
Construction
Repairs
CALIFORNIA
ELECTRICAL WORKS
....35 MARKET STREET

A HOME PRODUCT
AXLE-EASE
THE VERY BEST AXLE GREASE
Made by—
AMERICAN OIL CO.
SAN FRANCISCO

AHEM! AHEM!
E. H. M.
SPECIAL
The best WHISKEY for family use and Medicinal Purposes
RECOMMENDED
By all first-class Physicians. Sold everywhere.
E. H. MICHELS
Sole Controller
406 SANSOME ST. SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

CERTIFICATE OF COPARTNERSHIP.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, } ss.
COUNTY OF MARIN, }

WE, the undersigned, hereby certify that we are partners transacting business in this State, at the County of Marin, and in the City and County of San Francisco, under the firm name and style of The Novato French Cheese Factory; that the names in full of all the members of such partnership are James Newlands, Jr., Hermann Rudolff, and George Prinz; and that the places of our respective residences are set opposite our respective names hereto subscribed.

JAMES NEWLANDS, JR., San Francisco, Cal.
HERMANN RUDOLFF, Novato, Marin County, Cal.
GEORGE PRINZ, Novato, Marin County, Cal.

In witness whereof, we have hereunto set our hands, this twenty-sixth day of February, 1896.

JAMES NEWLANDS, JR.,
GEORGE PRINZ,
HERMANN RUDOLFF.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, } ss.
NOVATO, MARIN COUNTY, }

On this twenty-sixth day of February, in the year one thousand eight hundred and ninety-six, before me, J. Q. A. Haven, a Justice of the Peace in and for the County of Marin, State of California, personally appeared James Newlands, Jr., George Prinz, and Hermann Rudolff, known to me to be the persons whose names are subscribed to the within instrument, and acknowledged that they executed the same.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, at my office in said County of Marin the day and year in this Certificate first above written.

J. Q. A. HAVEN,
Justice of the Peace of Novato Township, County of Marin, State of California.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of Barthelemi Meric, Deceased

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, A. C. Freese, Administrator of the Estate of Barthelemi Meric, deceased, to the Creditors of, and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said A. C. Freese, Administrator, at his office, Room 9, 3 9 Pine Street, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said estate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California. A. C. FREESE, Administrator of the Estate of Barthelemi Meric, Deceased.

Dated at San Francisco, February 17, 1896.

J. D. SULLIVAN, Attorney for Administrator.

Hotel Del Monte

America's Famous Summer and Winter Resort

The Most Elegant Seaside Establishment in the World

"Where a leaf never dies in the still blooming bowers,
And the bee banquets on thro' a whole year of flowers."

G. H. ARNOLD,
—MANAGER—

Monterey, Cal.

Flower Festivals
Fiestas
Rose Carnivals

. . . and the like, will be the delight of California for the next two or three months.

Santa Barbara Flower Festival, the fame of which is world-wide, and the glory of which, like that of Solomon, is not half told, opens April 15. Queen Flora will reign 3 days an arbitrary and absolute despot.

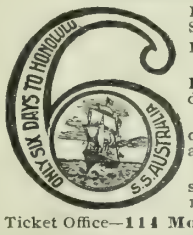
La Fiesta de Los Angeles, now fixed in the chronology of California feasts, and not less illustrious than its older prototypes, commences April 22, and the riot of fun will spread over 4 days.

The Carnival of Roses, to take place in San Jose, May 6th to 9th, inclusive, though a more recent candidate for favors of the fun-loving world, yet because of the limitless possibilities of the Garden City for anything that is made of roses, is quite as full of promise.

REDUCED RATES

will be made by the SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY for all these brilliant events. Arrange your programmes accordingly, and call on agents for particulars.

COOLGARDIE GOLD FIELDS
(FREMANTLE) AUSTRALIA



First-Class.....$220
Steerage 110
Lowest rates to CAPE TOWN

S.S. "Alameda," via Honolulu and Auckland, Thursday, April 2, 1896, at 2 p. m.

S.S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, April 7, 1896, at 10 A. M.

Special Parties—Reduced special rates for parties, March 10th and April 7th, 1896.

Ticket Office—114 Montgomery St.
Freight Office—327 Market St.

J. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO.,
General Agents

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.

Dispatch Steamers leave San Francisco for ports in Alaska.

For British Columbia and Puget Sound ports, Feb. 19, and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Wednesdays, 9 A. M.

For Newport, Los Angeles and all way ports, every fourth and fifth day, 8 A. M.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Hartford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles (Santa Monica), Redondo (Los Angeles) and Newport, every fourth and fifth day at 11 A. M.

For ports in Mexico, 25th of each month.

Ticket Office, Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.,
GENERAL AGENTS,
10 MARKET ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

HIRSCH-KAHN & Co.
MANUFACTURING OPTICIANS
IMPORTERS OF OPTICAL GOODS
PHOTOGRAPHIC APPARATUS & SUPPLIES ETC.
333 KEARNY STREET
SAN FRANCISCO CAL.

BAJA CALIFORNIA
DAMIANA BITTERS

"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and b'adder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular)

NABER, ALFS & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

THE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
610 MONTGOMERY ST., S. F.,

Reads all papers on the Pacific Coast, and supplies clippings on all topics, business and personal.

Horses Pastured

$1.50 PER MONTH

GOOD FEED AND CARE. Send for circular.

F. A. HYDE, 630 Commercial St.

BONESTELL & CO.

Dealers in PAPER
Fine Coated Papers a Specialty
401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

THE LICK HOUSE

Occupies the block bounded by Montgomery, Post and Sutter Streets

IT IS——
——scrupulously clean;
——accessible to all street car lines and places of amusement;
——conveniently situated for business men;
——a quiet, model place for a family to spend the winter;
——moderate in price, yet first-class in every particular.

AMERICAN OR EUROPEAN PLAN

K. B. SOULÉ, Manager

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention

A QUIET HOME CENTRALLY LOCATED

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL
SAN FRANCISCO
WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

THE GRILL ROOM SERVICE
—OF THE—
PALACE HOTEL

Has been extended to what was formerly the City Restaurant. This immense room, which has a direct entrance from Market Street is known as - - - -

"THE LADIES' GRILL ROOM"

NEW DEPARTURE—CHARACTERIZED BY PROMPT SERVICE—MODERATE CHARGES

$6.50 PER TON DELIVERED

COOS BAY COAL

SOOTLESS
SMOKELESS

—A—
SAFE GUIDE

No man knows all there is to know about advertising. The subject is too profound, too complex, too perplexing, for any single person, or for any dozen persons, for that matter. The path to success in advertising is full of dangerous pitfalls. All business men would do well to engage a safe guide to conduct them past the breakers and—tell them what to do and what to avoid doing.

PRINTERS' INK

Is a weekly journal for advertisers, published at 10 Spruce St., New York. It is a magazine filled with suggestions, advice, Advertisers the world over read it and write for it. It is the advertising authority of America—probably of the globe. Business men will find it a safe guide. To secure its services as guide costs $2 a year. A sample copy costs nothing.

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco
33 Post Street, below Kearny, Mechanics' Institute Building
Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000
JAS. D. PHELAN, Pres. GEO. A. STORY, Cashier
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.
DIRECTORS—Jas. D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. F. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.
Interest paid on term and ordinary deposits.
Loans on approved securities. Drafts may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.
When opening accounts, send signature.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE
OF LONDON
Incorporated by Royal Charter A. D. 1726
Capital Paid Up, $3,406,100 Assets, $21,534,413
Surplus to Policy Holders, $3,980,251
ROBERT DICKSON, Manager
NATHAN & KINGSTON, San Francisco Agents
301 MONTGOMERY ST.

Sun Insurance Office OF LONDON
Founded A.D. 1710 Cash Assets, $10,270,535
Oldest Purely Fire Insurance Office in the World
The Lion Fire Ins. Co. Ltd., OF LONDON
Established A.D. 1857 Cash Assets $1,160,205
The Imperial Ins. Co. Ltd., OF LONDON
Instituted A.D. 1803 Cash Assets, $9,362,920
40 Years in Business on the Pacific Coast
Manager for the Pacific Coast, WM. J. LANDERS
305 and 307 Sansome Street, near Pine

Aachen and Munich Fire Insurance Co.
Of Aix La Chapelle, Germany. Established 1805
Capital, $2,250,000.00
Total Assets, $6,854,653.65
United States Department
201 CALIFORNIA STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

Ask your Blacksmith to shoe your horse with
PHŒNIX HORSE SHOES
GIVE THEM A TRIAL

GEORGE E. HALL
Agent and Importer of Foreign Wines
MUTUAL LIFE BUILDING,
222 Sansome Street

DR. THOMAS L. HILL
DENTIST
Office, Odd Fellows' Building,
S. W. Cor. Seventh and Market Streets
Office Hours, 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.
Consultation Hours, 4 to 5

ABRAMSON-HEUNISCH CO. (Incorporated)
IMPORTERS AND JOBBERS OF
Brewers' and Bottlers' Supplies, Corks, Druggists' Glassware, Etc.
26-28 Main St. San Francisco

Pacific Towel Co.
Telephone 1780 No. 9 Lick Place, San Francisco
GEO. E. MOORE, Proprietor

TALES OF THE DAY.

Chauncey Depew was asked, What is Life? He replied: "A comic weekly; price, ten cents."

He has never been in the habit of punishing his children, leaving that disagreeable duty to his wife, but the other day, one of his numerous progeny became very unruly and he was obliged to say, "Flora, if you don't keep quiet I shall have to whip you." "Pooh," retorted the little three-year-old, with a contemptuous toss of her dainty head, "you isn't the mother."

A Cork Town Councilor is credited with having thus spoken: "There can be no doubt of the virulence of this epidemic, for I know of people lying dead from it who never died before." The same gentleman thus chivalrously defended a colleague. "I strongly protest against this attack on my absent friend, for surely it is not right to hang a man behind his back."

That law fixes the unity value, but cannot fix the value of the unit, is the dictum of Congressman Galusha Grow, who illustrates his point by the story of a woodchopper on the banks of the Mississippi River, near the close of the Rebellion. Hailed by a steamboat captain, who asked whether his wood was for sale, he answered, "Yes." The captain inquired, "How much a cord?" "How do you propose to pay?" "In Confederate money." "Then cord for cord."

The late Lord Leighton, President of the Royal Academy, posed as an Admirable Crichton. He was a sculptor, musician, orator, society man, and he spoke four languages, but he had excellent reason to dislike Whistler. It seems the author of The Gentle Art of Making Enemies had listened patiently to a friend's recital of all Leighton's gifts and accomplishments, and capped the list with the remark, in his inimitable, strident drawl, "Yees, he paints a little, too, doesn't he?"

It was in the train, and he was trying to read. There was the usual variety of passengers, and among them a lady with a very sprightly little girl that had blue eyes, a head of glistening gold, and an inquisitorial tongue. She plied him with questions and toyed with his watch chain. The mother, who was a widow, fairly beamed upon him. He was becoming nervous, and, turning to the mother, said: "Madam, what do you call this sweet little darling?" The widow smiled enchantingly, and replied with a sigh: "Etnel." "Please call her, then."

George Dyer, the English scholar and poet, and great friend of Chas. Lamb, was, at one period in his life, a Baptist minister. He was always being chaffed by his friends, and one of them, in referring to some incident, remarked: "Well, Dyer, you know that was before you drowned the woman." "Drowned a woman!" was the indignant reply. "I never drowned any woman!" "Haven't you forgotten? Don't you remember the time when, after a baptism, you left the woman in the water." "No! no! impossible," said Dyer; then, as the light struck him, "Oh, you are joking; it really could not be!"

Wilton Lackaye, on his way to rejoin the Trilby Company then playing in Philadelphia, was kept waiting at the New York ticket office while the agent was conversing with a friend. Finally, the official turned to him, drew from his rack a ticket, and said: "Want to go to Philadelphia?" "No," responded Lackaye. "You don't want to go to Philadelphia?" questioned the ticket agent in surprise. "I do not," said Lackaye. Whereupon the agent returned the ticket to the rack. Lackaye then pushed a five-dollar bill across the counter, saying: "Let me have a ticket to Philadelphia, please." "I thought you said you didn't want to go to Philadelphia," said the agent, much annoyed. "I don't want to go there," said Lackaye, "but I am going."

A savant noted for his eccentricities had a mania for collecting old books. Among other rarities he had a volume which he prized most highly, as he believed it to be the only one extant. Learning, however, that a second copy existed in Paris, he went over and drove straight to the address of his rival. "Sir," said he, "you have such and such a book?" "Yes, you may look at it if you wish." "I will pay you 1000 francs for it," said the savant. "I am not a dealer in books." "5000 francs?" responded the savant. "I repeat—" said the Frenchman. "10,000 francs?" was the sole response. "Well, I am not justified in refusing so generous an offer. The book is yours." The savant took it, paid the money, and after examining the treasure carefully, coolly threw it upon the fire that was blazing in the room. The Frenchman, horror-stricken, tried to snatch it from the flames, but the savant prevented him, saying, "Sir, I also have a copy of the work. It is now the only one in the world. Good morning."

FREE EDUCATION AND PROFESSIONAL TRAINING

"THE WAVE'S" LIBERAL SUBSCRIPTION OFFER.

The proprietors of THE WAVE have made arrangements with the most prominent schools and colleges throughout the State, and are now prepared to offer scholarships and courses in the leading educational institutions free of charge, for all who will obtain subscribers to this popular weekly.

UNIVERSITY COURSES.

A single year's course at the University of California, or at the Leland Stanford Junior University, for 185 annual subscribers. This offer includes room and board, and all other necessary expenses attached to the course. For 750 subscribers we offer a four years' course.

MEDICAL COURSES.

One year at the Cooper Medical College will be given for 125 subscribers. This includes books and incidental expenses attached to the course.

A single term at the Medical Department of the University of California for 100 subscribers.

For 500 annual subscribers we offer the full four years' course at the Cooper Medical College. This offer includes all incidental costs and fees, except board and lodging.

We offer the four years' course at the Medical Department of the University of California, for 400 subscribers.

The two year's course at the State Normal School at San Jose, for 600 subscribers. This offer includes board, lodging, and books. A single year for 160 subscribers.

The course at Hastings Law College for 250 annual subscribers. This includes books and other expenses attached to the College, for a period of three years, and the privilege of studying in a first-class law office.

A three years' course at the Mark Hopkins Institute of Art for 250 annual subscribers. A year's course for 85 subscribers.

A course in any department of Van der Naillen's School of Electricity and Engineering (except Department of Assaying) will be given for 125 annual subscribers. A course in the Department of Assaying for 50 annual subscribers.

A six months' course in either the Business Department, or the Department of Stenography and Typewriting of Heald's Business College, for 50 annual subscribers.

A nine months' course in the Columbia School of Dramatic Art for 75 annual subscribers.

A three months' course at the Meisterschaft School of Languages for 40 annual subscribers.

The course at the California School of Elocution and Oratory for 35 annual subscribers.

Tuition in music, vocal or instrumental, from Francis Stuart, S. G. Fleishmann, J. H. Dohrmann, Sigmund Beel, Nathan Landsberger, Lesley Martin, or H. J. Stewart. A course of twenty lessons from any of these gentlemen for fifty annual subscribers. For 100 annual subscribers a course of twenty lessons each in piano, singing, harmony, or any other branch of music.

CRESTA BLANCA WINES
AWARDED THREE HIGHEST AWARDS AT
THE ATLANTA EXPOSITION
OF SIX MEDALS AWARDED TO CALIFORNIA
Cresta Blanca Wines
OBTAINED THREE
WETMORE-BOWEN CO.
140 Montgomery Street
Under Occidental Hotel

J. R. SMITH & CO.
230 BUSH STREET
And Room 7, Rotunda, Mills Building
W. HALL, Successor
MERCHANT TAILORS
Will make garments to order
—At Great Reduction for Cash—
J. R. SMITH - - Manager

UP-TO-DATE
TAILORING
AT MODERATE PRICES
J. H. HAWES
Mezzanine B, Crocker Building

BICYCLE and GOLF SUITS
H. S. BRIDGE & CO.
Merchant Tailors
Many Novelties in Imported Wear. Shirts to Order a Specialty.
622 Market Street, San Francisco
(Upstairs, opposite Palace Hotel)

COTTON SAIL DUCKS
22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard
ALSO
Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks
From 30 to 120 inches wide
Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks
Manufactured by Murphy, Grant & Co.
Mount Vernon Company . . Pacific Coast
Baltimore Sole Agents

ORDER YOUR CARRIAGES AND COUPES OF THE
PACIFIC CARRIAGE CO.
At Baldwin Hotel
200 Sutter Street, corner Kearny
48 Eighth Street, or
St. Nicholas Hotel, Market and Ninth Streets
Steamer and Train Service a specialty 'Phone 1950

THE WAVE CLUBBING LIST
FOR 1896

By special arrangement with the Publishers, THE WAVE is prepared to offer the following list

SUBSCRIPTIONS MUST BE PAID IN ADVANCE

THE WAVE and	CENTURY	$6 00
" "	ARENA	5 00
" "	LITTELL'S LIVING AGE	7 75
" "	ART AMATEUR	5 75
" "	LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE	4 50
" "	MUNSEY'S	3 50
" "	ATLANTIC MONTHLY	5 75
" "	YOUTH'S COMPANION	3 75
" "	NEW ENGLAND MAGAZINE	5 00
" "	HARPER'S MAGAZINE	5 50
" "	HARPER'S WEEKLY	5 70
" "	HARPER'S BAZAAR	5 70
" "	HARPER'S ROUND TABLE	4 00
" "	SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE	5 00
" "	REVIEW OF REVIEWS	4 50
" "	ST. NICHOLAS	5 00
" "	OVERLAND	4 75
" "	COSMOPOLITAN	3 50
" "	FRANK LESLIE'S MAGAZINE	4 90
" "	PUCK	6 50
" "	JUDGE	6 50
" "	LIFE	7 00
" "	LIFE'S COMEDY	3 50
" "	LESLIE'S WEEKLY	5 70
" "	DEMOREST MAGAZINE	4 00
" "	SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN	5 00
" "	SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN SUPPLEM'T	6 50
" "	N. Y. DAILY SUN	8 00
" "	" SUNDAY "	4 50
" "	CASSELL MAGAZINE	3 75
" "	ARGOSY	3 50
" "	PUBLIC OPINION	4 50
" "	SUNDAY WORLD	4 75
" "	CRITIC	5 50
" "	FORUM	5 00
" "	NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW	6 50
" "	TABLE TALK	3 25
" "	NINETEENTH CENTURY	6 25
" "	CONTEMPORARY REVIEW	6 25
" "	FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW	6 25
" "	BLACKWOODS MAGAZINE	6 25
" "	TRUTH	6 25
" "	DELINEATOR	3 50
" "	VOGUE	5 50
" "	TOWN TOPICS	7 50
" "	DAILY JOURNAL	5 00
" "	SUNDAY JOURNAL	3 75
" "	ILLUS. AMERICAN	5 75

CALIFORNIA STATE LIBRARY

THE WAVE

VOL. XV. NO. 12. SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 21, 1896. PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE WAVE

Is published every Saturday, at the Crocker Building, corner Market and Post Streets, San Francisco.

SUBSCRIPTION, $3 per year, $1.50 six months, $.75 three months. Foreign subscriptions (countries in postal union) $5 per year. Sample copies free on application. The trade is supplied by the San Francisco News Co., 210 Post Street; East of the Rocky Mountains by the American News Co., New York.

THE WAVE is kept on file and is for sale at Brentano's, 17 Avenue de l Opera, Paris, France; 31 Union Square, New York City; 1015 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.; and 206 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

ADVERTISING rates and all other matters pertaining to the business of the paper, address Rooms 220-221-222 Crocker Building. Eastern Agent, E. Katz, 186-187 World Building, New York.

HARRISON M. PARKER, BUSINESS MANAGER.

Entered at San Francisco Post-office as second-class matter

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY.

SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 21, 1896.

CONTENTS.

EDITORIALS—
A Poor Type of Womanhood 1
The Liquor Problem 1
The Acquittal of Doctor Brown 2
Greek Currants 2
The Jury System 2
The Vacant Chair 3
A Compliment from Nihilists 3
Commentaries on the Constitution 3
CAUSERIE—By John Bonner 4
STORY — "Miss Juggernaut's Car"—By Juliet Wilbor Tompkins 4
THINGS AND PEOPLE—By The Witness 6
TWO OF HOYT'S HEROINES—by E. D. H 7
A VERACIOUS BIOGRAPHER—By Etc. Jr 7
A HEROINE IN SUPERLATIVES—By Oracle K. B 8
THE THEATERS—By Peg Woffington 9
THE WEEK IN SOCIETY—By The Gossip 10, 11
RIPPLES—Presumably Humorous—By Bruno 12
THE LADIES' BICYCLE TOURNAMENT 13
NEGLECTED ARTISTS—By D. 13
GOWNS AND GOSSIP—By Babette 14

MISCELLANEOUS.

Public People 5
Book Talk 8
Dramatic Notes 9
Shearings 12
Tales of the Day 16

Recently several cases have been brought to the attention of THE WAVE in which young men, anxious to secure an education, had undertaken to work their way through the University. The spirit that hungers for knowledge is not met with as frequently as one might wish, but the example of the youth in question has led the proprietors of THE WAVE to devise some means by which such persons, either male or female, might secure the education which they sought. On page 16 of this issue may be found an offer of scholarships at either of the two Universities, offers of the facilities of reputable business colleges, medical colleges, schools of electrical, mining, mechanical and civil engineering and architecture, schools of dramatic art, and scholarships at the Meisterschaft School of Languages and schools of elocution and oratory. In addition to these, THE WAVE has been enabled to make arrangements with Nathan Landsberger, S. M. Fleishman, H. J. Stewart, Sigmund Beel, J. H. Dohrman, and Lesley Martin, for courses in vocal and instrumental music, including piano, organ, harmony, and vocal art. This offer is something of a novelty in California, and is not lacking in generous features.

A POOR TYPE OF WOMANHOOD.

To approach with patience, or even with toleration, the subject afforded by that peculiar type of womanhood represented by the Reverend Anna Shaw is a matter of extreme difficulty. Indeed, the necessity for approaching it in any frame of mind is to be regretted. But the Reverend Anna Shaw is in the arena, insistent, vociferous, and not to be avoided.

The people of the present are asked to regard her standard of femininity as superior to that which it has been, and still is, an honor and delight for men to reverence, as they reverence that which they know to be better than themselves, and which they take pride in keeping unsullied. It becomes necessary to put aside the memory of our mothers, concluding that the hand that rocked the cradle might have been more wisely employed, and to regard our complacent and affectionate wives as mistaken and abject creatures incapable of asserting their rights. In place of the old ideal we can put the Reverend Anna Shaw. This is asking much, and the demand for investigation becomes apparent.

Miss Shaw is a preacher, a lawyer, and a doctor, but chooses to be a lecturer, to go about with absolute and noisy freedom, prating that she is not free. She is highly educated, comely, of magnetic presence, with a ready command of language, quick humor, a modest store of invective, and a fund of sophistry that seems undiminished by any draft made upon it. Above all, she has a deep and abiding insincerity. Her intelligence is too pronounced to permit her to believe her own pernicious doctrine. She scatters the seeds of discontent and inharmony, recking nothing of the harvest. She is a dangerous and disturbing element. If a man, she would frankly be termed a demagog.

The Reverend Shaw wants her sisters to understand that they are downtrodden, that all laws are framed for their oppression, that they have no chance for independence, that the wife is a slave, and she confidently makes these unfounded assertions with no sign that thereby her conscience is troubled. Her conscience has not been seared as with a hot iron, but it has been lulled by the gleam and the clink of coin. It is not because blinded by enthusiasm that she is abusing talents that might have made her useful, but because her mercenary instinct is her guide. She is in the reform business for money. As a missionary she is fervid, but as a passer of the hat she is none the less regular.

The spinster can be an excellent spinster if she choose, but she cannot be in any sense the ideal woman. She cannot take a broad view of life. The best there is in it is to her a closed book. When she assumes to be the instructor of wives and mothers her impudence is little short of the sublime. But she can make the wife believe that the husband toiling faithfully and cheerfully to provide for this loved one is a brutal oppressor; that nature in making the woman bear children and care for them was guilty of a grievous wrong which man malignantly abets. She can cause them to chafe under imaginary shackles, coax them into hysterically tugging at bonds that never existed. She may even inculcate that wild and extraordinary desire to be "free" that has expelled the joy from many a home. The disgrace of being a helpmeet, the ignominy of being a vine to the masculine oak, the odium of being protected, even it may be petted, are very clear from the Shaw standpoint. It is not too much to say that she makes common sense tired.

This living refutation of her own arguments was in San Francisco a year ago jingling her chains. She seemed to be quite at liberty, but she said she wasn't. She was bound down, hampered, this poor lady, who has only been permitted to enter three professions. She said then that a woman had no rights, didn't own her own bonnet, or her own children. A very worthy woman, a mother, who earns her own living entirely without shrieks, heard these statements and wondered, as well she might. The woman marveled that she had been a slave all this time without knowing it, and went to a distinguished attorney to find out. She ascertained directly from the statute books that each statement made by the lecturer was absolutely untrue. She called this circumstance to the attention of the Reverend Shaw, who declined to answer. But later, the Reverend Shaw took every occasion to misrepresent this woman, attacking her in public and in private, and calmly continuing to draw conclusions from premises entirely false. When men do this, they are called to account. The Reverend Shaw must admit that being a woman has generally shielded her from the exposure she richly earns every time she attempts to delude her hearers.

When the Reverend Anna Shaw was a figure in a Fourth of July procession here, she wrote to a Buffalo paper a description of the enthusiasm that ran riot about her carriage. She imagined all of this. As a matter of fact, small boys yelled: "Hi, there, Anna." Men and women were silent, and in their hearts felt pity at the sight of the gray-haired lecturer, who was being made into a spectacle. Her published statement has, until now, gone unchallenged, but not justly so, for where a woman revolts against being a woman, she crawls from beneath the mantle of charity that humanity would, under other circumstances, be glad to cast over her weaknesses.

The avowed object of this disturber is not to drag woman from the high estate that is now her portion, but such can be the only result of her labors, provided there be any result. It is not deemed best by men who respect women that they should be dragged to the level of performing public duties, or mixing with the rabble, but if Shaws grow more common women will voluntarily leave this estate, and all that is lovable about her become a memory. It is a matter for gratitude that the vast majority of women are still ready to be women, and abjure the screaming sisterhood; even desire affection, and appreciate deference. The demand for equality is not a demand for betterment, but for a place on a lower plane. If women want home to become a travesty, and the female colonel to lead them to battle, they will naturally turn to a Shaw. But before taking any decisive step, it would be well for them to consult the husbands who love them, the sons who cherish and look up to them, the lovers whose dearest ambition is to make them a home. It is true that the Reverend Shaw would invade such a home as ruthlessly as the pagan iconoclast enters the sacred temple. She would upset laws, natural and artificial, that seem best to conserve human happiness. Fortunately, she can be stopped at the door. If confidence in men has already been in a measure shattered, let the doubting women consult others who have fulfilled the duties of wifehood and motherhood, and not turn to the preposterous anomalies, almost without sex, who have constituted themselves models. They speak with false tongues, and their example is corrupting, no matter how smooth their sophistry. One of the Shaw style is more dangerous than the anarchist. The anarchist is a folly so palpable that none of sense may be led astray by him. The Shaws are specious, cunning, and can bring to substantiate their arguments some show of reason, and give them a basis of deftly distorted fact.

THE LIQUOR PROBLEM.

The liquor dealers, represented by the California State Protective Association, propose to take in hand the regulation of the liquor traffic within the State themselves, and, so far as may be, to elevate the tone of the business and rid it of the disreputables who only too often seek it as a means of earning an easy living. They propose, if possible, to remove the liquor business from politics, and place it upon lines the same as any other business. Such a step as that proposed by the President of the association would go a long way toward benefiting the State. We know Mr. Edoff, the president, to be a man of indomitable will, high abilities, and honest purpose. He has no affection for the keeper of the groggery, and his point of view is very largely that of a sane, unprejudiced, unbiased thinking man; namely, that with the disreputable groggeries, dives, and pitfalls weeded out, and reasonable legal regulations strictly adhered to, the business may be made less injurious to the community which permits it to exist. It is his purpose, and the purpose of the association which he represents, to labor to that end. Heretofore, in California, the only questions presented in regard to the liquor traffic have been prohibition and unrestricted sale of liquor. The advocates of the former measure have thus far been unable to accomplish anything approaching a tangible result. We are now presented with an organization powerful in numbers, strong in purpose to accomplish great reforms within its own lines; but it will not be surprising if the temperance people refuse to lend their aid to this movement, which, if successful, would mean so much for the betterment of the State.

The following incident clipped from Mr. Edoff's public statement strongly indicates the character of the man:

It is not the purpose of our association to encourage the infraction of the laws that have been passed to regulate the retail liquor trade. On the contrary, it is our desire to see those laws strictly enforced, and we shall do everything to help the authorities in that regard. Let me recite you a case that will well illustrate what our position in this matter is. Not long ago a saloon-keeper in Oakland named Vananee was arrested on a charge of selling liquor to a minor. He was a member of our association and at once hurried over to this side and called upon me to aid him. I asked him if he had sold liquor to a minor and he tried to evade the question, but I insisted on an answer. He finally said: "I guess I did." I at once ordered him out of the office and told him that I would instruct the counsel of the association to aid in his prosecution, which I did.

There are some other expressions in the statement pregnant with meaning to the initiated.

We will not go into politics as supplicants. Neither will we allow any party to use us as their cat's paw to pull their chestnuts out of the fire.

If Mr. Edoff can steer his organization clear of these rocks he will accomplish much. He is a man of wealth and is above the necessity of trading off his friends for his own advancement. He is not an advocate: he is a principal thoroughly imbued with the justice of his cause; is a close student of the subject, and is really the brains of the association; and, what is all important, has a reputation for keeping his promises to the letter, notwithstanding difficulties that may interpose and delay.

During the last campaign, beyond a doubt, the liquor dealers were used by various parties to "pull their chestnuts out of the fire." As a result, nothing was accomplished, and a whole year of effort and expenditures was practically thrown to the dogs and distinct damage done to the advance of decency. Mr. Edoff promises to obliterate the dives and pitfalls if given the proper aid by the police authorities. Let our temperance friends join in a movement so beneficent in its purpose.

THE ACQUITTAL OF DOCTOR BROWN.

The verdict of the ecclesiastical council of the Congregational Church in the case of Doctor C. O. Brown is, in the main, satisfactory to good people. It is a verdict of acquittal on the charges against the accused; this is tempered with a mild censure of the Doctor for his harsh behavior to a lady who had shown a disposition to join hands with his enemies in hounding him. The public will easily acquit the minister for showing feeling when his good name was assailed through ignorance or ill-nature.

It will be remembered that the Doctor was accused of adultery with two women—Mrs. Stockton and Miss Overman—and of endeavoring to buy off the witnesses against him by paying five hundred dollars to one Mrs. Davidson, to whom he promised a further stipend of thirty-five dollars a month. These charges were brought by members of his congregation, who appear to have been mischief-making women. The Council found that, though the streets and by-ways have been ransacked for evidence against the Doctor, no evidence of adultery was adduced, and that the testimony of Miss Overman, who was the chief witness for the prosecution, was discredited by her confessed falsehoods, told previously regarding the same matter. As to Mrs. Davidson, Dr. Brown long ago instituted criminal proceedings against her for attempted extortion; she is out on bail pending the trial of her case. The Council might have added, had the members thought it worth while, that evidence was laid before them proving that Dr. Brown had not been at the places where his accusers declared his delinquencies took place, at the times alleged, or at any other times; and that the great bulk of the testimony for the prosecution consisted of street rumors gathered at second-hand by chattering, malicious women reeking a scandal.

These being the facts the case went to pieces when it was sifted. It would not have lasted a week if it had been tried in one of our Superior Courts. Such a District Attorney as Mr. Barnes would never have allowed it to come to trial; he would have his bailiff throw the female slanderers into the street. Unfortunately for Doctor Brown he is a clergyman, and therefore a natural target for scandal, that which in a layman is a venial offense, is high treason in a minister of the gospel. In a case involving the moral purity of a minister, accusation is equivalent to conviction. The world is full of vile creatures who are so conscious of their own depravity that a taint upon a clergyman is nuts to them, because it tends to set them on the same plane.

The verdict of the Council is satisfactory in the main, but not altogether. It was not its business to inquire whether Doctor Brown had resented fiercely, in the tone of righteous indignation, charges and insinuations which he knew to be false, and inspired by malignant spite. Like the prophet of old, he did well to be angry. The Council wisely declared that "the facts in the case have not left a trace of suspicion in our minds concerning the hitherto stainless reputation of this honored minister of the gospel." They should have stopped there. They had no right to censure him for using the hasty speech of an angry man toward those who were trying to destroy his character and his life. Are we to suppose that the pastors and deacons and delegates who tried Doctor Brown would meet charges ruinous to their reputation and their usefulness with meek resignation and self-abasement? Would Doctor McLean bow his head in lowly humility if he was accused of crimes similar to those laid at the door of Doctor Brown? Would Doctor Pond kiss the hand which smote him with a rod of infamy. Would Mr. Scudder stand upon the punctilios of etiquette if he had to answer a blackmailer who charged him with meeting a loose woman at a house of assignation. There are times and occasions when a virtuous man, falsely accused, is fully justified in letting the hot passion of his wrath boil over in fiery vituperation; and this was one of them.

The acquittal is a happy thing for this community. We have a rabble here—some of it in respectable station—which is imbued with a fanatical hatred of the clergy. The members of this rabble rejoice when a clergyman is detected in guilt. They chuckle over the crime of a minister of the Gospel, because his fall is the next thing to their own rise. They do not go to church, though they know they should; and they are imbued with a narrow spite against those who do, and call them hypocrites. A professor, and much more a minister, of religion is a living reproach to their way of life. They exult when they think they find that the occupants of pulpits are no better than themselves When the charges were first brought against Doctor Brown, the whole of this rabble shrieked in glee over the collapse of a clergyman. They would not listen to evidence for the defense. They would not see that his accusers were mean, malignant falsifiers, who would not be believed in any court of justice. The only object present to their eye was the prospect of the humiliation and degradation of a clergyman.

If Dr. Brown had been convicted, the blow would not have fallen on the Congregational Church alone. It would have been felt equally by the Episcopalians, the Methodists, the Presbyterians, and the Baptists. That valuable class of citizens which haunts barrooms, and professes agnosticism because it is ignorant of all forms of religion, would have gone round croaking, "There! see what your clergy are like! See what kind of rascals your churches breed!" It is indeed a mercy that the verdict of the Congregational council has not encouraged the demoralization of which such speeches would have been the outward and visible sign.

GREEK CURRANTS.

A curious state of affairs has recently arisen in Greece. It seems that at the time when the vines of France and Italy were destroyed by the phylloxera, there existed in Europe almost a famine, which was especially felt in France. Greek currants, which are largely used in the manufacture of wine and cognac, in consequence, came into great demand, and rose to an hitherto unknown price. The agriculturists of that country seemingly went mad; they began to destroy fruit and olive orchards, and substituted the vine. This unwise procedure has now brought them to disaster. Olive trees, which require, before coming into bearing, an age equal to that of the average human life, were cut down to make way for the vine. In Morea, mulberry-trees were destroyed for the same reason, and the silk industry injured to an irreparable extent. The whole agricultural community of Greece seemed to have gone currant-mad, with the result that that country now has but one crop to market, for which there is no adequate demand. Italy did not excel this little country in her olives and olive oil. "Greek wines," says the United States Consul at Athens, "which, properly managed, should equal those of France and Italy, have been neglected; silk making, as an industry, has almost disappeared; garden vegetables, which grow here of unsurpassing quality and flavor, are raised only in a few localities near Athens; raspberries and blackberries are unknown; strawberries are few, and high in price, and there is not a fruit cannery in Greece."

Meanwhile, the vines of France and Italy have been renewed; California's product overflows and seems inexhaustible. The demand for Greek currants has diminished to such an extent that the producer is reduced to the necessity of demanding Government aid. Parliament has been asked to adopt some measure to increase the price of currants. This seems to be a most startling proposition. The measure demanded by the people is about as follows: They ask that public depots be built for the storage of currants, and that only a certain percentage of the crop (the amount to be fixed by law) shall be put upon the market. Surplus currants are to be put in the depots and not sold until disposition has been made of the loose crop. The establishment of a currant bank is proposed in connection with this scheme, from which any shareholder may draw sums of money corresponding with the value of the currants deposited by him. Twice was this scheme brought forward, and twice rejected. But finally, the Greek Parliament has partially acceded to the demands of the agriculturists, and has offered to receive tax payments in kind from the producer in currants. Depots and stores are being rented by the Government to receive these products, and it is understood that they are to be used by the Government for uses other than those for which that commodity is usually sought in commerce. It will be interesting to note the result of this experiment at paternalism.

THE JURY SYSTEM.

The witless young fellow of the Call, who writes of The Thirteenth Juror, has not been entirely suppressed. He tilted his lance last week at some of the most ancient rules of practise, charged ferociously at things that were old and antiquated when the hair on the top of his devoted head was as thin and scanty as is his present knowledge of the law.

Speaking of the jury system, is it not rather a failure? One of the strongest arguments to be used against it is found in the fact that a lawyer with a weak case invariably demands a jury trial, and there is no doubt that many failures of justice in the administration of the law may be attributed directly to the practise—ancient but active of instructing jurors in matters of law. In the ordinary jury trial twelve laymen, taken from the body of the people, are sworn as jurors to render a true verdict in accordance with the evidence adduced. Assuming them to be honest and sincere, they are men whose minds are untrained as to the intricacies and subtleties of law; men who are unfamiliar with its philosophy and its logic; who, not understanding the fundamental principles of legal rules, are necessarily at a loss to understand the rules as mere abstractions. If you state to a man wholly unversed in mathematics that the square of the base of a right-angled triangle plus the square of the perpendicular equals the square of the hypothenuse, it will be to him a mere succession of words, and will convey to his mind no intelligible idea. So it is very frequently the case that the statement of a rule of law to the layman is quite as incomprehensible. Yet we constantly commit the folly of giving to the jury instructions which the judge and the attorney well know will not and cannot be understood by the talesmen.

An inspection of the decisions of our Supreme Court will indicate that a large number of the cases reversed by that Court have for the ground of reversal an error in the giving of these instructions, an error because they do not clearly and correctly state an abstract question of law. The verdict of the jury might not have been influenced in the least by these instructions, had they been according to law, for it is safe to say that in coming to their conclusion in the jury-room, the instructions were ignored, and the general trend of the evidence alone considered. The judge of a trial court is called upon in the rush and excitement of a trial, without opportunity for careful deliberation, to state the most intricate and vexed points of law in the form of instructions. If he errs, the Appellate Court must reverse the judgment and order a new trial, although, most probably, the verdict rendered would have been precisely the same had the point of law been accurately stated. These evils flow largely from a blind adherence to the time-honored folly of taking general verdicts. If the whole practise of instructing juries in the law, and the taking of general verdicts were abolished, much criticism would end; fewer errors would occur, and the administration of justice would be subserved. To cure this evil is a simple matter of legislative adjustment. It involves the amendment of a few sections of the Code of Civil Procedure to remedy the evil. Section 607 prescribes the manner of conducting a jury trial, and concludes: "6. The Court may then charge the jury." Section 608 says: " . . . the Court may state to them all matters of law which it thinks necessary for their information in giving their verdict . . ." Section 609 recognizes the right of attorneys to request specific instruction. Here is where an attorney with a bad case gets in his work to trip up the court and secure a new trial if the verdict goes against him. Of course, he takes exceptions to all instructions requested by him and refused by the Court, and likewise excepts to all given at the request of the other side, and stands a good chance of catching the judge in some erroneous position.

Section 624 of the same Code provides that a verdict may be either general or special. Section 625 provides that in certain specified cases the jury may, in their discretion, tender a general or special verdict, but not being versed in legal practise, they know nothing of it, and could not frame a special verdict even if they knew they had the right, and would not do so in any case unless required. In certain other classes of cases the Court may require the jury to render a special verdict; that is, to find the precise facts and leave the judgment to be rendered by the Court upon the facts.

Where a case is submitted for a special verdict, the jury have nothing to do with the law or the judgment which the law will cause to follow the special facts found. Necessity for instruction by the Court here ceases. The jurors have only to consider the evidence and decide what facts are proven, and the Court pronounces judgment. Special verdicts are taken, upon issues framed, in the form of questions prepared by the Court, or by the attorneys with the approval of the Court, thus: "Did the defendant execute the bill of sale dated" etc.? "How much has the defendant paid on the account sued on by the plaintiff?" The issues in any case, civil or criminal, may be very readily reduced to a few simple, plain questions which an ordinary jury could, and usually would, decide intelligently and correctly. All that is necessary is the slight amendment of a few sections so that the law would provide for the trial of all cases upon special issues, and do away entirely with the general verdict, and at the same time with instructions. The Court, at the end of a trial, would simply say: "Gentlemen of the jury, here are a few simple questions in writing which you will take to the jury room. From the evidence in this case, you will determine how these questions should be answered, and write in your answers and return the paper to the Court. You have nothing to do with the law of the case, but when you find the facts, the Court, after argument by counsel, will determine what judgment should be entered."

As the law now stands, special verdicts might be required in many cases, but, so long as it is not imperative, the Courts usually prefer to take the easier course of following the old custom and allow cases to drift along for general results. If the law made it imperative in all cases to frame special issues, the Courts would soon perceive the great saving of time, the greater accuracy of practise, and the better results of trials; and if the Supreme Court found it necessary to reverse a judgment for error of law in the rendition of judgment on the facts found, it would order the Court below to enter the proper judgment called for by the special verdict, instead of advising a new trial.

An erroneous instruction given the jury vitiates the verdict and necessitates a new trial, but where the Trial Court makes a mistake of law and renders a judgment not sustained by the facts found, the Appellate Court, having the facts before it, can see just what judgment should have been rendered, and order it.

THE VACANT CHAIR.

Mr. "Cy" Brown moved that the Legislature of Kentucky adjourn "everlastingly, eternally, and forever," which we surmise is Blue Grass for sine die. The motion was carried, and the Legislature went into history without having elected a successor to Senator Blackburn. Senator Lindsey, therefore, must play a lone hand in the Senate for the next two years. Washington will be deprived of one of its most picturesque characters and best story-tellers in Blackburn. But these are by no means the most significant features of the incident. The constitutional method of electing Senators has miscarried. The scheme devised by Madison and Hamilton for the choosing of a select body of legislators, representative of the sovereignty of the various States, has proved abortive. The obstinacy, or ambition, of five men, three, or even one, makes it impossible for a State to have her rightful number of Senators at Washington. This is surely a governmental problem worthy of consideration, and for which a solution must be found, for senatorial deadlocks, it seems, have become fashionable. Only in the last few years has it been thought justifiable for members of a Legislature, through partisan or personal zeal, to deprive their State of its full quota of Senators. Within a half dozen years, however, there have been as many deadlocks, which lasted until the Legislature's life expired. If the politician's code approves of such methods, the people will discover a means to save all future trouble over the question. They will probably take the electing of Senators into their own hands.

In the Federalist—that ablest, wisest, and most far sighted of all constitutional expositions—no evidence can be found that the makers of our Federal Constitution deemed it possible that such a deadlock would occur. They provided a court of appeal in the event of a tie in the Electoral College, but it never entered into their heads that States would be so indifferent to their representation at the National Capital as to allow a State Legislature to adjourn without having filled a vacancy in the United States Senate. Had any such objection been raised to the scheme of the Constitution, it would, no doubt, have been laughed to scorn even by the enemies of the Constitution, so jealous were the States of all that they were allowed. One never could have persuaded James Madison that a portion of the then State of Virginia would, a hundred years thence, forfeit one-half its representation in the Senate to the obstinacy of five men.

Such a thing could not be if patriotism were at its proper level, or partisanship were more exacting and absolute. Behind such a deadlock there must be something of the feeling that the country will thrive quite as well without the additional Senator as with him—a feeling not altogether without reasonable basis. Factional feeling dominates. The patriotic impulse is subordinated. Here is an indication that the issues at stake in the politics of to-day are not great enough to draw out the higher qualities in men. At a time of intense national, sectional, or party feeling there would be a coercive sentiment in the community that would compel the putting under of personal bias and factional fight for control. Hitherto the one strong argument in favor of the popular election of Senators has been the notorious corruption of legislatures by wealthy aspirants. Henceforward the deadlock will play a part in this agitation. The people will demand a method by which they may be made certain of full representation in the Upper House.

The one question that is to be determined by thoughtful men in considering the advisability of the election of Senators by the direct vote of the people, is as to which method would send the ablest and safest men to the Senate. It is probable that the strong men of the Senate would remain there if the system of election were changed. In this State neither Mr. Perkins nor Mr. White were elected by money, and both were popular leaders before being elected. Their chances of reelection would be improved, we should say, rather than diminished by the change. Mr. Hill of New York could have been elected to the Senate quite as easily as he was to the Governorship. But his colleague, Mr. Murphy, the Erie brewer, would have remained at home. Mr. Sherman could carry Ohio at the polls, but not so Mr. Brice. Most of the New England Senators rose from the House, indicating their strength with the people. So we might go through the country and find that the live and able men, those nearest approaching to statesmanship in the Senate, are strong with the people of their States and, therefore, need not fear any such change as is proposed. On the other hand, the men who have bought their way to the honor, and those who are but accidents, would find a seat in the Senate more difficult of attainment. The Upper House would then be made up of those thought worthy of promotion from the Lower House, a selected as well as select Legislative chamber.

A COMPLIMENT FROM NIHILISTS.

There are always troubles for Congress. If that body is active it is accused of being rashly radical, and if, in its struggle to be safely conservative it manages to do nothing, criticism of an adverse nature is not slow in finding expression. But seldom has Congress rested under such a load as now. It has stirred the wrath of the Russian Nihilists of Chicago and they have not only given voice, not unmixed with alcoholic fumes, to their disapproval, but have gone so far as to burn Senator Lodge in effigy. To be burned in effigy is not a particularly uncommon experience. It has never injured anybody. On the contrary, it has branded the burners as vicious, but too ignorant to find an intelligent method of conveying a sense of their disapprobation.

There is no reason, perhaps, to be lost in admiration of Senator Lodge. He is not, in the councils of the Nation, a towering figure. He talks much and not always wisely, and has succeeded on numerous occasions in acquiring a deep-seated and not wholly baseless dislike. But between the opinion of Senator Lodge and that of a lot of Russians who barely escaped exile to Siberia, who have known the touch of the knout, we must confess to a tendency to pin faith to Mr. Lodge. He thinks that there should be a more stringent assorting of immigrants, that the ignorant, the criminal, and the pauperized should be denied the privilege of landing here, and in this he is so indubitably correct that even the weighty hostility of the Nihilists cannot controvert his theory, nor his burning in effigy utterly overthrow the position he has assumed.

It is true that America has always welcomed the oppressed, but it is equally true that the time has come when the line must be drawn. When the oppressed drift naturally to jail after their arrival or are hanged before they have had time to become civilized and naturalized; or when they band themselves into groups of Nihilists and rail at the Government here as bitterly as they railed at monarchy abroad, then they forfeit all claim to consideration. San Francisco had an experience with victims of kingly cruelty when a boatload of escapes from Siberia landed at this port. They were received with open arms, and they repaid the debt. Several of them are in the penitentiary for such crimes as burglary, one was slain while attempting to rob a man on the highway, and one met on the gibbet a fate richly earned by double murder. These might be taken for isolated cases of depravity, and held to have nothing in common with the stream entering United States ports by regular methods, save for the existence of such aggregations of ingratitude as the Russian Nihilists, the Italian Mafia, and the anarchists embracing the scum of all the nationalities that in America find their cities of refuge.

In the instance under consideration, Senator Lodge stands for a principle upon which depends the welfare of this great nation, and in burning him in effigy the Nihilists burned in effigy every man who believes a foreign scoundrel or a foreign ignoramus should remain on his native shores, since he has demonstrated that if permitted to come here he will neither reform nor learn. Crime is often his chosen field, and in a lack of knowledge he finds a strange and lasting joy. The Association of Russian Nihilists, if bent on becoming useful, and in liberating friends yet forced to live under the iron rule of the Czar, could be viewed with patience, but this is not the line of conduct they prescribe for themselves. They choose still to remain haters of the government, none the less because it is a different government from the one they knew at home. They do not stop to inquire about it. They do not read about it, for they scorn to lay aside the language of their nativity, and so are not able to read, save the insane vituperation published by aliens in the interest of disorder. Because Senator Lodge does not encourage such outcasts to come here and nurture their doctrines, they conclude that he is not worthy. If he is a vain man it is natural to suppose that just now he is puffed with pride. The most scathing rebuke that the Nihilists could administer would be a compliment to decency.

As the country progresses, poverty is inevitable. From poverty ignorance springs, and crime is its companion. There is no need to import poverty, nor to send across the water to secure ready-made lawbreakers. They are here in an abundance that is more than plenty, and in themselves constitute a grave problem. The neglect to stop the inflow of the undesirable is an exhibition of cowardice, and is to be explained on no other ground. The Nihilist becomes a voter.

Altogether, upon analysis, this new burden placed upon Congress is not an onerous one. Properly construed, it is a compliment. The Congress that achieves the disapproval of the Nihilist has in it much that is good, and when it is burned in effigy by the alien mob, the blaze is a halo and the smoke an incense.

COMMENTARIES ON THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. Roger Foster, lecturer on federal jurisprudence in the law courts at Yale University, has issued, under the auspices of the Boston Book Company, quite a pretentious work in three volumes, entitled, Commentaries of the Constitution of the United States, Historical and Judicial. The first volume, which has just come to hand, is quite exhaustive of the several topics of which it treats. The introduction considers up paper constitutions, hostility to the Federal Constitution, the anarchy preceding the Federal convention, and deals with the prototypes and models of the Federal Constitution, the compromise made in its drafting and the result of the Federal convention. Chapter II. takes up the nature of the Constitution and the Preamble, and gives the significance of a number of words and phrases. The lawyer will find that the author has exhausted every topic with which he has attempted to deal, and, in addition to this, adds to his chapters upon a given point, when the occasion requires, an appendix which throws sidelights upon the subject matter, and encompasses in one volume matter heretofore not obtainable except by prolonged research. Two instances of this are found in the second chapter, which deals with the nature of the Constitution and the Preamble, the appendix to which contains, verbatim et literatim, an act concerning alien sedition laws, Virginia resolutions of 1798, Kentucky resolutions of 1798 and 1799, first ordinance of nullification and second ordinance of nullification. Again, in Chapter XIII., which deals most exhaustively with the subject of impeachment, there is attached an appendix of State impeachment trials covering some eighty pages, that is, in fact, a text-book in itself, on impeachment. The value of a work such as this to the student, as well as to the careful lawyer, cannot be over-estimated.

The book not only contains what might be termed a digest of all the judicial decisions bearing on the Constitution, but it also gives very full extracts of all the important State papers referring to the same subject, including Presidents' messages, resolutions of Congress, and reports of the committees of both Houses. Many of the latter are only to be found in a few of the leading libraries. Here, the substance of the opinions thus expressed is set forth in the text, and references are made to the sources of authority in copious footnotes. The author fortifies his conclusions by citations such as we refer to. These citations are partly from decisions of the U. S. Supreme Court and Courts of Appeal of several States on important constitutional questions that have been considered by those august tribunals, and also are taken from such valuable state papers as Madison's papers, John Adams's works, Maine on Popular Government, and the Federalist.

The article on secession, showing the action of the several States that formed the Confederacy, is very interesting, as is also the Constitutional History of the Confederacy. A comparison of the various sections in that constitution with the Constitution of the United States shows that our Southern brethren possessed advanced ideas in constitution-making that have outlived the defeat of battle. Among others first adopted by the Confederacy, was that giving the President the power to veto any item in an appropriation bill; this wise provision has since been copied into the constitution of nearly one-half of the States of the Union, including that of our own State. The appendix to Chapter VI. contains two valuable papers on the apportionment of Representatives; one from the pen of Thomas Jefferson, which discusses the Act of 1792, and the other by Daniel Webster, which was a very exhaustive report on the subject at a time when Congress was considering the apportionment of 1832.

The masterly manner in which the author analyzes each separate clause of the Constitution, showing the origin, which, in many cases, antedated its consideration by our Constitution framers; the clear account of the proceedings in the convention which adopted it; and the comparisons made with similar provisions in other constitutions, stamp the work as a most valuable treatise on the subject. We shall await the coming of the two succeeding volumes with expectancy and also the hope that they will follow the high plane pursued by the author in the volume before us.

CAUSERIE.

BY JOHN BONNER.

The Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections has authorized Senator Mitchell to report a Constitutional Amendment providing for the election of Senators by popular vote. There seems to be some prospect of its passing. If it does, it is pretty certain to be accepted by the House, and ratified by the requisite number of States. In that case, the Federal Legislature would consist of two bodies, elected by the same constituency, and only differing from each other in the length of their term of service. Why would not one body suffice?

* * *

Charles Dudley Warner defines a "strong" story as one which verges on indecency, or is hysterical, or disagreeable, or repellant, or morbid, or tragical. He declares that that is the sort of story which the modern reader wants, and that the end-century man and woman crave ugliness, misfortune, suffering unrelieved, vulgar surroundings, dissolute characters, and an undeserved fate. If that is so, end-century people are much to be pitied. There is better material for good novels in the comedy than in the tragedy of real life. La comédie humaine is ever changing, whereas sorrow and death are always the same. In the evolution of civilization, new situations and new characters are always turning up with infinite comic aspects. Each generation begets new themes for laughter, as the old themes grow commonplace and threadbare. Drollery, pleasantry, humor, and wit, and the taste for them, are immortal.

* * *

The newest strike is that of the house-painters, who want three dollars a day, and who, by striking, are throwing out of work the great body of the carpenters, plasterers, plumbers, and other workmen in the building trades. They are pursuing the usual methods. Chairman Rose defined the position of the Union by saying that "laborers should only do laborers' work, and should under no circumstances be allowed to do the work of a skilled mechanic." At Strogen's building, on the corner of Octavia and Fulton Streets, a walking delegate found three men and a boy working. He induced two of the men to knock off work; the third said he was Strogen's brother-in-law, and was helping him out. The delegate warned him to stop work, and added that "he would return in twenty minutes, and if the brother-in-law was not away, it would not be well for him."

* * *

Jerry Lynch, the new President of the Hale & Norcross, is having a taste of the labor unions' quality. When he assumed control, he appointed Mr. Tangerman superintendent; whereupon the miners refused to work under him, threw up their jobs, and left the mine. Their action was indorsed by the Miners' Unions. If any miner at Virginia City attempts to take their place, he will do so at the risk of his life. Thus the mine is run, not by the owners or the trustees, or the president, but by the men who work underground. And, then, people wonder the mines on the Comstock do not pay dividends.

* * *

The issue which has been raised at the Hale & Norcross is the problem of the mining industry on this coast. It is whether the mines shall be run by their owners, or by aggregations of workmen known as unions. Twenty years ago the miners fixed the rate of wages at $4 a shift, and denied the right of apprentices —even their own sons—to go underground to learn the trade. The industry was ruined; a few ores were rich enough to afford $4 a shift; most of them were not, though they might have been worked at $2 or $3; and the consequence was that all mines were shut down except those which were kept running for the sake of the mills. By an ingenious system of tricks, all that was in the ore went to the mill owner and the working miner; nothing was ever left for the owners of the mine.

* * *

When Jerry Lynch undertook to capture the Hale & Norcross, he did not foresee that he was going to grapple with the vital problem of Pacific Coast mining. It has been sprung upon him, and he has got to solve it or give it up. He is just the man to solve it, if it can be solved; ingenious, intrepid, persevering, and determined. But he may just as well realize now as later, that it is a fight to a finish between him and the unions.

* * *

A bank official, who has been for twenty years connected with a leading bank in this city, has resigned, intending, as he says, to make the experiment of trying to live in London on £400—say $2000—a year. The gentleman has lived a hundred and fifty years too late. Doctor Johnson told Boswell that "£30 a year was enough to live on in London without being contemptible." He allowed £10 for clothes and linen; one shilling six pence a week for a garret, six pence for dinner, and a penny for breakfast. By spending three pence at a coffee-house, he might be for some hours every day in very good company; on clean shirt day, he might go abroad and pay visits.

* * *

On March 13th, Queen Victoria, who has been Sovereign of Great Britain for 59 years, met for the first time Francis Joseph, who has been 48 years Sovereign of Austro-Hungary. What a curious interview it must have been! The Queen is eleven years older than the Emperor; she had been on the British throne for the same number of years when Francis Joseph assumed the sceptre of Austria. She was the mother of seven children when the Emperor married. Though he is a man of 66, and must be looking forward to his release from royal cares, he has probably not forgotten the time when, as a boy in jacket and pinafore, he read in the papers of the statesmanlike speeches delivered to Parliament by the youthful Queen of England. What a prodigious array of reminiscences these two old people must have had to exchange!

* * *

Philip Becker Goetz must have had the American correspondent in Cuba in his eye when he wrote the epitaph beginning with the lines:

> He lived on lies, and won such warm applause
> That truth became to him an eyeless myth.

* * *

Those who are fond of ghost stories should read Meade Falkner's Lord Stradivarius. The ghost has a faint flavor of Frankenstein, though it is not a monster, but a fascinating fiend, whose unspeakable and unimaginable wickedness freezes the marrow in one's bones. The ghost is recalled to life by strains of music which he loved during his earthly existence; then he falls in love, and the evil spirit dominates and wrecks his post mortem-life.

* * *

The memorable passage at arms in Midshipman Easy, known as the triangular duel, is being repeated by the leaders of the Republican party. From his earthworks at Columbus, Governor McKinley is taking pot-shots at Tom Reed, who is waiting, under cover of a bulwark of Congressional Rules, for his foe to expose a vulnerable part of his anatomy; and genial Mr. Allison, at the head of a party of mounted Cossacks, is harassing both with a stinging flank fire. Thus far, all three avoid the open. But that cannot last. As convention time draws near, they will all send their skirmishers into the field, and we shall then learn that McKinley robbed a church, that Reed throttled his grandmother, and that Allison never went sober to bed a single night of his life. The glory of our beloved country is the freedom of the press.

* * *

The land swarms with politicians who are making reconnaissances in force for the fall campaign. It is settled that the Democrats need not go to the trouble of making a nomination; the only question at issue is which of the Republicans will divide the honor and the glory and the profit of victory. Sitting in a luxurious parlor of the Palace, a famous wirepuller from the East was heard to mutter a day or two since: "Shall we not divide the prey? To every man a damsel or two; to Sisera a prey of divers colors, a prey of divers colors of needlework, of divers colors of needlework on both sides, meet for the necks of those that take the spoil."

* * *

The crusade against big hats at the theaters is being conducted with vigor in New York under the lead of Harper's Weekly. There, as here, the tenacious adherents of the odious fashion belong either to the lowest grade of the roture, or to the demimonde. Where a young woman wears a monstrous head-covering at the Baldwin, and waggles her head like a Chinese Mandarin, it is safe betting that her address is either in South San Francisco or in the tenderloin, and no usher need have any scruples in inviting her to take a seat in the upper gallery. There is talk in the East of reviving the old English custom of having a gallery especially set apart for Traviata; all the big hats would naturally be assigned to that part of the house.

* * *

The 400 in New York have gone into the ice business, having served an apprenticeship by freezing out aspirants to social honors. They have hired a big building with an area of 200,000 square feet and converted the ground floor into a skating rink. The ice is made by chemical process from distilled water and is to be known as hygeia ice. After the beaux and belles have skated on it all winter, the Company will sell the ice in summer to consumers who are willing to pay a fancy price. A similar institution flourishes in Paris; the temperature is kept all summer at a freezing point, and ladies in furs flock there to get cool, and to listen to songs by such vocalists as Yvette Guilbert. Perhaps it might be worth while to try such an establishment here in connection with the Lurline Baths.

MISS JUGGERNAUT'S CAR.

BY JULIET WILBOR TOMPKINS.

I.

It is barely two miles to the Early English Station, and as I don't have to take the first train, I generally walk down. When I am about a quarter of a mile on my way, I sometimes see a commotion ahead of me. Teams pull out of the road, coachmen shorten up their lines and get their whips ready, and pedestrians show a nervous desire to get over the fence. There is a roar behind me, a thunder of hoofs ending in a clash at my side, and when I come to, Stephanie is looking down at me from the seat of a trap several miles high, while an Early English groom clings to the heads of two panting, snorting horses.

"I'll drive you down, if you like," she says. "I'm going for the mail."

"It is very kind of you," I answer, recovering my wits sufficiently to take off my hat, "but I think I'll walk. I want the exercise."

"Hurry up," says Stephanie, impatiently. "They hate to stand." The off horse rears a little and the on one playfully taps the dashboard with his heels, to bear her out.

"I've horses of my own, you know," I say, climbing up beside her. "I needn't walk if I didn't want to."

"Oh, yours!" she says, scornfully, flourishing her whip. There is a sudden plunge forward, followed by a slight thump behind, which means that the Early English groom has hit the seat. His aim is very good; we have never succeeded in losing him yet."

"I wish you wouldn't look so nervous," she says, presently. "I always drive twice as fast when people hold on to the seat and glare at the horses. It makes me reckless." I relax my gaze, though still careful to keep my feet disentangled from the rug. "We will go the long way," she adds. "There is plenty of time."

"Did you know that the Harts had a burglar scare last night?" I say, casually. Stephanie turns pale.

"No!" she says, with a little gasp. "How perfectly dreadful! It will be our turn next, you'll see. Oh, I wish you hadn't told me! I shall lie awake all night long." I smile contentedly.

"It is only in real life, Stephanie," I say, "that people are as gloriously inconsistent as you. Here you think nothing of driving wild horses all over the country, while the word 'burglar' sends you into hysterics. You couldn't put that into a book; nobody would believe you."

"How many were there?" she interrupts. "Did they get much?"

"I said a scare. I was going on to explain that it proved to be the butler coming home from a celebration. Butlers are apt to be intemperate. That's why we don't keep one."

Stephanie looks relieved, then glances suspiciously at me. I whistle softly under my breath, which is a good thing to do if you are afraid of looking conscious or giving yourself away. She frowns, and touches up the off horse to get even with me, and for the next few minutes there isn't time to do anything but wish one had led a better life, or carried an accident policy.

"Have you met the bride yet?" I asked, presently, when the worst is over.

"Yes, I called yesterday. She's dreadful."

"Why, I thought everybody——"

"Oh, she's nice enough, but she's so abominably domestic!" The corners of Stephanie's mouth curve down contemptuously over the word. "The kind of a woman that goes to market, and keeps accounts, and watches at the window for her husband. You know the type."

"She might have worse faults than those," I begin, cautiously.

"She has," says Stephanie. "She actually gets up and takes breakfast with her husband every morning, and he goes on the early train. She says nobody else can pour his coffee to suit him. Did you ever hear anything so idiotic?"

"I don't mind people's being a little silly when they are just married," I say, deprecatingly. "I think I'd like to be myself for a week or so, if I married the girl I——"

"Listen!" exclaims Stephanie, lifting her head. "Is that the train?"

It is the train, unmistakably, and we are some distance from the station. She swings her whip and off we go at a frantic gallop, spinning a butcher's cart out of our way and grazing the heels of scudding humanity. The train is already in motion when we dash up to the station. Oh, for the agility and training of an Early English groom! I catch the rail of the last car and ride horizontally for a second or two, until I can bring my feet down to the step. I get a flying glimpse of Stephanie waving her whip and laughing, then climb into the car, with clothes disheveled and nerves unstrung, in a highly exasperated frame of mind. But it's absolutely nothing to the temper I'm in on the days when Stephanie doesn't go for the mail.

II.

"You'll miss your train if you walk," said Stephanie. "I started a great deal later than usual."

We compare watches, and though I am right and she is wrong, I end by weakly climbing up beside her.

"I was exactly right yesterday," I am beginning all over again, when a sharp pain just above my left shoe makes me start.

"What in Cain—!" I exclaim, and, diving under the seat, fish out a white bull puppy with an imbecile expression and a mouth apparently full of pins.

"Oh, I had forgotten Chauncey," Stephanie says. "Isn't he a lamb? I bought him yesterday."

"I hope it isn't another case of Tommy," I say, extricating the puppy's playful teeth from the hem of my trousers. Tommy was a Gordon setter, bought for a large sum, who surprised and grieved his mistress by becoming a mother.

"Isn't he precious?" she says, ignoring my remark. "Wait till I make him worry the reins. Shake 'em, Chauncey."

"I wish you'd look where you are driving," I put in. "You came within an ace of running over a little girl back there. Just think of the time you'd have squaring it with her family if you did."

"They wouldn't mind. Children are horrid little nuisances, anyway," answered Stephanie. "They always spill things over you, and expect you to kiss them when they are sticky."

"Wait till there is a little Stephanie, and you will change your mind," I say, patronizingly. Stephanie leans back and smiles.

"There won't be any," she says.

"I can see her driving four-in-hand at the age of six," I go on. "You'd begin to lace her up at seven."

"Wouldn't I, though. She'd have a good figure if she didn't have anything else." Stephanie presses her disengaged hand on her hip, and pulls herself up a little, a gesture not uncommon among girls who are stunning of figure.

"And powder her nose at eight," I continue, with a critical glance under the broad brim of her picture hat.

"And continue her right eyebrow with a lead pencil, if it was defective," adds Stephanie, unblushingly. A certain tendency to tell the truth is the one flaw in her character.

"I wonder what sort of a fellow you'll marry," I say, musingly. "Rich, of course. Would you marry for money?"

"No, I wouldn't," she answers with decision, but spoils the effect by adding, "I wouldn't marry without it, though."

"Oh!" is my comment.

"Well, how could I?" she demands. "You know I'm naturally extravagant. I can't help it. If I could find a man rich enough to pay all my back bills I think I would fall in love with him out of sheer respect. You know yourself I'd ruin a poor man in six weeks."

"Stephanie," I say, impressively, "if ever a man is fortunate enough to gain your love and win you for his wife——" Stephanie puts on a bored expression and begins to snap the long whiplash, "then God help him!" I finish. She looks relieved, and smiles genially.

"He'll need it," she says, with a complacent nod.

We reach the little town too early for the train, and drive around to the postoffice for Stephanie's mail. She glances through the notes and tears up the bills.

"They'll send them again," she explains; "they always do. Let's see what's in the paper." She hands me the lines and turns to the society page. Suddenly she begins to laugh. "Your engagement is reported again," she says. "Whom do you suppose it is to this time?"

"Who is the lucky girl?" I ask.

"I myself—God help you!" she says, with a little chuckle.

I glance up under the picture hat, but find only amusement, so I exclaim, "How perfectly ridiculous!" and roar with laughter.

"Shall we authoritatively deny it, or simply ignore it?" she asks.

"Oh, we can live it down," I answer. "I've had worse things than that said about me."

"I don't know that I have," she murmured.

"We might try living it down together," I am fool enough to say.

Stephanie gives a startled exclamation, and pulls out her watch.

"There, you've missed your train," she says. "We can't possibly make it now. Don't you hear it on the bridge? Well, you will only have an hour to wait, and you would have missed it anyway if you had walked. Au revoir, I must be off." I climb down in sulky dignity.

"Good morning. Thank you very much for the ride," I say, with cutting politeness, as I start for the station.

"Oh, do come back, just a second," Stephanie calls "I want you." I glance over my shoulder, and am turned into an abject idiot, which is less imposing than a pillar of salt.

"Well?" I say, leaning on the wheel.

"It's just—would you mind lifting Chauncey up on the seat?" she says. "Thank you so much. Well, good-by. Don't forget that your watch is slow."

III.

"Well," Stephanie begins, "how did you enjoy the funeral?" She has driven down to the station to meet her father, but he has missed his train, as he generally does when his daughter has elected to be his coachman, and she has picked me up in his place.

"He was a very good friend to me," I answer, gravely, wondering if there is anybody on earth whose funeral would dampen Stephanie's spirits. "I was awfully fond of the dear old man."

"That's too bad," she says, with vague politeness; then, feeling that she has done her duty in the line of condolence, she goes on, cheerfully, "I never went to but one funeral, and it was horrid. I vowed I'd never go to another."

"Except your own," I suggest.

"Yes, I shouldn't like to miss that," she admits. "And there are one or two others I'd go to with pleasure. Aunt Dora's, for instance." I look up, scandalized. "I could stand her," Stephanie goes on, "if she wasn't always wanting me to bring some sewing up to her room and have a 'cozy chat.' I-mag-ine—a cozy chat. Could anything be more dreadful?"

"Call it a tête-à-tête, and it isn't half bad," I say.

"Yes, it is, when she begins on 'A Daughter's Place in the Home,' or 'The Sinfulness of Encouraging a Young Man and Breaking His Heart,' or 'The Holy Joy of Wifehood and Motherhood.' She inveigled me into darning a pair of father's socks once, because it would please him so if his little girl did it; but the darns blistered his poor heels so badly that he said I'd better leave it to Jane after this. Aunt Dora almost wept about it. Don't you think I'm a saint, to get along peacefully with a woman like that?"

I take a good survey of the face beside me, whose beauty is certainly not saintlike, and feel two equally strong desires within me, one of which is to box her aristocratic little ears.

"Stephanie, haven't you any vital organs?" I ask, sorrowfully. "Are you nothing but sawdust and valenciennes?"

"There's considerable whalebone," she answers, placidly. "If you're going to lecture, I'll make the horses cut up."

"How well you do it," I break out, after a little pause. She evidently thinks I refer to her driving (we have just been trying to trade wheels with a passing carriage) and looks gratified. "It is an art to be as thoroughly, deeply frivolous as you are," I continue. "You are the only woman I ever knew who had the courage to carry it out to its last detail. Most of them backslide and show occasional glimpses of heart or conscience or feeling, or are weak enough to be really in earnest once in a while, but no one could ever bring such charges against you. You are perfect in your role."

Stephanie stares at me in open-eyed amazement as I speak, then smiles ironically.

"Wasn't the funeral a success?" she asks. "Or did it miss its little cocktail to-day?"

"Oh, I know it is breath wasted," I say, looking fixedly ahead. "One might as well try to raise feeling in a spring tooth harrow. If ever you marry, it will be your husband's income that will have to come up to your ideals, not himself." She flicks the whip back and forth, and we are careful not to look at each other for some minutes.

"No, I couldn't marry a poor man," she says at last, with unexpected mildness. "We would both be utterly wretched. You know it as well as I do."

"But if you loved him?"

"Spring tooth harrows don't love," she says, with a little laugh.

We drive on in silence for a mile or so, while I mentally pat down the earth on a certain diminutive grave and compose a neat little epitaph for its headstone. There is a relief in knowing the worst, when you were sure of it anyway.

"I suppose the will will be in to-night's papers," says Stephanie, breaking in on my private funeral. "Did he leave much to charity?"

"Yes, a good deal," I answer, "but more to his wife's relatives. He hadn't any of his own. If Harold had lived, he would have had it all." She sighs.

"Why couldn't he have left you a million or so," she says, pulling up at my gate. "One little million out of all his money wouldn't have been missed, and it would have been so nice for you."

"Well, you see, he did," I answer, preparing to get down. Stephanie almost drops the reins.

"He did? Really?" I nod in a matter-of-course way. "But why? What made him?"

"Well, partly because the Henry in my name was for him, and partly because I was Harold's great chum all his life, and partly, I suppose, because he was fond of me." Stephanie holds out her hand, frankly radiant.

"How perfectly lovely!" she says. "It's the nicest thing I ever heard of!" We shake hands, and she gives mine an undeniable squeeze, neither coquettish nor insinuating, but openly joyous.

"It's simply perfect," she repeats. "You must tell me all about it to-morrow. I'm going for the mail, and I'll take you to your train. Good night."

She is off at her usual pace, and I turn in through the gate. The facts are unchanged; but the small grave I have taken such pains with is all tumbled up, and the emaciated little figure I have buried so carefully is grinning at me, fat and healthy, from the top of his own headstone.

San Francisco, March 21, 1896.

PUBLIC PEOPLE.

"Mr. Whistler," said a certain English Duchess, "I was at Richmond the other day, and the view of the river was almost as beautiful as one of your pictures. Now Whistler's begin to look like nature has begun to look up."

The deposed Monarch of Burmah, King Thebaw, was asked by a firm of cigar-makers to write them a testimonial in favor of a certain brand of cigars. His ex-Majesty was pretty hard up at the time, and the testimonial meant a large "consideration," so he loosed the floodgates of his eloquence to this effect: "My late father, the Royal Mindom Min, the Golden-Footed Lord of the White Elephant, Master of the Thousand Umbrellas, Governor of the Sun, the Moon, and the Universe and Master of the Royal Peacocks, smoked the Esoof Cheroot whilst meditating upon the punishment to be dealt out to the mud-eating and frog-drowned inhabitants of England. But I, in the madness of youth—I was tempted to smoke the vile trash sent me from San Francisco—and I fell. Thebaw, formerly King."

Sir Arthur Sullivan has just confessed that he does not always work with the rapidity ascribed to him. "When the fever is on me and the subject excites my fancy I can turn out four numbers in a day. On the other hand, I have spent a week over a single song, setting it over and over again until I felt the melody interpreted the story of the words. I have thrown in the fire dozens of tunes that might have been used as 'pot-boilers' and sold to the music shops on the strength of the popularity of my name. But into the flames they went, and they never can rise up against me. There was a song, "The Merryman and the Maid," that gave me infinite trouble. I really believe I spent a fortnight over that blessed jingle, and must have set and reset it a dozen times before I was content."

Christina Rosselli, the poetess, was twice sought in marriage, and in each instance was well disposed to her suitor, but was withheld by religious considerations. The first suitor, a painter, was a Christian, but not in the Anglican Communion. The second, a scholar and literary man—and this was far the more serious affair of the two—either was not a Christian at all or else was a Christian of undefined and heterodox views. The first matter terminated toward 1850, the second toward 1864. Both men died during Christina's lifetime.

Patti is said to choose her servants for Craig-y-nos with an eye to their vocal powers rather than to their domestic attainments. The castle is always full of company, and as operatic performances in the theater of the castle are of constant occurrence Mme. Patti must recruit her troupe from the servants' hall. Patti is said to be such an admirable manager that the double advocations of her servants never clash. She pays them very large wages and treats them as companions. The little opera house costs her about fifty thousand dollars a year.

Queen Victoria has only once or twice availed herself of the privilege of driving down the middle of Rotten Row—a prerogative belonging exclusively to the reigning sovereign. From this ancient privilege came the name "Route due Roi," contracted into "Rotten Row."

Mr. Robert Barr, whose new novel, A Woman Intervenes, is just published, is a Scotchman by birth, a Canadian by early association, an American by immigration, and an Englishman by long residence. He has just returned to London from a visit to Germany, where he has been living in a castle that was begun in the year 1200. He took his typewriting machine with him, and has written a fourteenth century romance, with the castle for a background. When Mr. Barr first went to London, he and Rudyard Kipling lived in chambers together.

During the past year Sandow has become a confirmed bicyclist. He did not at first give his approval to this form of exercise, thinking it developed the leg muscles only. In his exhibitions at Proctor's Pleasure Palace, Sandow has demonstrated that he is much stronger than he was a year ago. He has increased his single finger lift from 600 pounds to 750, while the dumbbell that he raises with one hand weighs 255 pounds, an increase of 50 pounds over that of last year. His harness lift has been increased from 5,800 to 6,100 pounds.

Mr. F. H. Cowen, Sir Charles Hallé's successor at Manchester, is one of the most prolific and popular of English composers. Since 1876 he has published six cantatas, three operas, two oratorios, and countless minor works. For some years he acted as conductor of the London Philharmonic Society and of Her Majesty's Opera House, and in 1888 he was invited specially to visit Melbourne to preside over the music at the great exhibition. He is only forty-four years old.

Mr. Gosling, the well-known banker, who died recently, left £900,000, to be divided among seven sons and seven daughters. He was himself one of twelve children, and represented the fifth generation of bankers of his name who had carried on the business at "The Three Squirrels," opposite St. Dunstan's Church, in Fleet Street, for nearly two hundred and fifty years.

Each ton of coal used by the principal gas companies of London costs, on the average, 11s. 10d.; but as it produces 12cwt. of coke, 10 gallons of tar, and other risiduals, which sell altogether for about 7s. 10½d., the net cost of the coal is reduced to a little under 4s. per ton. A ton of coal produces between 9000 and 10,000 feet of gas.

THINGS AND PEOPLE.

THE LATEST "scoop" story in journalism records the success of Tom Sullivan of the Examiner, who obtained the verdict of the ministers in the Doctor Brown case some twenty-four hours before his rivals. Throughout the progress of this celebrated cause he seems to have had advantages which kept his competitors wondering, and they were all watching that he should not distance them in the final heat; but when on the last day they gathered at the door of the Assembly Room of the First Congregational Church, inside which the good men were deliberating, lo! there was no Sullivan. A stranger was there in his place, who represented the other as too ill to appear. That was not convincing for the anxious scribes, who surmised at once their slippery rival had found a way into the Council Chamber itself. It devolved on them, therefore, to equalize, somehow or other, the situation. Among the journalists detailed on the case was a capable young woman from the Chronicle and a bright reporter from the Call, who took counsel together and found a way in the emergency. The Congregational Church adjoins Bridges's livery stables in the Hobart Block, but between it and the church there is an alleyway, by which the Council Chamber derives light and air. Behind is the Native Sons' Building, with windows commanding the same alleyway, the entrance to which is guarded by iron gates securely locked.

In their desperate extremity, the two reporters determined to secure a location at the Council window, and Proprietor Bridges befriended them. After due deliberation, the young lady and the Call man were carefully lowered by the agency of a rope ladder and safety gearing from an aperture in the Hobart Building, and then comfortably settled themselves at the coveted window. From within rose the hum of voices, and it was quite possible to catch the words of the discussion. In fact, the stratagem had proved a brilliant success, when another journalist, the representative of an evening paper, saw the situation from the Native Sons' Building. This young man had tried the window himself and he was determined to keep the morning dailies out of the verdict, which he believed they could obtain in no way save by listening. So he went below and dug up a cobble from Mason Street and returning to his vantage point, flung it forcefully against the glass, skinning by a span the faces of the listeners. It was a mean trick for which he should be ostracized. It crashed through with a terrible report. Instantly the two reporters made a dash for cover. The Call man climbed the gate, and, there being nothing else for it, the Chronicle's representative was forced to the same extremity, skirts and all. A moment later, the sexton and two ministers were raging through the alleyway, but the birds had flown. Next morning the two papers had partially accurate accounts of the proceedings, with wild guesses at the verdict, while Sullivan, by favor of a certain church official, had heard the entire proceeding from an interior point of vantage, and was enabled to publish the exact summary of what transpired. I am told the achievement cost the Examiner a small fortune in liquor, for the official in question needed much priming and had developed an inextinguishable partiality for champagne.

* * *

Reverting again to that interesting subject—the vicissitudes of fortune—there is told a curious yarn about the Black Oak Mine. This property has just come into the possession of a syndicate in return for $300,000, and some prominent gentlemen with more than a passing knowledge of quartz are bewailing their lack of patience. The Black Oak was owned by the Scotts of Tuolumne and two Stockton men, and has been figured by such an expert as Captain Neville of the Rawhide as a capital property. For something like $60,000 it was acquired by Mr. Ewing of Oakland and several French capitalists, who spent some $20,000 in developments. When down a few hundred feet the prospect of gold seemed poor, for the ore was thin and the ledge slim. So they sent to the mine an expert—a gentleman of the old school—one of those antiques to whose mind quartz under fifty dollars per ton is worthless. He carefully inspected the shaft and the croppings, and warned his patrons off the premises. "Better get out at once," he advised, and they did. Back came the mine into the hands of the Scotts, who, with their newly acquired funds, promptly continued the development. Inside of a week they laid bare the apex of a new ledge of extreme richness, and soon afterwards they uncovered rock showing by measurement $150,000 of gold. The new combination is better prepared to sustain the expense of development than they, however, and doubtless we will soon hear of the Black Oak as among the important gold producers.

* * *

Corral Hollow, where the coal mines are situated, promises to become an important center of industrial activity. Quite a village is growing up around the pit mouth; the railway which is to convey the product to tide water is nearly finished, and in a few months more the great problem of cheap fuel will have been solved, practically, for the bay counties. Among the important enterprises hinging on the scheme is the project of a syndicate of Oakland men to utilize the slack. There is ever a great waste of this material round a mine, for it does not pay to transport, and is produced in too large quantities to be consumed. But it can be converted into power, and the new idea is to establish in the Hollow an electric plant of great capacity, and to supply light and power to manufacturing establishments in Oakland, Martinez, Livermore, and other neighboring towns. There is no prospect of obtaining natural power nearer at hand, for Alameda County does not rejoice in any miniature Niagaras. The enterprise is a notable one, and may mean much to our Athens. It is bold enough to deserve success, too. The arrangements perfected with the Coal Company give to the projectors the privilege of obtaining the slack in return, I am told, for a fair-sized block of stock in the new concern. Imagine all the fly wheels in Oakland buzzing under the influence of distant electricity, and not a wisp of smoke in the sky. It seems, but is not, an Arcadian ideal.

* * *

THE DIVINITY SYSTEM of the Democracy has undergone revolution. No longer are the gods in their old places on Olympus. A new and younger and brighter generation has arisen which knoweth not the power of their names. No longer is it presumption for a young man to aspire to office, nor is it probable that the places will henceforth be awarded to ancient celebrities. In olden days half a dozen of the Chivalry settled the destinies of the party over a basket of champagne. That procedure is out of date. Two years back it would have seemed audacious to mention more than half a dozen names as Gubernatorial possibilities. Depend on it, there will be scores of aspirants for honors at the next Convention. I am led thus to comment on changed conditions by the meeting of the State Central Committee on Saturday last at which the turning-down of Buckley was so neatly and so effectively accomplished. Strange to say the familiar names were rather on the side of corruption than with the visitors, and the old leaders seemed to lack their erstwhile supremacy. The fact was developed there that Buckley essays to meet new conditions with the old game; that he is putting past political methods against men who, in generalship, are his superiors. The fact is the party has really outgrown its old leaders; it has emerged from bondage, and will in future rely for guidance on the vigorous young men who have recently forced themselves to the front. They have the advantage of fresh intellects and honest hearts, and to the party their participation in politics opens up broad prospects of success.

* * *

The defeat of Buckley, though a foregone conclusion, was not accomplished without a hard fight. The associated villainies were leagued in his cause, and the tactics of obstruction were freely resorted to. However, Gavin McNab was more than a match for the Blind Leader, and, for once playing a single-handed game, routed the opposition and achieved a notable victory for decency. No wonder the vanquished felt irritated against the conqueror, for he had beaten them at every point, frustrated their cunningly devised schemes, and showed that ingenuity and capacity at dealing with emergencies which marks the born leader. Of course, the Buckley contingent underrated McNab's ability and were oblivious to his influence in the country. But he came to the meeting armed with proxies and backed by the good-will of the Democracy. He permitted no diversions; met his opponent's taunts with return jibes; scared and scarified them in his speech, and won handily, with lots of strength to spare.

* * *

Even the bitterest opponents of Gavin McNab must admit he has now won his spurs. His name is familiar to the Democracy as a stanch opponent of Bossism and an earnest champion of reform. His stalwart individuality has been developed in contests against the common enemy, and he is now a force to be counted with in the political game. McNab has many times been on the verge of supremacy, but, in the past, he delegated the important posts to his lieutenants, who, when in power, forgot their creator. He is clever and cautious, a Scotchman by descent, cool, shrewd, and trenchant of speech. His ability as a manipulator, however, does not detract from his sterling honesty and loyalty, for, though he is notably able at harmonizing apparently irreconcilable forces and handling combinations, his arm and voice are ever on the side of right and justice, which, with his ability, explains his success. By profession McNab is a lawyer, and, as those who have met him in court know, he is as handy with law and argument as he is in a political contest, ready of wit and epithet, and a convincing and vigorous reasoner. The manner in which he met the onslaughts of Reel Terry and Porter Ashe, both bright men, in the Livingstone case, showed him no whit their inferior in legal badinage, and General A. L. Hart, whom he encountered and extinguished in a lawsuit at Sacramento recently, is now aware of McNab as a foeman worthy his steel. Mining law is his favorite branch of the profession, and he has built up a strong clientele of foreign and California mining capitalists.

* * *

Chairman Frank Gould is recovering from his unpopularity with Governor Budd, and is liable to appear prominently before the Democracy in the future. He is established in the profession of the law at Stockton, and when the Governor was Jim Budd, a mere Slough City lawyer, Frank was his most intimate friend. Success alienates more intimacies than misfortune, however, and by the time Gould had developed an ambition to be Harbor Commissioner, Budd discovered his inadequacy for the post. The fact is, however, the former, though not a man of great force, is an admirable talker, whose speeches have grace and point, and oratory is still a valuable component in Californian politics. He participated nobly in the battle against Buckley on Saturday, and aided Mr. McNab with his influence and votes. Apropos of that meeting, and the anti-Funding Bill resolutions, I am inclined to regard the expression as inimical to Buckley and his associations, rather than to the corporation. There was an unfortunate mingling of issues on that occasion most liable to promote confusion.

* * *

There is much exultation among the Examiner contingent over the success of the Journal, whose circulation, I am told, attained the 200,000 mark on Sunday last. There is progress that discounts even the tremendous growth of the World under Joseph Pulitzer. It has been attained by smart journalistic feats, of course, and represents the triumph of flim-flam over fact and sensationalism over sense, but there are the results. The enterprise, I am told, has passed the corner financially, and its revenues have begun to meet the outlay. It cannot be said that Mr. Hearst has spared money in achieving his object, for his expenditures have been absolutely regal. The Sunday issue is an interesting and decidedly a sightly paper, and has more pictures than its rivals, the World and the Herald.

* * *

It cannot be true that we are to lose all our celebrities. Rumor has it that Gelette Burgess proposes to transport the Lark to Boston where this curious little opuscule enjoys its greatest popularity. It is said, too, that Mrs. Hearst has offered to send Jimmie Swinnerton to Paris for three years to study art, and that he proposes accepting the opportunity. Burgess is an original, dowered with real literary and artistic ability, interwoven with which is the whimsical vein that gave us the Purple Cow. That weird drawing together with the extraordinary verses which accompanied it made him a personality in the East and he has had innumerable offers to shift his locale. There have been some clever bits of prose and verse in the Lark recently, more valuable than its fantastic features and deserving of more attention and praise than they have attracted. It is to be hoped we may be able to retain both Swinnerton and Burgess for sometime yet.

THE WITNESS.

Do you wish to learn the languages, or music, or oratory, or elocution from the best teachers and without expense to yourself? See page 16

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

HOYT'S HEROINES.

CHARACTERISTICS OF TWO SOUBRETTES CONTRASTED.

There are two farces, both satires, playing in this city, at present, written by that most prolific and successful of farce-comedy writers, Charlie Hoyt—he of the little head and fertile brain—of the squeaky voice and bright sayings—the man who has taken more liberties with our most cherished traditions, and made more clean, harmless, irresistible fun out of them than any other dramatist of the day—the personnel of whose plays is purely American, and who involves his characters in more absurdly ludicrous situations in the course of one play than most people would conceive of in a lifetime—whose plots defy criticism, because they have neither beginning nor end, and disarm it by arousing heartiest amusement and mirth.

When I saw "The Milk White Flag" at the Baldwin I was rather attracted to the little girl, Clarisse Agnew, who does the baby act. On the stage she appears a pretty, blonde, lisping, baby thing in a fresh white gown and cap, and while neither her vocal notes nor her heels displayed much talent, they disclosed a certain ability, combined with extreme youth, which interested me. I found myself wondering where she came from. "From California," some one said. I grew curious enough about her to avail myself of the entrée which my vocation affords to professional circles, and I went over to her mother's house on Folsom Street, where she is stopping, and called upon her. I found Miss Agnew a bright, self-possessed young woman of about twenty, with a thin, rather shrewd face. Pretty? Well—yes and no. Pretty skin, good nose, rather good brow, broad lidded blue-gray eyes, which sleep and watch at the same time; line of lips unequal, and chin heavy, with no end of will power. She has a trick of head and shoulder which reminded me of Ada Lewis occasionally. Tough? Oh, no—just a suggestion of the same quality which makes Miss Lewis so successful in certain lines of work, and a manner labeled, "No nonsense about me." She was not shy about her debut. It was made at the Orpheum in this city. Why did she go there?

"Oh, because there was fun in it," she said, "I had a notion of singing and dancing, and it seemed a good thing to make a little money. Mother wanted me to go to school a while longer—I was only fifteen—and when she found I would keep at it, she sent me away East, on a pleasure trip. Well, now," Miss Agnew gave me a telling little look, emphasizing her remark by a rather scornful little laugh, "perhaps she thought she was going to cure me—not much—that only made me worse than ever. One day, I was talking the matter over with some friends, and as I made the remark, 'I'll never be satisfied till I am an actress,' a gentleman standing near, turned and looked at me curiously. It was John McVicker, who died a few days ago, you know. After a while he came to me and asked me if I really wanted to go on the stage. Well, I lost no time in convincing him that I did. I guess he saw I could act—don't you believe they can tell?"

She cut herself short, in her breathless little tale, to ask me this question. She speaks very rapidly in leaps and bounds—it is almost impossible to keep up with her.

"I am sure I don't know," I answered.

"Well, anyway," she went on, "he engaged me very soon after that for a light part, and I stayed with him awhile, and, finally, got into this company—I was watching for my opportunity. I believe in jumping right in when your chance comes, and I tell you what it is, I've made the biggest sort of a hit, too. Why," she continued, skimming right along, "all the papers East said Lydia Yeamans wasn't in it after they saw me do the baby—she would have to take a back seat," and she sent Lydia Yeamans flying backward with a sweeping motion of her hand.

Perhaps you think this little girl has a great deal of self-confidence and assurance? Well, so she has—but has not observation taught you that there are telling qualities in many successful careers? As she says herself:

"Whatever has any fun, it goes with me, whether it is 'shooting the chutes' or riding donkeys down at Coney Island, or driving across country with a party of girls—running into somebody's buggy and having to pay a fine of 'twenty-five dollars all around, please'—no use crying over spilt milk; but when its business, I am going to watch for my opportunities"—I look at her eyes, and I believe her—"and I am going to get there," and she will, with limitations attached.

This little talk with the "baby" was so unique, it rather whetted my appetite for more. I would go and see "Bossy"—pretty, plucky, level-headed little "Bossy"—so I traveled back across Market Street to the Occidental, where Miss Dorothy Sherrod was domiciled. Now, she plays a rather difficult part. You smile? Did you ever stop to think what it must be to adopt the air and manner of a swinging, happy-go-lucky, rough comedy part, and then to merge yourself gradually into a budding Society belle, and do it with ease, and naturally? It takes good acting to do this well, and Miss Sherrod does it well. She does not give you a rough tumble from one to the other—you slip so gradually into the notion, she leads you so gracefully into the situation, that you are there before you know it, and without casualties during the transition. Miss Sherrod is a fascinating little piece on the stage—don't you think so? Now, the woman who fascinates is not necessarily beautiful, but she must be a woman of infinite variety and resourcefulness, or, if beautiful, and you find it impossible to say of her, "She is charming," then she will not fascinate you.

Miss Sherrod is delightfully pretty—in the delicate Dresden China order—a round, shell-tinted, cherub face, big, appealing, hazel eyes, straight nose, and pouting lips, all set in a frame of curly, red gold hair—and all natural, too. Then she is charmingly modest and laughs at the sentimental notions she used to have about earning money. You see she was born away down in old Mississippi, where the idea of women as wage earners was never tolerated until the change brought about by that fateful day, nearly thirty-two years ago, and where they are still so old-fashioned that they scarcely know the "new woman."

"I used to imagine it would be lovely to be an actress," said Miss Sherrod, "if only to be allowed to act such noble parts. They were all so real to me. I went to the theater a great deal with my father and was wild over it. I actually used to pray I might become an actress. Then I was sent off to Baltimore to school, and during one of my vacations when in New York, I wrote to several managers. Mr. Daly was the first to answer, and he asked me to call, then he put me through an examination, and finally I signed a three years' contract with him, which I broke in six weeks."

"How was that?"

"Why"—blushing in the prettiest way—"I got mad with the manager, and then I went straight to Mr. Daly and said I wouldn't play any more. Mr. Daly was so kind," she went on, "and tried to make me listen to reason; but I wouldn't. I was such a goose. I had very high-flown notions as to the way men should treat women. I forgot I had begun my battle with the world. Shortly after, I signed with Mr. Hoyt and played Dixie Style before I did Bossy."

"Which do you prefer?"

"Oh, Bossy," she replied, with animation. "She is so human and honest."

Away from the stage, this little woman is a home-loving body, not given to wild trips or rough sports. She is essentially a gently bred Southern woman, whose home and music, books, plants, and pets are her delight.

Which of the two will succeed? Both, in different lines, we shall hear from both, further on, and one will rise sooner than the other. But the other will rise higher.

Which one?

I'll let you guess.

E. D. H.

MANNING.

THE FRANK HISTORY OF A PRIESTLY INTRIGUER.

The literary sensation of the year in London is not a novel, but Purcell's biography of Cardinal Manning. The late prelate was held in general esteem as a man of unworldly character and heavenly designs, whose progress to the head of the English Church was the triumph of spirituality over material ambition. A reverend and venerable figure, he incarnated for many all the saintly virtues, the charity, gentleness, and kindly zeal for celestial things which we all like to believe as characteristic of our great churchmen.

Alas! for these beautiful ideals. By documentary evidence in his own handwriting, Manning is revealed as the most adroit and unscrupulous of diplomats, a man consumed by ambitions, who believed the ends justified the means, and ruthlessly sacrificed to the cause of his own advancement the careers of his opponents. Nor is it possible to defend one's prior conception of the prelate by the presumption of his conception. The Cardinal himself furnished the material for the work, turning over to Purcell his letters and diaries. Through the medium of these literally transcribed, is the story of his life outlined. There is little suppression, no commentary, but the conclusions are enforced.

The most interesting portion of the biography is that which reveals Manning's relations with Rome, and the manner in which he attained his ambition. After being converted to Catholicism, he allied himself with Cardinal Wiseman, then head of the Church in England, and established through Monsignor Talbot, an Englishman who was Chamberlain to Pope Pius IX., relations in the Vatican which were invaluable to him in his future intrigues. Indeed, it is a strange history of ecclesiastical double dealing, this correspondence with Talbot reveals. Manning was as subtle as Talleyrand, and a match for even the Italians at diplomacy. The influence of his personality over Wiseman soon grew supreme, and it enabled him to cause the removal of Doctor Errington, whom the Cardinal had appointed Coadjutor-Archbishop of Westminster, with the right of succession. But Wiseman discovered when too late that Errington was a "minimizer," that is to say, not an "ultramontane," and he induced his superior to proceed against him. A Papal decree was issued soon after removing Errington and leaving the way to Westminster clear for the unscrupulous intriguer. He proceeded after that in a campaign against the "minimizers," being determined to crush them, and thus earn the gratitude of the Holy See. The record of these guerilla contests, in which Manning delighted, is not pleasant to read, and would often be ludicrous if it were not so sad—as when, for instance, we are informed that one of the bishops, being hard pressed by his enemies, set his nuns to praying against a certain move they intended to make.

Early in this campaign, Manning and Newman became estranged, and there is included in the biography letters from the bitter correspondence which passed between them. At the close of this, the latter informed Manning, whom he knew to have been guilty of double dealing, that he would say seven masses for him. In reply, Manning promised one hundred and twelve masses for Newman. His treatment of the great Oratorian was, in fact, unspeakably mean and malevolent. In the correspondence to which I have referred, Newman, it seems to us, clearly convicts Manning of having borne false witness against him, while he uttered no word of protest against the scurillous attacks on Newman by Warde and others. It is true he wrote deprecating these attacks, but, at the same time, he was writing to Talbot at Rome in terms that indicated his hostility to Newman, and Talbot, who was quick to take a hint, took good care that Newman should remain in bad odor at the Vatican. Mr. Purcell, in fact, admits that Manning virtually accused Newman of disloyalty to the Pope, and of worldliness, while at the same time he was assuring Newman of his friendliness. Subsequently he exhibited his enmity by passing over Newman in favor of Monsignor Capel on opening his ill-starred Catholic University, refused to inform him of a kindly reference from the lips of Pope Pius IX, though he knew the Oratorian suffered keenly because of his ostracism at Rome. And, last of all, when Pope Leo XIII. expressed an intention of making Newman a Cardinal, he spread abroad a false report that Newman would decline the honor, than which nothing could have been better calculated to cause the Pope to change his mind.

During the latter years of Wiseman's life, Manning devoted himself to strengthening his position in Rome. He made frequent visits there, and impressed himself on all who might be of service to him. When the question of the Pope's temporal power came up, his attitude was more Roman than that of the Pope himself. Indeed, he was "called down" by the Vatican for his overstatements on the subject. But at a hint from Monsignor Talbot he at once made his views harmonize, and was recognized by the Pope as a pillar of the Papacy. This reputation proved of the greatest service to him on the death of Wiseman. The Chapter of Westminster cordially disliked Manning, though he was one of its officers, and it is not surprising that his name did not appear among the three which it sent to the Pope. But if it thought thus to suppress Manning, it soon discovered its mistake, for through the able management of Monsignor Talbot, in Rome, the Pope was induced to pass over the three names, and name Manning. And so in the plenitude of his powers this able, ambitious, unscrupulous, and scheming Church politician reached a position of vast power and influence.

The last notable events in the ecclesiastical career of the great churchman were his participation in the discussions of the Vatican Council and his elevation to the Cardinalate. The Vatican Council was the opportunity of his life. There was a strong and vigorous opposition in the Council to the promulgation of the decree of Papal infallibility. Manning, of course, favored it, and soon became its leading champion. Its final passage by the Council made him, therefore, one of the most conspicuous ecclesiastics in the Church, and, best of all, persona gratissima at the Vatican. His elevation to the Cardinalate followed almost as a matter of course, and the evening of his life was spent in the enjoyment of his well-earned and, we must add, well-worn honors.

ETC., JR.

The czar of Russia proposes to adopt the Gregorian system of computing time after the end of the present century. The Russian calendar is twelve days behind the rest of the world's time, and it leads to all sorts of confusion. His Majesty has not yet decided whether to jump over the thirteen days at once, or to accomplish his object gradually by omitting the first twelve leap years of the century. It would then require forty-eight years to bring about the change.

A HEROINE IN SUPERLATIVES

THE TERMAGANT DUCHESS IN MRS. HODGSON BURNETT'S NEW NOVEL.

So formidable is the person of Miss Clorinda Wildairs, that I approach her veracious history with apprehensive trembling. She is A Lady of Quality in Mrs. Hodgson Burnett's last book, and is at her zenith the most formidable woman in London, having the strength of an Amazon, combined with the beauty of a Juno. Size and comeliness are in themselves gifts so considerable that we are ready at once to be led at the victorious chariot of Miss Clorinda, but her creator has added to the panoply of her bewitchments the grace of intellect and the charm of wit. So here, indeed, is a most invincible heroine—strong, shrewd, and dignified, and so beautiful that the spectacle of her loveliness drives its audience desperate, and inflames the hearts of hero, first gentleman, and villain with inextinguishable desire. We are fortunate in having so ample a recital of Miss Clorinda's progress, for the reader assists at her birth, and is privileged to know her epitaph. She does not excite sympathy, it is true; I fear her morality is Jesuitical, but out of the "Arabian Nights," or the mythology, you will not find such perfections united in a single woman.

From the first, Miss Wildairs exhibits a superb vitality. Lady Jeoffry, her unfortunate mother, dies after giving birth to this, her eighth daughter, who shrieks her wants with savage shriliness, flourishes like the traditional green bay-tree (being wicked, I suppose), and grows up the tyrant of the stables and a queen among her father's grooms. Not until she is six, and an unmitigated termagant, does she encounter her progenitor, Sir Jeoffry, a sporting squire of bad repute and bibulous habits, whose neglect of his offspring is partially mitigated by obliviousness of their existence. Her shrewish temper, combined with a furious attack made on his legs with his own hunting whip, introduces to him both her temper and her violent individuality. She is taken to his heart, is presented to his boon companions, becomes their toast and their comrade, evincing even at that early age a command of vituperative language together with a knowledge of coquettish devices which would not disgrace a woman of twice her years. Not an oath in the vocabulary but she can match with its mate; not a song, however ribald, but she knows the chorus. Miss Clorinda is, indeed, a wild, wilful, and imperious maid, a lover of dogs and horses, with a quick wit, a ready hand, and a complete realization of her own charms. However, here she is at her fifteenth birthday, at which she makes her last appearance in boy's clothes:

> She wore knee-breeches of white satin, a pink satin coat embroidered with silver roses, white silk stockings and shoes with great buckles of brilliants, revealing a leg so round and strong and delicately moulded, and a foot so arched and slendder as surely never before, they swore one and all, woman had had to display. She met them standing jauntily astride upon the hearth, her back to the fire, and she greeted each one as he came, with some pretty impudence. Her hair was tied back and powdered, her black eyes were like lodestars, drawing all men, and her color was that of a ripe pomegranate. She had a fine, haughty little Roman nose, a mouth like a scarlet bow, a wonderful long throat and round cleft chin. A dazzling mein, indeed, she possessed, and ready enough she was to shine before them.
>
> When the last dish was removed and bottles and bumpers stood upon the board, she sprang up on her chair and stood before them all, smiling down the long table with eyes like flashing jewels. Her hands were thrust in her pockets with her pretty young fop's air, and she drew herself to her full comely height, her beauteous lithe limbs and slender feet set smartly together. Twenty pairs of masculine eyes were turned upon her beauty, but none so ardently as the young ones across the table.
>
> "Look your last on my fine shape," she proclaimed in her high, rich voice. "You will see but little of the nether part of it when it is hid in farthingales and petticoats. Look your last before I go to don my fine lady's furbelows."
>
> And when they filled their glasses and lifted them and shouted admiring jests to her, she broke into one of her stable-boy songs and sang it in the voice of a skylark. . . .
>
> The clock struck twelve before she returned to them. Just as the last stroke sounded the door was thrown open and there she stood, a woman on each side of her, holding a large silver candelabra, bright with wax tapers high above her, so that she was in a flood of light. She was attired in rich brocade of crimson and silver and wore a great hooped petticoat, which showéd off her grandeur; her waist, of no more bigness than a man's hands could clasp, set in its midst like the stem of a flower; her black hair was rolled high and circled with jewels, her fair long throat blazed with a collar of diamonds, and the majesty of her eye and lip and brow made up a mien so dazzling that every man sprang to his feet beholding her.

Three generations are required to produce a gentleman, we are assured, but Mrs. Hodgson Burnett converts Miss Wildairs into a lady in a single chapter. Out of the depths of her inner consciousness this hoyden evolves the idea that her own sex becomes her best. So she grows moderate of manner and language, eschews breeches for brocades, and straightway mingles in the society which has hitherto regarded her as an outcast. This disregard of human, and especially feminine, conventions is necessary for the evolution of the plot, it is true, but one is forced to protest against the startling rapidity of the conversion. However, it is here that the villain, Sir John Oxon, appears, and commences pursuing the young beauty. His wooing accentuates the fact of her sex, and there is skilfully woven into the narrative the suggestion of an intrigue sufficiently articulated to be beyond question, but yet without grossness of particular. Sir John, be it said, is as handsome as Miss Clorinda, as vigorous of form, and as fine of feature, but without the mental power and self-control which the author makes the basis of her heroine's achievements. But he wins her, and then flies off; his engagement is announced later with a Creole heiress, and soon after the twain meet at their old trysting place in the rose garden—she disdainful and indifferent, he enraged at her unconcern. It is a dramatic scene that then ensues—terminated by Clorinda flinging over her head a wreath of scarlet roses and ordering Sir John "to the kennels." That night she accepts the hand of the catch of the county, the aged Earl of Dunstanwolde, but is introduced also to her fate, the Duke of Ormonde.

At the pen of so inimitable a literary prestidigitateur as Mrs. Burnett, it is unnecessary to say that the hoyden develops the admirable qualities which adorn a great lady and a good wife. Her domestic ability is remarkable. She has the air of a queen and a goddess; her servants are filled with awe at her grandeur, and though secretly in love with the Duke, she gives no sign of the consuming passion. In the second year of her marriage the happiness of his lot is too much for the Earl; he dies, and his widow retires to the country for eighteen months, emerging into society more radiantly beautiful than ever. She is the belle of London, sought by the noblest.

To rehabilitate himself, he begins an impassioned wooing, and she, because of the past, dare not spurn though she disdains his attentions. When the betrothal of Clorinda and the Duke is announced, he threatens to acquaint her lover with the story of their intrigue, and here ensues the scene which is the tragedy of the novel. Forcing himself into her presence, he proceeds to rehearse the story of their youthful passion, and asked what proof he can submit he brings forth a little package folded in silk:

> He unfolded the silk and let other silk unfold itself, a great and thick ring of raven hair which uncoiled its serpent length, and though he held it high, was long enough after swaying from his hand to lie upon the floor.
>
> "Merciful God!" she cried, and shuddering, hid her face.
>
> "'Twas a bet, I own," he said. "I heard too much of the mad beauty, and her disdain of men, not to be fired by a desire to prove to her and others that she was but a woman after all, and so was to be won. I took an oath that I would come back some day with a trophy—and this I cut when you knew not that I did it."
>
> She clutched her throat again to keep from shrieking in her impotent horror.
>
> "Devil, craven, and loathsome—and he knows not what he is!" she gasped. "He is a mad thing who knows not that all his thoughts are of hell."
>
> 'Twas in sooth a strange and monstrous thing to see him so unwavering and bold, flinching before no ignominy shrinking not to speak openly the thing before the mere accusation of which other men's blood would have boiled.
>
> "When I bore it away with me," he said, "I lived wildly for a space, and in those days put it in a place of safety, and when I was sober again I had forgot where. Yesterday, by a strange chance, I came upon it."
>
> "And once"—she breathed—"and once I loved thee—cur!"
>
> He was mad with exultant villainy and passion, and he broke into a laugh.
>
> "Loved me!" he said. "Thou! As thou lovedst me—and as thou lovedst him—so will Moll Easy love any man—for a crown!"
>
> Her whip lay upon the table, she caught and whirled it in the air. She was blind with the surging of her blood and saw not how she caught or held it, or what she did—only that she struck!
>
> And 'twas his temple that the loaded weapon met, and 'twas wielded by a wrist whose sinews were of steel, and even as it struck he gasped, casting up his hands, and thereupon fell and lay stretched at her feet.
>
> But the awful tempest which swept over her had her so under its dominion that she was like a branch whirled on the wings of the storm. She scarce noted that he fell, or noting it, gave it not one thought as she dashed from one end of the apartment to the other with the fierce striding of a mad woman.
>
> "Devil!" she cried, "and cur! And for thee I blasted all the years to come! To a beast so base I gave all that an empress herself could give—all life—all love—forever! And he comes back—shameless to barter like a cheating huckster—because his trade goes ill, and I—I could stock his counters once again."

One might suppose the noble Countess frozen with remorse and horror at her deed, but she has the presence of mind to tumble the body of her recreant lover under a divan whereon she sits that afternoon receiving her visitors. Indeed, the terrible whip with which the murder was committed and which had performed its purpose in subjugating her fiery steed Devil, is the topic of conversation and drops from the slender hand of a fashionable lady who had essayed to wield it, falling perilously near the dead. That night Mistress Clorinda carries in her arms the corpse of Sir John down darkened stairways into an unused cellar, the entrance to which is subsequently bricked up by her orders. Afterwards she learns that her sister Anne, whose retiring womanliness forms a foil to her ambitions and predominant personality, had known of the terrible deed, had, indeed, saved her from discovery, mentioning never a word, however, of her melancholy knowledge.

But there are no consequences. This is a sin without retribution. The Duchess, it is true, traces down all Sir John's intrigues and takes kindly care of his ruined victims. Under the influence of a noble love she grows tranquilly beautiful; her wit loses its keen edge. To her husband she bears strong-limbed boys and Amazonian maids like unto herself. Save for the deathbed confession of Anne, there is no recurrence to the tragedy, no brooding over the sin, no remorseful necessity for confiding this guilty secret to the noble Duke. Her life touches the farmost limits of felicity, but instead of being removed to Olympus in a chariot of fire or in the arms of Mercury, as befits so superior a being, she dies, after a due measure of years, is buried, and a tombstone records her glowing virtues and her splendid beauty.

It is only a story, this history of an impossible Lady of Quality—an interesting, a dramatic tale, narrated with commendable smartness and knowledge of literary effect. Clorinda Wildairs is as improbable as she is magnificent; her beauty is as dazzling as her acumen is incredible. She has more perfections than Cleopatra, more seductions than Circe, more talents than Madame de Stael—with the ambition and will power of a Catherine de Medici. Had she less vigor, fewer superiorities, more humanity, Clorinda might be conceivable but she remains merely a concatenation of superlatives.

ORACLE, K. B.

BOOK TALK.

A leading feature of the last Flyleaf is a conversational essay by the editor, Walter Blackburn Harte, on the interesting topic of how he proposes to demean himself when that bibelot shall have attained a million readers. It is reasonably presumable that the possession of such a circulation would afford an income adequate to satisfy his most lingering longings, but it affords a capital opportunity for dilating on the pangs and deprivations of a literary career, which he does with much humor and considerable felicity. "Life and Death" is a somewhat far-off sketch of a woman who married the wrong man. In "Bubble and Squeak" there are some vigorous jabs at eminent names and prominent literary institutions. I must take issue with Mr. Harte for his railings at what he calls "organs of British complacency and aids to prejudice." I am a reader of the Saturday Review, and insist it cannot truly be called "a dirty gutter rag of imbecile impertinence." Since Frank Harris has been at the helm he has redeemed its old reputation, and it is to-day a strong, vigorous journal whose critiques are full of earnestness and enthusiasm, and it certainly enlists the best English names as its contributors.

The prose and dramas of Hendrik Ibsen form a recent issue of the United States Book Company's "Lakewood Series." They are in convenient form, clearly printed, and include the most important works of modern dramatists. The most conspicuous among these are "A Doll's House," "Pillars of Society," "Ghosts," "A Lady From the Sea," "An Enemy of Society," and others, mainly translated by William Archer, the well-known English dramatic critic. For those with whom economy in book buying is a necessity, this issue will prove a prize, inasmuch as the two volumes are to be had for seventy cents.

A late issue of the United States Book Company's publication is The Return of the Native, one of Thomas Hardy's most notable books. Of the merits and character of this work it is unnecessary to speak here, but the availability of this novel in cheap form should induce a renewal of its original popularity.

Rand, McNally & Co. publish A Grey Eye or So," an exceedingly smartly written novel by F. Frankfort Moore. It is really the brightest and most readable of Mr. Moore's books, and contains passages of very beautiful descriptions and several ably depicted characters.

The last issue of Macmillan's Novelists' Library is The Last Touches, by W. K. Clifford. It is a series of very charming stories, by no means the least notable of which is that from which the book takes its name.

[Macmillan & Co., publishers. For sale by A. M. Robertson.]

Though A Tale of a Lonely Parish is not the most notable of Marion Crawford's novels, it is a very well put together story, and the interest is better sustained throughout than in his recent publications in which the incidents are strung together too loosely. It is number eleven in Macmillan's Novelist's Library, and is for sale by A. M. Robertson.

Quite the handsomest publication we have, typograpically, is The Traveler, and the March issue is up to the standard of its predecessors. Curious as it may seem, The Traveler is the only effort at an illustrated paper we have in San Francisco. It attains some very excellent effects, and it is remarkable its success does not induce rivalry. Among the features of the March number are, "Mexican Types," "A Story of a Perilous Flume Ride," and "Nikko Temples," contributed by the editor and beautifully illustrated.

There is scant comfort for Nicaraguan canal theorists in the current Forum. In it appears an article by Joseph Nimmo demonstrating the impracticability of the Suez Canal. Mr. Nimmo bases his views not so much on the geographical difficulties of the undertaking as on the statistics which show that, even if the canal should be dug, it could not be made to pay. The author is well prepared to write on this subject, as he was at one time Chief of the Bureau of Statistics in the Treasury Department at Washington.

Harold Frederic's new novel will be out this month, and its publishers think it is going to be one of the sensations of the year. The Damnation of Theron Ware is the title, and the story is of a Methodist minister. In view of the predictions so often made that Mr. Frederic might some day write the long expected "American novel," this new book will be noteworthy.

Miss Alice I. Wolf, a San Francisco girl, and quite well known in Jewish Society, is the author of A House of Cards, the latest volume in Stone & Kimball's "Peacock Library." The characters and background are San Franciscan, and it will be interesting to see how she has handled the material.

The initial reviews of H. C. Lea's Auricular Confession and Indulgence in the Latin Church indorse it as a book of great interest, and, though very erudite, extremely good reading. The authorities quoted are entirely Catholic, the intention being to explain the institution of confession and absolution from an historical rather than from the polemical standpoint.

The Life of Gibbon which the world has known, is but a patchwork of extracts from the original MSS. There is now promised The Unpublished Works of Edward Gibbon—to contain the historian's seven autobiographies, correspondence, and much unpublished data. It is said the papers are full of entertaining matter.

Nym Crinkle does book reviewing for Will Hearst's Journal, and capital work it is. He concludes, thus, a review of Mrs. Ola Hansson's Study of Modern Women—a book founded on the lines of Sonia Kovaleosky, Eleonora Duse, Marie Bashkirtseff, and others of the same ilk: "We lay the book down with the impression that woman makes a fatal mistake in trying to be anything but woman, but we also feel that it is peculiarly woman-like to make so tremendous an induction from only six women."

Joel Chandler Harris is one of the most modest of men. He hates being interviewed, and when lionized by the Authors' Society in New York he disappeared in the midst of a reception given in his honor. The creator of Uncle Remus is described as rotund of body, short, stoopy, and ruddy as to complexion. He rejoices in simplicity of habit and has few wants. His greatest passion is roses, and in the early morning, when the dew is on the grass, one can hear the snipping of the pruning shears as Mr. Harris works in his garden—the finest rose-garden in Atlanta. He is one of the few men who confess to contentment with their lot.

Joan of Arc is the latest literary fad. Five books are announced this spring with La Pucelle as a raison d'etre, three of which will be stories of her marvelous life. One other will be a book about the times and people when she lived, and she will also figure as the main subject in the next columns of the Putnam's Stories of the Nations series. She has numerous admirers already who are dealing with her from the lecture platform as an inspiring topic of educational interest. Besides these is the Harper's biography accredited to Mark Twain.

There is much about wheeling in the latest Harper's Bazaar—articles from Dr. W. P. Hughes, Dr. Lucy Hill, Mary Sargeant Hopkins, and Ida Trafford Bell.

"BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES" are unrivaled for relieving Coughs, Hoarseness, and all Throat Troubles. Sold only in boxes.

EASTER!

New Easter Cards
New line of Prayer Books
Fine Stationery at

DODGE'S

Our New Store
Our only one
112 Post St., the
Yellow Store next
The White House

THE THEATERS.

THE ATTITUDE OF AN ACTOR-AUTHOR ANALYZED.

At first glance it seems as if it ought to be the very apex of happiness to act the hero's part in one's own play, for, being the author, the play would seem capital to the actor, and, being the actor of so important a part, much of the performance would of necessity be done in a manner vastly pleasing to the author—he who generally sits through representations of his plays in torture which only another playwright, or a loving parent doomed to be still and see his child maltreated, can understand. It really seems a delightful state of affairs all around. It lures one to attempt to be an author-actor oneself.

After considering it a bit, however, one sees that in order to make the combination agreeable a large, large hunk of self-esteem (not to say conceit) would be a necessary concomitant. For just suppose for a minute that one had only a moderate estimate of oneself; merely thought oneself a very clever playwright (they mostly do) and only a middling actor—they mostly don't, but we'll suppose it—then the author part of one would cry out for an actor more worthy of the role. Reverse the case; suppose one considered oneself possessed of great histrionic ability and only a mediocre playwright—then would the actor part of the combination yearn for greater lines and greater situations. It is quite evident, therefore, that unless an actor-author thinks himself at once the greatest playwright and the greatest actor in the world, his lot is not a happy one unless other persons act his plays and he acts in other persons. Of course, he might think his play and his acting were two of a kind and equally poor, but such modesty is inconceivable in—an actor or in—a playwright. He might also think them possessed of the same degree of merit, neither superlative nor poor, simply good; but this case would be worse than any other, for there would be dissatisfaction on both sides. The author and the actor, two persons in one, would sing a duet something like this:

"Had I but {a great actor / great lines} then would {my play / I} make a hit."

So, after all, I do not now, as I first felt inclined, envy Edwin Milton Royle, the author of "Mexico," and one of the most prominent of the dramatis personæ. I am inclined to think him a better playwright than actor, though I can hardly judge as I have seen him but once. He has discovered, like many of us, that the John Drew style of acting is never obnoxious and generally pleasing, and seems to be striving in that direction. I do not mean by this that he imitates John Drew, but his methods are similar. Probably he has a natural tendency toward the self contained, impassive manner which we are accustomed to associate with Drew, and which, by-the-way, our youngsters are assuming to be the only manner possible to a man of refinement and self-respect. Taken as a whole, Royle's acting reminds one of General Ople's description of his residence, "gentlemanly, yes, gentlemanly." "Captain Impudence, or Mexico," is, for a wonder, just what it pretends to be, "A picturesque romantic comedy in three acts." The first act does not open well; we don't jump into the story as we should, but have to be led up to it by some explanatory remarks (a lot of them) from old Jim, who, by the way, is played very well indeed, barring a weak spot or two in the first act, by a man by the name of Ben Johnson.

Finally, though, we get started, and discover Captain Shields, U. S. A., is engaged to one girl (at home), making love to another (Lucretia Bugg), and seeming to be trifling with the affections of still another, the Mexican girl, Jovita Talamanca, a prisoner on parole. His conduct toward Jovita is thus explained: Because this quixotic Captain had killed Jovita's father, in war time, and "in fair and square open fight," he feels for some reason that he must watch over her. We are told that he feels this merely on account of the unfortunate little affair with her father, but we don't believe it; one has a lurking idea that Jovita's charms had much to do with his attentions to her. It seems that Jovita had some such idea herself, and so did a great many other people in the Mission; still, they did not know about the father, so I suppose I must believe the playwright—he ought to know—but it is not human. Anyway, a very pretty lot of complications arise. Lucretia Bugg (horrid name) returns the love of the Captain, but doesn't want to admit it. Major Bugg, U. S. A., her doting yet selfish father, is in love with his comfort, and doesn't want to admit that, but he gives it away when he accepts his daughter's promise to remain single so long as he does. The Captain goes to work on the spot to marry old Bugg off. Mrs. General Trigg is the instrument he uses. To incite her to the chase, he wagers his favorite mare against something—I forget what—that she can't captivate the old fellow. Major Genaro Mendoza, M. A., Jovita's cousin, and in love with her, urges her to break her word to the Captain and escape. To drive her to this he makes her believe the Captain is already married, and has made a dishonorable wager about her. She taxes the Captain with this wager; he, thinking of the one with Mrs. Trigg, seems to admit it. Mad with rage, the girl vows vengeance. "We women of the South," she says, "Mio Dios! how we love! Mio Dios! how we hate!" Arrested in the midst of their plans for escape and treachery, incriminating papers are found on Mendoza. He is sentenced to be shot, while the Captain allows Jovita to escape. For this he is finally court-martialed and condemned to be shot; but neither of these affairs coming off immediately, Mendoza improves the time by trying to poison the Captain. Matters miscarry, and the little Bugg girl gets most of the poison.

There you have them all very ingeniously tortured: The Captain to be shot; Lucretia Bugg to be crazy or dead, on account of Mendoza's dose of what is commonly known as "loco" or "rattle-weed." The Major frantic over his daughter; The Widow Trigg worrying about her deceitful conduct with the Major, and Jovita, poor Jovita, flown to the Mexican army with her heart sore and full of hatred, while old "Jim" is in an abject state of misery because he (meaning to keep the Captain true to his fiancée) had brought affairs to this unfortunate climax by collaborating with Mendoza in his lies to Jovita. It looks rather black, doesn't it, for a comedy? It all turns out well, however, and you really ought not to know any more if you intend to see the play. If you do, you will be very well amused, for after all, there are more laughs to be gotten out of it than tears, and, barring the bad beginning, it goes with quite a swing and the interest is kept up. The cast is fair throughout, though Wm. Bittner (Major Bugg) overdoes what ought to be a very amusing part. He lays it on too heavy. This is the fault of Gretchen Lyons (Lucretia Bugg); they should rub off some of their extravagancies—tone things down a little. Miss Lyons has a pretty, piquante little face, a tip-tilted nose, and, altogether, makes a very tolerable ingénue. Madeline Merli was very good indeed as Jovita; her face interesting and handsome, her make-up excellent, but her gown might have been prettier, and she need not have forgotten her accent so often when expressing emotion. She and Henderson (Mendoza) should come to some understanding about their little conversations. It is funny enough to hear two Mexicans—fully aware of each other's linguistical abilities, and with no one present save themselves—talking in broken English, but when one of them talks Mexican-English and the other wobbles uncertainly between Mexican-English and American-English, the effect is indescribably heightened — becomes quite piebald, in fact. Henderson was very good, though more like a "Greaser" than what I would like to believe a Major in any army (even the Mexican) to be.

Like the rest of Hoyt's plays, "A Texas Steer," gives one the impression that he could do infinitely better if he wished, that he was only playing when he wrote it and had not half tried, but it is funny, very funny in spots, and Tim Murphy as Maverick Brander the cattle king is a gem. If anybody wants to find flaws in his impersonation, very well, but I can't and wouldn't if I could. Perhaps the thing which brought down the house best was his remark to the little adventuress. She tells him that once upon a time "my mother was kissed by a great, great man—Daniel Webster—she often told me about it; now I would like to be kissed by a great man, too, won't you kiss me?" she said, affecting extreme coyness. After examining the premises to be sure that his wife is not in sight, Brander gave the little schemer a cautious peck.

"There," he said, casting doubtful glances about him, "I've kissed you, but—you'd better not brag about it until I'm as dead as Daniel Webster."

When the girl's accomplice produces a photograph of this chaste salute and demands hush money, old Brander quietly produced a hundred-dollar bill, with the question, "Did it cost Daniel Webster a hundred dollars, too?" One of his most ferocious jokes was his response to the statement that all some wretched little town in Texas needed was "good society and a little more rain." "Yes," he said, "that's all Hell needs." As for the rest of the Company, they are not at all bad, and "Bossy" barring the first act, is quite good. I don't think the little woman knows much about frontier girls, and she really ought not to disfigure her plump, partridge-like figure as she does with her cowboy costume. She looks clumsy in it, and her pistols destroy the waistline completely. Put 'm further front or further back, Bossy.

PEG WOFFINGTON.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

On Monday next, at the Columbia Theater, Mr. David Henderson will bring back "Sinbad the Sailor, or the Maid of Balsora." It is more in the light of a new production than a revival—the libretto has been overhauled, the costumes are entirely new, and the music has been, with the exception of one or two of the popular numbers, entirely re-written. Among the songs are: "I am the man," "The Song of All Songs," "In Gay Bohemia," and "It's a Way They Have in Frisco,"

The piece opens with a magnificent view of the Port of Balsora, at day-break. The populace is asleep, and Cupid awakes them. This first act is full of rapid motion and well-balanced stage pictures and it introduces the main characters of "Sinbad": a terrible sea pirate named Snarleyow, played by Hugh Chilvers; an idle apprentice who makes no end of fun, who is Oscar Girard; an impecunious Italian Count (Henry Carter) who wishes to marry; the charming sweetheart of Sinbad, taken by Frankie Raymond, and Sinbad himself, the fair and statuesque Louise Eissing, with other characters of the burlesque order. The music of this act is in Bachelor's matchless style full of spirit and catchy melody. The second act terminates with a realistic shipwreck. In the third act, there is a lovely tropical scene full of cannibals, whom Snarleyow subdues with his popular song "The Bogie Man."

The American Extravaganza Company has given the utmost care and attention to the ballet, which includes sleighing, tobogganning, and skating, in which Maria Ferrero and Signor Bioncifiori give examples of their skill. The transformation scene is entitled the "Origin of the Harp."

"The Milk White Flag" will give its last performances to-day and to-morrow night at the Baldwin Theater, and on Monday night James O'Neill opens in "Monte Cristo." The week's bill will include "Virginius," "The Courier of Lyons," and "Hamlet." The company includes Florence Rockwell, Hallett Thompson, and Wm. Pascoe.

"The Hoolah" has run its merry course at the Tivoli, but has failed to elicit the interest it did when first produced. A change will be made on Monday next, when Richard Stahl's romantic comic opera "Said Pasha" will be produced.

Edwin Milton Royle will continue another week at the California, in his new play "Captain Impudence." He closes his engagement on Sunday, the 29th, to make room for Peter Dailey in his new play, "The Night Clerk."

The Orpheum has had a fine program this week, and packed houses. The Carty Brothers did a very good horizontal bar act, and the Kins Ners, equilibrists, from the Nouveau Cirque, Paris, have done some of the best balancing ever seen here. Charles B. Ward, singing and character comedian, enlivened the bill with some new songs and Rachel Walker renewed acquaintance with her admirers. Wills and Collins, and the Andersons added no small amount to the week's entertainment.

On the 24th of this month, "Bob" Burdette, who has not been seen here for ten years, will give one of his humorous entertainments at the Auditorium, where he will appear in not less than twenty different characters.

Morosco's has been well filled all the week, and the company has given a very smooth performance of a well-conducted play, "The Hoop of Gold." Miss Tittell, who played Ruth Bullion, invested her role with rather more than usual interest. She was easy, natural, and graceful, and did better with her pathetic lines than she has hitherto. These are easily over done, and often fail of eliciting sympathy for that very reason. Miss Tittell always dressed her part well, and it is refreshing to see fresh, crisp gowns after some of the limp affairs of the past. Darrell Vinton was at his best as Richard Wrench—it is the best thing he has done since his advent at the Grand Opera House. Mr. Butler, whose very gentlemanly appearance rather belies the character of villain which he so often assumes, makes, nevertheless, so smooth a villain that one regrets he renders his lines always in the same monotone. If he would vary his inflections, and raise or drop his voice with his sentiments occasionally, it would leave little to be said of work which is usually sincere in effort and quite true in delineation. Charley Swain deserves more words than space will allow for his "Scottie," who was more than "a jolly good fellow when you knew him." Next week Mr. Carroll Johnson in his entirely new departure, "The Irish Statesman," written by Fitzgerald Murphy.

The Alcazar has done very well with its continuous performances. Two shows a day have been the rule for the past week, and the little house has been fairly well filled at each. The prices are on the popular order, the same scale prevailing for day and night, the highest price being twenty-five cents. At least eight numbers to every bill and usually a short comedy besides.

People

who stand or walk much need comfortable shoes. "Foot Comfort" tells you what shoes are comfortable, and how to get them. We send "Foot Comfort" free. Write for it. 50

GOODYEAR SHOE MACH'Y CO., BOSTON

THE AUDITORIUM

[illegible] Lessees and Managers

One Night Only Tuesday, March 24th

[illegible] public

ROBERT J. BURDETTE

The Laughing Philosopher

Will give one of [illegible] at the Auditorium

GOOD MEDICINE

Prices [illegible] and $1.00

Reserved seats on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co's

THE AUDITORIUM

Friedlander, Gottlob & Co ... Lessees and Managers

TWO GRAND WAGNER CONCERTS

Thursday Eve. March 26th, at 8.15

Saturday Afternoon March 28th, at 2.30

The World Renowned MATERNA

The Great Wagnerian Tenor ANTON SCHOTT

ONDRICEK, the world's greatest Violinist

ARTHUR FICKENSCHER Pianist

First appearance in San Francisco

Grand Orchestra Fifty Musicians

ISIDORE LUCKSTONE Musical Director

Popular Prices—Reserved Seats—50c., $1.00 and $1.50

Seats on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co's, beginning with Monday, March 23d, at 9 A. M.

BALDWIN THEATRE — AL HAYMAN AND CO. INCORP'D PROPS.

To-night, Sunday Night, and all next week

Last Performances of HOYT'S

--A--

Milk White Flag

Last Performance Sunday Night March 26th

Monday, March 30th MR. JAMES O'NEILL

Columbia Theatre.

FRIEDLANDER, GOTTLOB & Co. LESSEES AND MANAGERS

Monday Evening, March 23rd

For just two weeks. Seventh Annual California Tour, and first time at this popular play house. The American Extravaganza Company [illegible] people. D. Henderson, Manager. Presenting that most superlatively splendid of all the Henderson productions.

SINBAD The Sailor, or The Maid of Balsora

With every stage accessory which have made the Henderson extravaganzas the most notably magnificent in America.

Next attraction—PUDD'NHEAD WILSON

CALIFORNIA THEATRE — AL HAYMAN & CO. INCORP'D PROPS

Second Week Beginning Monday, March 23d

Owing to the great success scored by

CAPT. IMPUDENCE

("MEXICO")

By Edwin Milton Royle, author of "Friends"

Management of Arthur C. Aiston

This play will be continued all this week

Superb scenery—Gorgeous Costumes

TIVOLI OPERA HOUSE

MRS. ERNESTINE KREELING, Proprietor and Manager

Last nights of the beautiful ballad opera

MARITANA

Next Week Scenic Production

Richard Stahl's romantic comic opera

SAID PASHA

Perfectly cast, mounted, costumed and staged

Wednesday Evening, March 25th

Yachtmen's Night Under the auspices of the San Francisco Yacht Club

POPULAR PRICES 25 and 50 Cents

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE

Handsomest Family Theatre in the World

WALTER MOROSCO, Sole Lessee and Manager

Last Performances of Hoop of Gold

MONDAY, MARCH 23d

Mr. Carroll Johnson, in his new departure

THE IRISH STATESMAN

GROVER'S ALCAZAR

Matinee to-day at 2 o'clock—This evening at 8

MY WIFE'S HUSBAND OPEN GATE

and Continuous Vaudeville Specialty

Prices.....25c., 15c. and 10c.

ORPHEUM

O'Farrell Street, between Stockton and Powell

Week of Monday, March 23d

Unparalled New Attractions

4 More New Acts 4

SEGOMER, the greatest ventriloquist, mimic and shadowgraphist in the world

THE NAWNS, the great Irish character artists

BRUET & RIVIERE, the celebrated French duo of vocal imitators

LITTLE GERTIE CARLISLE, the wonderful child singer and actress, and

AN UNEQUALLED VAUDEVILLE CO.

SPLASHES.

THE RESIGNATIONS from Burlingame don't seem materially to disturb the equinimity of the remnant. There was a fair gathering at the Club last Sunday in spite of the rain, and no sign of consternation. I assume the next move will be a general meeting of the Club, and the appointment of a committee to canvass the situation, look over the books, etc., and then an effort at peace-making. There is, of course, a certain degree of irritation among the so-called commercial element over the predominance of the sporting set, but the sympathy won has really been gained by false pretenses, and the impression existing may be removed by more general explanations. Certainly the Club is in a fairly good position, has made, rather than lost money, and can survive as long as one hundred and fifty members are paying their dues.

* * *

Willie MacDonough has determined there is too little money in racing to encourage following it as a profession. While he has no intention of absolutely retiring from the turf, he has determined to materially reduce his string; so he is going to sell his stock, retaining only Orestes, Santa Bella, and Miss Brummell. In future, his main effort will be in the direction of breeding, and as Ormonde has recovered his pristine vigor there should be no difficulty in recouping the onslaughts of past misfortune. His main reliance this season will be on Orestes, son of Ormonde, who is pretty generally entered in Eastern events, and promises to duplicate the successes of his sire. He is a magnificent animal, with the fine lines and splendid limbs of his progenitor.

* * *

It is a bit curious that San Jose has not yet developed a polo club. There is quite an English colony there composed of the younger sons of well-known families, though it has never drawn conspicuous attention to itself by a development of undue nationality. I am told that a feature of the coming Fiesta at the Garden City will be a polo game between Riverside and Burlingame, which the San Joseans are busy arranging. This will probably be prior to the match at Burlingame, in which the local team will endeavor to wrest return honors from the Southern men.

* * *

THE BOHEMIAN CLUB election is to take place on April 13th. Interest is not very great or very loud-spoken in the contest, and yet it may mean much to the institution. The proposition to add another story to the Club building and to create in this way a "jinks" room is sure to come up, and the supporters of this idea believe that the Hamilton ticket would favor such a scheme, whereas the Chismore ticket, with Peter Robertson in second place, would oppose it.

* * *

Arthur Scrivener is one of the regulars at the Pacific-Union Club who will be missed. He is among the little coterie that for years has daily dined at the institution, sitting on the same chair, at the same place at the table, and nothing would induce him to dine at any other place. He would rather go to a restaurant than be deprived of his seat at his own table. This attachment to a certain seat has driven more than one member to shun his club for weeks when he has found it occupied by some one else, or some one to whom he has not been partial has occupied a seat at "his" table.

* * *

The Press Club rarely misses a chance to do honor to a visiting celebrity, and more than once has anticipated the Bohemian Club in this direction, noticeably in the cases of Henry M. Stanley and James Whitcomb Riley. On Saturday last, it was once more ahead of the "jinks" givers, and entertained the Hungarian violinist, Ondricek, and the pianist, Isidore Luckstone. There was no time to issue invitations, and so the word was passed round to rally at the Club as soon as possible after eight o'clock, and in each of the "daily" offices a notice was posted to that effect. The violinist proved a very genial, sociable fellow. He played several tunes for the boys, and Luckstone did not confine himself to piano playing, but sang and whistled to his own accompaniment until his listeners grew boisterously enthusiastic.

* * *

Joseph D. Redding, over whose departure the Bohemian Club lamented at one of the jolliest dinners ever given, has suddenly returned. He has swung round the big New York and London clubs and slipped into the Bohemian Club on Monday evening, unannounced, and so to the great surprise of those who thought he had gone "it may be for long, it way be for ever." Everybody knows that he met Alexander G. Hawes in London and dined at a tavern; for the two filched a pewter pot, had it duly inscribed, and sent it to take its stand on the new shelf in the Club café, with the "Holy Grail," the silver, clay, glass, and porcelain loving cups which decorate the room. "Joe" will be here for about three weeks and will then go back to New York to carry out the original intention of his departure last fall—to practise law.

* * *

SOCIETY has little to talk about at the moment. Lent is well under way, and few entertainments are announced. There is considerable interest in the theatricals which Mrs. Hagar proposes to have Easter week. Details of the performance then to be given are sedulously concealed from all but the dramatis personæ, but a number of prominent people are to take part. A supper follows the performance, and later a cotillion.

* * *

The Hobart engagement continues the topic of greatest social importance, and some interesting gossip is circulated in regard to the engagement ring. It is an immense and very beautiful ruby, and was Walter Hobart's share of his mother's jewels. The value is estimated, I am told, at $7000. The marriage, to be celebrated at the Williams home at San Rafael, is to be a very quiet affair, only the intimate friends of the twain being present. Miss Juliet Williams is to be the maid of honor; Miss Ella Hobart and Miss Edith McBean will be bridesmaids, while Harry Stetson is to officiate as best man. Mr. and Mrs. Winthrop Lester are to return for the wedding, and it is said that all the members of the family, married and single, will continue to reside at the Hobart mansion on Van Ness Avenue.

* * *

The Southard Hoffmans have rented the Woolworth house for two years. Mrs. R. C. Woolworth and Miss Helen are to leave for Europe for an extended tour. The John Boggs have gone to live at the Richelieu for the rest of the season. The Harringtons, who have been residing there, have left for their home in Colusa. Mr. and Mrs. Stephen Harris have returned from their honeymoon in Southern California, and, at present, are residing at the Sullivan mansion on Oak Street.

* * *

Miss Williams and Mr. Walter Hobart have returned from Lakeport, where they have been visiting the Colliers. Miss Williams is busily engaged in shopping just at present.

* * *

Who is revealing the secrets of the Fortnightly? There is much anxiety within the ranks of the organization to discover the traitor. The announcement of Wednesday night's program in Wednesday morning's Examiner created something like consternation, especially as the same publication gave the details concerning the reconciliation of Mrs. Kauffman. A feature of the last performance, which took place at the Houghton house, was a minuet, performed by ladies who stepped out of massive picture frames arranged around the stage. They made rather an effective picture. Subsequently, there was performed a comedy called "Trial by Jury," besides some other sketches. The recent difficulties have been smoothed over by Mrs. Kauffman's deciding to ignore the slight to which she was subjected, the members having assured her against a recurrence of the offense.

* * *

THE GOLF CLUB was suitably inaugurated last Saturday afternoon, and its clubhouse ought to be the scene of interesting and fashionable gatherings. Of course, the exposed nature of the links must prove an obstacle to the popularity of the game, for the Presidio Heights is a favorite nesting-ground of the afternoon fogs. Otherwise, the ground is fairly well laid out. The Club already numbers several enthusiasts; among them Harry Babcock, Patrick Grant, and John Lawson who obtained his accomplishment in the land o' cakes. I wonder if the game will develop here the same enthusiasm as in the East. There Golf is a craze and there are dozens of Clubs and innumerable champions.

* * *

There is a strong effort being made to induce the St. Louis and Chicago polo teams to visit California and participate in the Burlingame Club's polo tournament this spring. Trophies to the value of two thousand five hundred dollars have been offered, and everything has been done to gather a crowd. The Penryn and Riverside teams, together with the Walla Walla cavalry team, are expected to compete. Even if the Eastern men will not accept the invitation to attend, there will be a vastly better show than last year. The Burlingame men are practising for all they are worth, and at least two afternoons a week are devoted to the game.

* * *

The Bal Poudré at the Verein Saturday night last was the most successful entertainment the Club has had. The ladies, who were in full control, organized the entertainment, arranged the tableaux, and exhibited the interesting fact that the conservatism accredited to the institution is the monopoly of husbands and brothers and not of their female relations. The affair was splendidly free and easy. The girls had all the privileges, invited the men to dance, and escorted them to supper. Perhaps the most novel feature of the entertainment was the living rose calendar. The stage was hung with a curtain on which pictures of roses were painted. These opened at a given signal and disclosed the faces of pretty girls. There was also a species of pantomime called "The Rise of the New Woman," in which two well-known ladies in bloomers went through a series of amusing evolutions. As I predicted, the girls and ladies looked charming in their powdered chevelures. Quite a number of Marie Antoinette gowns were displayed, and altogether it was a very good show.

* * *

Miss Carrie Heller, daughter of the late Moses Heller, and Mr. Isidore Fleischmann were married on Thursday night at the Heller residence, on California Street. The Rabbi Nieto performed the ceremony against a background of lilies and smilax. The wedding gown was very gorgeous, of white satin handsomely trimmed with real lace. After the ceremony there were supper and dancing, and later in the evening the happy pair headed for the California Hotel, where they remain until the departure of the steamer for Japan. Mr. Fleishmann is a nephew of I. W. Hellman of the Nevada Bank.

* * *

The recent weeks have been productive of several interesting engagements. Matrimony in San Francisco seems to be looking up. There is promised a fine crop of weddings after Lent, and from all reports the betrothals announced are but the forerunners of others to come. The last engagement was made known at a dinner at Mrs. René Schwerin's Friday evening last, at which Miss Emma Butler and Lieutenant Lopez were the guests of honor. Miss Butler is quite a pretty and decidedly a popular girl, and the only daughter and heiress of the well-known millionaire, C. C. Butler. She has been out two seasons, has made many friends, and has done considerable entertaining in a quiet way. Lieutenant Lopez is now attached to the Coast Survey steamer "Gedney." In May, 1892, he was appointed Lieutenant in the Navy, and was detailed to coast survey service. He is a tall, handsome man, whose Spanish ancestry is indicated by his dark hair. He is a great friend of the Schwerins and the Ellicotts, and is regarded as one of the rising men in his profession. They are to be married in October.

* * *

I am glad to learn that Mrs. Samuel Blair has recovered from the illness consequent on the sudden announcement of her brother's death. He died in the country, and the news came with cruel unexpectedness. She fainted and was unconscious for several hours. Miss Jennie Blair is down at Paso Robles during the Lenten weeks.

* * *

Among the young women whose custom it is to attend matinees, there is considerable disappointment over the loss of the opportunity to be impressed by Charles J. Richman when he was here. Mr. Richman appeared with Miss Coghlan in "Diplomacy," at the Columbia, and was boomed pretty extensively as a leading man of the future. Unfortunately he struck no one in the light of a revelation, and he was made little or nothing of. He figured in the performance of "As You Like It," out at Sutro Heights, and not a maiden fell in love with him. But now he is in New York, leading man for Augustin Daly, and is almost as great a success as Herbert Kelcey.

* * *

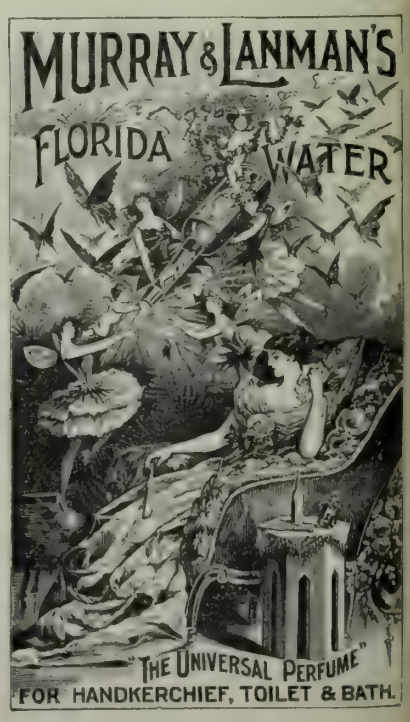
It may not now be long before the privilege is afforded us of again meeting Count and Countess Festetics. They are still voyaging round the world on the yacht, and by latest advices are at Yokohama. It is rather good to learn that J. B. Haggin is in a fair way to convalescence after his recent attack of appendicitis. The presence of his partner, Lloyd Tevis, who went East last week, will doubtless contribute to his recovery.

* * *

The Philomath is to be heard from this season, and inaugurated its campaign by entertaining Fred Warde in the banquet hall of the Y. M. C. A. Building. Mrs.

The Original Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter Street, stands without a rival and has stood the test for years. The most delicious meats are served by gentlemanly attendants, and the management takes pride in having everything orderly. It is just the place for business men and ladies out shopping to lunch.

Chew Adams' Pepsin Tutti-Frutti. It is sovereign for Indigestion and agreeable to the taste.



Lowenberg, the President, assisted by a number of very charming maidens, received their guests. During the afternoon Mr. Warde talked on Shakespeare, and at the conclusion of his address was presented with a handsomely bound volume called Characters from Shakespeare.

* * *

THE REJOICING over Miss Jennie Schwabacher's engagement continues. This fortunate maiden has been fêted in every way and has been the subject of theater parties, suppers, dinners, and luncheons. The Feckheimers gave her a lunch on Tuesday afternoon, quite an elaborate affair, and Miss Helen Sutro had a reception in her honor Friday evening last, these being but a few out of the abundance. Rather a pleasing story is told of the engagement. Prior to Mr. Rosenbaum's proposal, he had never been regarded by the Schwabacher family in the light of a suitor. He came often to their house, and was attentive to Miss Jennie, but rather as an old friend than in the role of wooer. That he entertained matrimonial intentions never entered into their minds. One afternoon, a week before the formal announcement, he was graciously permitted to take Miss Schwabacher out for a drive, and on the way back through the Park, proposed and was accepted. The story goes on to say that returning home the bride-elect rushed in to her mother and said: "Charlie Rosenbaum is to be married!" "To whom?" asked her mother in surprise. "Guess," suggested her daughter. Whereupon Mrs. Schwabacher enumerated a list of some fifteen or twenty young women who might be deserving of so golden a fate. The answer in each instance was in the negative, and finally Mrs. Schwabacher asked: "Well, who is he going to marry?" And Miss Jennie, gaily tapping her breast, retorted, "Me!"

* * *

There is quite an exodus of prominent Jewish people to Europe this spring. Among them are the Hellmans, Sterns, Sachs, Haases, and Roths. The entire contingent has booked staterooms on the "Augusta Victoria," which leaves New York on the 23d of April. The Sachs, who have already started, were the recipients of several teas prior to their departure. Quite a party accompanied them across to Oakland to bid them farewell.

* * *

Another engagement dinner was that given by Mrs. Dinkelspiel to Miss Lowenberg and Miss Gerst. Miss Lowenberg's marriage is set for the 24th.

* * *

The young Lazards were entertained at dinner by Mr. and Mrs. Sigmund Stern and were the recipients of considerable hospitality from the fashionable set. Mr. and Mrs. Abe Stern are comfortably installed at the Palace, where they have a charming suite of rooms. One of the presents of Mr. Stern to his bride was a handsome carriage and a swagger team of horses.

* * *

One of the prettiest brides of the winter season was Miss Bertha Haydenfeldt, who was married to Mr. Clifford R. Coulter of Ohio. Miss Haydenfeldt is a daughter of Charles Haydenfeldt. She is a tall handsome girl, whose dark eyes and reddish brown hair recall the style and beauty of Miss Nellie Joliffe who is now Mrs. Rudolph Spreckels. The costumes of the bridesmaids were exceedingly handsome, and the bride herself wore the usual cream satin and orange blossoms, which fitted her graceful figure to perfection.

* * *

Among those who are going to Europe soon are Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Stern, Phil Barth, Mrs. Emma Joseph and her two daughters. Mr. and Mrs. Abe Mertief have returned from their wedding tour and are temporarily installed at the Palace. Doubtless, they will become house-holders ere long. Mr. and Mrs. Marcus Gerstle have recently bought a house on Washington Street between Buchanan and Webster. Mr. and Mrs. Hochstadter have just moved into their new home at 1806 Broadway, and will doubtless celebrate the occasion in the accepted manner.

* * *

The important weddings of the month will be that of Miss Schwabacher to Charles Rosenbaum, and Miss Carrie Heller to Mr. Isidore Fleischmann. Preparations for both affairs are elaborate, especially the former. Mr. and Mrs. Rosenbaum go to Europe for their honeymoon.

* * *

The Calliopean Club was the scene of a very pretty supper on Monday night, when a party of the younger members entertained Miss Ehrman and Miss Helman at a theater party to the Columbia, subsequently adjourning to the dining-room of the pretty clubhouse, on California Street. There they partook of a capital menu and had a thoroughly good time.

* * *

OF THE OAKLAND SETS, the Jackson-street contingent, of which I spoke last week, is the most conspicuous. It is composed of the fashionably inclined, those young women to whom the covenances are a religion and clothes the foremost consideration. Its ideals are smartness and income. It displays itself of first nights at the theater, and enjoys those privileges which are the perquisites of social prominence. Next in importance to the Jackson-street set is the semi-intellectual contingent, whose expression is The Carlyle Extension Club. This coterie is not given to the things of the flesh, but practises the arts and preserves its accomplishments. Its members are often graduates of local or Eastern colleges; are not given particularly to lunches, and are more liable to be met at lectures than at afternoon teas. To this set The Carlyle Club stands in the same relation as The Chafing-Dish Club does to the Jackson-street contingent. At the Carlyle there are papers read and literary subjects discussed. Sometimes they give original plays. They are fond of Ibsen; are devoted to Browning, and have gone so far in their zeal for culture as to discuss the American poets. Certain members of the clique are given to wheeling, but athletics is not its conspicuous characteristic. It is more eloquent on books than on people, and, if less fashionable, is rather more estimable than its Jackson-street rival.

* * *

The youngest set had a dancing party at Military Hall last Friday evening, under the patronage of Mrs. Goodfellow, Miss Ethel Moore, Mrs. McKenna, and Mrs. McDermott. The future debutantes and beaux figured en grande tenue, and enjoyed themselves to the top of their bent.

* * *

The East Oaklanders have not forgotten the charming Mrs. Captain Edwards, who married H. A. Butters, a Colorado mining man, and accompanied him to South Africa. The latest news of this interesting lady comes from Mexico, where her husband has become the purchaser of the system of Mexican suburban railways, comprising some two hundred miles of animal traction, and steam lines. The actual price is stated at seven and three-quarter millions. This is really an important purchase, and, considering the extensiveness of the system, the sum is exceedingly low. Mr. and Mrs. Butters are accompanied by Mrs. Robt. Augusta Bray of East Oakland.

* * *

The inability of one's own country to appreciate prophetic power is equally true of prophetesses. The most adequate homage the California maiden has received is not at home, but abroad. It seems she must go forth to conquer, however. To the list of Oakland maidens who have found husbands North, South, and East, must be added the name of Miss Claire Ralston, whose engagement to Dr. James Bullitt, from Louisville, has just been announced. Miss Ralston is decidedly a pretty and, especially, a nice girl. She has been prominent in Oakland since her debut, and her friends are properly regretful over the prospect of losing her. She is a daughter of A. J. Ralston, President of the Selby Smelting Works, and a niece of the great Ralston. Miss Ralston has been visiting Mrs. Wilders at Louisville, and there met Dr. Bullitt, who is a son of Judge Bullitt, one of the eminent jurists of the Kentucky capital. He is to come to the Coast in August, and the marriage will be celebrated early in the autumn.

* * *

The second of Miss de Fremery's organ recitals was hardly as generously attended as its predecessor. The Presbyterian Church in which she played was but half full, which seems a pity, considering the merits of the performance. The program was rather substantial for a woman, embracing many of the standard selections; but the organist hardly attained her best form. Perhaps the best selection was the final sonata, which was given with considerable spirit. However, this young lady is certainly to be congratulated on the degree of her accomplishment.

* * *

CONSIDERING the paucity of audience at the MacDonough Opera House on Monday night last, the degree of enthusiasm displayed over Materna and Ondricek on the same afternoon at the Unitarian Church reception was somewhat disproportionate. The entire musical set gathered for the occasion and hovered exultingly round the great twain as though the community thought of nothing but music and considered artists divinities. It is not that the homage rendered was ill-judged, for Ondricek and the great Wagnerian singer are worthy all the honors that could be bestowed. Unfortunately the preliminary enthusiasm was without subsequent development, for at the theater there could not have been over four hundred or five hundred people. The assumption is justifiable that the fashionables took out their musical infatuation in conversation rather than in performances. The reception was organized by Mrs. Charles Webb Howard, Mrs. Stratton, and Mrs George C. Perkins, and was in every way a commendable and interesting affair. By the way, if Oakland is going to treat its visitors so cavalierly as it did Paderewski and Materna, it will lose its reputation as the Athens of the West, as both artists were seriously disappointed at the financial results of their trip. On the other hand, Fred Warde has drawn huge houses across the bay, and has been a tremendous success. In fact, he seems to have rehabilitated his treasury after the inadequate patronage of San Francisco. In addition to performing at night, he lectured nearly every afternoon on some phase or other of Shakespeare—once before the Girls' High School, for which he was rewarded with a gold watch case, and on another occasion for the Woman's Exchange, on whose behalf he actually filled the big Presbyterian Church with ardent and anxious females. I wonder what it is that they find so attractive about him over there? Perhaps the great and generous wealth of his voice.

* * *

The May-day festival is engaging, in a mild way, the attention of Society. Mrs. Renie Chabot has undertaken the management of the fête, and the fashionables have promised to participate. Let us hope the day will be somewhat less of a scorcher than that which was celebrated last season, so that the flowers will have less of an opportunity to wilt.

THE GOSSIP.

Adams's Tutti-Frutti Chewing Gum for Indigestion.

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist, 806 Market St.

OPORTO PORTUGAL.

Of the numerous vintage ports we tasted, none were more interesting than the collection shown us at the Douro Lodges and Vineyards of Messrs. D. M. Feuerheerd, Jr., & Co. This firm keeps certain of its vintage wines from particular quintas intact, and here we tasted the "Commendador" of 1870, remarkable for its delicacy and fine flavor; also a sample of 1873 from the Quinta de Roncao, dry and full of flavor. We were also shown some other natural ports without any addition of spirits, vintages of '75 '73, '71, 72. The latter was a well-rounded wine of singularly refined flavor.—Vizetelly, in "Facts about Port."

Kelly's Corn Cure never fails. 5 cents. 102 Eddy Street.

Pains
in the body, and Poisons
in the blood

Yield to Nature's treatment that wells forth at Byron Springs. [illegible] health and strength to the weakened system.

[illegible] Byron is a natural sanitarium, and every modern convenience and comfort is provided for the health seeker. Send for booklet. Address

BYRON HOT SPRINGS
Contra Costa Co., Cal

Good Appetite

Is restored and the disordered Stomach and Liver invigorated by taking a smal. wineglassful, before meals, of the celebrated . . . . . .

Peruvian Bitters

TO-MORROW (SUNDAY) AFTERNOON
March 22d
BALDWIN THEATRE
A Truly Big Show
Testimonial Benefit to E. J. BUCKLEY
Tendered by the Entire theatrical profession of this city and visiting companies
NOTE—Curtain will rise promptly at 1.30 P.M., owing to the length of program
Prices..... .... 50c. and $1.00

Racing! Racing! Racing!
California Jockey Club
WINTER MEETING
BEGINNING THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 20TH
BAY DISTRICT TRACK
Racing Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday. Rain or shine. Five or more races each day. Races start at 2 P.M. sharp. McAllister and Geary street cars pass the gate.
R. B. Milroy, Secretary. Thos. H. Williams, Jr., Pres.

AHEM! AHEM!
E. H. M.
SPECIAL
The best WHISKEY for family use and Medicinal Purposes
RECOMMENDED
By all first-class Physicians. Sold everywhere.
E. H. MICHELS
Sole Controller
406 SANSOME ST. SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

Wedding Invitations are properly engraved and in correct form, at ROBERTSON'S

DID YOU EVER try the Visiting Cards that we print from your plate for One Dollar per hundred? Others have, and they always re-order. Try and be convinced.
PIERSON BROS.
225 KEARNY ST

COMET OOLONG
The oldest and most reliable brand of Tea on the market. Sold only in ⅓ pound papers at 20 cents per paper.
All grocers keep it.

RIPPLES.

THE RIDDLEVILLE DEBATING SOCIETY.

The first public meeting of the Riddleville Debating Society was called to order by its President, Mr. Josh White, who, as soon as quiet prevailed, rose from his chair on the platform and addressed the club and visitors as follows:

"Brethren and Friends: As this am der first meetin' ebber held by dis Society, and as dere am a number of non-members present dis ebening, I think it am no more den right dat a few explanatory remarks from myself be in order for de elucidation of der non-members present, who am, ob course entirely iguorant ob der By-Laws of dis Society.

"Der object of dis Society am self-imbrovement. Der officers elected yearly am der president, secretary, treasurer, timekeeper, and doorkeeper. Anybody and eberybody am cordially invited to attend our debates, which will be held ebery Saturday ebening of der year. Der subjects for discussion am selected by der members of der Society thusly: Each member selects four subjects, each subject being written on a separate piece ob paper and deposited wid der president, which am done at der meeting ob der election of officers for der year. Der box, in which the selections ob subjects am deposited, am kept by the president, but der key ob der box am in der possession ob der secretary, who opens it only when a subject of debate am required. As myself am der President, I has no more conception ob der subjects in der box den der unborned babe. Der box will be unlocked presently, and Miss Susie Simpson, dis little chile in blue on my right, will draw a slip from der box, on which will be written der subject for dis ebening's discussion. and Miss Martha Howard, der little lady in red on my left, will draw from er hat two names of members who am to argue on der subject before Society.

"As brevity am wit, each speaker am limited to five minutes; and if he doesn't finish his talk afore dat time, der timekeeper will call time on him, and he will have to quit whether he am finished or not.

"Now, den, Mr. Secretary and Treasurer, if you will hab der goodness to unbolt der box, Miss Simpson will draw der subject for dis ebening's debate."

In compliance with the President's request, the box was unlocked and Miss Simpson smilingly drew from the same a slip of paper which she handed to the President amidst great applause. The box was immediately relocked and placed on the President's desk, while he, the President, adjusted his glasses, unfolded the slip, and, after much labor in deciphering the writing, finally exclaimed:

"Ladies and Gentlemen: The subject for dis ebening's discourse am, 'Was Ebe a blonde or brunette.'"

Before the laughter to this announcement had subsided, the President had the names of the different members of the club written on separate slips of paper deposited in a hat, and Miss Howard drew from the same a slip which she handed to the President, and which he read aloud as "Andrew Jackson." A second name was drawn, and the President read, "Eugene Johnson."

"As Mr. Jackson's name was drawn first," continued the President, "according to der By-Laws he am to debate first; and as it am left optional wid myself as to which side he am to take, I would request dat his argument be in fabor of Miss Ebe being a blonde. Mr. Johnson will hold dat she am a brunette. Now, Mr. Jackson, when der timekeeper calls time, you will please get up and start right in widout any apology at all."

Time being called, Mr. Jackson, a tall, lean person with a tiny little voice, rose to his feet and squeaked:

"Mr. President, Brudder Members, Friends: It seems perfectly useless for any one to argue dat Ebe was anything else but a blonde, and there am not the least doubt in my mind dat she was otherwise. To der doubting Tommies I would refer dem to der Good Book, and if dey can find anything in it what says dat Ebe wasn't a blonde but a brunette, I'll eat my hat. Another good authority on der matter am dat beautiful play, 'Uncle Tom's Cabin.' Did any one eber see a brunette Ebe in dat play? No, sir; dey am all blondes. And if der original Ebe was not a blonde, does yer suppose dey would make little Ebe a blonde in der play?"

Whatever else Mr. Jackson intended to say will never be known, for the audience burst into a round of applause and continued it so long, that time was called several times before the time-keeper's voice could be heard. Mr. Jackson was compelled to drop into his seat, which he did with a grateful thud.

When quiet had been restored, the timekeeper's voice was again heard, and Mr. Johnson, a very corpulent person, arose and said:

"Gents: Ebe was a brunette. Der Good Book may not say dat Ebe was a brunette, neither does it say she was a blonde. If any one can show me where it says she was a blonde, I won't eat my hat, but I'll eat my trousers, and dey am der only ones what I possess. In my opinion Ebe was a brunette. You will find nothing in the Good Book to der contrary. Does der Good Book tell you in words dat Ebe was white, red, yellow, or black? Why shouldn't she hab been black? Why should she hab been white, as a great many people seem to think she were? Doesn't things point that she was just as liable to be black as any udder color, and if she was black, does yer suppose she was a blonde? Did anybody ebber see a black blonde? Am dere more white people on der face ob der earth to-day den all de dark races combined? I guess not. If dere am more colored races to-day, doesn't dat go to show dat de colored race was here first, and isn't dat conclusive ebidence dat der colored race was der direct descendents ob der pioneers, Adam and Ebe; dat dey were colored and, consequently, brunettes?

"I'se got a wife. I has, and she am so black dat when she cuts her finger she bleeds ink. Her name am Ebe. Does yer suppose if der people what named her didn't beliebe dat Ebe in der Garden ob Eden was a brunette, dat dey would have named my wife Ebe? Not much, according to my opponent's argument."

And Mr. Johnson sat down, perspiring, amidst great applause, which was finally checked by the President, who said:

"According to der By-Laws ob der Society, all debates must be settled by der audience in dis manner: All those who think that Mr. Jackson made der best argument, may drop any amount of money dey desire into the hat ob der little girl in blue, who will now go among you. Those who think dat Mr. Johnson made the best argument, may do likewise to der little girl dressed in red. A nickel counts one. Der doors will be unlocked as soon as der vote am taken. Der meeting will den adjourn till next Saturday ebening, when der decision will be made known."

IT MADE NO DIFFERENCE.

First Female—I never go anywhere without first asking my husband.

Second Female—But what if he objects to having you go to certain places?

First Female—I go anyway.

HAD THE POWER.

He—Do you believe in mesmerism?

She—I certainly do. And I think you have the power to put people to sleep.

He—Why?

She—because whenever you sing I can feel myself slipping away.

PARADOXICAL.

Sniffles—You write some terrible husband and wife jokes, Squibbs. Don't you and your wife get along well together.

Squibbs—Great Scott, man, I'm not married!

SHE COULD DO THAT MUCH.

Mr. Blossom—That mind reader is something wonderful. Why, he read my mind like a book.

Mrs. Blossom—I'm sure I don't see anything wonderful in that.

SMOKING ON THE REAR PLATFORM.

Conductor (to man standing in door-way with a cigar in his mouth)—Smoking is not allowed on the rear platform.

Man—Who's smoking?

Conductor—I was merely calling your attention to one of the rules, sir.

Man—Don't you suppose I know what street-car etiquette is? Don't you think I have respect enough for the ladies in this car not to smoke in their presence? Why, you blank, blank, blanketdy blank, I'm a gentleman, I am.

A HINT.

He—What is there so very fascinating about Jack Bradway?

She—He says so many good things.

He—What did he ever say so very good?

She—Champagne and oysters.

THEY BEGIN YOUNG.

First Lady—My baby commenced to talk when only ten months old.

Second Lady—That's nothing; my baby talked when only three months old.

First Lady—Oh, of course; your baby's a girl, and that makes a difference.

REUNITED.

She—What did you do at the office to-day?

He (a Justice of the Peace)—Oh, I repaired a couple of diseased minds.

She—Why, what do you mean?

He—I married a divorced couple.

HE WAS MARRIED.

She—You must not think that Mrs. Shoddy's husband is in clover, merely because she dresses so extravagantly.

He—Why, bless you, I don't. I was wondering whether he was in jail or the poor-house.

SHEARINGS.

St. Peter—Walk right in.

Mr. Lincoln Park (from Chicago)—One minute, please. Have you a lady in there named Mrs. L. Park?

St. Peter—Yes.

Mr. Lincoln Park—And another named Mrs. Westside, née Park?

St. Peter—Yes, yes!

Mr. Lincoln Park—Thanks. I think I'll go below. There's only one of her left for that place.—Judge.

"I tell you," said the Chicago man in Philadelphia, "you people don't know what life is unless you come to Chicago. Everything there goes with a rush. Wait until we get the pyramids of Egypt standing on the lake front, the car of Juggernaut on one of our trolley lines, and the hanging gardens of Babylon floating out from the flagstaff on the Auditorium tower, and your old town won't be in it at all."

The Philadelphian trembled and looked out on Chestnut Street, where a flock of sparrows were patiently trying to build a nest on a messenger boy's shoulder.—Truth.

"Waiter, tell me what on earth there is in this hash!"

"I really can't, sir; our cathode rays haven't been in working order for three days."—Yonkers Statesman.

"You look as if——"

Mrs. Skinner was evidently anxious to say something disagreeable to the boarder in arrears.

"——butter wouldn't melt in your mouth."

The boarder in arrears glanced casually round the table and murmured:

"Depends on the butter."

Mrs. Skinner thereupon turned the subject to bicycles.—N. Y. World.

"If you could have your choice of names which one would you choose?"

"Either Smith or Jones."

"Why such a common one?"

"So my country relations couldn't find me so easily in the city directory."—Detroit Free Press.

He—That man has fought his way through life.

"How so?"

"He's been married four times."—Yonkers Statesman.

Reduce your obesity by taking Brooks's Phytolacca. Pleasant to take. Makes walking a pleasure. No diet necessary. Trial size 50 cents. Try it. Get it at 119 Powell Street. Mailed free on receipt of price.

When splendor and comfort are in sight, the people of Burlingame are never behind. Most of the beautiful homes in that section have been built within the past three years, and there was for a short time only one comfort that could not be obtained for those homes, and that was the use of illuminating gas. However, that inconvenience has been overcome by the introduction of the Peerless Gas Machine by Badlam Bros., of 511 Market Street. The Peerless Gas Machine is beyond all question a wonder, for in it are combined cleanliness, comfort, and safety. It can be put in a house at a nominal expense, and when it is once in, gas costs a great deal less than coal-oil.

These machines are of such a size that they can be used in any building from a cottage to the largest public building.

In Burlingame the machine is at present used in the homes of J. D. Grant, W. H. Crocker, and H. T. Scott, and are at present being put in all the larger residences.

At San Mateo, one is in the residence of John Parrott, and at Castle Crag there is one in the summer home of Colonel C. F. Crocker.

"The San Francisco Calling List," of which Mr. Greenway takes the responsibility, is calculated to smooth the path of matrons who have large acquaintances. It is easily the most authoritative announcement of names and addresses we have, and is put together in a convenient and capital style. The book is beautifully printed and includes the guest list of the various hotels, together with some chapters on the etiquette of cards and wedding invitations. Typographically, the publication could hardly be improved upon.

IN THE DAYS OF RALSTON.

One's memory need not run back to any great length to recall the days when Ralston and Reese and other of our prominent citizens walked to North Beach for the sake of an invigorating salt water plunge. That era, happily, has gone by. The Lurline Baths provide the best imaginable facilities for swimming, and the institution is almost in the very center of our city. The latest feature which the Olympic Salt Water Company has added to the luxuries of its menage is a Russian Bath with Needle Shower. This latest improvement is now in working order, and proves a great attraction. The price for the above, which includes the Swimming Bath, has been established at the low rate of fifty cents.

50 cents

In some conditions the gain from the use of Scott's Emulsion of Cod-liver Oil is rapid. For this reason we put up a 50c. size, which is enough for an ordinary cough or cold, or useful as a trial for babies and children.

In other conditions gain must be slow, sometimes almost imperceptible, health can't be built up in a day. For this Scott's Emulsion must be taken as nourishment, food rather than medicine, food prepared for tired and weak digestions.

SCOTT'S EMULSION has been endorsed by the medical profession for twenty years. (Ask your doctor.) This is because it is always palatable always uniform always contains the purest Norwegian Cod-liver Oil and Hypophosphites.

Put up in 50 cent and $1.00 sizes. The small size may be enough to cure your cough or help your baby.

FOR GRIPPE IT'S A DANDY

VINA BRANDY

AND

It's Pure! That's Sure!

VINA DISTILLERY CO.

819 Market St., S. F.

J. F. Cutter

EXTRA

Old Bourbon

has been a staple family and medicinal whiskey for a quarter-century

E. MARTIN

—AND—

CO.

411 MARKET ST.

SAN FRANCISCO

GEO. GOODMAN

Patentee and Manufacturer of—Artificial Stone

Schillinger's Patent — In all its branches

SIDE WALK and GARDEN WALK A Specialty

Office, 307 MONTGOMERY ST. Nevada Block, SAN FRANCISCO

Beecham's pills are for biliousness, bilious headache, dyspepsia, heartburn, torpid liver, dizziness, sick headache, bad taste in the mouth, coated tongue, loss of appetite, sallow skin, etc., when caused by constipation; and constipation is the most frequent cause of all of them.

Go by the book. Pills 10¢ and 25¢ a box. Book free at your druggist's or write B. F. Allen Co., 365 Canal Street, New York.

Annual sales more than 6,000,000 boxes.

THE WHITE FLYER IS THE MOUNT FOR '96
BARNES BICYCLES
HOOKER & CO.
16-18 Drumm St.
RETAIL STORE:
1640 Market St.
San Francisco, Cal.
THE WHITE RIMMED HUMMER IS THE COMER

A CARLOAD OF '96
PIERCE TRIED AND TRUE CYCLES
JUST RECEIVED
Many Superior Improvements. Ask to see the
Pierce Crank Hanger
Holbrook, Merrill & Stetson
Pacific Coast Agents
MARKET and BEALE STREETS
SAN FRANCISCO
Ask for Catalogue

THE WORLD-FAMED HUMBER
BICYCLES
For 28 years the standard of excellence as the highest type of cycle construction known to the civilized world.
Now manufactured in America as well as in England, France, Russia and Portugal.
ST. GERMAIN BILLIARD CO.
GENERAL AGENTS
55 & 57 FIRST ST., NEAR MARKET

A HOME PRODUCT
AXLE-EASE
THE VERY BEST AXLE GREASE
Made by—
AMERICAN OIL CO.
SAN FRANCISCO

A. D. CHESHIRE, Pres. and Manager
W. O. MACDOUGALL, Secretary
CALIFORNIA UNDERTAKING CO.
Fine Funeral Furnishers
Telephone, Main 971
123 STOCKTON ST., Cor. Geary
Finest Funeral Parlors in the city
Embalming a specialty
Open day and night

THE LADIES' BICYCLE TOURNAMENT.

A woman wheeling in bloomers or mannish knickerbockers is even yet an object of some interest. Though you pass a thousand, you still turn and look at the thousand and first. If you are sufficiently tough, you still occasionally address her as "your size," and make personal remarks if nature has been lavish or skimpy in the matter of calf. She is interesting because she is still a new departure. But put that same bloomer girl in a gaslit hall, arrayed in velvet tights spangled zouave jacket and flowing white blouse, and bid her ride to amuse the public, and the interest dies out at once. She has become merely a circus performer, whose tights and spangles have been familiar to us for generations, and a decidedly tame one at that. No trapeze, no hurdles, no kissing of the hand, no tiptoe poise on the seat of the bicycle; what right has she to spangles and a gaslit ring and an audience?

Well, to tell the truth, the Ladies' Bicycle Tournament, Saturday night, could boast very little in the way of an audience (eight laps to the mile was a liberal estimate), and the strange part is that it had any at all. There were some gloriously tough youths and some who would like to have been gloriously tough, half a dozen women, ungrammatical but not otherwise objectionable, and a sprinkling of men, trying to make some showing on the bare rows of empty benches. Four women rode four wheels two uneventful hours, then got off and went home in four cabs, and that was all. Sunday afternoon in the Park gives you a great deal more for your money. There wasn't even an accident to liven things up. When a man handed one of the cyclists (cyclesses? or cyclones?) a section of lemon as she went by a thrill of gratitude went through the audience; and when he ran out with a canteen of water, or something equally drinkable, they wanted to applaud. It is almost exciting to see a girl ride along the side of a wall with head thrown carelessly back and one hand tilting a canteen, then fling it airily aside the next time around. We were all disappointed when no one had any thirst left, and the monotonous wheeling, wheeling, wheeling, in a solemn little bunch went on unenlivened by lemons or even fresh relays of gum.

"I guess they're waiting for the ghost to walk," a woman behind me said.

I did not quite see the point, but I felt just that way myself.

If the tournament could have begun and ended with the last minute and a half of the two hours, it would have been more attractive, for then there was a little real scorching. Of course the girl from Minneapolis came in ahead. That vivid red Satanella get-up wasn't for nothing. She had set the pace nearly all the evening, though Chicago and San Francisco had taken occasional turns at it. Little Oakland never forgot that there was a large 4 on her back, and kept doggedly to her place, allowing no one to get behind her. She had yellow puffs let into the sides of her knickerbockers, perhaps faint relics of her departed skirts, and she worked her pedals and her gum with the same quiet persistency. The others might dash away from her in an occasional spurt, but she never changed her pace, and they never lost her long. Nobody gave her lemons or gum or ran out with canteens as she passed, or even called out her time to her, but she pedaled steadily ahead with the air of one who earns a modest competence by her labors, and is content.

There were no jokes on the programs (unless the one thousand dollars in prizes was one) and we thought at least there would be one here and there among the advertisements on the walls to help us through the performance, but the signs were pitifully lacking in wit. One cyclery's suggestion that you "Ask for Romeo, our favorite teacher," possibly had humorous intentions, but it would have been funnier if they had named him Cupid or Experience or something like that. The audience was too depressed to make those pointed, cynical remarks in bad English that one always says one overhears in such places, and altogether there was not a laugh to be squeezed out of the whole evening. For a few minutes we had hopes of at least a smile, when a certain calf showed a tendency to slip away from its owner. It couldn't have gone far, as there was a board wall on one side and a wire fence on the other, but the chase after it might have been exciting. But the wheels went round with a humming sound, and the calf strayed no further. We even began to have a disappointing suspicion that it might really belong to the member it adorned, and that the displacement might be merely a stocking effect; though we wouldn't have acknowledged it to each other for worlds.

At half-past ten the bell sounded, there was a final scurry around the track, then congratulations and bath wrappers for the weary performers, sloppy streets and sighs over wasted six bitses for the weary audience. The Tournament had done its worst.

Jane Hading has been selected and approved by Sardou for the title part of his new play, entitled "Marcelle."

NEGLECTED ARTISTS.

SAN FRANCISCO'S FAILURE TO APPRECIATE MATERNA.

Not since the presence here of the National Opera Company, many years ago, have the musical lovers of San Francisco had such an opportunity as in these latter weeks to hear interpreted the works of the great composers. It is questionable, however, if these opportunities have been appreciated at their true value. At the various concerts, one sees eager faces and hears heartfelt applause, but this comes from the cheaper seats and not from the front rows. I am inclined to think, a London and New York reputation, the fame of curious hair, of a note of personal characteristic, have meant more to our community than real musical ability. It is not because Paderewski is the greatest of the world's pianists that he had such immense audiences in San Francisco, but rather because he was a fashionable fad. Because Ondricek and Materna were not so fashionable, they drew smaller audiences, and created no enthusiasm. This is one of the drawbacks of San Francisco. That there is culture here in plenty, is true, but it is indifferent and without energy.

That is one point. I want to emphasize another fact: the first idea of the American writer or critic is to compare the attainments of artists. In Europe these comparisons are almost unknown. It is true, certain masters are worshiped in different places by our country people and the English, but the veritable musical soul considers music above personality, and listens to, and learns from, each artist, that which his talent enables him to tell. There is no reason why personality and artistic spirit cannot be combined, for they frequently are, but there is no reason why the personality should rob us of what little appreciation of art we may have.

Last week we had with us "the Materna." In 1872 she created Brunhilde in Wagner's Nibelungen Ring at Bayreuth. The master's philosophy, poetry, music, and painting had culminated in a first presentation of his life-long hope—a perfect representation of the combined arts. Ludwig of Bavaria had made it possible for the temple to be built, and finally the sacrifice was ready to be offered—Wagner's Trilogy was to be given. One person alone could be found worthy the goddess—mortal heroine Brunhilde—Materna. She was the high priestess of that day, and high priestess she still is, after a long service in office, twenty-four years. Musicians, artists, the appreciative world have all been at her feet; worship her still on the continent, but when she comes here only the cheap seats are filled. One reception of appreciation is given her, and that "across the Bay." She comes to us and shows her wonderful ability in the pure love song of Elizabeth, the death song of Isolde, the blossoming of true love in Sieglinde, to transmit to us the living art of Wagner as no one else can, and we receive it with halls half filled. After a begged encore—which we seemed to think a kindness on our part—forget to clap our thanks, having allowed her to sing again. It is a living shame to us this lack of appreciation.

Don't say we appreciated Paderewski. Some did, to be sure—the same ones would appreciate d'Albert Rosenthal or Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler—but the majority of us went because 'twas the thing to do, because he was well advertised.

I once saw Materna in Wagner's house—Wahnfield. Mottl accompanied her as she sang "Im Treibhaus," "Traume." Near the piano sat Frau Cosima, and by me stood the eldest daughter and Siegfried. I wish you could have all been there! The direct rays from the music genius surrounded the little roomful and perhaps whetted the natural enthusiasm. She is a great woman, and should be heard. Go to her, now there is the chance.

D.

MATERNA-ONDRICEK CONCERTS.

It would be difficult to name a violinist who can do greater justice to the compositions of Paganini and Ernst than Ondricek, although plenty there are whose interpretation of the Bruch g minor concerto is more satisfactory. It seems strange that, after playing the latter work for many years, Ondricek makes so comparatively little of it. However, it is quite true that a good artist, studying a composition early in his career without a true conception of it, often clings to this immature reading.

This may or may not be the case with Ondricek. At any rate, he more than makes up for it in his rendering of other things, the Paganini concerto, for example. In the cadenza, he performed the astonishing feat of playing broken diminished sevenths in double stops, at a lightning-like rate of speed. A "Moto Perpetuo" of Ries, as well as the better-known one of Paganini, served to display the violinist's marvelous precision and unity of bowing and fingering. Were more convincing proof of Ondricek's remarkable virtuosity necessary, his own "Tarantelle" would answer the purpose admirably. This very good composition of its kind fairly bristles with technical difficulties that only the composer or a Cesar Thomson could make interesting. Not so clever is his fantasie on Smetana's "Bartered Bride," for it is neither well-made nor of particular musical value, despite the charms of the opera from which the themes are taken.

Materna was almost a greater success with the audience than was Ondricek. Listening to her eminently satisfying interpretations, one forgets for the moment that the voice is not what it was in the days of Wagner. Time enough to speak more fully of this once incomparable artist, when she appears with orchestra, which is promised for the near future. That excellent musician, Mr. Luckstone, does not seem to have been thoroughly appreciated; indeed, an accompanist never is. Ondricek and Materna owe not a little to the exquisite piano work of this admirable musician. Mr. Luckstone will have a better opportunity to distinguish himself at the orchestral concerts.

P. C. A.

Gladness Comes

With a better understanding of the transient nature of the many physical ills which vanish before proper efforts—gentle efforts—pleasant efforts—rightly directed. There is comfort in the knowledge that so many forms of sickness are not due to any actual disease, but simply to a constipated condition of the system, which the pleasant family laxative, Syrup of Figs, promptly removes. That is why it is the only remedy with millions of families, and is everywhere esteemed so highly by all who value good health. Its beneficial effects are due to the fact, that it is the one remedy which promotes internal cleanliness, without debilitating the organs on which it acts. It is therefore all important, in order to get its beneficial effects, to note when you purchase, that you have the genuine article, which is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only, and sold by all reputable druggists.

If in the enjoyment of good health, and the system is regular, then laxatives or other remedies are not needed. If afflicted with any actual disease, one may be commended to the most skillful physicians, but if in need of a laxative, then one should have the best, and with the well-informed everywhere, Syrup of Figs stands highest and is most largely used and gives most general satisfaction.

The Best of all Cough Medicines is Dr. Acker's English Remedy. It will stop a cough in one night, check a cold in one day, prevent croup, relieve asthma, and cure consumption, if taken in time. It is made on honor, from the purest ingredients and contains neither opium nor morphine. If the little ones have croup or whooping cough, use it promptly.

Three Sizes—25c., 50c. and $1 per bottle.
At Druggists.

ACKER MEDICINE CO.,
26 and 18 Chambers Street, New York.

CHARLES S. WHEELER ERNST H. LUDWIG

Ernst H. Ludwig & Co.

THE MODEL AMERICAN CATERERS

Supply Wedding Breakfasts, Luncheons, Dinners, Matinee Teas and Receptions on shortest notice. Also Terrapin Entrees Luncheons and Dinners. Ice Cream, Cake, &c.

Telephone 2388 1206 SUTTER STREET

Health and Beauty

: : is a book valuable to all who desire to be attractive and healthy. It tells how fat folks can be made slender, and thin people made plump; how baldness may be avoided; wrinkles removed; faces bleached; red noses restored to natural color; forms improved; flat chests filled out, bust enlarged; dyspepsia cured and chronic diseases avoided.

Other Valuable Information

Any one of the many prescriptions is worth more than price of book. Mailed, sealed in plain wrapper, $1.00.

ORR AND REED,
Box 545. Grand Rapids, Michigan.

ROBBIEST STYLES NEATEST FIT
BEST MATERIALS

Up-to-Date Ideas.....

In HATS
Spring and Summer Styles. now in

AT HARLOE'S

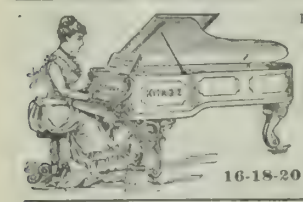
237 KEARNY ST. PHONE, RED 361

ITO, SOTOMI & CO.

JAPANESE GOODS

ART POTTERY,
CURIOS AND RUGS A SPECIALTY

116 Sutter St. Bet. Kearny and Montgomery San Francisco, Cal.



Established 1856

Benj. Curtaz & Son

Pacific Coast Agents

16-18-20 O'Farrell St.

MRS. EDITH E. McLEAN
PHYSICIAN FOR THE HAIR

Has a Canadian Vegetable Tonic for the Hair that will make it grow when all else fails. Dandruff removed. Terms moderate. High-class references.

Office Hours 10 to 12 and 1 to 6. Rooms 45, 58 and 60 ST. ANN'S BUILDING SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

NEW YORK HAIR DRESSING STORE

MME. E. KESSING, Proprietress

Artistic Hair Dressing and Shampooing. A new preventive for the hair falling out. Superfluous hair removed. 1704 Market Street, San Francisco

FASHIONS AND FRIVOLS.

The gowns in "Gossip," which Mrs. Langtry and Miss Calhoun are giving at the Comedy Theater in London, are considered by the social authorities as veritable fashion pronouncements and safe guides in the selection of chiffons. One learns there is not in any of them the smallest exaggeration of stiffness, eccentricity of horsehair lining, or any other indication of unnatural pretrusion effected by artificial means. As the action of the play takes place in Trouville and Deauville, the gowns are summer-like.

In the first scene, Mrs. Langtry wears a crepe dress of the palest pink, more than a little tinged with mauve, something of the shade of a rhododendron petal. The usual silk lining was conspicuous by its absence, the under-dress being as soft of fabric as the upper. Over the skirt fell from the waist several long, pointed panels or peplums of fine point lace, in an ideal tone of cream color. A little similar lace made a pointed collar at the back of the bodice, being carried over the shoulders, whence it fell in careless-looking fold's just in front of the arms, ending in a point a little below the waist on either side. A wide satin ribbon formed the belt, the back being ornamented with four paste buttons. The sleeves, falling as softly as the skirt, finished at the elbows, where they were met by long kid gloves. The hat worn with this was made of bright lilac-mauve crepe, the shape being large and shady. A lovely sunshade of chine silk, patterned with mauve and soft pink flowers on a creamy ground, made another item in the costume.

In the same scene, Miss Calhoun wears a blue crepon with very thick and pronounced ripples. The skirt is closely gathered in for some four or five inches below the waist all the way round, not the slightest fulness appearing even at the back. The ripples of the crepon, escaping from these gathers, flowed downwards in harmonious lines, not outwards, as we have been accustomed to see skirts do of late. The bodice consisted of two portions, first a very wide folded belt of blue silk, coming quite up to the arms, and then of a deep square, back and front, of blue chiffon, made with transparent, narrow, perpend cular puffings and edged all round with a multitude of satin-edged frills of the chiffon. The neck cut low enough to show the base of the throat, emerged from clouds of these blue frills. The sleeves were particularly pretty and artistic. Made of the blue chiffon, they were gathered very fully all the way down the inner arm from the shoulder to the wrist, and were fitted closely by a join down the outer side. But from this join rose a small forest of frills, all in the blue crepon with its tiny little satin edge. Two or three yellow roses at the waist made the blue look still bluer. It was almost the shade of the sea in the distance.

In the next act Mrs. Langtry's dress is pale sky-blue, in some very soft material, to which I was unable to put a name. It did not look like muslin, and it certainly was not crepe. The bodice was blue and white, the latter crossing the former in a kind of diagonal check, which may or may not have been applique in batiste upon the color. The sleeves were almost tight at the shoulders, but had very full puffs at the elbows. A little cream-tinted lace relieved the simplicity of the blue and white at the sides. At the throat a huge syllabub of white tulle was caught at the neck with an enormous square emerald set in brilliants, and at the waist an emerald green satin belt, in exactly the color of the stone, was folded round, and ended under a loop or two in front. The hat worn with this dress was brown straw, with a cache-peigne of white roses. The brim was almost covered with frillings of white chiffon, and a little pale blue, like that in the dress, was introduced in a ribbon that climbed up the crown from the back.

The gown in which "Mrs. Barry" has her portrait painted is really a "dream" Only an artist could have designed it. One could not bear to see it on a plain woman. It is in palest pink chiffon, all softly falling in natural folds, and caught in at the waist with a band of brightest vermilion velvet, a tint that would be intolerable in anything but velvet, but in that is perfect. Another fold of this velvet passes up one side of the bodice in front of the arm, and on the other shoulder there is a knot of it with a great bunch of violets and green leaves. The sleeves are puffs of the pink chiffon with cream-colored lace insertions introduced from the shoulders. The puffs droop toward the elbows, and the sleeves stop short an inch or so above the elbows, long pink gloves almost but not quite, meeting them. Chains of threaded diamonds pass round the neck, are caught in and out round the vermilion velvet belt, and droop in three or four lines of light from either shoulder to the waist, falling slightly below it. The hat is very large, and is covered with fluffed and frilled black tulle, with many ostrich feathers, also black, one of them falling over the hair at the back.

Then there is a lovely white satin ball dress embroidered in very fine lines down one side of the front in a small floral design, in which gold sequins are conspicuous. A gold sash encircles the waist. The sleeves are billowy, foamy snowdrifts of white tulle, and Mrs. Langtry wears with it a diamond tiara, and many diamond ornaments upon the bodice.

Miss Calhoun's teagown in this act is as beautiful and graceful a dress as any in the whole play. It is made of white and silver brocade, with a wide band of gold trimming all down one side from the shoulder; where the gown fastens over, an immense diamond button catches it on the shoulder and again at the waist. A few ripples of white and gold gauze are visible one side. This material forms the sleeves, which are partly covered by bands of the brocade from the shoulders to the elbows, lined with pale applegreen silk, like the gown itself. The collar which finishes the dress at the base of the throat is in small bands of the brocade lined with green, and curved outward over a line of the gold embroidery.

In this last act Miss Calhoun wears a sweet frock of white striped gauze over yellow silk, and a beautifully fitting zouave, made of gold and bronze-colored silk brocade, bordered with jet, and gold embroidery. Mrs. Langtry's summer costume is in palest green with much fluffery of tulle or chiffon about the bodice, and great bunches of violets. Her very large hat is covered with frills of the pale green, and has violets and pink roses for trimming, a couple of white roses being laid on the edge of the brim at the left side.

BABETTE.

If giving careful attention to detail and keeping constantly in touch with the very latest ideas in London, Paris, and New York has anything to do with artistic hair-dressing, Mr. Lederer, 111 Stockton Street, would seem to be San Francisco's best coiffure-maker.

When you are selecting a wedding present, go to S. & G. Gump's, 113 Geary Street. They have a magnificent variety to choose from.

PERRIER-JOUET CHAMPAGNE EXTRA DRY "SPECIAL"

Also specially selected stock of Clarets and White Wines on hand.

W. B. CHAPMAN, Sole Agent Pacific Coast
123 California Street

CERTIFICATE OF COPARTNERSHIP.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, } ss.
COUNTY OF MARIN. }

WE, the undersigned, hereby certify that we are partners transacting business in this State, at the County of Marin, and in the City and County of San Francisco, under the firm name and style of The Novato French Cheese Factory; that the names in full of all the members of such partnership are James Newlands, Jr., Hermann Rudolff, and George Prinz; and that the places of our respective residences are set opposite our respective names hereto subscribed.

JAMES NEWLANDS, JR., San Francisco, Cal.
HERMANN RUDOLFF, Novato, Marin County, Cal.
GEORGE PRINZ, Novato, Marin County, Cal.

In witness whereof, we have hereunto set our hands, this twenty-sixth day of February, 1896.

JAMES NEWLANDS, JR.,
GEORGE PRINZ,
HERMANN RUDOLFF.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, } ss.
NOVATO, MARIN COUNTY. }

On this twenty-sixth day of February, in the year one th usand eight hundred and ninety-six, before me, J. Q. A. Haven, a Justice of the Peace in and for the County of Marin, State of California personally appeared James Newlands, Jr., George Prinz, and Hermann Rudolff, known to me to be the persons whose names are subscribed to the within instrument, and acknowledged that they executed the same.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, at my office in said County of Marin the day and year in this Certificate first above written.

J. Q. A. HAVEN,
Justice of the Peace of Novato Township, County of Marin, State of California.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS
Estate of Barthelemi Meric, Deceased

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, A. C. Freese, Administrator of the Estate of Barthelemi Meric, deceased, to the Creditors of, and all persons having claims against the said deceased, to exhibit them with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said A. C. Freese, Administrator, at his office, Room 9, 319 Pine Street, the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the said estate in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California. A. C. FREESE, Administrator of the Estate of Barthelemi Meric, Deceased.

Dated at San Francisco, February 17, 1896.
J. D. SULLIVAN, Attorney for Administrator.

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco

33 Post Street, below Kearny, Mechanics' Institute Building

Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000

JAS. D. PHELAN, Pres. GEO. A. STORY, Cashier
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.

DIRECTORS—Jas. D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. P. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.

Interest paid on term and ordinary deposits.
Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.
When opening accounts, send signature.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

OF LONDON
Incorporated by Royal Charter A. D. 1726
Capital Paid Up, $3,416,100 Assets, $21,584,413
Surplus to Policy Holders, $8,980,251
ROBERT DICKSON, Manager
NATHAN & KINGSTON, San Francisco Agents
501 MONTGOMERY ST.

Sun Insurance Office OF LONDON
Founded A.D. 1710 Cash Assets, $10,270,535
Oldest Purely Fire Insurance Office in the World

The Lion Fire Ins. Co. Ltd., OF LONDON
Established A.D. 1879 Cash Assets, $1,108,095

The Imperial Ins. Co. Ltd., OF LONDON
Instituted A.D. 1803 Cash Assets, $9,362,920
40 Years in Business on the Pacific Coast
Manager for the Pacific Coast, WM. J. LANDERS
205 and 207 Sansome Street, near Pine

Aachen and Munich Fire Insurance Co.

Of Aix La Chapelle, Germany. Established 1805
Capital, $2,250,000.00
Total Assets, $6,854,653.65
United States Department
204 SANSOME STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

REMOVAL

Rountrees English Chocolate, Kohlers Swiss Chocolates, and all brands of Foreign and Eastern Confectionery, imported by . . . .

W. L. GREENBAUM,

of 205 SUTTER ST., will, after December 1st, be found in large and commodious quarters at

128 POST ST., Bohemian Club Bldg.

GEORGE E. HALL

Agent and Importer of Foreign Wines

MUTUAL LIFE BUILDING,
222 Sansome Street

CRESTA BLANCA WINES

AWARDED
THREE HIGHEST AWARDS
AT

THE ATLANTA EXPOSITION

OF SIX MEDALS
AWARDED TO CALIFORNIA

Cresta Blanca Wines

OBTAINED THREE

WETMORE-BOWEN CO.

140 Montgomery Street
Under Occidental Hotel

Horses Pastured

$1.50 PER MONTH

GOOD FEED AND CARE. Send for circular.

F. A. HYDE, 630 Commercial St.

J. R. SMITH & CO.

230 BUSH STREET
And Room 7, Rotunda, Mills Building

W. HALL, Successor

MERCHANT TAILORS

Will make garments to order
—At Great Reduction for Cash—

J. R. SMITH - - Manager

BICYCLE and GOLF SUITS

H. S. BRIDGE & CO.

Merchant Tailors

Many Novelties in Imported Wear. Shirts to Order a Specialty.

622 Market Street, San Francisco
(Up-stairs, opposite Palace Hotel)

UP-TO-DATE

TAILORING

AT MODERATE PRICES

J. H. HAWES

Mezzanine B, Crocker Building

COTTON SAIL DUCKS

22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard
. . ALSO . .
Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks
From 30 to 120 inches wide
Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks
Manufactured by Murphy, Grant & Co.
Mount Vernon Company Baltimore . . Pacific Coast Sole Agents

BONESTELL & CO.

Dealers in PAPER

Fine Coated Papers a Specialty

401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

Ask your Blacksmith to shoe your horse with

PHŒNIX HORSE SHOES

GIVE THEM A TRIAL

DR. THOMAS L. HILL

DENTIST

Office, Odd Fellows' Building,
S. W. Cor. Seventh and Market Streets
Office Hours, 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.
Consultation Hours, 4 to 5

ABRAMSON-HEUNISCH CO. (Incorporated)

IMPORTERS AND JOBBERS OF
Brewers' and Bottlers' Supplies, Corks, Druggists' Glassware, Etc.

26-28 Main St. San Francisco

Hotel Del Monte

America's Famous Summer and Winter Resort

The Most Elegant Seaside Establishment in the World

"Where a leaf never dies in the still blooming bowers,
And the bee banquets on thro' a whole year of flowers"

G. H. ARNOLD,
—MANAGER—

Monterey, Cal.

Flower Festivals Fiestas Rose Carnivals

. . . and the like, will be the delight of California for the next two or three months.

Santa Barbara Flower Festival, the fame of which is world-wide, and the glory of which, like that of Solomon, is not half told, opens April 15. Queen Flora will reign 3 days an arbitrary and absolute despot.

La Fiesta de Los Angeles, now fixed in the chronology of California feasts, and not less illustrious than its older prototypes, commences April 22, and the riot of fun will spread over 4 days.

The Carnival of Roses, to take place in San Jose, May 6th to 9th, inclusive, though a more recent candidate for favors of the fun-loving world, yet because of the limitless possibilities of the Garden City for anything that is made of roses, is quite as full of promise.

REDUCED RATES

will be made by the SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY for all these brilliant events. Arrange your programmes accordingly, and call on agents for particulars.

COOLGARDIE GOLD FIELDS
(FREMANTLE) AUSTRALIA

ONLY SIX DAYS TO HONOLULU — S.S. AUSTRALIA

First-Class.....$220
Steerage 110
Lowest rates to CAPE TOWN

S.S. "Alameda," via Honolulu and Auckland, Thursday, April 2, 1896, at 2 p. m.

S.S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, April 7, 1896, at 10 A. M.

Special Parties—Reduced special rates for parties. March 10th and April 7th, 1896.

Ticket Office—114 Montgomery St.
Freight Office—327 Market St.

J. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO.,
General Agents

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.

Dispatch Steamers leave San Francisco for ports in Alaska.

For British Columbia and Puget Sound ports, Feb. 19, and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Wednesdays, 9 A. M.

For Newport, Los Angeles and all way ports, every fourth and fifth day, 8 A. M.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Hartford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles (Santa Monica), Redondo (Los Angeles) and Newport, every fourth and fifth day at 11 A. M.

For ports in Mexico, 25th of each month.

Ticket Office, Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.,
GENERAL AGENTS,
10 MARKET ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

THE LICK HOUSE

Occupies the block bounded by Montgomery, Post and Sutter Streets

IT IS—
——scrupulously clean;
——accessible to all street car lines and places of amusement;
——conveniently situated for business men;
——a quiet, model place for a family to spend the winter;
——moderate in price, yet first-class in every particular.

AMERICAN OR EUROPEAN PLAN

K. B. SOULÉ, Manager

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention

A QUIET HOME
CENTRALLY LOCATED

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL
SAN FRANCISCO

WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

Pacific Towel Co.

Telephone 1780 — No. 9 Lick Place, San Francisco

GEO. E. MOORE, Proprietor

The Club Hotel — 5 Bund, Yokohama

Hotel Metropole — 1 Tsukiji, Tokyo

First-class Hotels, centrally situated, well furnished. ENTIRE FOREIGN MANAGEMENT. Experienced English Matron in attendance. Excellent table under the superintendence of qualified foreign Chef.

The Hotel steam-launch attends steamers arriving and departing. Passengers are met at the Railway Station. Visitors have the option of messing either in Tokyo or Yokohama, without extra charge—The only Hotels offering such an advantage. Certified Guides are in attendance at both Hotels. European Hair-Dresser on the premises.

THE CLUB HOTEL COMPANY, Limited, Proprietors

E. C. SIOEN, Manager — YOKOHAMA
E. DEWETTE, Manager — TOKYO

THE GRILL ROOM SERVICE
—OF THE—
PALACE HOTEL

Has been extended to what was formerly the City Restaurant. This immense room, which has a direct entrance from Market Street is known as - - - -

"THE LADIES' GRILL ROOM"

NEW DEPARTURE—CHARACTERIZED BY PROMPT SERVICE. MODERATE CHARGES

$6.50 PER TON DELIVERED

COOS BAY COAL

SOOTLESS
SMOKELESS

ORDER YOUR CARRIAGES AND COUPES OF THE
PACIFIC CARRIAGE CO.
At Baldwin Hotel
205 Sutter Street, corner Kearny
45 Eighth Street, or
St. Nicholas Hotel, Market and Ninth Streets
Steamer and Train Service a specialty 'Phone 1950

THE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
510 MONTGOMERY ST., S. F.,

Reads all papers on the Pacific Coast, and supplies clippings on all topics, business and personal.

—A—
SAFE GUIDE

No man knows all there is to know about advertising. The subject is too profound, too complex, too perplexing, for any single person, or for any dozen persons, for that matter. The path to success in advertising is full of dangerous places. All business men would do well to engage a safe guide to conduct them past the danger spots—to tell them what to do and what to avoid doing.

PRINTERS' INK

Is a weekly journal for advertisers, published at 10 Spruce St., New York. It is a magazine of ideas, of suggestions, of advice. Advertisers the world over read it and write for it. It is the advertising authority of America—probably of the globe. Business men will find it a safe guide. To secure its services as guide costs $2 a year. A sample copy costs nothing.

THE WAVE CLUBBING LIST

FOR 1896

By special arrangement with the Publishers, THE WAVE is prepared to offer the following list

SUBSCRIPTIONS MUST BE PAID IN ADVANCE

THE WAVE and	CENTURY	$6 00
" "	ARENA	5 00
" "	LITTELL'S LIVING AGE	7 75
" "	ART AMATEUR	5 75
" "	LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE	4 50
" "	MUNSEY'S	3 50
" "	ATLANTIC MONTHLY	5 75
" "	YOUTH'S COMPANION	3 75
" "	NEW ENGLAND MAGAZINE	5 00
" "	HARPER'S MAGAZINE	5 50
" "	HARPER'S WEEKLY	5 70
" "	HARPER'S BAZAAR	5 70
" "	HARPER'S ROUND TABLE	4 00
" "	SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE	5 00
" "	REVIEW OF REVIEWS	4 50
" "	ST. NICHOLAS	5 00
" "	OVERLAND	4 75
" "	COSMOPOLITAN	3 50
" "	FRANK LESLIE'S MAGAZINE	4 90
" "	PUCK	6 50
" "	JUDGE	6 50
" "	LIFE	7 00
" "	LIFE'S COMEDY	3 50
" "	LESLIE'S WEEKLY	5 70
" "	DEMOREST MAGAZINE	4 00
" "	SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN	5 00
" "	SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN SUPPLEMT	6 50
" "	N. Y. DAILY SUN	8 00
" "	" SUNDAY "	4 50
" "	CASSELL MAGAZINE	3 75
" "	ARGOSY	3 50
" "	PUBLIC OPINION	4 50
" "	SUNDAY WORLD	4 75
" "	CRITIC	5 50
" "	FORUM	5 00
" "	NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW	6 50
" "	TABLE TALK	3 25
" "	NINETEENTH CENTURY	6 25
" "	CONTEMPORARY REVIEW	6 25
" "	FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW	6 25
" "	BLACKWOODS MAGAZINE	6 25
" "	TRUTH	6 25
" "	DELINEATOR	3 50
" "	VOGUE	5 50
" "	TOWN TOPICS	7 50
" "	DAILY JOURNAL	5 00
" "	SUNDAY JOURNAL	3 75
" "	ILLUS. AMERICAN	5 75

TALES OF THE DAY.

The late Sir Frederick Leighton was exceedingly kind to poor students. On one occasion a young fellow came up to London, hoping to make money with his brush. He soon found that it was no easy matter, and in despair wrote to the President of the Academy, stating his case and forwarding some specimens of his work. Sir Frederick invited him to his home, gave him two letters of introduction to people who would serve him, and advised him to study. As the young man was leaving, Sir Frederick handed him an envelope, observing, "This is an example of the best kind of drawing. Some day you will be able to do as well, if not better." The envelope contained a check for $250.

Apropos of Sir Phillip Currie's detention by the Sultan, who kept him waiting two hours for an interview, a story is told of Lord Cromer, the artillery Major who now represents the Queen at Cairo. Once when calling upon the Shiek-El-Bekri, the supreme dignitary of the Mohammedan Church in Egypt, that worthy received him reclining on a divan, and saluted with a negligent wave of the hand. Lord Cromer caught the hand in a fierce grip, and, with a sudden jerk, pulled the astonished dignitary to his feet, all the while belarding him with compliments, his face wreathed in the sunniest of smiles. The consequence was that Cromer ever afterwards was treated with the utmost respect.

Max O'Rell tells this story in the course of a paper on Peculiar Children in The Youth's Companion: A boy, reading from a play that was being translated at sight in class, came across the phrase, "Calmez-vous, monsieur." He naturally translated this by "Calm yourself, sir." I said to him: "Now, don't you think this is a little stiff? Couldn't you give me something a little more colloquial? For instance, what would you say yourself in a like case?" The boy reflected a few seconds, and said, "Keep your hair on, old man."

In the olden days many a good Scotchman fought in the ranks of La Belle France. A MacDonald, whose sword had won him a captaincy, while at mess with his brother officers, was jeered at by a Provencal major for a foreigner. "Bah," exclaimed the sneerer, "you beggarly Scots but fight for gold." "And what fights my brother Frenchman for?" exclaimed Mac. "For honor," exclaimed the Frenchman. "Well, well, man," coolly said the Scot, as he emptied his glass, "we both are fighting to gain what we need the most."

Gath George Alfred Townsend has a Pullmann pass—one of the few journalists with that good fortune. The manner of its last renewal is the topic of a Times-Herald story. In Pullman's New Year's mail was an envelope marked "personal," and being opened, was found to contain the pass issued Gath twelve months before—which, of course, had expired. Across its back, in the journalist's own hand, was this message:

Little ticket, go again
To the mighty chamberlain,
Who within his watchful keep
Puts the modern world asleep.

Pullman was much pleased, and with his pen made out a new annual.

Whittier had none of the pretensions of genius. A little girl who lived in his house, and of whom he was very fond, asked him to commemorate in verse the death of her favorite kitten, Bathsheba by name. Without a moment's hesitation, the poet recited solemnly:

Bathsheba, to whom none ever said scat—
No worthier cat
Ever sat on a mat
Or caught a rat,
Requiescat!

Count Jaubert had attacked Marshal Soult with a number of epigrams, and when the two met at a reception of the court of Louis Philippe, the Marshal turned his back just as the Count was coming forward to speak to him, and this in the presence of thirty people. "Monsieur le Marechal," said Jaubert, quietly, "I have been told that you consider me one of your enemies. I see with pleasure that it is not so." "Why not, sir?" demanded Soult. "Because," said Jaubert, "you are not in the habit of turning your back to the enemy." The Marshal held out his hand, and the Count's success was complete.

The editor of a London evening daily was noted for his promptitude and tendency to rush things. He was continually impressing upon his reporters the necessity for condensing news. There came into the office one morning a notice of a terrific explosion on board a big ship at Portsmouth. "If you catch the next train," he said to one of his men, "you will be down there by two, and can wire something for the fifth edition, but boil it down." The message came in due time. It said, "Terrific explosion. Melpomene. Boiler empty. Engineer full. Funeral to-morrow. No flowers."

FREE EDUCATION AND PROFESSIONAL TRAINING

"THE WAVE'S" LIBERAL SUBSCRIPTION OFFER.

The proprietors of THE WAVE have made arrangements with the most prominent schools and colleges throughout the State, and are now prepared to offer scholarships and courses in the leading educational institutions free of charge, for all who will obtain subscribers to this popular weekly.

UNIVERSITY COURSES.

A single year's course at the University of California, or at the Leland Stanford Junior University, for 185 annual subscribers. This offer includes room and board, and all other necessary expenses attached to the course. For 750 subscribers we offer a four years' course.

MEDICAL COURSES.

One year at the Cooper Medical College will be given for 125 subscribers. This includes books and incidental expenses attached to the course.

A single term at the Medical Department of the University of California for 100 subscribers.

For 500 annual subscribers we offer the full four years' course at the Cooper Medical College. This offer includes all incidental costs and fees, except board and lodging.

We offer the four years' course at the Medical Department of the University of California, for 400 subscribers.

The two year's course at the State Normal School at San Jose, for 600 subscribers. This offer includes board, lodging, and books. A single year for 160 subscribers.

The course at Hastings Law College for 250 annual subscribers. This includes books and other expenses attached to the College, for a period of three years, and the privilege of studying in a first-class law office.

A three years' course at the Mark Hopkins Institute of Art for 250 annual subscribers. A year's course for 85 subscribers.

A course in any department of Van der Nailen's School of Electricity and Engineering (except Department of Assaying) will be given for 125 annual subscribers. A course in the Department of Assaying) for 20 annual subscribers.

A six months' course in either the Business Department, or the Department of Stenography and Typewriting of Heald's Business College, for 50 annual subscribers.

A nine months' course in the Columbia School of Dramatic Art for 75 annual subscribers.

A three months' course at the Meisterschaft School of Languages for 40 annual subscribers.

The course at the California School of Elocution and Oratory for 35 annual subscribers.

Tuition in music, vocal or instrumental, from Francis Stuart, S. G. Fleishmann, J. H. Dohrmann, Sigmund Beel, Nathan Landsberger, Lesley Martin, or H. J. Stewart. A course of twenty lessons from any of these gentlemen for fifty annual subscribers. For 100 annual subscribers a course of twenty lessons each in piano, singing, harmony, or any other branch of music.

PACIFIC TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH CO.

Long Distance Telephones for $2.50 per month and 5 cents per switch

Kitchen Telephones will be furnished FREE by application to your grocer

L. H. JACOBI
Contract Agent
216 BUSH STREET

BAJA CALIFORNIA
DAMIANA BITTERS

"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular.)

NABER, ALFS & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

HIRSCH-KAHN & Co.
MANUFACTURING OPTICIANS
IMPORTERS OF OPTICAL GOODS
PHOTOGRAPHIC APPARATUS & SUPPLIES ETC.
333 KEARNY STREET
SAN FRANCISCO CAL.

THE WAVE

VOL. XV. NO. 13. SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 28, 1896. PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE WAVE

Is published every Saturday, at the Crocker Building, corner Market and Post Streets, San Francisco.

SUBSCRIPTION, $3 per year, $1.50 six months, $.75 three months. Foreign subscriptions (countries in postal union) $5 per year. Sample copies free on application. The trade is supplied by the San Francisco News Co., 210 Post Street; East of the Rocky Mountains by the American News Co., New York.

THE WAVE is kept on file and is for sale at Brentano's, 17 Avenue de l Opera, Paris, France; 31 Union Square, New York City; 1015 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.; and 206 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

ADVERTISING rates and all other matters pertaining to the business of the paper, address Rooms 220-221-222 Crocker Building. Eastern Agent, E. Katz, 186-187 World Building, New York.

HARRISON M. PARKER, BUSINESS MANAGER.

Entered at San Francisco Post-office as second-class matter

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY.

SAN FRANCISCO, MARCH 28, 1896.

CONTENTS.

EDITORIALS—
Murder as an Economic Factor.... 1
England's Change of Front . 1
The Average Train Robber.. 2
The Necessity for Some New Laws.... 2
A Western Vice-President... 2
One Weekly Paper.... 3
CAUSERIE—By John Bonner.... 4
DOMESTICITY AND TIGHTS—By E. D. H.... 4
A DIPLOMATIC DIAMOND DEALER—By Jules Lick.... 5
THINGS AND PEOPLE—By The Witness.... 6
THE THEATERS—By Peg Woffington.... 7
STORY—"Two to One"—By Juliet Wilbor Tompkins.... 7
REFLECTED NOVELS — By J. W. T.... 8
AN AMERICAN MAN OF LETTERS—By H.... 8
"KIMIKO"—By J. B.... 8
THE WEEK IN SOCIETY—By The Gossip....10, 11
RIPPLES—Presumably Humorous—By Bruno....12

MISCELLANEOUS.

Public People.... 5
Book Notes.... 9
Chimmie Fadden Again....13
Dramatic Notes 9
Zimmerman as a Bicycle Editor.... 13
The Bustle Redivivus....14
Tales of the Day....16

Recently several cases have been brought to the attention of THE WAVE in which young men, anxious to secure an education, had undertaken to work their way through the University. The spirit that hungers for knowledge is not met with as frequently as one might wish, but the example of the youth in question has led the proprietors of THE WAVE to devise some means by which such persons, either male or female, might secure the education which they sought. On page 16 of this issue may be found an offer of scholarships at either of the two Universities, offers of the facilities of reputable business colleges, medical colleges, schools of electrical, mining, mechanical and civil engineering and architecture, schools of dramatic art, and scholarships at the Meisterschaft School of Languages and schools of elocution and oratory. In addition to these, THE WAVE has been enabled to make arrangements with Nathan Landsberger, S. M. Fleishman, H. J. Stewart, Sigmund Beel, J. H. Dohrman, and Lesley Martin, for courses in vocal and instrumental music, including piano, organ, harmony, and vocal art. This offer is something of a novelty in California, and is not lacking in generous features.

MURDER AS AN ECONOMIC FACTOR.

The story is familiar now, but it does not deserve to be forgotten. Last week, for the crime of earning an honest living, Charles Mars was stricken to death by a gang of ruffians. They wanted him to leave his task because he did not belong to their union, because, possibly, he believed in such liberty as the Constitution specifies. He demurred, peaceably, it is true, but still he demurred, and so they killed him. He could not afford to cease work, he had none of the instincts of loafer or bully. Far from fighting them, though they tried to provoke him, he did not even tell them to go about their business. He simply continued to work, and his temerity was fatal. They set upon him with kicks and blows, and he was taken home to die. To the loving wife who bent over him he said: "Mamma, this is what I got for trying to earn bread." The statement was literally true.

The first duty of a citizen, both by the laws of God and the statutes of man, is to provide for his own, and that this man of humble station was ready and anxious honorably to fulfil the law was the head and front and entirety of his offending. Perhaps when the deliberate assault was made the assailants did not intend assassination, that they wanted only to give Mars a lesson in the art of being a meddlesome rowdy, to demonstrate to him that a free-born American is but a slave to the brutish caprice of fellows with whom he does not care to associate. But what they thought matters little; what they did was murder. The footpad wielding a sandbag does not care to slay his victim. Indeed, he prefers not to do so, but if the victim die the intention of the footpad is justly measured by the result.

Of course, the unions that inaugurated a series of strikes, sustained it, and encouraged it, disclaim all responsibility, although, as a matter of fact, the entire responsibility rests directly upon them, and is hardly to be shifted. If they are earnest in their protestations now, let them avoid any attempt to stand as a shield between the absolutely guilty and summary punishment Out at the Presidio there is a monument marking the graves of four soldiers martyred to the frenzy of a strike that found in labor unions its sole advocacy. On this monument is the inscription: "Murdered by strikers."

On seeing this the strikers raged and fumed and threatened. They made frantic denial. They said they would destroy the shaft. They did not care to have the record of as cowardly and despicable a deed as ever disgraced the history of modern agitation perpetuated in stone. But the record is there, and in living letters it is writ in the hearts of men. Post mortem sensitiveness is inadequate. Why not show a similar tendency before the crime, expel from the ranks the Mafia-spirited, and hand over to the courts those who resort, despite attempted restraint, to violence and murder?

Laboring men have the privilege of standing together, but once organized they often claim privileges they do not possess, and one among these is to stop the wheels of industry at any time when they themselves do not care to be industrious. If they desire to be idle, their impudence is brazen effrontery when they say that others also shall be idle. It is all due—this great and growing trouble—to the paid agitator. A noisy, noisome and slinking pest, he fills the mind with false ideas, the heart with guile, and when certain disaster ensues, avoids the payment of any share of the costs One man dealt the blow that killed Mars, but scores of men lent strength to the arm that administered it. And that blow was not dealt alone to the upright citizen now dead, but it fell with chiefest force upon the cause of labor. The grave of every Mars constitutes a barrier across which labor on its path to prosperity must pass.

While Mars did not belong to a union, he received wages as great as named in the union scale. He had an absolute and inalienable right not to belong to a union, not to submit to its oftentimes unreasoning dictates, and the character of the persons who visited him to dissuade him by the process of beating from still plying his tools, was, in itself, sufficient explanation of why he had not sought affiliation, and respectfully declined it when they would have thrust it upon him. Now they may shout, resolve, disclaim, but all to no purpose. Poor Mars, toiling in defiance of the element that prescribed an idleness he could not indulge in, was the noblest type of labor. He died for his principles; no man can do more. He might have joined the union, been released from the obligations to work, bawled for his sacred rights and against the sacred rights of others. He chose rather to be decent, consistent, law-abiding; "to earn bread." Oh, awful crime! Daring to earn bread, and perhaps even grateful for the opportunity.

The daily press has proved itself timid, as it always does in the face of an emergency that places a nickel in jeopardy. There has been no editorial denunciation of this fell deed of assassination, a deed so evil in itself and so dark a portent of greater evil. The city may ring with accounts of the mysterious strangling of a wanton woman in a place of sin, but it should ring louder with the story of the man murdered for no wrong; murdered because he followed the teaching of his conscience; murdered because he would not submit to a tyranny that, without excuse, without honorable pretext, would have bound him in helpless thraldom. But if the press is weak the time has come for the law to be firm. The striker cries for justice, but often withholds it. Now that innocent blood is crying for justice, shall the strikers place aught in the way? It is a chance for them to demonstrate their sincerity. And if this cry go unheeded there will be a bitter harvest. Murder will be recognized as having a place in the adjudication of economic wrongs, real or imaginary. Yet common sense affirms that the assassin should have no part in the regulation of human affairs. His place is on the gallows, or in a dungeon. The excuse that he slew a man because the man was earning bread by toil cannot be accepted as a justification.

ENGLAND'S CHANGE OF FRONT.

The most remarkable announcement of the week, and the one most fraught with significance to the people of the United States, is that England has volunteered to stand behind this country in whatever position she wishes to take as to Cuba. Following the settlement of the Venezuelan trouble—for it is now generally believed that England has conceded the chief points made by President Cleveland—this unofficial recognition of the United States as sovereign over the Western Hemisphere is an event in history that will make the present administration memorable, and help to make the world forget many of her earlier mistakes.

England refused to accede to the demands of the United States that she arbitrate the Venezuelan boundary question. It was none of our business what settlement she made of this trouble; it was her affair, not ours, and we must keep our hands off. Secretary Bayard entreated, Blaine insisted, Foster urged, Gresham argued—all to no avail. England laughed, sneered, scoffed at our pretensions. But Secretary Olney was not to be played with. He knew when he had a fight on his hands, and it took him a very short while to bring things to a crisis where the President could interfere and declare our policy to the world. The Brewer Commission resulted, and before that Commission has reported, England "proud Monarch of the Seas," has politely sent word that she will have no trouble over the boundary question, and is willing to do anything we think just. And now she gives us to understand that if we wish the Cubans to have their freedom, and even if we want to help her, England will see that we have a clear field, with no opposition from Europe. This means that England's policy is now the direct opposite of that which she has hitherto maintained. She recognizes that Brother Jonathan is a friend worth having and an enemy worth avoiding. An effort will be made to bind the two countries together in a friendly alliance. This is wise diplomacy on England's part. Such an alliance, even though not formal, would be worth to England far more than any other she could make—in fact, worth more to her than to us, for she is aggressive, while we but protect ourselves. But such an alliance England is after. She will have it understood that the United States is to be recognized as the final arbiter of American questions, and she hopes that we will regard her as holding a similar position over the rest of the world.

English papers and public men speak much of "kin across the sea," and the natural tie that binds the two great English-speaking nations, and it is evidently not all talk. England will always find that the sentiment and public opinion of the United States are with her in every move that she makes which tends to the spread of Anglo-Saxon civilization by just means. But no alliance of any nature that might be made between the two countries could hold us in the column of Britain's supporters when she was in the wrong. Lord Salisbury can learn from Mr. Bryce, the member of Parliament who wrote "American Commonwealth," that this is the land where public opinion governs. So long as any government appeals to the conscience and intelligence of Americans it can be sure of attention, consideration, and, if right, of support. But all the treaties of Christendom between England and America would do England no good if her cause did not commend itself to us. England can earn America's support by always being on her good behavior, not only toward us, but toward the rest of the world. If she will be in fact the country of ideals she professes to be, England will have America's friendship. But with treacherous or unjust John Bull we will have nothing to do.

THE AVERAGE TRAIN ROBBER.

The intelligence that directs its attention to train robbery as a calling is of a low order and difficult to understand. It is capable of appreciating the remote possibility of sudden wealth, but this seems to be its limit. Concerning the almost unbroken line of failures that constitutes the history of train robbery, it either thinks nothing, or is unable to draw an inference from a plain state of facts. It ignores the risk of death, of disgrace, the undesirability of killing people, and sets out to win a prize that is never won, and to attain a glory that is more elusive than the gold at the foot of the rainbow.

The fame of Jesse James has worked the destruction of many a youth, filled his mind with an utter misconception of the truth, dulled his conscience, and led him at last to sudden death, to prison, or the gallows. Many people in Missouri made an idol of this lawless and brutal bandit, partly through fear, and partly through admiration for his dash, and his defiance of authority. Divested of the undeserved glamor, James becomes a vulgar thief, a wanton and particularly heinous ruffian and murderer. He robbed trains as a regular business, but he died poor, and at the hands of associates who betrayed him for a price. These associates were both shot later, one by his own hand. The most notorious of the Jesse James gang who survived the hardships of their chosen field of industry are spending their declining years in the Minnesota penitentiary. They were surprised to find that in that State their presence did not excite admiration, nor lull the trigger-finger of the Minnesotan to inaction.

The Dalton gang has been shot into oblivion. Bill Cook, the old terror of the Southwest, will never again see the light of freedom; but it is unnecessary in looking for an object lesson to go so far from home. Evans is at Folsom for life, together with a young man who was induced at one time to aid him in escaping. One of the Sontags is also at Folsom, wearing the red badge that marks him as an especially dangerous man, and makes of him an excellent target for the rifle of the guard. The other Sontag, after being hunted for weeks like a wild beast, was finally run down and riddled with bullets. "Kid" Thompson is under sentence of death because he thought he could be a Jesse James. Brady and his comrade tried the same thing; the comrade was shot in the act of crime; the loot they had buried was found and wasted by a tramp. Brady is in a cell that is to be his home for the term of his life. Only the other day Dan McCall turned from peaceful pursuits to rob a train, and died in the attempt. Of his associates, several are in jail, and one, with probable success, has attempted suicide.

Such are only a few examples in a list that could be much extended. Surely there is instruction in them. It is beyond comprehension that any one should be tempted to emulate these vicious, misguided, and unfortunate men. The halo that has been placed upon the brow of the robber is but tinsel, and imagined only by a mind diseased. There is nothing inspiring in the act of theft, whether it be done with dynamite in an express car, or by picking a pocket. The tales told of the bravery of robbers are largely tales of fancy, but the precise results of the robberies can be read in the records of courts, the registry of prisons. There is nothing of romance about a striped suit that never may be doffed until the convict be carried forth to a nameless grave. There is nothing attractive about falling through the trap of a gibbet. Even the joy of being shot at is fleeting and precarious. As to the revelry to be engaged in after the securing of the spoils, it never eventuates; it is a myth. Even if a robber makes one haul, he can hardly stretch it to last to the next attempt; and sooner or later it is the officers who make the haul, and the robber constitutes the spoils.

These are the unvarnished truths pertaining to the ignoble art of train robbery. With the facts so clear, it is a wonder that any man can be found who is so great a fool as to enter upon a career of brigandage. Yet, there is a peculiar cunning that refuses to be instructed, and probably the railroad robber will be always with us. We can kill him on the spot, lock him up, hang him, and thus in a measure impress upon him a sense of his unworth and the inutility of his handiwork, but, doubtless, others of his kind will appear. It is not an encouraging outlook. If the embryo train robber was ever to have sense enough not to permit himself to hatch, he has had the opportunity to arrive at this period of discretion, and has neglected it.

THE NECESSITY FOR SOME NEW LAWS.

The decision of the Supreme Court, holding that Judge Murphy exceeded his judicial powers in enjoining the production of the play entitled "The Crime of the Century" while the trial of Durrant was in progress, serves to emphasize the necessity for some legislative restraint upon this character of proceeding. It is well known, and, therefore, hardly needs repetition, that the play enjoined by the trial Judge was one in which an attempt was made to depict the two murders, the perpetration of which Durrant stood charged, and the finale of the pretended drama fixed the crime upon the villain, who was manifestly meant to be the prisoner.

Even the mind prejudiced against Durrant will readily admit the infernal depravity of the proceeding upon which Judge Murphy set his seal of disapproval. This decision of our Supreme Court does not, of course, declare that the thing restrained was or would have been innocent and harmless. It simply confesses an inability on the part of the judiciary to protect a prisoner on trial from such an assault. It confesses that even though justice be perverted by the act; even though a strong and overwhelming public opinion be created against the innocence of the prisoner, or in favor of his guilt; even though the court itself, or the jury, be the subject of ridicule or attack, there exists no adequate legal remedy that may be applied to cure the ill before the damage has been accomplished. This is a serious confession of lameness in the law. The beneficent clause in our Constitution, which insures to every citizen the right to freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments on all subjects, but holding him responsible for the abuse of that act after it has been committed, covers the case in point, and will cover all subsequent cases of a similar character, and protect the individual who may seek to abuse the rich privilege so freely given. Having a knowledge of this infirmity of the law suggests that something in the shape of a remedy be devised. The joint efforts of the legal profession might have weight in such a matter. Public opinion might thus be formed and the shortcomings of our laws remedied. It must be confessed, however, that difficulties stand in the way of arousing public opinion in this case. The enormity of the crimes charged against Durrant repels all sentimental sympathy for him, and seems to blunt the public sense of right and wrong. With but a few exceptions he was absolutely friendless. It is difficult, therefore, to convey with force to the public mind a proper conception of the wrong the production of this play might have done, or the evil likely to flow from a repetition of the thing. His case does not offer an apt illustration on which to arouse a public indignation that would protest against such a manifestly unjust proceeding.

It is always a delicate question just where Liberty ends and License begins. As a rule, decent men regard with repugnance the general attitude of the press toward the judiciary and the unfair conduct which often marks its course during the progress of legal proceedings. In many cases the press exceeds all bounds of decency and becomes, what it often is in point of fact, an advocate—a paid advocate—upon one side or the other. Such a state of affairs was never contemplated by the men who drafted the clause of the Constitution insuring the liberty of the press.

Justices McFarland and Temple, who probably are among the strongest and ablest men in our Supreme Court, dissented from the prevailing opinion of the court in the following language:

> All the provisions of the Constitution must be construed together and effect given, when possible, to each. The one (Section 9 of Article 1), which provides that every citizen may fairly speak, etc., is to be construed in view of that large and important part of the Constitution by which a judicial department of the Government is erected, and all the usual and necessary powers of courts given to the tribunals established under it. One of the most essential of these powers of a court is to protect itself against unlawful intrusion upon its orderly conduct of business, and to insure litigants in a pending proceeding the full and unembarrassed administration of justice. In the case at bar, in a court of record established by the Constitution, a trial was gravely progressing, in which a man's life was at stake, and an act was about to be done which it is admitted "would be an interference with the administration of justice and deprive him of a fair and impartial trial."
>
> Is it possible that a court is powerless to protect a defendant in a case pending before it from an act that would deprive him of a fair and impartial trial? In my opinion the power given by Section 9 of Article 1, not to be stopped beforehand from speaking slander and writing libels, does not include the right not to be stopped from interfering in a pending proceeding in a court and preventing a party thereto from having a fair and impartial trial. The right to slander and libel individuals, and the right of a court to prevent interference with the course of justice in a pending trial, are not inconsistent and may both stand together. And I think that the cases where it has been held that a threatened publication could not be enjoined, will be found to be nearly all threatened cases of threatened libels against individuals or property, and not cases where there was a threatened interference with a pending proceeding in a court, and an attempt to deprive a party thereto of a fair and impartial trial.
>
> I think the order under review should be affirmed.

Is it not within the province of the Legislature to regulate or prevent a recurrence of proceedings so disgraceful as those complained of in the Durrant trial? There are some things forbidden by the rules of common decency and the rules of fair play that are common practises with the daily press and stand sadly in need of legislative regulation if regulation may be effected constitutionally.

> I. To prevent editorial comment during the trial of issues, of fact, or of law, or, if this be considered an abridgment of the right of free speech and therefore unconstitutional, then require all such editorial comment to be signed by its author.
>
> II. To prohibit reports during a trial about any witness or juror, or about the story of any witness except by way of a report of the proceedings in Court.

Common decency ought to step in and protect the rights of litigants and witnesses in this connection. But "common decency" cuts very little, if any, figure with the daily press. The orderly procedure of a legal trial seldom contains sensation enough to warrant an adherence to the testimony as given without comment. The amendments to the law above suggested are not original. We have referred to them in a former article. The suggestion was originally made in the American Law Review by a legal gentleman who was shocked by the conduct of the San Francisco daily press during the trial of Durrant. To these laws might well be added:

> III. All criticisms and attacks upon judges or judicial conduct or procedure shall bear the signature in full of the author of such criticism or attack.

Notwithstanding the intelligence of this age, notwithstanding the fact that we may ridicule the power of the daily press, it must be confessed that its announcements do carry some weight even to the man who is most loud in expressing his scorn at its power (power to do harm). We unconsciously invest the press with a dignity and character unwarranted under the light of intelligent criticism and analysis. So far as it attacks the integrity or the learning of our judiciary, its impudent criticism should be stripped as far as possible of the artificial importance we are so likely to yield. Ignorant of the first principles of the law, its articles upon the subject should be brought down to the level where they belong, which in no case is higher than the author of such criticisms.

Requiring articles dealing with the courts to be signed will tend to elevate their tone and breed a care, lest hasty and ill-advised criticism creep into the public prints. Is there not an opportunity here for useful activity among the legal profession?

A WESTERN VICE-PRESIDENT.

A few weeks ago "The Wave" requested its contemporaries to express their views on the question of uniting in the West for George C. Perkins for the second place on the National ticket. The answer has come, and has come with a force that is tremendous and unmistakable. The representative press of the entire State rang out with one hearty and unanimous "Aye." It was no hesitating, doubting, questioning approval; there were no fears as to his ability; no suspicion as to his integrity; no question as to his immense popularity. Such things were not so much as breathed, even by the press of the opposing party. The tribute paid to his honor, to his integrity, and the reiteration of popular confidence after years of official service, speaks strongly and forcefully to all the Nation; speaks to the man of Massachusetts and to the man of Maine; to the man of the South as well as to the man of the North; to the man of the East as well as to the man of the West. This unanimous verdict states to all the Nation that California is prepared to present to the Republican Party a candidate for National honors, in whom the people implicitly believe.

Mark well the press that stands sponsor for this man. It does not represent communities where machine politics obtain; it does not speak for the press that has "strings upon it," of the press that stands for "interests." It speaks for the people, and says, in language strong and unmistakable, that the great body of the people believe in this man; it says that the farmer, the man of the interior, the men who vote and speak their honest convictions, believe implicitly in his honor; it tells the politician of the East that California has a man whom the farmer would trust and support; it tells him that we have a candidate who would draw votes in this State by the thousand from the Populist ticket. And this feeling would spread and grow from one farming community to another. The agriculturist of the middle West and of the East would soon catch the spirit of confidence and trust in which his Western fellows hold this man, and the word would go forth that here is a man of the people, a sailor-boy candidate—a poor boy once, then a prosperous merchant, then a State Senator, then a Governor, and now a United States Senator, who has ever and always, in season and out of season, served his constituents, maintained his dignity, preserved his honor, and grown in the love and estimation of the people. Soon the Populists of Kansas, the wavering Democrat, the floating and uncertain voter, would fall under the banner, and the Californian who had never yet lost an election before the people would gather into his party a strength which few men could bring to the National ticket.

The clippings given below are only a fraction, a small fraction, of those that have come to this office. Each extract represents but a line or two of the glowing tributes paid to this most popular man. Read them, and consider that they represent the voluntary tributes of the Western press to a Western man. To the press, and to the politicians of the East, where his name is canvassed among strangers, his honor, integrity, and ability discussed, these voluntary tributes must have a deciding weight as to the man.

Senator Perkins is not in any sense an active candidate for the position of Vice-President. California, itself, presents him as its choice, and in presenting him vouches for his integrity, his popularity, and his ability.

George C. Perkins is on the road and making rapid strides toward the position of the Chief Executive of the United States, and in time is bound to get there.—Journal, Lompoc, Cal.

He is an honest, fair-dealing, hard-working gentleman. It is pleasant to find that even good, solid Democratic papers favor the nomination of Senator Perkins for Vice-President.—Observer, Corning, Cal.

Senator Perkins is a self-made man of no mean ability. A man of large affairs, he has shown conspicuous ability in every walk of life. Like a well-equipped American, he has proved to be equal to every demand made upon him. There is no man on the Pacific Coast who so well understands our needs, or who will poll so strong a vote irrespective of party lines.—Farmer, Santa Rosa, Cal.

Though in early life blessed with limited educational advantages, by sheer force of energy, square dealing, and unvarying amiability, he has achieved a most creditable and enviable place in the estimation of all who know him.—Sun, San Bernardino, Cal.

There is no doubt that Senator Perkins is to-day one of the most prominent men in this State, and in the entire West, for that matter.—Advocate, Blue Lake, Cal.

Mr. Perkins is better and more favorably known than any man in the West.—Chronicle, Portland, Or.

The Senator stands well with the people of California, and should the Eastern delegates to the convention wish to recognize this coast, Mr. Perkins might prove a formidable candidate for the place.—Times, Escondido, Cal.

He is simply a good business man of unquestioned integrity, who is affectionately regarded by a large circle of friends, and in whatever station he has been placed has acquitted himself with credit, and has made splendid use of his opportunities for improvement.—Sun, San Bernardino, Cal.

It is our opinion that Senator Perkins is in every way qualified for the position of Vice-President, and we are sure that if his side won, he would acquit himself with signal ability in that office.—Mail, Stockton, Cal.

Senator Perkins is a typical Californian, and a man who has made a success of everything he has undertaken in business and politics.—Banner, Buckley, Wash.

McKinley and Perkins would look well in print, and they would make a strong team in their official seats in Washington.—Star, Pasadena, Cal.

California should have a place on the National ticket, and Senator Perkins would be an excellent choice.—Union, Yreka, Cal.

The nomination would be a most excellent one.—Tidings, Grass Valley, Cal.

The Herald heartily seconds his candidature.—Herald, Arroyo Grande, Cal.

There is no valid reason why Senator Perkins would not make a good candidate for the office of Vice-President.—Nugget, Placerville, Cal.

We are glad to find his candidacy so popular.—Enterprise, Selma, Cal.

It is believed here that he would make a good second on the Morton ticket.—Commercial Advertiser, New York, N. Y.

The State of California has more than once honored Senator Perkins and he has never betrayed the trust.—Blade, Santa Ana, Cal.

The nomination would be a great compliment and honor to the Senator and the State he so ably represents.—Mail, Woodland, Cal.

In Washington the chances of Senator Perkins are considered favorable.—Times, Oakland, Cal.

Mr. Perkins has the ability and is sufficiently sound on the burning questions of the day for the first place on the ticket.—Argus, Petaluma, Cal.

If the Senator gets the nomination and the Democrats of the Nation vote for him like the Democrats of California voted for him for Governor, his election is assured.—Express, Merced, Cal.

It is doubtful if there is in any other Californian who would be so satisfactory both to his own State and the country at large as Senator Perkins.—Times, Palo Alto.

His ability is unquestioned.—Free Press, Ventura, Cal.

No man has a better right to seek the nomination than the genial and popular Senator from California.—Tribune, Oakland, Cal.

His nomination would be an honor to the Senator and the State.—Valley News, Anderson, Cal.

There is no better man for the position.—Prospect, San Andreas, Cal.

He is the only person available.—Journal, Yreka, Cal

His ability is unquestioned.—Chronicle, Santa Paula, Cal.

Senator Perkins is an able gentleman and has a clean personal record. He would do credit to the State and to the Nation.—Chronicle, Santa Paula, Cal.

In canvassing the list of suitable men for the place, none seems so clearly available, in all respects, as our able and popular Senator, George C. Perkins. His pure and splendid record as a citizen, Governor, and Senator, shows the character and calibre of the man, and the Republicans of California and the Pacific States would especially delight to have an opportunity to rally with unanimous and mighty enthusiasm to the support of a ticket bearing his magic and honored name.—Courier, Shasta, Cal.

The suggestion is simply a magnificent one. No man deserves more at the hands of his party in California than ex-Governor Perkins and none would do them more honor.—Sun, Colusa, Cal.

He is a man of inherent ability and sagacity, and is of the calibre of which statesmen are made.—Champion, Chino, Cal.

Senator Perkins is a clean, able, popular man.—Journal, Weaverville, Cal.

"Vice-President Perkins, of California." Now, that sounds all right, doesn't it?—Graphic, Stockton, Cal.

We are glad to find his candidacy so popular.—Enterprise, Fresno County.

Senator Perkins has the confidence of the whole of California. He stands to-day as a type of what California may well be proud, and if the second place on the National ticket comes to us, George C. Perkins is the one man that by a National Convention should be offered it.—Herald, Hueneme, Cal.

Senator Perkins is a man who would do credit to the office of Vice-President; he is a man whom Californians—without regard to section—should delight to honor.—Champion, Chino, Cal.

Everybody who knows Mr. Perkins, irrespective of political predilections, would he glad to see Mr. Perkins not only nominated but elected to that honorable position.—Gazette, Los Angeles.

If a Western man is chosen, Senator Perkins could not be improved upon.—Echo, Ione, Cal.

Here's hoping he'll be successful.—Bee, Lakeport, Cal.

Senator Perkins's nomination would be a popular one with the people, not alone in California, but the entire West.—News, Rio Vista, Cal.

He is a specimen of noble manhood, and California, irrespective of party, should delight to do him honor.—Ledger, Antioch, Cal.

He is an able man, and has been an energetic Senator, and if nominated he will be elected, and if elected he will do credit to the position.—Chronicle-Union, Bridgeport, Cal,

No one is better qualified or stands higher in the ranks of the Republican party west of the Rockies than Senator Perkins; he is a good candidate to boom for second place.—Times Gazette, Redwood City.

George C. Perkins is well-qualified for the position for which he is being mentioned and is probably the most eligible Californian for the position.—Star, St. Helena.

He would be very acceptable to the people of the Pacific Coast.—Times, Eureka.

Senator Perkins has the ability to fill the position.—Argus, San Francisco.

A lucky star has always hovered over the Senator.—Mail, Woodland.

We would like to see Senator Perkins named for Vice-President, but the party claim should reach further than that.—Argus, Auburn.

Even a stanch Democratic contemporary says if the Senator gets the nomination and the Democrats of the Nation vote for him like the Democrats of California did for Governor, his election is assured.—Selma Enterprise.

If they wish to succeed, they might as well give him first place, as he never was beaten when before the people. If he was a Democrat the Mercury would make Rome howl for him.—Oroville Mercury.

The Times seconds the nomination of Senator Perkins for the Vice-Presidency.—Times, Escondido, Cal.

There is no one in the Republican ranks who would fill the bill better than Senator Perkins. He is a large man in all respects and would draw the Republican vote of the Pacific Coast to a man.—Porcupine, Los Angeles, Cal.

So far as the Call knows, Mr. Perkin's party could do no better than support him for the place named.—Call, Norwalk, Cal.

The Senator would be heartily supported by the entire Pacific Coast.—Mercury, Portland, (Oregon).

He would receive the strong and zealous support of his party.—Advocate, Gilroy, Cal.

No better man could be urged for the Vice-Presidency.—Independent, Santa Barbara, Cal.

Perkins for Vice-President on the Republican ticket would be the proper caper for that party.—Record, Crockett, Cal.

ONE WEEKLY PAPER.

A recent number of The Bookman contains an article upon E. L. Godkin, editor of the New York Nation and of the New York Evening Post, showing the wonderful influence exerted by this gentleman in a weekly paper. Mr. Godkin, in 1865, was made editor of the Nation in New York City, and in '66 the ownership of the periodical passed into his hands. Its history under his management is more familiar in the East than here. In 1881 the Nation was made the weekly edition of the New York Evening Post, and Mr. Godkin assumed the joint editorship of the latter with Mr. Horace White. The journalistic methods which he has pursued are so at variance with the more popular methods, that it is well worth while to reproduce from the article in question extracts indicating his character, his methods, and the permanent imprint his thoughts have left upon the public mind. Mr. H. T. Peck, the author of the article, says:

Mr. Godkin at the very outset of his career was exceptionally fortunate in finding a broad field in which to develop his powers and to gain experience. Most American editors of distinction have begun their careers in the newspaper offices of some small town or city, and have thence worked their way toward metropolitan and national eminence. In the process they have necessarily acquired an invaluable knowledge of the mysteries of practical journalism, and a minute acquaintance with the temper and requirements of the American people; yet they have also in their formative period been cut off, owing to their provincial environment and the intensely local influences to which they have been subjected. They are, in consequence, too often imbued with prejudices that hamper their intellectual freedom. Their horizon is too narrow, their opinions too provincial, and their mental processes too deficient in perspective. The practical result is seen in the fact that while they are quick to recognize the drift of public opinion, they are deficient in the qualities that would enable them to direct this drift, to mould and shape this opinion, and to guide it toward wise and worthy ends. They are admirable followers, but weak and uncertain leaders.

The individual characteristics which have made Mr. Godkin a power are thus defined:

As an editor, Mr. Godkin has always displayed the characteristics that we have just noted as lacking in so many American editorial offices. So far from being in any way swayed by the breath of public favor, he has, perhaps, too often gone to the other extreme, and, by what appears to many to be a kind of perversity, has exulted in setting himself in direct opposition to the popular tide. In this way there have been times when his aggressive independence has put in jeopardy the success of a worthy cause, and has not infrequently estranged some of its most conscientious supporters. Yet in the main, as his attitude has become better understood, it has often at last been triumphantly vindicated; and some very marked revolutions in the national mind can be traced unmistakably to the persistent and powerful hammering of Mr. Godkin upon the door of the national conscience. It is possible to cite chapter and verse in support of this assertion; for it is not too much to say that all the most important questions of our recent political history were raised to prominence in the first instance largely by the influence of Mr. Godkin. They were, of course, in any case bound to arise in time and to clamor for solution; but it was Mr. Godkin's clear sight that penetrated the future and detected their imminence, as it was his courageous independence that forced them to the front and hastened on their consideration.

The bold indifference which he ever exhibited to opposition and ridicule is emphasized:

In almost every case he has had at first to contend with persistent opposition, unlimited ridicule, and disheartening indifference; yet in every case, also, by sheer force of character and power of argument, he has in the end impressed his views upon one or another of the national parties. Who does not remember, for instance, the torrent of contemptuous mockery with which almost every one received his first demand for a civil service in which the non-political appointments should be made from considerations of fitness alone, and with a tenure made independent of political expediency? How the politicians sneered and jeered! The spirit that animated Roscoe Conkling when he insultingly dubbed George William Curtis "a man milliner," was reflected in a thousand newspaper offices, and in the sardonic comments of a hundred political committee-rooms. "Snivel-service reform" was the popular name for Mr. Godkin's proposed system; and even the ordinary citizen, with no political axe to grind, chuckled quietly over the visionary aspect of what Mr. Dana called "Chinese" methods. Yet the civil service of the nation is now very largely organized as Mr. Godkin had suggested, and to-day no responsible politician dares to suggest a reversion to the spoilsman's ways.

Mr. Godkin had small respect for the ordinary sensational daily press, which he took no pains to conceal, and which his biographer declares had an elevating influence upon journalism. He goes on to say:

Never for a moment has he allowed his columns to exhibit any of the more discreditable features of the irresponsible press. Never has he ceased to denounce and to hold up to contempt the baseness of its practises, its cheap wit, its ignorance of history, its malevolent injustice, its clap-trap rhetoric, the shamelessly offensive outrages on personal privacy. There is to-day still much to be desired in our press, but the great metropolitan journals, at any rate, now adopt in the main a tone of courtesy and dignity that was once unknown.

Many may marvel that one man could exert such an influence through the medium of a weekly publication. It is generally assumed that the large circulation of a daily newspaper is the most influential means of molding public sentiments, but that this is a fallacy Mr. Godkin has demonstrated. Mr. Peck continues:

It may be asked how such an influence as we describe to Mr. Godkin could be so effectively exerted through the columns of a weekly paper whose circulation has never been a large one. The question is a very natural one. It is probable that the Nation has never possessed more than ten thousand subscribers, and the circulation of the Post is not a large one. Moreover, Mr. Godkin's editorials, while they represent the perfection of a certain style, are not likely to be regarded as "good reading" for the masses, who like slang-wanging and the beating of the big drum. How, then, has he succeeded in finally impressing his views upon the great body of the people? The answer is easy. Mr. Godkin's clientele, his ten or twenty thousand readers are a picked class. They are not ten or twenty thousand casual persons forming a stray drop in the bucket of the population. They are rather representative men—men of high professional standing, authors, lawyers, editors, experts in their own line—in other words, men who individually wield a strong influence upon many others. It is men of this type for whom Mr. Godkin writes, and when he has convinced and won over these, he has secured ten thousand apostles of his doctrine, almost every one of whom is a strong, positive force in the community. It is, then, not directly upon the masses that he works, but through his immediate circle of readers; and this accounts for the fact that among the people at large his name is little known. Hundreds of thousands of voters are to-day following implicitly Mr. Godkin's lead who have no knowledge of his existence. But the public men to whom they look for teaching, the editors of the newspapers whence they get their bias, these are Mr. Godkin's pupils, receiving from him the arguments and the elucidations which they pass on in a new form to the great constituency whom they serve. We could mention many newspapers that take their cue in this manner from the editor of the Evening Post; and there is a New York journal of which we wot that seldom fails to give its readers in the morning, in a sadly diluted condition, some one of the crisp, convincing editorials of the Post of the night before.

The De Reszkes, Calve, Plancon, and Maurel make it a rule to dine at two in the afternoon when they intend to sing the same evening. As Calve characteristically remarked the other day: "The voice cannot be used properly if the stomach is busy digesting food. Therefore, if you would enjoy dining or any of the other good things in life, keep off the operatic stage."

CAUSERIE.

BY JOHN BONNER.

The collapse of the extortion suit against Mrs. Davidson probably marks the close of the Brown case Nine-tenths of the people of this city believe the pastor to be guilty; the other tenth know him to be innocent. To fasten delinquency upon a clergyman is so grateful a task to the average layman, that long before any evidence was adduced, Mr. Brown had been tried and convicted by the press and the public; it has been difficult to shake the opinion then formed. He is not an adroit or a discreet man; he fits the poet's description—such men naturally become targets for stone throwers. But no one who has followed the case carefully will believe that he has done anything which unfits him for the ministry, or said anything that was not absolutely true. To convict Mrs. Davidson he had but to say one word; the judge and his own counsel urged him to say it; it would have been but the truth; but his nice sense of honor forbade him to speak; and the blackmailer won freedom.

Impiger, iracundus, inexorabilis, acer;

* * *

It does not often happen that the actions of San Francisco strikers command approbation. But the proposal of the painters, who were lately on a strike, to take contracts for painting buildings in competition with the bosses was undoubtedly a wise step. There is no reason why the journeyman who wields the paint brush should not deal directly with customers without the intervention of an employer. Dealers in paint, oil, and brushes would give industrious and steady mechanics credit for materials enough to paint a house. Then, if they are right in their contention that the bosses can afford to pay them $3.00 a day instead of $2.50, they would get the $3.00 plus the profit of the employer. This is the true solution of the question at issue.

* * *

The card system, upon which the Unions insist, is part of the machinery by which trade unions are trying to restore the ancient monopolies of labor, and is an obsolete absurdity. The unions refer to it as a new discovery; in fact, it is as old as the Middle Ages, if not older. Throughout medieval Europe, no mechanic could exercise a craft unless he could show by a card which he carried that he was a member of a guild, and the number of apprentices whom he could engage was fixed by a rule of the guild. In France the Revolution, in England a statute of William IV., abolished the monopolies of the guilds and made labor free. Our labor unions are trying to revive a system which the workmen of Europe sloughed off fifty and a hundred years ago. They will not find it easy to enforce a law which denies to an American citizen the right of earning his living at the calling he has learned.

* * *

The reactionary policy of the workmen on this shore is probably destined to defeat itself by a reductio ad absurdum. Wages are higher here than in the East. But the average workman loses so much time through strikes, and through a reduced consumption of labor caused by its high cost, that he does not net as much money at the end of the year as his brother in New England; and the treasuries of the unions, which should take the place of savings banks, are so constantly depleted by the demands of idle workmen on strike that contributions made to them are generally a dead loss. The moneys expended to support the striking molders four years ago have not yet been replaced.

* * *

Again the arbitrary power assumed by the unions has led, as arbitrary power always does, to its abuse. The miners on the Comstock object to a mine superintendent, run him out of town, and threaten him with death if he returns. Of course, this sort of thing cannot be endured. Men cannot be suffered to control properties which they do not own, and whose losses they are not called upon to defray. How the Hale & Norcross trouble will end it is not now easy to see. An appeal to force would probably be futile in a community where the bulk of the men capable of carrying arms are on the side of the law-breakers. A more practical remedy might be found in an organization of the mine and mill owners to throw off the despotism of the miners. This proved effectual in the coal districts in England. By closing all the mines and mills and keeping them closed until the unions were disbanded or came to their senses, the gentry who now insist on controlling other people's property might be reduced by famine.

* * *

Doctor Talcott, the alienist, says that a frequent cause of insanity is early rising. He says that to call a boy out of bed when his sleep is not finished is to grind his soul, to curdle his blood, to swell his spleen, to distort his mental activities, and to incline him to abject dementia, or resistive melancholia. He adds that insanity in the rural districts, where everybody gets up early, is twice as prevalent as in the cities, where people sleep late. Doctors tell us that the young should stay abed seven hours so that on them the balmy dews of sleep shall, with double nutriment, descend, and Henry Vaughan lays down the rule: "Never sleep the sun up." When, then, shall the sleeping hour come for the people of the North, who witness the midnight sun for days together?

* * *

The development of athletics, the use of the cycle, the popularity of walking, tennis, golf, and other outdoor exercises, have led to an increase in the size of the female foot. Dealers in fashionable shoes report that their stock used to consist of 1½s to 5s; now it runs from 3s to 7s. Hardly any girl wears a 2 size now, and many are not ashamed to ask for 8s. The craze for small feet was a fad, for which the caprice of poets is largely responsible; there is no more beauty in a disproportionately small foot than in a disproportionately small head. Sir John Suckling, as everybody knows, was an ass; if a woman of ordinary size had feet no larger than a mouse, she could not walk on them. We are approaching a period when girl bathers will not be ashamed to go into the water barefoot, which few of them can afford to do now.

* * *

Since the defeat of the Italians in the Tigre country, Mansfield Parkyns' old book on Abyssinia has acquired new interest. He did not admire the natives, though he did not consider them bloodthirsty. He marveled at the perseverance of the Christian missionaries who labored faithfully without ever making a single convert. One of them presented a fine Bible to a well-to-do native, bidding him be careful of the volume as it was worth six dollars. "Six dollars!" replied the Abyssinian, turning over the leaves, "I am unworthy of so costly a gift; take back your Bible, and give me one dollar, that is enough for me."

* * *

Judge Campbell has sentenced a druggist to a fine of $500 for selling morphine to a victim of the morphia habit. The Judge is not the man to lose an opportunity of advertising his guardianship of the public morals; but people who have met sufferers from the use of morphia will be inclined to applaud his decision. It is, perhaps, an extreme illustration of paternalism; but in many States the law protects the drunkard to the extent of making the dealer who sold him the means of getting drunk responsible for his acts. Certainly, nothing could be gained for Society by making the sale of morphia free; the pupilage of the weak and the unwary may be unsound in theory, but it does no one any harm.

* * *

The lather who murdered the poor old man Mars for daring to try to earn his living in defiance of the commands of the union, has been held by a coroner's jury on a charge of having delivered blows "with intent to do bodily injury." Blows which cause death are generally inflicted with some such intent; the fellow who the other day chopped his victim's head to pieces with an axe had probably some idea of the kind. From the testimony of the doctors, it may be inferred that the assassin is going to plead that his victim died of apoplexy. A bad disease, apoplexy; carries off its victims quite frequently.

* * *

Mr. Drayton has got his divorce. If current report be true, he was entitled to it long ago. Parvenues often prove unable to stand the pressure of high life; contact with the pomps and vanities of a wicked world reduces their principles to pulp. It may also be said in excuse for them, that in their set marriages are generally "arranged" without much regard to the impulse of love; when the parties to a marriage de convention meet their affinity afterward, the devil is to pay.

* * *

Mrs. Baldwin-Deacon has set her pretty foot once more on her native heath, where there is no Abeille to sting it. She is a lovely woman, and she enjoys the prestige of having had a man killed for her. Wonder if, in her moments of introspection and reflection, her mind's eye ever calls up the ghastly vision of that handsome face with a pistol wound in the forehead, through which the red blood was trickling, while the stern husband looked on and muttered the awful words, "Vengeance is mine!"

Would you be an actress or a vocalist? See how you may have the best tuition free of charge. Page 16.

DOMESTICITY AND TIGHTS.

THE CAREER OF LOUISE EISSING, WITH REMARKS ON THE MORALITY OF THE BALLET COSTUME.

"I don't approve of extravaganzas. In fact, I don't like to see women wear tights or bloomers—it isn't modest, it isn't womanly."

It was in the office of the Baldwin Hotel that I heard this remark. I was taking it easy just after the dinner hour. It is a great place to lounge in—you see so many interesting people there. Men who write, men who read, men who act, journalists, business-men, sporting-men, some who live by their wits, and some who live without any—those who live upon others, and—the others. It is a place full of good material for a short article, any day.

The voice that made the remark was young, and came from behind me as I stood by the elevator—it arrested my attention; I listened for a response. The answer came in quiet tones from an older voice:

"Indeed! And what have tights or bloomers to do with modesty or womanliness?"

"Why, everything," answered the young voice, impulsively. I turned, and recognized in the last speaker, a man but one short year married, formerly a frequenter of stage door and foyer, whom the recent advent of a young daughter had doubtless transformed into a censor of public morals. In his companion I recognized a certain journalist, an individual of diversified talent, repute and publicity—handsome, well-dressed—a man of the world, in the best sense, whose even temperamental balance had withstood the storms and buffets of a large experience of life, and—women. A delightfully charming companion, with just a dash of cynicism now and then,—a cloak to his kindness.

"Do you believe a woman can exhibit herself nightly in tights and still retain her modesty? Can she ride through the streets in bloomers and still remain womanly?" asked the young man.

"Why certainly, my boy. Is the exhibition of a shapely leg encased in silk tights any worse than that of bare arms and snowy bosoms? Do not the wives and mothers of our land permit themselves the latter quite often? Your own mother, your wife, perhaps. You would resent it if any one called them immodest."

"Oh, that's altogether different," replied the young man.

"Yes, it is," returned his companion, laughing softly. "Professional people have no voice in the matter. Their costumes are detailed for them—they have to wear what they are told to—it is obey or leave. Society people do as they please, and they often please to do a great deal. It seems to me the discussion about tights and bloomers is more immodest than the wearing of them. Modesty has its sins and a kiss its innocence. Take your wife to the extravaganza—she will enjoy it, and you can tell her from me the young woman who plays Sinbad is as modest as any good woman should be—and why not others?"

"Oh, you know her, then?"

"I have known her all her life," was the answer. "We came from the same city, Philadelphia. I remember her when she was a little girl, running around with her hair in two braids down her back. Eissing pere was in business in the Quaker City, and he failed This young woman was but fifteen then, but she was a plucky little thing. I remember how anxious she was to do something to help her parents—she used to talk with me about it. She had a sweet voice, and was well-grown and strong. She went straight to the Chestnut-street Opera House and enlisted the attention of Zimmermann, the manager, who engaged her as a chorus girl. Well, that's the way she began. Since then she has played under various managements."

The speaker here lifted his hat to a lady about to enter the elevator. I recognized Miss Eissing—a well-formed, graceful young woman in a dark green tailor-made gown—not pretty, exactly, but with a bright, cheerful face and soft, gray eyes, the color of an April cloud.

"That is Miss Eissing," her friend remarked to the young man, as the elevator door closed behind her.

"No!" he replied, in astonishment, "is that really Sinbad?" leaning forward to catch a further glimpse of her.

"That's Sinbad," replied his companion; "rather modest, eh?" he continued, quizzingly. "Nothing unwomanly about her?"

"Well, no; I should say not—looked like a good, quiet, home-body, rather on the Jenny Wren order. She had rather pretty eyes, I thought, too."

"Well, that's just what she is," said his friend, disregarding his last remark. "A quiet home-body—a devoted wife, romantically attached to her husband."

"Why does she remain on the stage, then?"

"Because she has just one ambition in life. As soon as they have made money enough, she and her husband mean to have a home of their own and a quiet life. She has a clear, sweet, flexible voice, a nice figure, and she can assume a certain up-to-date dash, which goes in such work as she does. It all means money to her, and she means to have money if hard work will bring it. I called on her the other afternoon; we were quite a little party in her rooms. I twitted her about writing so often to Mr. Scott—they write to each other every day."

"Just married, I suppose," said the young father.

"Why, let me see, they have been married nearly six years. I asked if she thought she really would give up the stage ever—hadn't she changed her mind, and she said:

"'Oh, no. I shall remain until I have made enough for our home. We want a home of our own.' It's always 'we' and 'our' with her."

"That's rather nice of her, don't you think so?" said the young man. "Sounds sort of wifely and womanly."

"Yes; that's the way it strikes me," returned the older man, as he rose and strolled toward the door with his young friend, "but she is one of those women you spoke of who wear tights," and he slapped his companion on the back. The young man laughed and said:

"Well, I guess I'll take Maudie across the street to-night."

That was all I heard, but it was enough. E. D. H.

A DIPLOMATIC DIAMOND DEALER.

EPISODES IN THE CAREER OF A CLEVER SALESMAN.

Colonel Andrews is not only a man of wide experience and large abilities, but he possesses a natural trait of character which is as valuable as it is infrequent. He is a born diplomat. A prominent jeweler once pronounced him to be the best judge of diamonds and the best diamond salesman in San Francisco. Tiffany, on one occasion, offered him the princely salary of twenty thousand dollars per year if he would go behind the firm's diamond counter. Here are some stories which will afford one an idea of the diplomatic side of the Colonel's life:

Upon one occasion a man, rather roughly dressed, stepped into his establishment and expressed a desire to be shown a cheap but good watch, explaining:

"I want to get the best watch for the least money."

The Colonel laid before him a silver timepiece, the price of which was ten dollars. The sale was made and the stranger departed. Several weeks after this occurrence the same man made his appearance, and, stepping up to the Colonel, asked:

"Do you remember me?"

"I do. I sold you a watch a few weeks ago for ten dollars," was the answer. The Colonel has a wonderful memory for faces.

"Yes, sir. I am nearly broke," explained the stranger, "and I have an opportunity to go to Arizona, where I think possibly I may better my condition. I have come to see how much you would give for the return of that watch," at the same time handing out the chronometer.

The Colonel examined it, and perceived it to be in good condition. He promptly replied:

"Ten dollars, sir."

"But that is what I paid for it," said the stranger.

"I remember," responded the Colonel, "but you have not injured it in this time, and I will simply sell it to some one else for ten dollars."

There was a look of thankfulness in the man's face as he departed from the store, saying,

"I'll not forget you."

Some two years later, during which the episode faded from the Colonel's recollection, there entered the store a rough, bearded man, with trousers tucked in the tops of long boots, slouch hat, woolen shirt, and a broad smile. Approaching the precise, scrupulously dressed Andrews, he inquired, abruptly:

"Do you know me?"

The Colonel looked at him earnestly. He was silent a moment. Then he said:

"You're the man I sold a watch to for ten dollars which I afterwards redeemed for the same price."

"That's right," said the stranger, "and now I want to look at some diamonds."

Thereupon the fellow with the rough dress and the coarse speech selected three large diamonds studs valued at $850. "Good," said he, "next I want some cuff buttons," and he selected a pair in which sparkled two expensive brilliants. "And now a collar button," said the man with the rough dress, and a collar button was produced in which sparkled another gem.

"Don't you think it'll look bar' on the breast?" inquired the stranger.

"Maybe," assented the Colonel.

"What's the price of that thar' cross?" pointing to a diamond cross containing thirteen large stones.

"Thirteen hundred dollars," said the Colonel.

"Well, put that in," said the man, bunching the gems together as if they were pieces of lettuce. He asked for his bill, and suggested that while the boy was "doin' up the stuff," he and the Colonel should have a drink. They retired together; then the stranger left, with the promise to return shortly.

The jeweler's clerk was not inclined to take the matter seriously, but the Colonel, on his return, ordered the gems put into their boxes and wrapped up, averring the sale to be bona fide. Sure enough, the fellow was back a few moments later, swinging a large sack of twenties, from which he counted out the price of the diamonds, amounting to $13,000. He explained then that his name was McMullin, that when down in Arizona he had discovered the famous McMullin Mine, which had made him rich. Had the Colonel not taken the watch back the trip to Arizona had been impossible, and he felt he owed him his prosperity.

Subsequently, McMullin returned and bought diamonds for his "gal," who afterwards became his wife. Then he disappeared. Some months later he entered the store, a shadow of his former self, and as he said, "dead broke." He wanted to borrow $20. The Colonel laid out five shining double eagles, and told McMullin to take them and pay when he could.

Eighteen months rolled round. Again the bronzed stranger returned. This time he had discovered the famous ——— Mine, and was again rolling in wealth. Finally, through drink and unwise speculations, McMullin came to the County Hospital, sick and broken down, and people wondered why it was the Montgomery Street jeweler visited the pale invalid in Ward A, and how it happened that chicken and soup and other dainties were supplied with so much generosity to McMullin. Another episode illustrative of this diplomatic intelligence occurred when Colonel Andrews was in business in Mobile. It shows even more pointedly the peculiar type of his mind.

Leaving home one night to procure medicine for his wife at a neighboring drug store, he was obliged to pass his own establishment. The Colonel makes it a rule to have one employee sleep upon the premises. Returning with the medicaments, he took the precaution to look in through the keyhole to see if everything was in order. The employee was awake, and there being no cause for uneasiness, he hurried along, "almost in a run," as he explains. A policeman, witnessing the occurrence, made chase, and the Colonel, thinking him a footpad, hastened his speed.

"Stop," cried the guardian, "I am an officer, and if you don't pull up I'll shoot."

The Colonel was taken to jail, protesting meanwhile that he was the proprietor of the store, and was not attempting to pick the lock or make a false key. While waiting the return of a messenger who had been sent after friends to come and identify him, the City Sheriff appeared and demanded in astonishment:

"Hello! Andrews, what are you doing here?"

"This officer has arrested me," said the Colonel, "for attempting to break into my own store."

Explanations followed, and one may imagine the discomfiture of the policeman, who supposed he had earned the everlasting enmity of a leading merchant. But the Colonel was not made of this kind of stuff. The next day he selected a fine gold ring, and had engraved upon it: "Presented to Officer ———, for vigilance in arresting me." That evening the astonished and delighted officer was the recipient of a gift from a source whence he had expected anger and possible dismissal. The consequence was that Andrews's establishment was better guarded than any store in Mobile; he had the friendship of the force, and never lost a cent through burglars.

But here is another tale, which shows that generosity is not always its own reward. A rich Nevadan, who proposed to celebrate a big strike by purchasing diamonds for his wife, was recommended to Shreve's and to Andrews's. The Nevadan first called at Shreve's, and the diamonds shown there delighted the lady. Subsequently they called upon Andrews, but his gems did not appeal to her as did those of the former establishment.

"But the Shreve diamonds are set, are they not?" asked the Colonel.

"Yes," was the answer.

"Then permit me to set these, madam, according to your design, and if you do not like them better than the others, I'll cheerfully bear the cost myself."

The lady explained her views, and the diamonds were arranged as she had suggested, and, subsequently, when she called to see them, she was delighted, and loudly expressed her preference. The happy husband then announced that he would be in to purchase them on a given day.

In the interval, however, news came of the sudden death of a brother in Nevada. The husband called and explained that his wife had lost her desire for the jewelry, and he asked Andrews to postpone the transaction until they again came to town. Indeed, circumstances compelled them to return by the evening train. "Besides," continued the Nevadan, "my wife is suffering from a violent headache, and is almost hysterical."

"My friend," said the Colonel, not willing to lose a sale of such magnitude, "if you will bring your wife here I'll promise to cure her headache in short order. A man who would purchase diamonds to such an extent as this for his wife is certainly fond of her, and ought to be ready to do anything that will tend to relieve her mind from such distress and divert her mind."

This struck the Nevadan as a good idea, and the twain appeared soon after. By the agency of a stick of methol the headache soon disappeared; the gems were produced and admired.

Both had decided that they would postpone the purchase, when there entered the store a wo-be gone, poverty-stricken tramp. The chief clerk was about to eject the mendicant, but the Colonel, raising his hand, stopped him, saying:

"No, no; the poor fellow may be hungry, and he shall not leave my door-way if I can help him." Turning to the tramp, he asked, "Are you hungry?"

"Yes," responded he, "and dry."

"Here's a half-dollar, my good fellow. Satisfy your hunger rather that your throat."

The rough, warm-hearted Nevadan dove into his pocket, and, producing a half-dollar, also gave it to the tramp. Then, turning to the jeweler, he said:

"Wrap up the stones. I'll take them." And he afterwards explained to Andrews that his generosity to the tramp had been the cause and meaning of the sudden change of mind.

JULES LICK.

PUBLIC PEOPLE.

Sir Edward Gray is regarded as the coming leader of the Radical party in the House of Commons, and has even undergone eulogy at the hands of Lord Rosebery. He is a liberal man, has a singularly prepossessing [illegible] manners, and his voice has a peculiar depth and melody. Even the Saturday Review says his speeches are thoughtful and earnest, and he never mistakes rudeness for repartee.

The habits of the young King Alexander of Servia are such as to furnish interesting matter for investigation to a student of heredity. The founder of His Majesty's family was a swineherd. The king, who is only nineteen years old, is of phenomenal strength and physical development, and takes pleasure in knocking his enemies' heads together.

The young Czarina of Russia has informed her ladies-in-waiting and other members of the court that she will permit no woman to approach her who smokes. The [illegible] consternation, as the ladies are addicted to cigarettes as to tea-drinking. The Grand Duchess Vladimir is both an inveterate smoker and a gambler.

The Right Honorable Herbert Gardner, Lord Burghelere, an ex-Cabinet Minister of Great Britain, who is soon to visit the United States with his beautiful wife, is the only English peer and statesman who ever appeared in [illegible]. He was an intimate friend of Queen Victoria's youngest son, the late Duke of Albany, and was celebrated for his impersonations of female characters in public and private theatrical performances. The Duke of Albany himself once appeared in private theatricals dressed as a girl.

Lord Kelvin, formerly Sir William Thomson, the famous electrician and man of science, says fifteen minutes quick-fire cannonading will be sufficient to reduce a sailor on a modern man-of-war to a state of imbecility. A naval battle would soon resolve itself into a contest between lunatics.

Ex-Queen Liliuokalani of Hawaii, President Cleveland's "great and good friend," has joined the European colony of monarchs in exile. She owns a villa in Northern Italy, and a schloss and a considerable landed estate in the Austrian province of Istria. The Queen and her daughter will arrive at Castello Washington, the Istrian villa, toward the end of March. On Easter Monday the marriage will be celebrated there of Princess Kailuaolani, of Kaila, and Don Tommaso de San Felice, an Italian nobleman. There will then be a great gathering of South Sea Island courtiers and others. Her Majesty will proceed to her Istrian seat in summer.

The Kaiser celebrated his thirty-seventh birthday about a fortnight ago, and a Berlin florist, who knew how "to take occasion by the hand," sent him thirty-seven tiny oak trees. William II. was delighted. True, he remembered having studied in his "First Lessons in Composition and Rhetoric" that to liken a great man to an oak tree is a trite simile, but there was nothing of the hand-me-down order of similitudes in comparing him to a whole forest. So the thirty-seven little oaklings were given to the head gardener, and in the spring they will be transferred to one of the imperial gardens, where the Emperor will personally superintend their grouping. And the far-seeing florist now displays the royal arms above his door.

The Queen-Regent of Spain is a confirmed cigarette smoker, and seldom transacts any business without smoking before, during and after the transaction. It is the especial pleasure of "Bubi," officially known as Alphonso XIII., to light the cigarette for his mamma. "Carmen Sylva," the Queen of Roumania, is also an inveterate smoker.

Chauncey Depew has the gift of judging champagne. There came to him recently a young woman who is interested in a brand of wine, for which she wanted his indorsement, saying it meant $10,000 in her pocket for a few lines from him. Depew refused stating he could easily make $100,000 per annum for testimonials, and that if he indorsed anything to drink it would reduce the business of the New York Central and prevent him being invited to address the students of a female seminary.

Queen Taitou, of Abyssinnia, the spouse of Menelek, is one of the class of women with whom it is well to stand on good terms. She conceals under a submissive aspect, an iron will, and a relentless disposition. She is well-formed, with regular features, except for a little defect of the mouth, which she endeavors to conceal when she speaks. Her skin is a clear brown. Her eyes are black, large and expressive. Her feet are small, and her hands are aristocratic, just as are her manners in general. She dresses in the Ethiopian fashion, with a great deal of taste and elegance.

Earl Grey, appointed by the British Government as Commissioner to administer the vast domains of the African Chartered Company, is a handsome man of about forty-four, and was known as Mr. Albert Grey until he succeeded to the peerage of his crotchety old granduncle about eighteen months ago. A brother of the Countess of Antrim and of Minto, as well as of the late Duchess of St. Albans, he belongs to a family which is renowned through England for its quarrelsome disposition.

Emperor Nicholas of Russia has at length signed the decree restoring to Grand Duke Nicolievitch all the honors of which he was deprived at the time of his [illegible] marriage at Nice to the attractive child of Prince Nicolas of Nassau and of a Montenegrin divorcee, the daughter of the great Russian poet Pushkin. Emperor Alexander III. had arranged for a match between his young cousin and Princess Victoria of Wales, the engagement being openly and publicly announced. At the last hour the Grand Duke jilted the English Princess and wedded the beautiful Countess Sophie Metenberg, a young American from Philadelphia acting as his best man at the wedding. The late Emperor was so infuriated that he at once banished the Grand Duke from the Empire, docked his large allowance and deprived him of all his military titles and honors, his rage being intensified by the sudden death of the young Grand Duke's mother, who expired in a fit of anger on hearing of the marriage. The young Grand Duke is now to return to Russia with his morganatic wife and child, the former having been created a Countess of Torby in her own right by the Grand Duke of Luxemburg, her uncle.

At Berlin people are alarmed about the increasing eccentricities of Emperor William, who seems to be immensely proud of the title of "Prince of Peace," applied to him by the President of the Transvaal, His Majesty obviously forgetting that the only other person in history who ever bore this title was the ignoble Godoy, the favorite of Queen Marie-Louise of Spain, who, after betraying to Napoleon the royal woman who had raised him from the humblest ranks to the highest position in the Kingdom, was murdered by a Madrid mob.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

POLITICAL combinations are as often a coalition of common hatreds as a union of common causes. A curious condition has been brought about in Alameda County by Governor Budd. Between John P. Irish and Frank Moffitt there has existed, for many years, an intense antagonism. The announcement of an ambition by the former defined at once the opposition of the latter. Wherever Moffitt showed his head Irish stood ready to bump it. But they have at last found a bond of contact—dislike of Governor Jim; and, in consequence, the stalwart Moffitt loudly announces a determination to send Irish to the State Convention from his own district just to emphasize and define this open hostility. He is certain the Naval Officer lives only for the discovery of opportunities of denouncing the Governor, and of these there should arise plenty at the Convention. Considering previous conditions, this inversion is so extraordinary that the Colonel refuses to accept its credibility. He declines to believe in the ex-Senator's good faith, and his skepticism alone prevents the consummation of two revenges. However, when conversing on the possibilities of this anomalous alliance, both make it clear that the basis is not that they dislike each other less, but they hate Budd more.

* * *

The Union League Club has invited Chauncey Depew to a banquet to be given in his honor. There is to be no mistake as to whom the club wishes to honor; it is Depew, not—at present at any rate—Levi P. Morton. Chauncey is here on a "pleasure" trip. General Clarkson was here on a "business" trip. Each gentleman has, however, been industriously dropping seeds by the bushel basket in the hope of reaping a presidential boom in the not distant future in favor of his particular candidate. To Clarkson the Union League Club tendered no reception, lest it might be construed an an acceptation of the "friend of the west"—for such was the reputation the "General" desired to give Allison. Now, however, it proposes to receive Chauncey for his own sake, and not because his pleasure trip is a booming for Morton. The query suggests itself, "Was not Clarkson worthy of a reception for his own sake?"

* * *

Just at this juncture the identity of the men who are to go to the National Conventions engages the curiosity of the political mind. The aspect of local affairs indicates the ultimate supremacy of the Spreckels, which means that the delegation will be drawn from the adherents of that clan, and will include, doubtless, John D., Sam Shortridge, his brother, the editor of the Call, Jim Rea, and their lieutenants. Whatever predilections there be toward Allison, it is safe to believe that the wild-eyed errors of the past will not be repeated. The party is to go unpledged, and will think long ere committing itself. At least the promise of a Cabinet office will be exacted as the price of support, or perhaps the compliment of the Vice-Presidency to a Californian. It is good to learn of the positive abandonment of those traditional illustrations of the glorious climate and the matchless resources, cases of claret and champagne, and baskets of fruit, which have ever formed the outfit, and important adjunct, of our delegations. That is a relic of the past. Our men propose now to be as icy, as dignified, and as remote, as though hailing from Maine or Massachusetts. The identity of the Democratic delegation is less mysterious. It is possible Gavin McNab may be delegate at large; James D. Phelan or Bernard Murphy will doubtless represent the Fifth; Geo. T. Marye can go from the Fourth; Frank Nichol of Stockton is a certainty, and Dr. Nutting has ambitions in the First. The choice from Oakland is uncertain, for the Fitzgeralds and the Bill Englishes are in the field with separate combinations, and the pick is with the victor. That, briefly, is the situation, but it is one which alters with the passing of days and nights.

* * *

Here is a disquieting piece of political information: Dr. O'Donnell has had his ambition diverted from the Mayoralty to a seat in Congress and desires to represent the 4th District in the National Legislature. This laudable aspiration seems to his optimistic soul well within the possibilities, for a careful figuring up of his successive votes indicates the possession of sufficient strength to cut a figure. Should he carry the threat into execution it is—farewell Congressman J. G. Maguire. That worthy will be retired into private life with a painful precipitancy. The participation of the notable quack means, of course, the success of the Republican candidate whoever he be. There is talk among the well informed of Will Barnes, and if he could be persuaded to enter, there need be little doubt of the result, but he proposes on retiring from office, to attend to the requirements of a growing law practise. Among the Democrats there is evinced an inclination to thrust responsibility on James D. Phelan. He will either be a candidate for Mayor with the new charter in view, or else, will conduct the campaign as Chairman of the State Central Committee. Admittedly a good manager and with reliability, good sense, and considerable felicity of expression as endowments, he would win honors in that role and help amazingly toward reducing anticipated Republican majorities.

* * *

Apropos of ambitions, I am inclined to believe that the journalistic prognosticators are misled over the aspirations of Claus Spreckels and his son. Unless I am mistaken, the able old Sugar King is quite content with his role of refiner and railroad builder, while John D. designs rather to name senators than to be one. He desires to have power; his participation in politics is the expression of a purely individual wish to have a voice in the government of the State, and, though it might be unwise to say he would refuse a proffer of the toga, the chances are that he would try it on Sam Shortridge. The talent of both father and son is executive. They are better in the council chamber than on the rostrum, and may be depended on to prefer story-telling to speech-making.

* * *

IN AN uptown hotel there resides a distinguished Irish family, which, prior to St. Patrick's Day, consisted of a husband, a wife, and a parrot. The parrot has since paid the penalty of indiscreet speech, under circumstances which seem too funny to be true. The husband hated the bird, but explained his complaisance on the score of its color—green. On the other hand, it served to console the wife, a quiet body, in the frequent absences of her consort, who is given to increasing the ardors of a naturally excitable disposition by over-indulgence in whiskey. His condition under such circumstances has become familiar to the sagacious Polly, whose ears had grown habituated to the sadly resigned murmur of his mistress.

"That poor fool Patrick's drunk again."

On the anniversary night of the patron of Ireland, aware of her conditions which the occasion precipitated in the spouse, the good lady sought other quarters, leaving the parrot in charge of the rooms. At midnight her husband returned, well under the influence of the Saint, and staggered solemnly into the room. At the noise of his arrival the parrot piped:

"That poor fool Patrick's drunk again."

The accumulated resentment of six months exploded that instant. The husband found a poker and beat cage and bird into mere splinters with such an expenditure of fire and vigor that its fond mistress found of her Polly next morning only a tangle of broken wires, stray feathers, and a green stain on the carpet. The Archbishop has successfully exerted his powers of persuasion, and Madame has retired her divorce proceedings.

* * *

GENERAL CLARKSON was the representative of a syndicate of capitalists who wanted to control the street railway system of the City of Mexico. Dealing with Mexican officials is purely a game of patience, and as a rival syndicate entertained similar designs, the degree of forbearance exercised may be imagined. The opponent was a Spaniard, and he had relations with the Government which made him dangerous. However, the General dealt with the President, and finally they agreed on $11,000,000 as the price of the property. To ratify the transaction the consent of a certain high official had to be obtained. He succumbed to pressure, and agreed to sign his name next day. The document was before him, the pen in his hand, when a messenger arrived from Diaz, commanding him to desist. The rival had seen Clarkson ascending the treasury stairs, and realizing by the triumphant expression of his face that the game was won, rushed off to the President and told him the General was the advance guard of an American invasion; that the United States Government having decided to annex Mexico, had delegated him as its representative to obtain the car system, and form an army of employees. Hint to a Mexican of Gringo designs, and there is no story too incredible for their gullibility. So positive was the effect of the story on Diaz, that all negotiations were at once dropped and Clarkson retired. However, the rival won nothing, for the property has remained since in the hands of the Government, until bonded recently by a Californian—H. A. Butters.

* * *

If in the transactions of the Mechanics' Library Trustees there arise those differences of opinion which so often goad men into belligerency, depend on it P. J. Healy, who has just been elected to office, will raise no finger for peace. He is a dealer in second-hand books, is Irish, and as pugnacious as a bantam. Among his proclivities is an interest in the single tax that has converted him into an adherent of Congressman Maguire. One night Maguire was addressing in an impassioned strain, an audience of enthusiasts and dwelt on the rights of men born equal. Eloquently he dwelt on the privileges of equality; there should be no distinctions between high and low, rich and poor, alien or native.

"Does that apply to the Chinese, Judge?" inquired Mr. Healy in the politest way possible.

Maguire paused embarrassed. It was an audience of workingmen and theorists, and hatred of Chinese is the keynote of their creed. Before he could destroy his reputation or his logic, a friend started hooting the inconvenient questioner and the confusion which ensued relieved the lecturer of the necessity of reply.

* * *

SINCE HIS engagement by Adolph Spreckels to supervise affairs at Ingleside, Sam Leake has become an habitué of the Grill Room. Among the Sacramento politicians he acquired celebrity by the dexterity of his manipulation and no one says he has lost the faculty since arriving in town. At the Legislature, of which Frank Gould was Speaker, Leake was a prominent member of the Third House. He had various corporate interests in charge and conducted them with judgment. The most debatable quantity in the game, however, was Gould, on whose dictum hinged the fate of several bills. Being honest and unprejudiced he was as liable to hold for the corporation as for its opponents, and the uncertainty kept the manipulators moving. As the end of the session drew near, there arose interesting questions of precedence and as they involved the revival of obnoxious measures, Leake made up his mind to discover the rulings in advance. So he gave an elaborate dinner and the Speaker sat at his right hand. He had three kinds of wines, and libations of champagne at the roast. When the auspices seemed happiest, he turned the conversation on rules of order, and discussed parliamentary law with frequent appeals to Gould, who entered into the debate with proper authority. Finally the wily Sam asked the Speaker to unravel a knotty point which he and a friend had quarreled over, framing at the same time a hypothetical question which involved the point at issue in the House. Gould, pretending innocence of the motive, provided the answer that Leake had hoped for, and announced he could see no other way of deciding. Whereupon Sam telegraphed the good news to his friends; but a day later the question came up, and Gould took exactly the opposite attitude. The two met outside, and the Speaker observed quietly to his erstwhile host:

"Sam, use some better bird lime than champagne when you are after such an old cock as I am."

* * *

THE journalistic cauldron bubbles and seethes. Never have the Examiner and the Chronicle hated each other more bitterly. Intense rivalry prevails; reporters are warned that defections from one journal to another mean permanent exclusion. For the spectators, and for Charles Shortridge, the situation is amusing. Here are two belligerents beating each other black and blue, and we wonder if those body blows they deal each other really hurt, or are like the punches which the comedians exchange at the Orpheum, merely for effect. In the meantime, the Call is gaining subscribers, and presenting us with fresh marine pictures, and the Bulletin is arranging to send all the school marms to Europe, besides crusading against the unfortunate Brown. By the way, the Saturday issue of this journal is well worthy of commendation; it has just secured the rights to Stevenson's last story, Weir of Hermiston, and, besides, publishes a quantity of excellent original matter from members of its own staff. It is gaining rapidly, and is now said to have a bigger circulation than any San Francisco evening paper ever before attained. This, however, is not an affidavit. THE WITNESS.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

TWO TO ONE.

BY JULIET WILBOR TOMPKINS.

They strolled boldly off under the same parasol in the direction of the beach. She was pretty and petite, with soft, fluffy hair so light as to be almost white. It did not matter to most people whether he was pretty or not. Some said he had five millions; others declared it wasn't more than two. He had the reputation of being extremely wary. The girls watched them go with uplifted eyebrows and significant smiles, and wondered if he knew—they did not say exactly what. Perhaps they did not quite know themselves. The men laughed and made sotto voce bets of two to one on Little Tow-Head.

Meanwhile he was standing on the beach below her, holding up his hands.

"Jump, 'fraid-cat," he said.

"But it's too high for me," she objected, from the rocks above. "I'm not a great long thing."

"It isn't so far as it looks. Come, don't be afraid to take the plunge. It's leap year, you know. There: that wasn't bad, was it? Do you realize that this is the last leap year for eight years?" he added.

"Dear me, I'll have to bestir myself," she said, curling up against a big rock. "Next one I'll be an antique of twenty-six," with a pensive air.

"No, you don't young woman," was the rude answer. "Don't you suppose I know what leap year you'll be thirty in?"

"Well, I wouldn't want to be eighteen, anyway," she said, with a bold change of front. "It's a horrid, crude age, all breaks and blushes. Twenty-four is much nicer. I'm going to stay there some years. I wonder if any girl, any nice girl, ever did take advantage of leap year?" she went on, presently.

"I think girls do more of the asking than people generally realize," he answered, frowning at some recollection.

"But that's because they are in love, or getting passée, or anxious to secure some particular treasure," she said; "not because it is leap year and their indisputable right."

He rolled over in the sand and looked up at her with a subdued laugh in his eyes.

"Let's inaugurate the custom—among nice girls," he said. "Suppose you try your hand at it now."

A puff of wind blew her hair across her eyes. It was as though a drift of silvery fog had come between them. She emerged laughing, and did some inexplicable things with hairpins.

"I wouldn't risk it for worlds," she said, emphatically. "If a man refused me, I'd never forgive him as long as I lived. Oh, I'd die of mortification."

"By the way, they say that you turned down Dick Hartridge," he said, burrowing absently in the sand. She straightened up.

"Did Alice tell you?" she demanded. "She's the only person in the world that knows it. She hadn't any business——"

"It's true, then?" he said. "Oh, nobody told me; I just inferred it. I suppose he was simply furious?"

"I don't see why. He hadn't the least right to be," she answered, indignantly. "It wasn't my fault, and I was as nice as I could be about it. I don't see what excuse he had to be angry."

He smiled to himself and, apparently, dropped the subject.

"About leap year," he said. "You know, if I should refuse you, I'd have to give you a silk gown."

"A silk gown!"

"Didn't you know that was the old leap year custom? I suppose it comforted the girl, and taught the man to recognize a good thing when it was offered him."

"And it's just exactly what I want," she said, joyfully. "I do believe I'll try it."

"Fire ahead," he answered, resting his chin on his palm, and looking up, expectantly.

"Can I have it made anywhere I want?"

"I suppose so."

"And plenty of real lace?"

"Oh, certainly."

She drew a long, ecstatic breath; then her face fell.

"But oh, dear! What if you accepted me?" she exclaimed.

"I suppose that, also, would involve a silk dress or two—eventually," he answered, with a sigh.

"To be sure," she said, looking gravely out to sea Then a glance at him started an eddy of dimples.

"What wouldn't some of the girls give to be in my shoes for five minutes," she murmured. He tried to look mystified, or at least reproving, but laughter was too much for them both.

"They couldn't get into them," he said, pouring sand over one of the members in question. "They might cut off their heels or their toes, but they couldn't fool me. I'd know Cinderella every time."

"I wonder if she would have loved the Prince just as immediately if he had come in homespun," she said, thoughtfully.

"Just exactly," he answered, with decision. "Rank hadn't anything to do with that marriage. I have great faith in—Cinderella."

The silver fog showed signs of settling down again, but she pushed it back and leaned closer to the rocks to be out of the breeze.

"But don't you believe his velvet cloak and the title of Princess had some influence?" she persisted.

"Why, yes; and so did her pink cheeks and silvery hair on the Prince," he answered, earnestly; "but he didn't love her any the less when she lost them. And if he had lost his title and his velvet cloak, her love wouldn't have gone with them, would it?"

"I thought Cinderella had golden hair," she said, demurely.

Several men were lounging on the club-house steps as they strolled up from the beach, still under the same parasol. One of these, who looked as if life had taught him a thing or two, scrutinized them closely, then chuckled softly to himself.

"Good for Little Tow-Head," he said, half under his breath. "Say, Johnny, you owe me ten dollars."

SAN FRANCISCO, March 28, 1896.

THE THEATERS.

IMPRESSIONS OF SINBAD—A BIT OF DIALOGUE AT MOROSCO'S.

With "Captain Impudence" in its second week and "A Milk White Flag" in its third, the theater habitués were in a bad way Monday night. Most of them were to be seen at the Columbia, where, with the assistance of a few other people, they packed the house. Yes, we actually forgot and forgave Katie Putnam and the "Wicklow Postman," and bought even the upper boxes in order to see "Sinbad," an old Christmas extravaganza. From a spectacular point of view it is well worth seeing, particularly the latter part, though, of course, it makes one pray, "Make me a child again just for to-night," and feel hopelessly grown up. Still, it is a pretty show, and there is certainly plenty of it, for the program is long, and the stage is full to overflowing with girls, even as were some of the pink tights. I watched several of them with anxiety, and there were two pairs which I expected every moment to break into agonizing shrieks of dissolution, so stretched and strained were they, and so strenuous were their efforts to do their duty in that state of life to which they had been called and to those legs on which they had been pulled.

The backbone of the combination is Oscar Girard, a really clever comedian. He made quite a hit with his topical songs, and was the only man who was able to attract any attention to himself and rise above this collection of scantily and gayly clothed women. No, I forget the "Old Man of the Sea"; he managed to make himself conspicuous, but then he had to get on top of another man to do it, so it doesn't count. His method of speaking was, however, very pleasant; he seemed to talk in an ordinary conversational tone, yet his voice, mellow, agreeable, natural, could be distinctly heard over the whole house; yea, even in the back rows of the dress circle, where the Columbia people are fond of relegating critics. They are guilty of this blunder, and yet complain at "roasts." My dear friends, you neglect the very A, B, C's of diplomacy; if (as 'tis said) a pair of tight shoes or an indigestible dinner plays havoc with a critic's judgment, how much more disastrous will be a back seat and strained ears and eyes.

Carroll Johnson, the man who has been singing "My Angelina" at the Orpheum, is trying his "entirely new departure," "The Irish Statesman," at Morosco's this week. It is a play on the lines of "The Wicklow Postman" but infinitely brighter, better constructed, acted and staged, and it can be seen for just half the money. Of course Mr. Johnson interpolates "My Angelina," and, while he has hardly any voice, he makes such a pleasant rhythmical noise and manages to establish such genial relations with his audience that he is called back again and again. The part he has to play might be insufferable in many hands, but he manages to make the Irishman's conceit and constant prophesies of the great future awaiting him no more irritating than the naive remarks of a child "playing president."

I was inclined to think "O'Sullivan's" bland admissions of his sublime confidence in himself and his firm belief in his ultimate rise in life, overdrawn, but a young man in my vicinity proved me entirely wrong—left me without a leg to stand on, in fact, and did it without the least trouble too. He was there with "his girl," a large piece of gum, a red necktie, and no grammar. There was an assumption of nonchalance in his manner, a sort of "this-is-nothing much-to-me" air, while his girl—a pale, respectable "thoughtful-daughter" looking young woman—seemed in a state of tremulous happiness and evinced a distinct desire to have him hold her hand. She contented herself finally by leaning against his shoulder and sitting as close to him as the unfriendly chairs allowed.

"Oh, Bill," I heard her say, "ain't that a pretty lady in the box—the one with black hair and a little red flower in it."

"So, so," returned his majesty, fastening his roving and amorous eyes on the dark head, which was charmingly poised over shoulders whose expression and covering indicated refinement and a position far above his own. "I've kissed lots that were prettier," he said, a little later, with a wink.

"Oh, you're just awful, ain't you?" said the thoughtful daughter, with a nudge and a giggle.

Bill beamed.

"Yes, I were pretty bad when I fust grew up," he remarked, with swelling shirt front and an admiring glance at his ring.

Just here one of the dramatis personæ stated that O'Sullivan would be married to the Judge's daughter, "and President yet," and O'Sullivan looked as if it wouldn't surprise him.

"I believe you could be President if you tried, Bill," said his poor little sweetheart, with an adoring, dog-like glance at him.

"Mebbe so," said Bill, complacently. "Mebbe I could—or married to a judge's daughter any way," he continued with his eyes on the pretty girl in the box.

The good daughter's eyes followed his, her face fell and she sighed as she pulled at her shabby gloves.

"Popper," she remarked with apparent irrelevance after a moment's silence, "Popper is looking for a job."

PEG WOFFINGTON.

MATERNA-ONDRICEK CONCERT.

The Materna-Ondricek concert of Thursday evening was not so enjoyable as those of the first series, chiefly because it was too long, and incidentally because there was too much of Schott and Fickenscher, and too little of Materna and Ondricek. It would have been better had the veteran tenor omitted the Schubert and Schumann songs entirely, for Time has not dealt so kindly with his voice as with Materna's. The Lohengrin airs, too, were altogether out of place with piano accompaniment on such a program. Evidently Materna was suffering from cold, for she seemed quite unable to do herself justice, particularly in the "Rienzi" aria. However, both artists rose to the occasion in the glorious "Walkure" music of the Heaven-gifted Wagner.

They sang as if inspired.

It is really pitiful that these great operatic stars should be singing in concert in a foreign land, when, but a few years since, they held the first places in the opera houses of Germany, and were the petted and feted guests of the crowned heads of Europe. Considering the few rehearsals, the orchestra did very well in the "Walkure" selections—far better than in the accompaniment to the Mendelssohn concerto.

Ondricek played this number, as he did the Bruch g minor, in an apathetic fashion. But the "Hungarian Airs" of Ernst he played in his inimitable way, and was rewarded with enthusiastic and deserved recalls. Mr. Luckstone is certainly not a born conductor, nor can it be said that he has as yet acquired the art. Nevertheless, one point in his favor is that he knows his scores thoroughly. A much better leader is Mr. John Marquardt, who gave a very spirited and musical reading of the "Mignon" overture.

Although the orchestra was considerably better than the one which accompanied Marsick, yet it was far from satisfactory. As a solo pianist, Mr. Arthur Fickenscher was a distinct disappointment. He has a good technic of the old-fashioned kind, and his tone is not unmusical, although small. His playing of the "Waldesranschen" and "Campanella" of Liszt was most dry and uninteresting. Like Herr Schott, he was too easily persuaded to reappear, thereby making a long program longer. P. C. A.

THE LATEST VERSE.

FOUR QUATRAINS.

BY PERCY HEMINGWAY.

Ye cannot cheat the Master of your fate!
Proclaim the goal to which your feet are set.
He who knows all is the Compassionate,
Often His wisdom prompts Him to forget.

Why weep for days irrevocably dead,
For flaunting hopes in envious battle slain?
The bravest soldier frankly looks ahead,
Knowing he dare not fight the past again.

To-night old poets through the city go,
Doors shake and windows rattle at their tread,
The empty streets are noisy with the wo
Of sad immortals banished from the dead.

The future lies before us rich with gold,
Only the foolish backward gaze and fret:
What laughter lurkes in stories still untold!
What solemn songs await the singer yet!

A DUET.

BY T. STURGE MOORE.

"Flowers nodding gaily, scent in air,
Flowers posied, flowers in the hair,
Sleepy flowers, flowers bold to stare—"
"Oh, pick me some."

"Shells with lip, or tooth, or bleeding gum,
Tell-tale shells, and shells that whisper 'Come,' Shells that stammer, blush, and yet are dumb—"
"Oh, let me hear."

"Eyes so black they draw one trembling near,
Brown eyes, caverns flooded with a tear,
Cloudless eyes, blue eyes so windy clear—"
"Oh, look at me."

"Kisses sadly blown across the sea,
Darkling kisses, kisses fair and free,
Bob a-cherry kisses 'neath a tree—"
"Oh, give me one."

Thus sang a queen and king in Babylon.

REFLECTED NOVELS.

NEW BOOKS THAT PROVOKE OLD MEMORIES.

"Let a man write a successful book on a new line, and a thousand little pen-pushers start up and write a thousand more on that same line, and think they've done something big because the first one did," said the man of letters, impatiently.

"They don't deliberately copy," said his wife. "They see the great book reflected in their shiny, threadbare little souls, and mistake the image for the real substance. No wonder they hold it up with some pride."

"Do you think they really don't know that it isn't their own? I don't," said the man of letters. "Call it intellectual kleptomania if you like. Perhaps they can't help it; but they know what they are doing fast enough."

"Everybody can't be on a new line; there wouldn't be enough to go around," said the wife. "Besides, often the follower does better than the originator."

"Then he is a co-worker, not a follower," said the man of letters. "Take Barrie and Maclaren and Crockett. No matter which came first, they all share the greatness."

"Another person's book may turn your eyes in a certain direction, but if you see for yourself, and see deeply, your book isn't a reflection," she said, thoughtfully.

"Yes," he said. "And then some one comes along like this P. Hay Hunter, and says to himself, 'Scotch dialect pays, evidently. Let's see what I can do in that line.'"

"And the result is, James Inwick, Ploughman and Elder, With a Glossary," she added. "The name is enough to frighten off most people."

"He gets in the Kirk all right," the man of letters went on, "and the meenister, and the political and religious controversies, and the usual dottle woggle gabble; in fact, all the correct attributes of a Scotch story, except the spirit, and humor, and pathos, and general deliciousness that you see through A Window in Thrums and Beside the Bonnie Briar Bush. He thought the dialect was all that was needed."

"I think his dialect must be very good; it's so incomprehensible," she said, picking up the book. "And he sticks to it so fondly. If he'd only let the schoolmaster, or somebody like that, take the story for a chapter or two now and then, to give your tongue a rest. Think of reading nearly two hundred pages of things like 'pawkie chiel,' 'gey thrang singlin neeps,' 'it wad gar a soo scunner.' Eeny meeny miny mo would be more intelligible to the average reader. Nobody wants to keep turning to a glossary."

"He doesn't see that the story must be just as good as if it were written in straight English," said the man of letters; "that the dialect is merely an adjunct. When this Hunter can draw characters like Posty and Jamie Soutar and Leebie, and make you blubber like a girl——"

"And end up with a little humorous twist that saves your life——"

"Then he can write Scotch stories," concluded the man of letters. "Till then he'd better stick to——"

"Book reviews?" suggested his wife, a little wickedly.

"That's about all he's equal to," was the imperturbable answer.

"Still," she went on, after a pause, "it's rather hard on a book to judge it by the greatest. Why not judge it by the average book that comes out, or just by itself, for what it has and what it lacks?"

"So one does, when a book doesn't deliberately put itself in competition with the best," he answered. "It's the author's own fault. James Inwick has tried to stand beside the Stickit Minister, and so has called attention to his own insignificance. It's the same way with this little book by Cockburn Harvey, The Light That Lies."

"I know. It's just a reflection of Anthony Hope's things," said the wife.

"In a cracked mirror," he added. "That's the only thing I have against Hope,—the number of reflected Dolly Dialogues he is responsible for."

"Hope can make a man engaged to two people and flirting with a third and it's dear and funny," she said; "but it's rash for any one with a clumsier touch to try it."

"This poor little book tries so hard to be devilish," the man of letters went on. "It thinks that heading the chapters with French phrases was a masterstroke. I'm so tired of this blundering type of man who is always getting into awkward situations and giving mixed-up explanations and saying, 'and—and things you know.' The author does think 'damn' is such a funny word."

"What else can you expect of a person who jokes about unpaid tailor bills and makes profane puns on the name of Helen?" she said. "Damn really was funny once, though; especially when you broke off in the middle and changed it to bother. I've laughed at that, I know."

"So were tailor bills funny once,—other people's," he said, with some scorn. "Now we have laughed all we can at them, and at the average smarty, would-be flippant, kiss-the-nearest-girl dialogues."

"No matter how light a dialogue seems, there must always be some real character study behind it," she said. "The actual truth of a thing is so often the foundation of its humor."

"And Hope recognizes that," the man of letters agreed. "No matter how ridiculous his characters are, there is always a touch of reality about them that makes the complications deliciously absurd. Let the same complications befall inane dummy heroes and typical femininities and the life is gone out of it. However the author deludes himself, the world never mistakes the reflection for the living being."

"I wonder if children do? Or don't they care?" mused his wife. "This Tommy Toddles, by Albert Lee, would be a very nice book if it hadn't come Through the Looking Glass, as it were."

"I think a child who loved his Alice would like another book all the better for dealing with March hares and rabbits and White Queens, no matter if it wasn't by the same author," the man of letters said. "They wouldn't resent it as we should, or feel any sense of desecration about it. To them cake is always good, no matter who the cook is, or what the quality of the baking."

"Suppose if somebody had your Alice or Snark and wouldn't give it up, Tommy Toddles would do very well as a substitute," she said, "though to my grown-up eyes they bear about the same relation to each other as an amateur photograph does to a Gibson drawing."

"I think I'd have enjoyed a loon cracking jokes with a hammer and seals weeping sealing-wax tears, twenty years ago," said the man of letters.

"I think you mean thirty," murmured his wife.

"And I'd have loved that about the oysters,—give them an inch-worm and they want an elephant," he went on, ignoring the aside; "and the duel that settles the fact that the penguin is mightier than the sword-fish."

"They only fought to bring in the pun," she objected. "I thought the best touch was the gopher's wanting the giraffe's long neck because things would taste good all the way down it. And the pictures of Tommy with his billow curl are lovely. Still, it isn't original."

"There is very little in this world that is," he said, regretfully. "Take these farces by John Kendrick Bangs; they are Howells's all over."

"Why, I thought they were quite funny," remonstrated his wife.

"So were Howells's once, long before you can remember. These have the same young married couple—wife silly and commonplace, husband facetious and resigned—second married couple, less silly and less humorous, a couple of odd men and a nonentity girl. The situations are slightly different, and some of the jokes."

"I didn't care so much for the first one, The Bicyclers, but A Dramatic Evening seemed to me intensely funny, and so did The Fatal Message. They would both act splendidly."

"Perhaps I'm biased," said the man of letters, frankly. "The truth is, I've been in daily terror lest you should want to get up one of them. If you'll swear you won't——"

"Of course I don't want to. How absurd!"

"Well, then, I really think they might act rather well for the benefit of a kitchen garden, or a Doctor's Daughters' Christmas Tree. But you needn't repeat that. When anybody glances around our drawing-room with an eye to dramatic possibilities, and asks me what I think of Bangs's farces, I say: 'Merely a humorous imitation of Howells's' and change the subject."

"Well, here is a book, anyway, that isn't on anybody's else line, The Second Opportunity of Mr. Staplehurst," said the wife. "It has its own faults and its own merits, not other people's."

"It was such a splendid idea for a book that I can't help being sorry that this M. Pett Ridge didn't make more of it," said the man of letters. "A prosperous, successful man echoes the universal statement, 'If I had my life to live over again, I'd do differently.' He is given a chance to live it over, with all the experience of his other life to help him, and makes a dreadful muss of it."

"The way the chance was given him was so fantastic—Jove offering it through the telephone," she objected.

"It was better than having it a dream, anyway. It would be hard to find a plausible method," he answered. "The book is interesting, and so bright that it is a pity it isn't cleverer."

"Mrs. Reade, who was of no importance, is splendidly drawn, while the hero, who had such an opportunity in the way of development, is not half real or vivid enough," said the wife. "Kitty is good, but Mrs. Brentford is just the conventional abstract of woman, and that whole episode on the Rhine is unnatural and lacking in strength."

"That's just it," said the man of letters. "It could have had so much strength and depth without losing any of its attractive lightness. If the author is young, I think some day he will want to write that book all over again, with more stress on the idea of living one's life over, and a deeper working out of the problem."

"With a real woman for Mrs. Brentford," she assented, "and a bigger kind of a man for the hero."

"With careful Roentgen photographs of his inner workings at each stage of the game," added the man of letters.

J. W. T.

KIMIKO.

Art and instruction are inimitably blended in Lafcadis Hearn's new book, Kokoro, which has just been issued from the press of Houghton, Mifflin & Co. The papers composing the volume treat of the inner life of Japan—of the emotional side of the Japanese character and have the charm inseparable from this writer's literary style. Among the stories which illustrate the love sentiment of Chrysanthemum Land is the graceful but melancholy tale of Kimiko, who once lived in the street of the Geishas. As related by Hearn, her history spreads over many pages, but here, briefly, is the sad complication:

Kimiko was more than pretty; she was clever, accomplished, and "genteel." Her original name was Ai, which many love. She had been well brought up at a private school, and had read stories in English, French, and German. As she budded into womanhood misfortune befell her family; she was left as the sole support of a mother and an infant sister. She could not earn money enough. The mother sold her house, her heirlooms, her trinkets, her costly robes, her crested lacquerware, even the gold mountings of her buried husband's sword—all went, and then there was nothing left, and Ai's mother fell ill.

"Let me be sold to the dancing girls," said she, and she repaired to a geisha whom she knew and whose name was Kimika.

"I will not buy you," said the geisha, "for I have not money enough; but you shall live with me, and I will support your mother and the baby, provided your mother signs a bond that you shall be mine till you are twenty-four, or till you pay me back."

Kimiko—for she was renamed by Kimika—became the belle among the geishas of Kyoto. She was as bright as she was beautiful. She knew the power of beauty and the weakness of passion. Rich men offered her lands and houses on condition of owning her body and soul, but she shook her pretty head with a coquettish laugh. To be in her good graces for a day was the ambition of the gilded youth. She accepted gold and diamonds, but she would not part with her freedom. Respectable women spoke well of her, because her name never figured in any tale of domestic unhappiness.

One summer moon there came wooing a gentleman whom Kimiko could not dismiss with a laugh and a flutter of her fan. He was in earnest and he was worthy. To him she said:

"It is time that I should speak. For the sake of the mother who gave me life and the little sister, I have lived in hell. That is past, but the scorch of the fire is upon me, and there is no power that can take it away. It is not for such as I to enter into an honored family, nor to bear you a son. Suffer me to speak. Never shall I be your wife to become your shame. I am your companion only, your playfellow. Some true, sweet lady will be chosen for you, to be the mother of your children, but the place of a wife I will never take, and the joy of a mother I will never know."

Then she disappeared, vanished from the face of the earth.

Years afterward, when the man, after having sought her vainly, did marry a lady who bore him a son, a mendicant nun knocked at his door for the meal of rice which no good Buddhist denies to the wayfarer. The little boy came to the door, and she caressed and kissed him, and the child poured the rice into the mendicant's bowl.

"Will you," asked the nun, "repeat to your father, when I am gone, the words which I say to you: 'Father, one whom you will never see again in this world says that her heart is glad because she has seen your son.'"

And then, softly laughing, she passed out into the trackless distance.

J. B.

AN AMERICAN MAN OF LETTERS.

The Life of Bayard Taylor, by Albert H. Smyth, is the latest volume in the "American Men of Letters Series." Its appearance just now is, in a sense, inopportune, in another sense, most opportune. Whatever Bayard Taylor's place in American literature is to be a century hence, his name is now-a-days well-nigh forgotten. It suggests the author of certain books of travel, which had a great vogue in their day, but which are now superseded; it suggests the translator of Faust, but Americans who read Faust at all read it in German, and many critics prefer Anna Swanwick's version. Fewer perhaps, think of Taylor as a poet, yet it was his life-long and central ambition to achieve something in verse. But he was not an original force in literature; he had no great message to deliver, nothing that insisted upon being said in verse, that could not be said in prose. He was "master of the mechanics of his art" and subject matter was of secondary importance.

There is then, no great curiosity about Bayard Taylor; Mr. Smyth's book supplies no "long felt want." Its proper function is, rather, to call attention to another and an equally forgotten phase of Taylor's life, to Taylor the novelist. It is through his novels, indeed, that Taylor's name will be known a hundred years hence, if known at all. For here he was working at first hand, on ground that he knew well. He was of Pennsylvania German and Quaker stock, and in his youth felt himself fettered and repressed by the severe practicality of those about him. His attempt to live in Pennsylvania in later life failed. To the simple, narrow minds of his neighbors all customs not their own—the habits of a man of the world—were wicked. Yet Taylor is at his best in depicting their life, or rather the life of their grandfathers, which had, perhaps, more color and variety than their own. It was, in a way, English, too; fox-hunting was typical of it. Just at the beginning of the century it formed a cheery contrast to the New England gravity, and in its vigorous, prosaic heartiness, a contrast to the more romantic and aristocratic society of the South. It was a society intensely conservative; for this reason, perhaps, critical rather than productive; but in this critical function, a sane and restraining influence in American literature. Whatever literary value Bayard Taylor has is as interpreter of this conservative influence; that is, as novelist, or even more specifically, as the author of The Story of Kennett. He felt that American life needed repose; in The Story of Kennett he has done much to show the value of that, to give it that. To the never-ending stir and unrest and ineffectual change of our Western life, and to the broad magnificence of our Western landscape, the slow-going contentment of Pennsylvania ninety years ago and the intimate, homely charm of Chester Valley farms and lanes offer a pleasant and healthful contrast. One would not voluntarily choose the one way of life rather than the other; but Kennett shows us that now-a-days we have gone to the other extreme; it recalls to our minds the fact that there is a charm in repose and contemplation as well as in action and in the "large and liberal discontent."

Mr. Smyth's Life contains no new material; his task, as he himself says, has been that of arrangement and selection. The book is provided with a good index, and a bibliography of Taylor's works. For the rest, it is, in the main, careful, scholarly, just—a volume that is worthy of the publishers and of the editor of the series.

H.

The predatory tendencies of the Argonaut have so often been animadverted on that further comment thereon may savor of tautology. Vanity, a bright New York weekly, is the last journal to protest against the methods which rule in Mr. Harte's sanctum. The comment is decidedly caustic, and, for the benefit of those who do not know how the Argonaut is put together, I cull it:

Last week I had occasion to comment upon the freedom with which VANITY is quoted by journals, which, while fully appreciative of the good things offered in these pages, are frequently piratically reluctant to give us credit for same. Among these papers the San Francisco Argonaut is the most unscrupulous and daring. Its custom is to adopt clever paragraphs of ours verbatim, and these in turn are reprinted in Eastern journals and credited to the Argonaut. Not long ago the Evening Sun thus reprinted a story of ours about the mother of the Sultan Abdul Aziz of Turkey, and gave the Argonaut the credit of its authorship, thus becoming, though innocently, particeps criminis in the latter's theft. If the Argonaut continues this sort of thing, decent papers will have to take care how they clip from its columns. There is really no excuse for such piracy. Permission to use VANITY'S bright ideas is freely accorded to those who are willing to acknowledge source from which they draw. For this reason the act is indefensible.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

"James Inwick, Ploughman and Elder," by P. Hay Hunter. Harper & Bros., publishers.

"The Light that Lies," by Cockburn Hardy. J. B. Lippincott Co., publishers. For sale by Jos. A. Hoffman, 120 Sutter Street.

"Tommy Toddles," by Albert Lee. Harper & Bros., publishers.

"The Bicyclers and Three Other Farces," by John Kendrick Bangs. Harper & Bros., publishers.

"The Second Opportunity of Mr. Staplehurst," by W. Pett Ridge. Harper & Bros., publishers.

BOOK NOTES.

Frederick, a new irresponsible hero of Mrs. Walford's (the madam is to be held accountable to her sex for these queer male characters she is giving us, despite her resort to the indefinite initial letters dodge, whereby she signs herself only "L. B. Walford"), is not half so original in disposition as he is in practise. He shares the rather common disaffection for labor or personal responsibility to social obligations, which include some kind of work for even lords and gentlemen, and desires simply to be let alone to enjoy himself in his own way. But the beauty of his scheme is that he succeeds in being so absolved, though he is a gentleman of means, good morals, and utterly harmless motives—a being particularly inviting to Society's habit of interference. Very few people who really could lead a glad, free life, unhampered by cares of the busy world, are permitted to do so—there is always the Neighborhood, headed by a capital letter, which may be said to be the letter of an unwritten law, to step austerely into the elysium, and, by pointing a finger, however unwarrantably, at the disturbed occupant, make him so uncomfortable that he will think he is ashamed of himself. In reality he is only harried. But, dear me, the world will never learn to mind its own business, so why protest against having its nose in our plate at meals and under our bed at nights? Frederick is a very delightful tale, withal, and the young man's splendid irresponsibility is rewarded by several prizes, among them the prettiest wife in the countryside.

[Macmillan & Co., publishers, New York.]

Dear old Mary Anderson in an introductory note to her autobiography says she is content to be forgotten "except by such of my friends as I hope will always keep a place for me in their hearts." She tells us the volume is intended to point a moral to young actresses, showing that the glitter of the stage is by no means golden.

The Scribners announce a new volume of short stories by H. C. Bunner—Jersey Street and Jersey Lane. Mr. Bunner is in San Francisco, resting, and is established at the Occidental Hotel.

Mark Twain's impressions of the modern interviewer should be worth hearing. "Interviewing," he says, "would be quite justifiable if the public would grant that when a man is being interviewed he is not expected to say anything worth the interviewer's trouble in recording." That, however, is the opportunity and the responsibility of the interviewer. It is the fault of the agent if the actor does not display himself.

The April issue of Godey's Magazine is the long expected bicycle number. It is full of the wheel in all its cycles. General Miles writes of the bicycle in military operations; the latest novelties in equipments are presented; there are several bicycle stories; Doctor Bird decides the conditions under which bicycling is most healthy; some one else tells how a bicycle became a bicycle; and there is much more on the same line.

A feature of the April St. Nicholas is an article about flying-machines by Tudor Jenks. It is finely illustrated, and really very clever of its kind. Another article is devoted to the revival of the Olympian games in Greece; C. F. Holder writes about "How a Whale Looked Pleasant"; there are several chapters of "The Prize Cup," the conclusion of "Teddy and Carrots," and some bright and graceful verse.

Edmund Purcell retorts in the Nineteenth Century on the priestly critics who have so denounced his biography of Cardinal Manning. He publishes a letter from W. E. Gladstone, in which the book is termed "fascinating and entrancing," and declares that he had the Cardinal's authority to comment on both the Catholic and Protestant periods of his life. Even the very letters and documents of which he is accused of undue use, were entrusted to him by his subject. Purcell further turns the tables by revealing that he tried to interest the Catholic clergy in the work, but they had refused all participation.

EASTER!

New Easter Cards
New line of Prayer Books
Fine Stationery at

DODGE'S

Our New Store
Our only one
112 Post St., the
Yellow Store next
The White House

DRAMATIC NOTES.

James O'Neill follows "A Milk White Flag" at the Baldwin, in a repertoire of romantic plays, opening on Monday night, the 29th, in "Monte Cristo."

"Captain Impudence" has been favored with fairly good houses at the California, and will be followed by "Friends," Mr. Royle's very successful drama.

A most remarkable ventriloquist, Segommer, is to be seen at the Orpheum. He has a stage crowded with figures, consisting of several animals, and a few black, and also white, individuals of the human race, who, by electric contrivances and reproduction of voices, he is able to render so natural, as, in some instances, to deceive his audience. Another very good feature, on a bill which has had few rivals at this house, is the Bruet and Rivière number. They style themselves French Vocal Imitators, and have for stock in trade two eccentric voices, with which they perform on violin, guitar, cello, and xylophone at will, while their song, "C'est le Chat," is a perfect imitation of two cats. There are several equilibristic performances given by the Kins-Ners and the Pantzers, which, for physical glibness, have rarely been equaled.

The Tivoli Company has been in good shape this week in "Said Pasha." The opera is not a new one here, but it has been revived in new garments and very pretty scenery. Hartman, in his old role of Hadad, was very amusing, and was quite ably assisted in his nonsense by Mr. Kavanaugh. Fanny Liddiard, who always dresses her parts well, made a good-looking Alti, and Carrie Roma's voice was heard to advantage as Balah Sojah. The next opera in preparation is "Blue Beard," which is featured as an Easter production on the bills—but "Said Pasha" will be continued another week.

The Alcazar seems to have entered on a season of prosperity. Certainly the continuous performances of the week have been exceptionally good. A very material part of the performance is the little play, which usually opens the show, and which is enacted by such well-known and competent performers as Fanny Young, Leonard Grover, May Noble, and others. There is also a new member to the company, by name, Gordan Foster, who is a good actor. The short play is followed by an excellent variety program. Best seats only twenty-five cents.

Selma, the favorite pupil of Mme. Marchesi, is to appear at Procter's Pleasure Palace in New York. It was only by offering most munificent terms—$1400 a week—that Selma could be secured for vaudeville, as she has never appeared in anything but grand opera. She is very young and pretty, and Massenet, the composer, has written most enthusiastically of her in the Paris Figaro.

Albert Chevalier, the great coster singer and the idol of the London music hall stage, is on his way to this country, and opens at Koster and Bial's shortly.

Something like twenty years ago, a young man, with a rumpled head of hair and eyes which were never at rest, was stage manager at the Baldwin. During rehearsals he acted nearly every character in the piece, and put his whole heart into the work. Finally he began to write plays, and after a few successful productions, he had a dismal failure or two, and was not heard from for a long time. Everything is said to come to him who waits, and to David Belasco there has come, with his play at the Herald Square, the most substantial triumph of his career. "The Heart of Maryland" shares honors with "The Prisoner of Zenda"—the two hits of the season.

A. M. Palmer will produce, on March 23d, at Palmer's Theater, a new play by Charles Coghlan. Mr. Coghlan called his play "Madame," but the title is to be changed. Miss Rose Coghlan will play the principal part in the piece.

The dramatic critic on the New York World says: "Of one thing I am sure, and that is, that we, in this country put up complacently with a most unreasonable amount of wretched acting, and even call it good. It takes a Duse, illuminating with her magnificent genius a piece, long familiar to us, to show us how shallow, vain, and trumpery is the awkward mummery which we call acting. There is something in this worth laying to heart, if you will carefully consider it."

Theater-goers are looking forward to "Pudd'n'head Wilson," which opens at the Columbia April 6th for a stay of two weeks. The play will be seen precisely as it was given at the Herald Square Theater in New York. The cast is identical. Mr. Mayo, as the hero of Mark Twain's story, is said to have created a character that is as simple and as wise as any that has ever bid for the affection of play patrons.

Jessie Bartlett Davis gave a dinner at the Imperial, in New York, recently, to the women members of the Bostonians' Opera Company. During the dinner three cards, bearing the names Rose Coghlan, Leslie Carter, and Sarah Bernhardt were presented, and the illustrious visitors admitted. In spite of clever disguises, it was soon discovered the three were Eugene Cowles, Jerome Sykes, and Harry Dixon. The feast proved a very merry one.

Sir Henry Irving, when studying his role of Corporal Brewster in the "Story of Waterloo," visited Thanet workhouse to get his realistic touches from the study of an old soldier who was an inmate of that institution. He visited the Broachnoor Asylum in order to prepare the part of King Lear. It is said of Eleonora Duse that she made an extensive study of the unfortunate girls in a convent, kept by the Sisters of Mercy, before undertaking the part of Santuzza.

"Trilby" has been translated into Italian, and will soon be seen in Rome. Tina di Lorenzo is mentioned as a possible impersonator of the title role. The news also comes from Rome that the elder Salvini has been playing Othello to Novelli's Iago, for the benefit of the Dramatic Artists' Society, of which Salvini is president. Speaking of his art, the correspondent says: "Salvini's Othello is known all over the world, but it is always new to us. He is as grand as ever in it. He is not an actor playing a part; he is a man suffering all the tortures of doubt and jealousy. Even when he does not speak, his face is so expressive that it brings forth applause without a word."

The Italian opera season in New York lasted thirteen weeks. It consisted of thirty-nine evening and thirteen afternoon performances. Then there were the ten special subscription performances in German and twelve representations on Saturday evening—given at half-price. The total number is seventy-four, and twenty-six operas were given.

Richard Mansfield has bought the melodramatic farce "Macaire," in which Robert Louis Stevenson and W. E. Henley collaborated. The picturesque role of the hero is suited to Mr. Mansfield, who will play it at the Baldwin next month. Beerbohm Tree will use the play in England.

The subscription lists for the Seidl Concerts, to be given at the Columbia Theater the last week in May, will be ready on Monday morning next. Subscribers for the nine concerts can secure a season ticket for only twenty dollars, while the regular price will be three dollars for each seat on the ground floor. The subscribers will also have the choice of selecting places in advance of the general public. In addition to Seidl and his orchestra, the two famous violin virtuosos, Emil Sauret and Achille Rivarde, will come to San Francisco.

It is said that Mr. Hugh Chilvers is by long odds the best comedian that Mr. Henderson has ever had in his American Extravaganza Company.

"Sinbad" has another week to run at the Columbia Theater. Thus far it has crowded the house. In point of scenery, costumes, stage-setting, ballets, and music, the revived Sinbad excels any former production. The cast is strong, and the chorus is composed of pretty faces, neat figures, and excellent voices.

More minstrelsy at the Auditorium. This time, opening on Sunday night next, Richards & Pringle's Georgia Minstrels, headed by the colored comedian, Billy Kersands, said to be a survivor of the old school, and as clever as any of the dark lights of other days. This year they come with a brand-new show, which, according to newspaper comment, surpasses the record. The prices for this really excellent performance will be only 15, 25, and 50, and general admission 25 cents.

David Belasco is hard at work on another new play, treating of American life. In view of the uninterrupted success of "The Heart of Maryland," it has been decided to let Mr. Belasco's play run all summer.

Mr. Frank Belcher, the possessor of a fine baritone voice, gave a concert and vaudeville entertainment last week, in which he had the valuable assistance of a number of clever people, musical and otherwise. The Press Club Quartet opened the program with "She is Mine" (Buck).

Mr. Belcher sang "The Song of the Helmet" (Archer), and in the second part, an a and a b, "He was a Prince" (Lohrn) and "Answer" (Robyn). There were also solos by Miss Carrie Roma of the Tivoli, Mr. Frank Coffin, the popular tenor, and Doctor Regensberger, cellist.

Mrs. Olive Reed was indisposed, so did not appear. Mr. R. F. Tilton played the accompaniments, and played them decidedly well. The entire program gave evident satisfaction to the many friends and admirers of the participants. Mr. Belcher leaves soon for Europe, where he will devote several years to the study of music.

Reduce your obesity by taking Brooks's Phytolacca. Pleasant to take. Makes walking a pleasure. No diet necessary. Trial size 50 cents. Try it. Get it at 119 Powell Street. Mailed free on receipt of price.

Racing! Racing! Racing!

California Jockey Club

WINTER MEETING
BEGINNING THURSDAY, MARCH 19TH
BAY DISTRICT TRACK

Racing Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, Saturday, Rain or Shine. Five or more races each day. Races start at 1:30 o'clock sharp. Take Mc Allister street cars direct to the gate.

R. B. Milroy, Secretary. Thos. H. Williams, Jr., Pres.

BALDWIN THEATRE
AL. HAYMAN AND CO. INCORP'D PROPS

Beginning Monday Mar h 30th
Engagement limited to two weeks
MR JAMES O'NEILL
Repertoire for first week—Monday, Thursday, Saturday Evening and Monday Matinee, Monte Cristo; Evening and Saturday Matinee, Virginius; Wednesday, Courier of Lyons; Tuesday, The Lyons Mail; Friday, Hamlet.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE
AL. HAYMAN & CO. INCORP'D PROPS

Beginning Monday March 30th
Third and Last Week
The established success. The always welcome comedy drama
FRIENDS
By Edwin Milton Royle, management of Arthur C. Aiston, with the same excellent company that scored such a pronounced hit here before.
Monday April 6th PETER F. DAILEY

Columbia Theatre.
FRIEDLANDER, GOTTLOB & Co. LESSEES AND MANAGERS
Second and Farewell Week
American Extravaganza Company in
SINBAD The Sailor, or The Maid of Balsora
New scenery, with new mechanical and electrical devices, new music, new ballets, new marches, and a wealth of bright new songs.
April 6th—PUDD'NHEAD WILSON

THE AUDITORIUM
Friedlander, Gottlob & Co.... Lessees and Managers
Commencing Sunday Eve., March 29th
For one week only—Everything new this season
RICHARDS & PRINGLES
Famous Georgia
MINSTRELS
Headed by the great Billy Kersands. Watch for the band parade at 11 o'clock A. M. Free Concert at 12:15 in front of the theatre by one of the finest bands traveling.
Prices—15, 25, 50c. General admission, 25c.

ORPHEUM
O'Farrell Street, between Stockton and Powell
Week commencing Monday, March 30th
A Superb Bill. Celebrated Star Features.
THE THREE MARVELLES
Acrobatic Eccentriques and Grotesque Pantomimists
SEGOMMER
THE NAWNS
BRUET & RIVIERE
GERTIE CARLISLE
And a Magnificent Company

TIVOLI OPERA HOUSE
MRS. ERNESTINE KRELING, Proprietor and Manager
Life is always sunny as long as we play
SAID PASHA
To be continued every evening this week
Our next production the brilliant Easter burlesque
BLUE BEARD
It will be seen on Monday Evening, April 6th
The most gorgeous home production ever gotten up in this city
POPULAR PRICES - 25 and 50 Cents

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE
Handsomest Family Theatre in the World
WALTER MOROSCO, Sole Lessee and Manager
Last Performances of The Irish Statesman
MONDAY, MARCH 30th
Louis Imhau's Adaptation from the French
THE RED POCKET BOOK

GROVER'S ALCAZAR
Special Matinee To-day 10c., 15c. and 25c.
Confusion and Refined Vaudeville
Shouts of Laughter, Salvos of Applause
Night Prices: Orchestra, 25c.; Dress Circle, 15c.; Balcony, 10c. and 15c.; Stalls, 10c. extra.

SPLASHES.

SO THE FORTNIGHTLY is dead! A sad and quite unexpected demise! Yet it seemed to have more vitality at the start than was subsequently developed. However, the difficulty seems to have been a combination of bashfulness and laziness on the part of the male element. It was impossible to persuade them into serious dramatic effort. Innumerable plans of plays were proposed, and it was easy to fill the feminine roles, but while the men seemed willing to accept the honors, they evinced a decided disinclination toward study or rehearsal. At each meeting there were disappointments, so the result each time was a recourse to vaudeville, which, while very good of its kind, did not arouse or maintain interest. However, the series of entertainments have been light and amusing, the last in particular being fairly interesting. The feature was the "Trial by Jury," with twelve young women in the jury box. The dialogue in which they indulged was excellent of its kind. Mr. Lawlor enacted the roll of an Irish deputy sheriff of whom the ladies were privileged to ask questions, and obtain directions, the fun being in the inadequacy of the ladies to the situation. Miss Jennie Hooker and Miss Jessie Newlands rather bore off the honors. It is a bit curious, considering the degree of leisure with which certain of the younger male generation are gifted, that they make no attempt at serious work. There is lots of fun to be had out of acting, the girls are all willing, and no one is asked to undertake impossible roles. However, the attractions of the 'Varsity Club prove too enticing. Or is it the 'Varsity?

* * *

THE POLO SITUATION is uncertain. Maybe the St. Louis men will come and they may not, for it takes money to transport a team and the necessary outfit of ponies from the Mississippi to the Pacific Ocean. Still, there is a westward disposition in the Missouri Country Club, and who knows but the Burlingame team will have an opportunity of defeating them. The term "defeat" is used advisedly, for our men, this season, are in good shape and are ready to make the battle of their lives or any one's else life. There is but little doubt that the Walla Walla team will appear, and it seems probable the Riverside men will be present, together with a delegation of Englishmen from Penrhyn. I believe the tournament is set for the 18th, and in the meantime there is lots of work being done on the ground. The candidates for the team are Joe Tobin, Lawson, Richard Tobin, Hobart, McCreery, and Baldwin. The Tobins and McCreery, who makes a specialty of No. 1, are safe to be selected, so the contest is between the others. At all events, there is an interest in the game in prospect and the tournament promises to be very exciting. Last season, the affair cost some thing like two thousand dollars, for you cannot gather a polo team without cost. Of this amount, eleven hundred dollars was subscribed, and the rest was made up of charges for admission and in various other ways, so the Club came out even. Just what course will be adopted to gather the necessary dollars this trip has not yet been decided, though, from all accounts, expenses will not be nearly so great as before.

* * *

MR. AND MRS. DEYOUNG are back from Paris quite contented to remain in San Francisco for some time to come. Mrs. de Young especially abounds in reminiscences of their excursion and it certainly appears as if they had had a charming time. They have been as far afield as Constantinople but spent most of the vacation in Paris, where they celebrated Christmas with their children. They had a big corner suite at the Hotel Continental, and organized a fête to which they invited all the English-speaking children at the "Sacre Coeur" convent. An immense Christmas tree was loaded down with beautiful presents, mainly purchased in New York, consisting of mechanical toys and all manners of patent devices. The room was decorated with American flags, and every youngster was given a miniature Stars and Stripes—quite a patriotic idea, by the way. A big Christmas dinner followed with immense pies and various other delicacies. George Hall was with the De Youngs in Paris and accompanied them to Turkey where they had a most enjoyable time and were entertained by Minister Terrill over whose personality Mrs. de Young is very enthusiastic.

* * *

Of course, the wanderer has a great deal to say about Parisian fashions, and affords us the welcome information that sleeves are decidedly smaller, that the hair is worn loosely, that hats are immense, and the prevailing colors are purple and bright green. She is inclined to think New York milliners have now the advantage of the Parisians, for, while the models are the creation of Gallic artists, the New York workmanship is considerably better. While in Paris, Mrs. de Young gave a tea to leading members of the San Franciscan colony which she says has quite an enviable position there, its members enjoying popularity and prominence. By the way, young Charles de Young is to remain abroad but one year. Then he returns here and is to obtain his schooling in California, as Mrs. de Young believes her son should grow up among the people with whom he is to live out his life. He is the future proprietor of the Chronicle.

* * *

Quite an interesting turn in the career of J. F. J Archibald is just announced. At the death of his father, who for many years had been Pacific Coast Manager of the Union Central Life, young Mr. Archibald retired from journalism and took charge of his affairs. Subsequently he was invited to succeed and has accepted the post. The position, from a monetary point of view, is decidedly advantageous, as there is an excellent salary and generous commissions. I believe he ranks as the youngest manager on the Coast. Prior to his newspaper experience Mr. Archibald was in the Union Central office and is well up in the details of the company's business.

* * *

The destruction of the Colliers' Lakeport mansion, and the sad casualty of their son's death has aroused general sympathy for them in Society. The family is prostrated by the dreadful event, and it is unlikely the girls will go into Society for a year at least. The destruction of the Collier mansion will put an end to many anticipated house-parties, for they have always been the most generous of hostesses, and rarely a week passed but they had a crowd of young people as their guests. Just prior to the accident they entertained the Misses Williams and Walter Hobart.

* * *

Mrs. Will Tevis has just returned to Bakersfield after a month's devotion to the purchase of furniture for the Spanish mansion which has just undergone finishing touches. She has captured some very beautiful things, including a set of beautifully carved antique furniture which Mrs. Mathias Gray owned, and a quantity of Japanese armor which will be used for the decoration of the hall. She has also found some fine old hangings, antique sideboards and chairs for the dining-room, and the very latest, of course, in carpets and rugs. It is her intention to entertain quite largely this season, and she has already arranged a series of house-parties for May, June, and July. By the way, the story of Doctor Harry Tevis's departure for Japan was a fiction.

* * *

Gossip about approaching family events is in circulation. I learn with interest that Arthur Rodgers is a parent, and is much taken with the new role. Lady Bache Cunard, Maud nèe Burke, has been busy for some time preparing a layette, and is extremely happy thereat.

* * *

THE PROSPECTS of a gay season at Sausalito are excellent. The seaside town has actually become fashionable. Rents are up in the air. Landlords are as divinely lofty in their demands as they were deferential some months back, and, judging by appearances, it is more economical to buy a house in Stilt City than to purchase without rights, on the rent system. The example of Mr. and Mrs. Osgood Hooker, who are to be installed there for the season, is to be followed by the Goads, who are looking for a villa, and by the Morrows, who are already installed, and probably by the Carolans, McBeans, and many others. I am told the Sperrys offer their mansion for three months, but no one has yet come to their figures. The Hearst cottage is still for rent, and it is surprising some young man of means does not get hold of this splendid establishment and fix himself in bachelor quarters for the summer of '96. The Misses Adler have a cottage near the Pacific Yacht Club, which is liable to be a center of entertainment during the season. The coming event on which the aristocratic coterie of Sausalito have their eyes turned and their anticipations elevated, is the garden party at Mrs. Major Miller's on the 11th prox. This is to be quite a sumptuous festivity, organized for the Kitchen Garden Fund. Mrs. Miller's house, which is the largest on the hillside, has been offered for the occasion. There are to be twenty-four young hostesses, fourteen of them native born and the rest importations. Later there is to be a supper and subsequently a cotillion.

* * *

The gathering at the "Sinbad" premier was really fashionable. Society had representatives innumerable. There were lots of box parties, and the front rows were full of discerning young men. While the costumes are pretty, it must be confessed the chorus maidens are rather more robust than graceful. There is no denying the wealth of lower limb exhibited, but the lines are rather too generous to be lovely. As for beauty—well, one hardly looks for that in the ballet girl, though the vivandieres in "The Milk White Flag" have captured much homage—the charming Miss Mary Biffin in particular.

* * *

The wedding of Miss Fannie Crocker, which was to have been among the Easter celebrations, has been postponed for the time being, owing to the ill-health of Mrs. McCreery, the mother of the prospective groom. She is now at Honolulu convalescing and the celebraiion will occur on her return.

* * *

Among future weddings there is considerable interest in that of Fred McWilliams and Miss Millie Siebe. Miss Siebe is the belle of the German-American Society set. She is a tall and decidedly handsome girl, of very pleasant manners. Mr. McWilliams is an employee of George W. McNear. They are to be married April 8th at the Lutheran Church.

* * *

Mr. Babcock and Mrs. Favre are to be congratulated upon the most sensible wedding of the season. Avoiding the dreary elaboration and observation of a church wedding, with its tiresome ceremony and wearisome congratulations, they went quietly to San Mateo, with but a word to their nearest and dearest, and were there married by Bishop Nichols last Saturday. The honeymoon is being spent at Mr. Babcock's cottage, near San Mateo, which he has had charmingly fixed up for the occasion, and, later in the season, the happy pair go to Lake County. A more agreeable arrangement than this could hardly have been devised, for it avoids the publicity and all the other worries and troubles incident to a public function, which, after all, is what a church marriage with decorations amounts to.

* * *

The marriage of Miss Millie Greenebaum and Doctor Hatch is to be somewhat of a novelty. The celebration will be performed at four o'clock in the afternoon and the affair will have much the aspect of a reception, or, as some one has called it, a matrimonial tea. The immediate families will stop for dinner, and then the happy pair go northward to settle, I believe, in Seattle.

* * *

Engagements are coming with rapidity in these latter weeks. A late one—I don't think the latest—is that of A. J. Bloch and Miss Emma Selling. The prospective groom holds the responsible post of head bookkeeper of the Nevada Bank, and was manager of the Virginia City branch until the business of that agency was transferred to San Francisco. Miss Selling is a bright, piquant young lady, and her father, Matthius Meyer, of the firm of Daniel Meyer, is well known in banking circles.

* * *

Children's parties are not so frequent across the Bay that due record should not be made when they happen. Last week Miss Bessie Coghill had a luncheon for twenty of her little friends—quite an elaborate affair, with games afterward, birthday cake, pink candles and pink favors. Mrs. McPike entertained a lot of youngsters in honor of her daughter's, Miss Hazel, ninth birthday. It was called a peanut party, for, as each maiden arrived, she was presented with a little basket and told to hunt for peanuts. The one whose satchel was first filled obtained the prize. Besides that, there was a grab-bag full of pretty little articles in silver, all inclosed within large gilded peanuts.

* * *

MRS. HAGAR was much perturbed by the publicity the papers have given her dramatic entertainments. One of them announced she had issued five hundred invitations, and it seems the first has not been sent out. She proposes to have this affair especially for young people, and intends to hire the Native Sons' Hall, and have some arrangement devised to reduce its magnitude. There are to be no decorations and no banquet, but, in its place, an informal supper, and afterwards, if the guests so desire, a dance. "A Modern Ananias" is the play selected, and, I am told, it affords excellent opportunities for amateur histrions. Miss Houghton has the leading role, and Miss Rose Hooper is the soubrette. Frank Mathieu, Doctor Geo. Redding, George De Long, and Edgar Peixotto have the male roles, and Leo Cooper officiates as director. There are several rehearsals every week, which, strange to say, are punctually at-

The Original Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter Street, stands without a rival and has stood the test for years. The most delicious meals are served by gentlemanly attendants, and the management takes pride in having everything orderly. It is just the place for business men and ladies out shopping to lunch.

Chew Adams' Pepsin Tutti-Frutti. It is sovereign for Indigestion and agreeable to the taste.

Dainty and Refreshing
PAR EXCELLENCE
"THE UNIVERSAL PERFUME"
For the Handkerchief, the Dressing-table and the Bath.
Murray & Lanman's
FLORIDA WATER
Its fragrant, lasting sweetness exerts a subtile charm and never tires or cloys.
Ask your Druggist for the genuine Murray & Lanman's.

tended, and it does look as though a capital performance would be given, inasmuch as the director announces his satisfaction, and promises great things. The night of April 13th has been selected for the performance.

* * *

Thank heaven, decorations are out of date. No longer is it proper to background one's guests with bamboo poles, fish-nets, banked roses, and profuse violets. Brilliant effects have ceased to be desirable, and it has become eminently proper to be extremely simple. It is also mal-apropos to afford the inquisitive reporter the list of your guests, though it continues permissible to confide the facts and fictions of the occasion, and to dilate on the glass and silverware, but the satin table cloth with lace edges is called in nowadays, and is only visible in households of which the income is better than the information.

* * *

Miss Hannah Williams, says Vanity, has received a gift of a very unique and beautiful prayer-book, which she will hand to the clergyman on the day of her marriage, and from it he will read the service. The book is of white royal velvet, with pearls and small diamonds set around the edges of the cover, while in the center of each side are embroideries done in white and gold, one of a cross, another of a crown, with tiny doves of white and silver in the upper corners. My contemporary is evidently rather at sea as to the name and identity of Mr. Hobart's fiancée, whose name is not Neil Williams.

* * *

THE GLORIES of the weddings this week should be recorded in blank verse. Considering the millions united and the importance of the occasions, mere prose is pale, cold, and inadequate. The marriage of Miss Ruby Lowenberg and Mr. Abe Brown was celebrated at the Palace Tuesday night, amidst the pomp of much decorations, and immediately under a canopy of peach blossoms. Doctor Voorsanger officiated with his usual aplomb, and Rabbi Nieto was present in case of an emergency. The bride looked very charming in her wedding gown. Mr. Brown, of course, was equal to the occasion. A big dinner followed, at which the health of the happy pair was cheerfully and genially toasted, with speeches from the Rabbis, Walter Levy and Charles Ackerman, whose post-prandial oratorical capacity is as felicitous as it is facile.

* * *

Mrs. Osgood Hooker has been giving some pleasant dinners and luncheons at her villa in Sausalito, and entertained Mrs. Lloyd Tevis and Mrs. Holt a few days ago. Her home is charmingly arranged, and her talent as a hostess shines even more brightly in its new setting than under more elaborate auspices of the Goad mansion. By the way, W. F. Goad is very anxious to sell his big house and take his daughters to Europe.

* * *

The second great wedding was that of Miss Jennie Schwabacher and Mr. Charles Rosenbaum, which was quite the most elaborate marital affair Society has had in some time. The decorations were really gorgeous. The great mansion was filled with flowers—roses, lilacs, and carnations in luxurious abundance. Under a canopy of peach blossoms and charmingly tinted incandescent lights, the happy pair stood, the groom supported by Mr. Al Ehrman and the bride by her sister. Dr. Voorsanger again performed the ceremony; then followed congratulations, dancing, and a magnificent supper. There was no doubt about the sincerity and genuineness of the felicitations, for the bride is an extremely sincere and very popular girl, though, unlike the groom, her fortune is prospective. It is noticeable that the progenitors of the principals at both weddings are in the millionaire class. So in neither instance need there be any question of love in a cottage. The presents were of a most sumptuous character.

* * *

WHIST IS EPIDEMIC in Oakland; Why, no one seems yet to have explained but it is the only game in which there is any interest. It has superseded wheeling in general estimation, and the lonely social events of record are in the form of whist parties. On Friday last, Mrs. E. Crouch had a French whist party in honor of her daughter, Mrs. Lewis Tainter of Wisconsin. The occasion of designating the affair a French whist party was the decorative effect, the adornments being tri-colored and quite pretty of their kind. Mrs. Charles Pierce and Mrs. Ross gave a matinée whist party on Saturday afternoon, in honor of Mrs. Strong of Chicago, who has been generously entertained throughout that region. Mrs. R. W. Gould of Myrtle Street gave a party for the Wheelock Whist Club, the recognized exponent of scientific whist in Oakland. Some of its members put up a very good game.

* * *

THE NEWS of Miss Claire Ralston's engagement was closely followed by an announcement which has made every one happy—the betrothal of Mr. Harry Miller and Miss Myra Prather. It is generally admitted that Miss Prather is the handsomest girl in Oakland. She is a sister of Thomas Prather, the banker, and the daughter of William Prather. She is tall, dark, vivacious, possessed of a stunning figure, and is notable for having domestic as well as social virtues. Mr. Miller is by professiou an analytical chemist, and is a graduate of Heidelburg, but devotes some of his spare time to service in the bank of his father, Chris Miller. Otherwise, he is a very generous young man, much given to theater parties and dinners, and as an amateur conjuror can hold his own with many a professional prestidigitator. The progress of the courtship, though apparent enough to the initiated, has not been subjected to much comment, inasmuch as Mr. Miller has never limited his entertainments to the specific object of his admiration.

* * *

I see that young Mr. Selby, whose engagement to Miss Glenn was announced a week or two ago, has left college and is installed at the smelting works. The marriage is to take place in April, I believe. He is a very pleasant young man, popular, and possessed of considerable ability.

* * *

Apropos of the engagement of Doctor Bullitt and Miss Claire Ralston rather a pretty story is told. As one of the belles of Oakland, she has been the recipient of marked attentions, and has had quite a number of proposals. It is said that she has confided the details of these various affaires to her father, insisting that he should decide and relieve her embarrassment. This amused Mr. Ralston very much, and he continually told her that when the right man presented himself she would not think of asking advice, for her feelings would reply for her. This she always denied, but in her letter announcing the news of the engagement, she commented that "Father was right after all." The right man had finally arrived and there had been no difficulty about the answer. Doctor Bullitt is said to be a very good-looking young man, and he commands quite a large practise in Louisville. The marriage will be celebrated in the autumn at the Ralston house—one of the finest residences of Oakland. Miss Claire is the only daughter. The only son graduates this spring at Cornell.

* * *

THE FAILURE of certain musical enthusiasts to form a musical club, attracts attention to the singular callousness of Oakland to culture. The old assumption that the residents of the burg across the bay were especially given to literature and art, is continually being subjected to contradiction by facts. Paderewski plays to half empty houses at the Macdonough, Materna and Ondricek complain of inadequate patronage. The inability to organize a club, of which I have spoken, is but an extra link in the chain of evidence. With one or two exceptions, Oakland has no resident teachers of music. Certain San Francisco teachers devote a day out of their week to the harmonic necessities of Alameda County, but there is no tendency toward lionizing or patronizing a resident professional. The fact seems to be that Oakland grows more and more domestic. In the resident sections there is little gas burned after nine. At ten, Jackson Street and about there is a veritable Land of Nod, not a soul stirring, not a glimmer of light. This is curious, when one considers the number of wealthy people and the opportunities their splendid homes afford for elaborate entertainments. Reluctantly one concludes Morpheus to be decidedly in the ascendant there—a sad but necessary conclusion.

* * *

Very regretfully Mrs. Howard is breaking up her home in Oakland. She leaves for the East this afternoon to spend the vacation with her son Harold, and will remain on the Atlantic Coast until after the marriage of her son Shafter to Miss Mollie Hunter, which, I believe, is to be celebrated in the summer at Newport. Miss Maud Howard goes to Palo Alto for a course of study, and later on in the season will join her mother, accompanied East by Karl Howard. Mrs. Howard has taken up, with her customary zeal, the cause of female suffrage, and her absence is the more regrettable that it prevents her participating in the movement. Last week she gave a reception in honor of Miss Shaw and Miss Anthony, at which she gathered a number of prominent women interested in or identified with the cause. Of course, the topic of real importance for the occasion was suffrage, and what must be done to obtain it. By the way, the suffragists are quite popular in Berkeley. Mrs. William Keith is an ardent supporter of their theories, and she entertained Miss Anthony and Miss Shaw at dinner a few nights ago.

* * *

I am inclined to think the career of the Deux Temps Club has come to an end. Its members, for the most part, are eligible to be classed among the grown-ups, and will doubtless figure among the "Bachelors and Benedicts" next winter. The prominence which the former organization has enjoyed for two seasons will doubtless devolve upon the minor club, which is known among the habitués as the "Little Ducks." The rising generation takes its terpsichorean pleasures there, and it will doubtless be a graduating ground for future belles. By the way, the "Bachelors and Benedicts" celebrate the last of their series of entertainments soon after Easter. There is ample coin left in the treasury for a good supper and elaborate decorations.

THE GOSSIP.

THE SAILOR'S SONG.

ALBERTA BANCROFT.

"Sing me a song, ye waves,
Ye that murmur so lazily here."
And a sailor's boat on the bay afloat
Came dreamily drifting near.

"Sing me a song, ye waves!"
And low from the answering hill,
His every word I faintly heard
Till all again was still.

"Sing as ye fall and rise,
For the sky above is bright,
And the Beverly shore stands out once more
In the deepening morning light.

"Marblehead over the way,
Port Sewell in ruin close by;
While above me here—and the graves show clear—
The Puritan fathers lie.

"Sing then your grand old song,
Your lay of ancient birth,
Until I deem that it's all a dream,
This sky and the mighty earth

"Sing me a song, yes, sing,
While I skim o er my watery way!"
And the echoes rang as the sailor sang
And pulled from his native bay.

"Ah, sing me your song, ye waves,"
I, too, in pleading say;
And all day long I he rd the song
Which the lad awoke that day.

The Commendador Port Wine is without doubt the finest imported. To the invalid it will prove invaluable as a restorative, its great maturity in wood rendering it easy of digestion, at the same time retaining the greatest recuperating and strengthening properties. It has been prescribed with great success by our leading physicians.

The Easter display which Nathan, Dohrmann & Co. present in their windows this year, is remarkable, both for its originality, and the exquisite taste with which it is arranged. Beauty and unique souvenirs appropriate to the season are shown in great number and variety, and aside from the suggestions for Easter decorations and presents which they cannot fail to give, the windows well deserve a visit for their own beauty.

CHAMPAGNE SEC.

Of all champagnes, Pommery Sec is most in demand in London. It is the favorite at all select gatherings, being preferred by the refined and fastidious classes of Europe rather than by the sporting fraternity. Among recent prominent affairs, Pommery Sec was served at the banquet in Atlanta tendered to President Cleveland, at the dinner in Hamburg given to the German Emperor, and at the banquet in Bordeaux tendered to the President of the French Republic, and was a prominent feature at the dinner tendered to Paderewski at the Palace Hotel, being served exclusively on that occasion. By real connoisseurs, Pommery Sec is considered the ideal champagne.

A SPLENDID ENTERPRISE.

The special Market-street edition of the San Francisco Daily Report on Monday last, was one of the finest and most useful issues of a daily newspaper in the history of the Pacific Coast. The Report not only dealt with the past, present, and future of one of the most remarkable thoroughfares in the world, but presented historical facts in connection with the street that had never been in print, and in the absence of searching work by the Report, would have been lost for all time. Some of the men who made the history of Market Street are dead, and others will, within the next few years, pass away. The twelve pages devoted to Market-street illustrations and descriptions have been sent to all the leading cities of the world, and are bound to create a wide-spread interest in San Francisco. The Report's enterprise is being very highly commended by property owners, merchants, and others who realize the advantage of having the streets of the city shown in their best light.

Adams's Tutti-Frutti Chewing Gum for Indigestion.

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist, 806 Market St.

Kelly's Corn Cure never fails. 25 cents. 102 Eddy Street.

TAKE IT TO BYRON.

Is it rheumatism, gout, or dyspepsia—or any ailment of blood, skin, stomach, liver, or kidneys? . . . . . .

Take it to Byron Hot Springs, and by a judicious use of the waters you will leave your trouble there. The climate in spring is perfect. Write. . .

Byron Hot Springs

Contra Costa Co., Cal.

Good Appetite

Is restored and the disordered Stomach and Liver invigorated by taking a small wineglassful, before meals, of the celebrated . . . . . .

Peruvian Bitters

Wedding Invitations are properly engraved and in correct form, at ROBERTSON'S

AFTER LENT

We never allow any poor work to go out of our store.

You will need some Visiting Cards. Do not forget that we are still printing from copper Plates, one hundred of the very best quality for One Dollar.

PIERSON BROS.
225 Kearny Street

COMET OOLONG

The oldest and most reliable brand of Tea on the market. Sold only in ⅓ pound papers at 20 cents per paper.

All grocers keep it.

New Shoes,

rightly made, need no "breaking in." Goodyear Welts are rightly made—stronger and better than hand-sewed. 51

Goodyear Welts are leather shoes, not rubber.

GOODYEAR SHOE MACH'Y CO., BOSTON.

Argonaut OK WHISKEY

IS FIVE YEARS IN WOOD BEFORE BOTTLING

E. MARTIN

—AND—

CO.

411 MARKET ST.

SAN FRANCISCO

FOR GRIPPE IT'S A DANDY

VINA BRANDY

AND

It's Pure! That's Sure!

VINA DISTILLERY CO.

819 Market St., S. F.

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco

33 Post Street, below Kearny, Mechanics' Institute Building

Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000

JAS. D. PHELAN, Pres. GEO. A. STORY, Cashier
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.

DIRECTORS—Jas. D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. P. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.

Interest paid on term and ordinary deposits.

Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.

When opening accounts, send signature.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

OF LONDON

Incorporated by Royal Charter A. D. 1726

Capital Paid Up, $3,436,100 Assets, $21,584,413
Surplus to Policy Holders, $8,980,251

ROBERT DICKSON, Manager

NATHAN & KINGSTON, San Francisco Agents

501 MONTGOMERY ST.

Sun Insurance Office OF LONDON
Founded A.D. 1710 Cash Assets, $10,270,535
Oldest Purely Fire Insurance Office in the World

The Lion Fire Ins. Co. Ltd., OF LONDON
Established A.D. 1875 Cash Assets, $1,105,095

The Imperial Ins. Co. Ltd., OF LONDON
Instituted A.D. 1803 Cash Assets, $9,362,920
40 Years in Business on the Pacific Coast

Manager for the Pacific Coast, WM. J. LANDERS
205 and 207 Sansome Street, near Pine

Aachen and Munich Fire Insurance Co.

Of Aix La Chapelle, Germany. Established 1805

Capital, $2,250,000.00

Total Assets, $6,854,653.65

United States Department
204 SANSOME STREET, SAN FRANCISCO

VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

RIPPLES.

SPORTS.

When the majority of the people of this universe hear or see in print the word "sports," they picture in their mind's eye a gang of well-fed, dissipated specimens of mankind decked out in horse-blanket-plaid suits of clothes, embellished with an unusual amount of cheap jewelry. The people who think so are ignorant, and know nothing of the meaning of the word.

Sport is supposed to be pleasure. Some people claim to find it so, but few will acknowledge it to be otherwise. I am one of the few who acknowledge it to be otherwise.

Some people find pleasure in attending a funeral, and would, undoubtedly, call it sport. I can readily understand an undertaker looking upon the attending of a funeral as sport; but, as we all know, what is one man's misery is another man's pleasure.

I could never see any sport in work; and when you come right down to it, all sport is labor. Yet, if you told a laborer that he was a sport, he would knock the head off a small keg for you; not that he would believe you told him the truth, but all men are human, and nothing tickles their vanity so much as to be looked upon by their fellow men as sports, or having the inclination of a sport. It does not matter whether the subject be a barkeeper, a banker, or a lawyer; it is the same.

While a minister does not like, apparently, to be considered of a sporty composition, still he does not object to you thinking that he was a sport of the first water before he entered the ministry, and feels flattered to think that you think as you do. Ministers are but men, and have their feelings, likes and dislikes, their passions, and all the other ills in their natures that flesh is heir to. It is impossible for them to be otherwise.

Sports differ from poets in one respect. Sports are made, not born. For instance, a boy may be born of what one might call sporty parents, whose parents before them were sporty; it does not follow, however, that he will be a sport, or even be a lover of sports. He is more liable to be a bookmaker at the race track; and whoever heard of a bookmaker being a legitimate sport? He does nothing for sport, but everything for gain.

Take the minister's son whose father before him you can safely wager was not a minister, and he will be more liable to make a sport, and nine times out of ten he does, than the sport's son.

Sport is to do something real difficult that you do not have to do. When there is compulsion in the matter the sport ceases, and it then becomes labor.

I have seen high salaried young men get up at daybreak, walk six or eight miles before breakfast, all for sport. If their employers should ask them during the day to walk down the street a couple of blocks to the bank, they would do so grumbling, with wagging hands and pouting lips, muttering something about not being able to understand why the old man didn't hire an office boy to do the errands.

It is even so with the small boy. He will run his feet off chasing a ball all day, but if his mother should ask him to run to the grocer's for something, he will say frowningly: "Why don't you make Jack do it?" referring to his younger brother; "you make me do everything." And with scuffling feet and tear-dimmed eye he shambles from the house, believing that he is the most abused mortal on the face of the earth.

A SHODDY GATHERING.

Mr. Shoddy (as the guests begin to arrive)—H'um, my dear, but who is that shabby looking man with the long hair?

Mrs. Shoddy—Don't speak so loud. He sells some kind of snake root medicine on the street corners. To-night, however, he is the poet of the Rockies.

"H'um; but who is the ministerial looking cuss?"

"He's an undertaker when at home, but to-night he's a professional humorist."

"But everybody will expect him to say something funny, won't they?"

"Of course they will, but he won't. Professional humorists never say anything funny in public."

IN OAKLAND

Stranger—Are you the Assessor of this city?

Party Addressed—Oh, dear, no; I'm only the Mayor.

ONE ON HIM.

He—My wife is such a coward that she won't stay in the house unless I'm with her.

She—I've noticed that she is on the street a great deal.

A NEW RECIPE.

Mrs. Wedgewood—What can I do, John, to keep you at home nights?

Mr. Wedgewood—Go out.

A MODEL HUSBAND.

Newwed—These biscuits don't taste much like those my mother used to make.

Mrs. Newwed—I try so hard to please you, Fred.

Newwed—Who said you didn't please me, darling? If my mother had the knack of making such biscuits as these, my father might have lived twenty years longer than he did.

THE TRAMP'S SOLILOQUY.

The Tramp (a college graduate, sitting on sawbuck, with eyes fixed on wood pile)—Omnia vincit labor. How true! How true! Why, the very thought of labor overcomes me.

NON-COMMITTAL.

Proud Father (showing artistic friend a painting by his daughter)—Now, what do you think of my daughter as an artist?

Artistic Friend—Well, -er-er- she paints! Yes, sir; she paints!

THE FAMILY ALBUM AND THE PIANO.

Grace—Where is the book of horrors, mamma?

Mother—On the instrument of torture.

BOYS WILL BE BOYS.

Old Gentleman (to small boys stealing apples)—Good gracious, boys, stealing is bad enough; but if you must steal, why don't you take the ripe apples instead of the green?

Boys (in chorus)—Th' man what owns the orchard will give us all the ripe ones we want, if we ask for 'em.

THEY HAD BEEN THE ROUNDS.

Biggs—I saw by the papers a few days ago that a well-known writer died recently and left fifty thousand funny dialogues that had never been published.

Squibbs—That's nothing. I ain't dead yet, and I have three times that number at home now.

WE HAVE MET HIM.

Upstart (trying to write a letter)—James, how do you spell toward?

James (the office boy)—T-o-a-r-w-a-r-d, sir.

Upstart—That's what I thought.

James (after a moment's thought)—Oh, no, sir; that's wrong. I remember now, it's spelt t-o-r-w-a-r-d, sir.

Upstart—That's the way I had it.

OF COURSE NOT.

Mrs. Blossom—How do the signal officers know what kind of weather we are going to have?

Mr. Blossom—I wasn't aware that they did. BRUNO.

Count Castellane, the husband of Miss Gould, recently purchased a table which cost four thousand dollars. Verily a fool and his money are soon parted.

The Czar of Russia is the largest landholder in the world. His personal estates are nearly one hundred million acres in extent.

Sufferers from Coughs, Sore Throat, etc., should be constantly supplied with "BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES." Avoid imitations.

When you are selecting a wedding present, go to S. & G. Gump's, 113 Geary Street. They have a magnificent variety to choose from.

Does your hair need a tonic? Quinania removes scurf and cleanses the scalp; strengthens the hair, renders it soft and brilliant, and prevents falling out. Price, 35 cents per bottle. If your dealer doesn't sell it, get it at Lederer's, 111 Stockton Street.

CLEANLINESS THE WATCHWORD.

In no other city in the world, probably, does there exist an institution parallel or similar to the Lurline Baths. It is simply unequaled anywhere. Aside from the novelty of the fact that one may enjoy a plunge in the water of the ocean, in the heart of a great city; aside from this fact, I say, the institution is most elegantly and completely equipped. There is a gymnasium and all the other accessories needed to build up the constitution, and to reduce surplus fat, to the accumulation of which the inhabitant of this climate is most dangerously prone. Cleanliness is the watchword of this institution. The tubs and tanks and everything about are kept scrupulously white, the water pumped fresh from the ocean every day, and one may enjoy it in any shade or degree of temperature. Rates, 30 cents single ticket, four for $1.00; and for the plunge, fifty tickets $10.00.

Gladness Comes

With a better understanding of the transient nature of the many physical ills which vanish before proper efforts—gentle efforts—pleasant efforts—rightly directed. There is comfort in the knowledge that so many forms of sickness are not due to any actual disease, but simply to a constipated condition of the system, which the pleasant family laxative, Syrup of Figs, promptly removes. That is why it is the only remedy with millions of families, and is everywhere esteemed so highly by all who value good health. Its beneficial effects are due to the fact, that it is the one remedy which promotes internal cleanliness, without debilitating the organs on which it acts. It is therefore all important, in order to get its beneficial effects, to note when you purchase, that you have the genuine article, which is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only, and sold by all reputable druggists.

If in the enjoyment of good health, and the system is regular, then laxatives or other remedies are not needed. If afflicted with any actual disease, one may be commended to the most skillful physicians, but if in need of a laxative, then one should have the best, and with the well-informed everywhere, Syrup of Figs stands highest and is most largely used and gives most general satisfaction.

There may be other Shirts as good as "STANDARD," but they cost more. There may be others the same price, but they are not as good. There may be others even that are as good and as cheap as "STANDARD," but they are not Californian.

LOOK FOR THIS MARK ON EVERY STANDARD SHIRT

ELECTRIC..

Supplies
Construction
Repairs

CALIFORNIA ELECTRICAL WORKS

....35 MARKET STREET

A. D. CHESHIRE, Pres. and Manager W. O. MACDOUGALL, Secretary

CALIFORNIA UNDERTAKING CO.

Fine Funeral Furnishers

Telephone, Main 971 123 STOCKTON ST., Cor. Geary

Finest Funeral Parlors in the city
Embalming a specialty Open day and night

Beecham's pills are for biliousness, bilious headache, dyspepsia, heartburn, torpid liver, dizziness, sick headache, bad taste in the mouth, coated tongue, loss of appetite, sallow skin, etc., when caused by constipation; and constipation is the most frequent cause of all of them.

Go by the book. Pills 10¢ and 25¢ a box. Book free at your druggist's or write B. F. Allen Co., 365 Canal Street, New York.

Annual sales more than 6,000,000 boxes.

THE WHITE FLYER IS THE MOUNT FOR '96

BARNES BICYCLES

HOOKER & CO.
16-18 Drumm St.
RETAIL STORE:
1640 Market St.
San Francisco, Cal.

THE WHITE RIMMED HUMMER IS THE COMER

A CARLOAD OF '96

PIERCE TRIED AND TRUE CYCLES

JUST RECEIVED

Many Superior Improvements. Ask to see the

Pierce Crank Hanger

Holbrook, Merrill & Stetson
Pacific Coast Agents
MARKET and BEALE STREETS
SAN FRANCISCO
Ask for Catalogue

THE WORLD-FAMED

HUMBER

BICYCLES

For 28 years the standard of excellence as the highest type of cycle construction known to the civilized world.

Now manufactured in America as well as in England, France, Russia and Portugal.

ST. GERMAIN BILLIARD CO.
GENERAL AGENTS
55 & 57 FIRST ST., NEAR MARKET

A HOME PRODUCT

AXLE-EASE

THE VERY BEST
AXLE GREASE

Made by—
AMERICAN OIL CO.
SAN FRANCISCO

McCUNE CYCLES

Moderate in price—
—As good as the best

ARMES & DALLAM
COAST AGENTS 230-232 Front St.

CHIMMIE FADDEN AGAIN.

THIS TIME HE TELLS OF A SALVATION ARMY MEETING.

Chimmie Fadden has had his attention called to the Salvation Army. This latest adventure takes him into the midst of the battle of the Booths, and here are his reflections recorded in last Sunday's Sun:

"Say, do yer know about de Salvation Army? Dey is great people, sure, and I taut dey was all settled as much as de Washin'ton Arch, and wasn't doin' a ting but doin' good, like I've seen 'em do on de Bow'ry ever since I was a kid; but, p'chee, dey is all in a scrap what's worse dan dat Dunraven flimflam.

"Dat's right. Let me tell you. Mr. Paul and Mr. Burton is members of dat yacht club what give de grand trun down t' de lord chap, Dunraven, and dey scrapped and dey scrapped and dey scrapped over dat game till Miss Fannie tole 'em dat if ever dey opened dere mouts any more about de dinky yacht race she'd break dere faces. Dat wasn't just what Miss Fannie said, cause she talks only high-toned langwudge, but dat's what she meaned, all right enough.

"Mr. Burton, he's kinder stuck on de English lord chap, see? But Mr. Paul, he's straight American, dead straight American, like me, and he says, 'What t ell,' he says, 'dere can't be but one mug can win a fight or a race, and if de mug what loses don't stand up to de dough dish widout hollerin' murder, den he ain't no good, and oughter get de dinky-dink.'

"Well, dat's de way dey jawed till Miss Fannie put de kibosh on dere chinnin', and de house was as peaceful as willy-boy wid a cigarette, till dis Salvation Army row came along, and den dere was more trouble in de family.

"His Whiskers says dat de English mug what come over from for'n parts t' put a cash register on de word of de Gospel was a person a non gratter, what means dat he was a person not in it.

"Dat started de game; Mr. Burton says dat de boss mug what lives in England has a right to run de machine accordin' t' de rules, and if de rules was broke den he had de right to ask what t'ell.

"Den Mr. Paul he gets hot in de collar, and he says dat if Mr. Burton was right den George Washin'ton was wrong, which is de man what discovered de city of Washin'ton, where dey makes laws for de lawyers and sa-ses for'n queens and kings.

"Say, I nearly unscrews me arm openin' small bottles for 'em, havin' t' do someting t' keep meself in de room, so as not t' miss any of de rounds. Dey was all talkin' to onct, and puttin' up terrible fronts of knowin' all about de game, when Miss Fannie killed dem all dead wid askin' in dat smood voice of hers: 'Has any of you gents ever been to a Salvation Army meetin'?'

"Say, honest, dey all looks as silly as a bull pup in a bathtub, and dey just t'rows der wine in dere faces, and coughs, and don't say nothin' fer a while.

"Well, his Whiskers says, after he taut a while, 'No, my dear,' he says, 'I don't tink we has ever went.'

"Den Miss Fannie she says, 'Before yuse all settle de affairs of de Salvation Army, spose you chases yourself to one of der meetin's, and take a tumble to yourselves'—only not dose langwudge—'till you knows de game.'

"Mr. Paul, he held out his glass for me t' fill, and den he says, solemn-like dese was his very words, 'It strikes me dat our spiritual welfare would be improved, as well as our understandins, if we adopts de resolution magnanimously.'

"So de next evenin his Whiskers says t' me could I take 'em down t' where dere was a Salvation Army meetin', and I says, 'In a minute,' for I knowd where some loidies dey call Slum Lassies was preachin'.

"Say, it was down near Chatham Square, and when we got off de car his Whiskers give one look and tried t' make a sneak, but Mr. Paul he held him up t' dough dish and makes him stay. For a while de crowd was more curiouser about our gang dan about de Salvationers, and dey gives us a great jolly. Dere was one old woman I uster known down dere, a Mrs. Murphy, what was rushin' a growler; but when she sees me she stops and says, 'Shure, it's Chimmie Fadden and his foine frinds Introjuce me t' his Whiskers, Chimmie dear,' she says, wid a smile you couldn't spoil wid a club.

"Say, I taut his Whiskers would trow a fit right dere, but Mr. Paul says, 'Certainly Chames,' he says, 'present your lady friend; I am sure Mr. Van Courtlandt would be pleased to know her,' he says, givin' me de wink.

"Well, say, I had t' do it, if I got slugged for it, and I give Mrs. Murphy a knock down in polite style to all de gents; and Mr. Paul he says t' her, solemn as a Judge, says he, 'Mrs. Murphy, we would be pleased t' get your views on de American split from de English Salvationers,' he says.

"His Whiskers tells Mr. Paul not t' be a ass, but Mr. Paul made a bluff at not hearin' him, and was as polite as a actor t' de old woman.

"Well, you oughter seen her! She kinder hunched herself inside her close like a bull pup what's glad t' see you, and she says: 'T'ell wid de English! savin' your prisince, sir,' she says, t' Mr. Burton, who she taut was a Englishman; 't'ell wid de English!'

"'Can you answer dat logic?' says Mr. Paul to Mr. Burton. 'Shure he can't,' says Mrs. Murphy. 'I'd not have me sowl saved if ut was dipindin' on de English for de savin',' she says, and Mr. Paul says, 'We Americans stand togedder, Mrs. Murphy.'

"I was gettin' leary of de game, and wonderin' how could I chase offi de old woman, when Mr. Paul sees de lay, and tips her a quarter, askin' could she use it for her healt.

"'Oi ken,' says she, 'but Oi'll not go to Kelly's for de beer, for I owe him de price and de tief would take it out of dis. once he seen it. May de Lord love you, and not call for you too soon,' she says, and makes a hurry sneak wid her growler.

"Say, his Whiskers was dead sore on Mr. Paul for jollyin' Mrs. Murphy, and tells him t' pay 'tention t' de Army lassies, what had a tough gang 'round 'em, but was keepin' em quiet as mice wid dere talk. We listened and listened, and his Whiskers kept sayin' over de tings what de lassies was sayin' t' de gang, and pipin' off de nice way de gang was treatin' de lassies, and how de gang stopped usin' tough langwudge, and didn't go t' de beer joints. Pretty soon Mr. Burton says t' Mr. Paul, 'I guess there ain't no need of no for'n boss tellin' dese girls how t' do dis job.'

"'Not on your life,' says Mr. Paul; 'we'll have anodder Boston tea party first,'—which was a little picnic dey had in Boston to celebrate de first challenge for de America Cup, Mr. Paul told me.

"His Whiskers kept kinder slidin' closer and closer t' de Salvationers, and de rest of us followed, and what do you tink? All of a suddint de lassies began singin' and Mr. Paul joined in—he can sing like a peach—and so did Mr. Burton, and so did his Whiskers, and me—say, I warbled till you couldn't hear de elevated cars goin' by! De crowd give us a jolly at first, but Mr. Paul he faced 'em, and, usin' his cane like de little club de boss of de teeater band uses, he led 'em all into de song, till even de cops on de corner was singin' t' beat 'ell.

"When it was over a lassie passes by Mr. Burton wid a paper she had t' sell, and offered him one. He takes it and gives her a bill, and tells her t' keep de change. In a minute she comes back wid a face on her like she'd just piped off a ghost, and says, 'You made a mistake, sir; you give me dis, sir,' and tries to give him back de boodle.

"'Dere's no mistake, me good girl,' he says, 'if you are an American secessionist'—which I don't know what it is. But I seen de bill, and p'chee, what do you think? Honest, it was a double saw-buck—a twenty.

"Well, when we got home, I was takin' a little supper t' de folks, and I heard Miss Fannie ask Mr. Burton if he was converted, and he says, 'Yes, I'm converted t' de Salvation Army, and dere game all right, and dey don't need no for'n mug tellin' 'em how t' do de trick.' His Whiskers says 'Amen,' and Mr. Paul says, 'Under de circumstances, Chames, you need open only a small bot.'

"Say, de Duchess was dead crazy t' hear about de whole game, and when I told her about Mr. Burton punglin' de twenty plunks she looked at herself in de glass, and she says, tautful like, like de bull pup looks when little Miss Fannie pinches his ear, she says, 'Chames, how do you tink I'd look in a dark blue poke bonnet wid a red ribbon around it?' she says.

"Say, what t'ell was de Duchess tinkin' of, I'd like t' know."

EDWARD W. TOWNSEND.

ON THE WHEEL.

ZIMMERMAN'S ADVOCACY OF AN ERECT POSITION IN THE SADDLE.

No one is justified in knowing more about bicycling than Champion Zimmerman. His announcements on the subject should be fraught with authority. They are, at least, interesting. The New York World has enjoyed Zim as its bicycle editor, and thus does he direct the steps of the ambitious biker on the verge of buying a wheel. It is good to find so competent an expert insistent on the advantages of the upright attitude.

Go to some physician who is a bicycle rider, if you happen to know of such, and be carefully examined. The purpose of the examination is to determine if your organs, heart, lungs, kidneys, etc., are sound. You may think they are and perhaps you are right, so far as all ordinary pursuits and pastimes are concerned. You may not have an organic disease, but a functional disturbance. In that case the moderate riding of a bicycle may help that difficulty and put the particular organ in a state of perfect health, when the training could be done with impunity. On the other hand, that functional difficulty might be aggravated by the severities of training and worse injury result.

Seat yourself firmly in the saddle of a bicycle. Extend the limbs. Without bending them, slide the top of the foot beneath the pedals. Point the toe straight out in this. If the top of the foot slips under the pedals easily, the bicycle is about right for you. If not, have the seat raised or lowered until it does fit you.

Above all things else, do not get a bicycle that is too light. There are such, though you may not think so now. Extreme lightness is gained generally at the expense of rigidity. With a bicycle that is not absolutely rigid you can never hope to win.

Here let me tell you something that you must keep before you ever: All races are won in the finish. It is in the last few yards that the battles are fought out. Even there, when your feet are going forward so fast that they seem to you to be going backward, do not forget that the race is won in the end of it.

You must understand that it is possible to reach a limit in driving a bicycle; not the human limit, but the limit of speed at which the wheels can be driven. I have many times reached the point where it was not possible to drive the wheels around any faster. That was on my wheel with sixty-eight gear, which is the gear with which I won the championships from one-quarter of a mile to fifty miles. In the fierce pounding which occurs at the end of a race the poor bicycle will give under each motion. You can feel it plainly. Every time it gives there is just so much loss of speed. But with a good bike everything remains rigid, and you go forward with increasing speed, and with less effort. The little things tell the most then.

Sit up straight when you ride. If you are out for a mild little jaunt you will enjoy it ever so much more if you sit up straight.

There's nothing so attractive about the road that you should keep your eyes on it constantly. Study the country you are riding through. If in a city street keep your shoulders back and your head well up, so you won't meet with an accident or cause others to meet with one. Give your lungs an opportunity to fill with fresh air. That's what you are out for.

Ladies, I don't care how handsome your costume is or how pretty your face may be you look hideous when you go by all doubled up. If you don't stoop over your wheel you will not be afflicted with what has become known as the "bicycle face." It is just as much bad form for you to double over when riding the bike as it is for you to use your knife where the fork should be used.

There is a matter connected with cycling upon which there is considerable ignorance, strange as it may appear, and that is the proper kind of a bath to take following a spin. A rational bath is important from a health point of view, and the good work of the different organs of the body. After a long spin on the bicycle, where the rider perspires, and is covered with the dust of road, it is necessary not only to wash, but refresh the skin. Many cyclists bathe in the ordinary manner, with hot or warm water and soap. Plunging into warm water, and conscientiously rubbing themselves, they afterward feel enervated, weakened, and incapable of doing anything but sleep.

What a wheelman needs after a ride is a very quick bath, or a shower with the water as cold as he can bear it, and then a long and vigorous rubbing with rough towels. If water with a little salt or alcohol in it is used the tonic effects are increased. It is not necessary to plunge entirely into the water. A large sponge soaked in water rubbed over the body, followed by a vigorous [illegible] towel, is sufficient. The feeling after a bath is taken in this manner, following the ride, is one of exhilaration, and lessens, if it does not entirely remove, any sense of fatigue.

mothers!

Your clear skin? Mother's. Your voice? Mother's. Your slight figure? Mother's. Inherited weak lungs? Then protect yourself. Live out doors; get the fresh air; and keep well nourished.

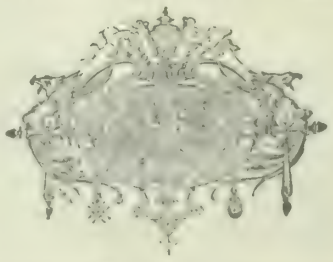
Scott's Emulsion

of Cod-liver Oil, with Hypophosphites, is the best known preventive to serious lung trouble. It supplies just the kind of needed fat; prevents useless waste of tissue; makes rich blood; and fortifies the body against attack. You should take it at once if you feel weak, have no appetite, or are losing flesh.

SCOTT'S EMULSION has been endorsed by the medical profession for twenty years. (Ask your doctor.) This is because it is always palatable—always uniform—always contains the purest Norwegian Cod-liver Oil and Hypophosphites.

Put up in 50 cent and $1.00 sizes. The small size may be enough to cure your cough or help your baby.

PERRIER-JOUET CHAMPAGNE EXTRA DRY "SPECIAL"



Also specially selected stock of Clarets and White Wines on hand.

W. B. CHAPMAN, Sole Agent Pacific Coast
123 California Street

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

BULLION MINING COMPANY. LOCATION OF principal place of business, San Francisco, California; location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the eighteenth day of March, 1896, an assessment (No. 47) of ten cents (10c) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, room 11, No. 328 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the twenty-second day of April, 1896, will be sold on WEDNESDAY, the [illegible] day of May, 1896, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with [illegible] and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

A. E. GRAY, Secretary.

Office, Room 11, No. 328 Bush Street, San Francisco, California.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS

Estate of Barthelemi Merle, Deceased

Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, A. C. Freese, Administrator of the Estate of Barthelemi Merle, deceased, to the creditors of and all persons having claims against the said deceased to exhibit them, with the necessary vouchers, within four months after the first publication of this notice, to the said A. C. Freese, Administrator, at his office, being a [illegible] Street, the same being his place of business in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California. A. C. FREESE, Administrator of the Estate of Barthelemi Merle, Deceased.

Dated [illegible], February [illegible], 1896.

J. D. SULLIVAN, Attorney for Administrator.

GEO. GOODMAN

Patentee and Manufacturer of Artificial Stone

Schillinger's Patent In all its branches

SIDE WALK and GARDEN WALK A Specialty

Office, 307 MONTGOMERY ST., Nevada Block, SAN FRANCISCO

DOCTOR
Acker's
ENGLISH
Remedy
will stop a cough in a night, check a cold in a day, and cure consumption if taken in time. If the little ones have Croup or Whooping Cough, use it promptly.

Croup is a very fatal disease. Fully one-half of those attacked die. The great danger is in delay. The disease progresses so rapidly that the loss of a few hours in treatment is often fatal. ACKER'S ENGLISH REMEDY will cure Croup, and it should always be kept in the house for emergencies. A 25 cent bottle may save your child's life.
Three sizes: 25c, 50c, $1. All Druggists.
ACKER MEDICINE CO.
16 & 18 Chambers St., New York.

CHARLES S. WHEELER ERNST H. LUDWIG
Ernst H. Ludwig & Co.
THE MODEL AMERICAN CATERERS

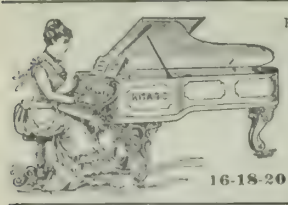
Supply Wedding Breakfasts, Luncheons, Dinners, Matinee Teas and Receptions on shortest notice. Also Terrapin Entrees Luncheons and Dinners. Ice Cream, Cake, &c.
Telephone 2388 1206 SUTTER STREET

E. H. M. SPECIAL
The best WHISKEY for family use and Medicinal Purposes
RECOMMENDED
By all first-class Physicians. Sold everywhere.
E. H. MICHELS
Sole Controller
406 SANSOME ST. SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

NOBBIEST STYLES NEATEST FIT
BEST MATERIALS

Up-to-Date Ideas.....
In HATS
Spring and Summer Styles now in
AT HARLOE'S
237 KEARNY ST. PHONE, RED 361

ITO, SOTOMI & CO.
JAPANESE GOODS
ART POTTERY,
CURIOS AND RUGS A SPECIALTY
116 Sutter St. Bet. Kearny and Montgomery San Francisco, Cal



Established 1856
Benj. Curtaz & Son
Pacific Coast Agents
16-18-20 O'Farrell St.

MRS. EDITH E. McLEAN
PHYSICIAN FOR THE HAIR
Has a Canadian Vegetable Tonic for the Hair that will make it grow when all else fails. Dandruff removed. Terms moderate. High-class references.
Office Hours 10 to 12 and 1 to 6.
Rooms 45, 58 and 60
ST. ANN'S BUILDING
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

NEW YORK HAIR DRESSING STORE
MME. E. KESSING, Proprietress
Artistic Hair Dressing and Shampooing. A new preventive for the hair falling out. Superfluous hair removed. 1704 Market Street, San Francisco

THE BUSTLE REDIVIVUS.

NEW NOTES ON MILLINERY AND POINTERS ABOUT PARASOLS.

The bustle is upon us! Yea, verily, it is in the hands of our best dressmakers and on the persons of a few of our fashionably attired. After almost ten years of immunity from this hurtful and vulgar appendage, we are again taking it to our hearts and carrying it upon our backs. Of course, in the hands of an artist in cloth, like Madame Baer, it is comparatively harmless. She deftly inserts it under the skirts of long-backed depressed-looking women, and it becomes an aid to beauty. People who stand well over the ball of their feet, with the hips properly thrust out and back, escape. It is all very well now, it is still "Will you need a bustle? Do you want a bustle?" but in a year it may be "You must wear a bustle, you look so flat," and we will all be bearing these uncomfortable, heating, inartistic articles. They press upon the base of the spine; they overheat it. A large one, on even a woman whose walk indicates refinement, gives a strange wriggle to the back of the skirt, which suggests the switch which a negro woman gives her dress when she feels very fine indeed and somebody is looking.

The bustle and the fact that the untrimmed little sailor hat is losing its prestige are the two facts to be wailed over this spring. Those of the straight brim and the square crown are being put to flight by ones of Panama straw with a crease down the middle of the crown, and several other slight variations which add nothing to the beauty and destroy the simplicity. They are also to be further desecrated by trimmings; of course this has always been done by the uninitiated, but the good milliners have fallen this year, too. So these little oases which my eyes have always sought in a crowd and rested upon, are to be spoiled. Never again when compelled to go on the Oakland boat shall my eyes, tired of contorted brims loaded with birds, flowers, feathers, furs, beads, laces, thistles, weeds, fruits, and vegetables—never again, I say, shall these eyes seek the plain sailor-hat and refresh themselves on its simplicity, for the suburban girl will now not only wear her "best" gown to the city, but also a trimmed hat, and the one suitable article for a trip on cars and boat which she has been prone to wear (i. e., a severe sailor hat) will be superseded by probably a yellow Panama straw, creased and over-trimmed. Alack! alack!

The small or rather smaller sleeve is a fact now, and no longer a subject of conjecture. It has been adopted by all the important establishments, and the same is true of the diminished skirts. Sleeves are arranged in plaits, and fall well over the shoulders. A pretty fancy is to have some of the trimming of the bodice caught down, or over on the sleeve in the case of revers, by a few small buttons. When the sleeve covers the whole arm, a high, tight cuff is generally used.

The subject of millinery is of dire importance at the moment. In well-regulated families but little else is spoken of. It is the lunch topic in mansions and the subject of paramount interest at afternoon teas. Girls have been known to speak of hats, going to and coming from Lenten service. Here is what an authority has to announce on the subject:

The new hats are remarkable for their odd color combinations, the amount of trimming they are able to bear up under and still look well, and the peculiar manner in which they are worn. All the most fashionable spring hats are to be worn well tilted over the forehead. It is not a becoming fashion, but it is Louis Seize, and that, Paris milliners claim, is sufficient to assure its popularity.

And yet it has been impossible to ascertain the exact space allowable between the eye-brows and the brim of the new Spring hat, but it is safe to say that but little of the forehead should be visible.

The hats themselves have never been more worthy of attention than they are this year. The all black hat is quite in the background. The new hats in both coarse and fine straws come in such colors as bright purple, vivid green, and flaming nasturtium yellow. Hats of mauve straw will be considered this season as subdued. Two colored straws are frequently combined in one hat. The new shapes are broad in effect. The crowns are low and generally much trimmed.

The color combinations used are most startling. Among the newest is purple and navy blue, turquoise blue and stem green, cerise and heliotrope, vivid green and mauve, old rose and green, and perhaps the oddest combination is one of mauve and nut brown.

Tulle is the chief trimming. It is arranged in filmy loops, soft rosettes, and in cloudlike masses. It does much toward subduing the effect of the new hats. Half the flowers used this season are veiled in tulle. Occasionally the tulle itself adds an odd touch to the color combination, as when clusters of pink geraniums are covered with film of violet tulle. But generally it does much to soften the crude color effect.

Conspicuous among the new trimmings is the bird of paradise, which was so popular ten years ago. This bird, with its long, waving plumes, is to be seen on all the most exclusive French hats. It is dyed in many different colors and is used in trimming a bonnet as well as a round hat. White feathery aigrettes are another feature of the new hats.

Nearly as important as the question of headgear is the subject of parasols. Said an authority to me recently:

Nine out of every ten of the women who really know how to dress well always try their parasols on, just as they do their hats, before buying, and it is an excellent plan, for a pale, sallow woman should never carry bright blues or greens, and should by all means avoid glaring reds. She should wear something in a black or mode. Dark women, with high color, look well under the blues and greens in light or dark shades, and yellow is also becoming to them; while the blondes, these pink and white girls with real gold in their hair, look very captivating with dead white, yellow, pink, or pale blue as a background, in the light shades, and the dark ones are equally as becoming.

The batiste, or grass linen parasols are out for the first time, and are very swagger for morning use, either in the mountains, or by the sea. They are made up with plain, natural sticks, and the lining, which is of any colored China silk, shows through the batiste. Some have colored dots with a lining to match, others have bands of insertion let in, and still others are figured, while many of the plain ones have a finish of open-work embroidery woven in at the edge. These parasols are designed to be worn with summer flannels, ducks, and linen gowns, and will be extensively used by those going on coaching tours. They are exceedingly light and durable, and will not fade, and the price varies from $3.50 upward.

Here is a costume ordered in Paris for a western heiress:

The skirt, rather full, with only godets at the back, was made of a rough, black material shot with mandarin. The waist was of very full black mousseline de soie over a light black silk lining. Coming from the shoulder seam were two strips of rare white lace, held down by bands of jet. The shoulder seams were very long, and at the arm hole was a ruff of mandarin velvet, held with a band of jet. The dark green velvet on the waist was arranged so as to give the effect of a bolero jacket over the waist of mousseline de soie. At the back the velvet was cut in the fashion of a short bolero jacket, showing three inches of the fulled mousseline de soie and the shirred ends of a crush green velvet girdle. The jacket effect in front consisted of two tiny pointed lappets of the velvet, lined with white satin. These fell over the girdle in front. The sleeves were full puffs to the elbow. From the elbow to the waist the sleeves were tight-fitting, but at the hand they flared and showed a facing of white satin and a frill of lace. The collar was a full crush collar of the black mousseline de soie, with a stiff full ruche of the same standing out four inches.

BABETTE.

USE THE CELEBRATED
C. D. CORSETS AND WAISTS
ALL FIRST-CLASS DEALERS KEEP THEM
SCHWEITZER & CO., San Francisco
Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast

SPRING SEASON, 1896
GRAND OPENING
...OF...
FRENCH PATTERN BONNETS
AND—HIGH ART NOVELTIES
MARIA J. STACOM
531 Sutter Street - San Francisco

REMOVAL
Rountrees English Chocolate, Kohlers Swiss Chocolates, and all brands of Foreign and Eastern Confectionery, imported by . . . .
W. L. GREENBAUM,
of 205 SUTTER ST., will, after December 1st, be found in large and commodious quarters at 128 POST ST., Bohemian Club Bldg.

GEORGE E. HALL
Agent and Importer of Foreign Wines
MUTUAL LIFE BUILDING,
222 Sansome Street

CRESTA BLANCA WINES
AWARDED
THREE HIGHEST AWARDS
AT
THE ATLANTA EXPOSITION
OF SIX MEDALS
AWARDED TO CALIFORNIA
Cresta Blanca Wines
OBTAINED THREE
WETMORE-BOWEN CO.
140 Montgomery Street
Under Occidental Hotel

Horses Pastured
$1.50 PER MONTH
GOOD FEED AND CARE.
Send for circular.
F. A. HYDE, 630 Commercial St.

J. R. SMITH & CO.
230 BUSH STREET
And Room 7, Rotunda, Mills Building
W. HALL, Successor
MERCHANT TAILORS
Will make garments to order
—At Great Reduction for Cash—
J. R. SMITH - - Manager

BICYCLE and GOLF SUITS
H. S. BRIDGE & CO.
Merchant Tailors
Many Novelties in Imported Wear. Shirts to Order a Specialty.
622 Market Street, San Francisco
(Up-stairs, opposite Palace Hotel)

UP-TO-DATE
TAILORING
AT MODERATE PRICES
J. H. HAWES
Mezzanine B, Crocker Building

COTTON SAIL DUCKS
22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard
. . ALSO . .
Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks
From 30 to 120 inches wide
Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks
Manufactured by Mount Vernon Company Baltimore
Murphy, Grant & Co. . . Pacific Coast Sole Agents

BONESTELL & CO.
Dealers in PAPER
Fine Coated Papers a Specialty
401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

Ask your Blacksmith to shoe your horse with
PHŒNIX HORSE SHOES
—GIVE THEM A TRIAL

DR. THOMAS L. HILL
DENTIST
Office, Odd Fellows' Building,
S. W. Cor. Seventh and Market Streets
Office Hours, 9 a. m. to 5 p. m.
Consultation Hours, 4 to 5

ABRAMSON-HEUNISCH CO. (Incorporated)
IMPORTERS AND JOBBERS OF
Brewers' and Bottlers' Supplies, Corks, Druggists' Glassware, Etc.
26-28 Main St. San Francisco

Hotel Del Monte

America's Famous Summer and Winter Resort

The Most Elegant Seaside Establishment in the World

"Where a leaf never dies in the still blooming bowers,
And the bee banquets on thro' a whole year of flowers"

G. H. ARNOLD,
—MANAGER—

Monterey, Cal.

Flower Festivals
Fiestas
Rose Carnivals

. . . and the like, will be the delight of California for the next two or three months.

Santa Barbara Flower Festival, the fame of which is world-wide, and the glory of which, like that of Solomon, is not half told, opens April 15. Queen Flora will reign 3 days an arbitrary and absolute despot.

La Fiesta de Los Angeles, now fixed in the chronology of California feasts, and not less illustrious than its older prototypes, commences April 22, and the riot of fun will spread over 4 days.

The Carnival of Roses, to take place in San Jose, May 6th to 9th, inclusive, though a more recent candidate for favors of the fun-loving world, yet because of the limitless possibilities of the Garden City for anything that is made of roses, is quite as full of promise.

REDUCED RATES

will be made by the SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY for all these brilliant events. Arrange your programmes accordingly, and call on agents for particulars.

COOLGARDIE GOLD FIELDS
(FREMANTLE) AUSTRALIA

ONLY SIX DAYS TO HONOLULU — S.S. AUSTRALIA

First-Class.....$220
Steerage 110
Lowest rates to CAPE TOWN

S.S. "Alameda," via Honolulu and Auckland, Thursday, April 2, 1896, at 2 p. m.

S.S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, April 7, 1896, at 10 A. M.

Special Parties—Reduced special rates for parties, March 10th and April 7th, 1896.

Ticket Office—114 Montgomery St.
Freight Office—327 Market St.

J. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO.,
General Agents

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.

Dispatch Steamers leave San Francisco for ports in Alaska.

For British Columbia and Puget Sound ports, Feb. 19, and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Wednesdays, 9 A. M.

For Newport, Los Angeles and all way ports, every fourth and fifth day, 8 A. M.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Hartford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles (Santa Monica), Redondo (Los Angeles) and Newport, every fourth and fifth day at 11 A. M.

For ports in Mexico, 25th of each month.

Ticket Office, Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.,
GENERAL AGENTS,
10 MARKET ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

THE LICK HOUSE

Occupies the block bounded by Montgomery, Post and Sutter Streets

IT IS——
——scrupulously clean;
——accessible to all street car lines and places of amusement;
——conveniently situated for business men;
——a quiet, model place for a family to spend the winter;
——moderate in price, yet first-class in every particular.

AMERICAN OR EUROPEAN PLAN

K. B. SOULÉ, Manager

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention

A QUIET HOME
CENTRALLY LOCATED

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL
SAN FRANCISCO

WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

Pacific Towel Co.

Telephone 1780 — No. 9 Lick Place, San Francisco

GEO. K. MOORE, Proprietor

The Club Hotel
5 Bund, Yokohama

Hotel Metropole
1 Tsukiji, Tokyo

First-class Hotels, centrally situated, well furnished. ENTIRE FOREIGN MANAGEMENT. Experienced English Matron in attendance. Excellent table under the superintendence of qualified foreign Chef.

The Hotel steam-launch attends steamers arriving and departing. Passengers are met at the Railway Station. Visitors have the option of messing either in Tokyo or Yokohama, without extra charge—The only Hotels offering such an advantage. Certified Guides are in attendance at both Hotels. European Hair-Dresser on the premises.

THE CLUB HOTEL COMPANY, Limited, Proprietors

E. C. SIOEN, Manager
YOKOHAMA

E. DEWETTE, Manager
TOKYO

THE GRILL ROOM SERVICE
—OF THE—
PALACE HOTEL

Has been extended to what was formerly the City Restaurant. This immense room, which has a direct entrance from Market Street is known as - - - -

"THE LADIES' GRILL ROOM"

NEW DEPARTURE—CHARACTERIZED BY PROMPT SERVICE. MODERATE CHARGES

$6.50 PER TON DELIVERED

COS BAY COAL

SOOTLESS
SMOKELESS

ORDER YOUR CARRIAGES AND COUPES OF THE
PACIFIC CARRIAGE CO.
At Baldwin Hotel
200 Sutter Street, corner Kearny
48 Eighth Street, or
St. Nicholas Hotel, Market and Ninth Streets
Steamer and Train Service a specialty 'Phone 1950

THE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
510 MONTGOMERY ST., S. F.,

Reads all papers on the Pacific Coast, and supplies clippings on all topics, business and personal.

—A—
SAFE GUIDE

No man knows all there is to know about advertising. The subject is too profound, too complex, too perplexing, for any single person, or for any dozen persons, for that matter. The path to success in advertising is full of dangerous places. All business men would do well to engage a safe guide to conduct them past the danger spots—to tell them what to do and what to avoid doing.

PRINTERS' INK

Is a weekly journal for advertisers, published at 10 Spruce St., New York. It is a magazine of ideas, of suggestions, of advice. Advertisers the world over read it and write for it. It is the advertising authority of America—probably of the globe. Business men will find it a safe guide. To secure its services as guide costs $2 a year. A sample copy costs nothing.

THE WAVE CLUBBING LIST

FOR 1896

By special arrangement with the Publishers, THE WAVE is prepared to offer the following list

SUBSCRIPTIONS MUST BE PAID IN ADVANCE

THE WAVE and	CENTURY	$6 00
" "	ARENA	5 00
" "	LITTELL'S LIVING AGE	7 75
" "	ART AMATEUR	5 75
" "	LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE	4 50
" "	MUNSEY'S	3 50
" "	ATLANTIC MONTHLY	5 75
" "	YOUTH'S COMPANION	3 75
" "	NEW ENGLAND MAGAZINE	5 00
" "	HARPER'S MAGAZINE	5 50
" "	HARPER'S WEEKLY	5 70
" "	HARPER'S BAZAAR	5 70
" "	HARPER'S ROUND TABLE	4 00
" "	SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE	5 00
" "	REVIEW OF REVIEWS	4 50
" "	ST. NICHOLAS	5 00
" "	OVERLAND	4 75
" "	COSMOPOLITAN	3 50
" "	FRANK LESLIE'S MAGAZINE	4 90
" "	PUCK	6 50
" "	JUDGE	6 50
" "	LIFE	7 00
" "	LIFE'S COMEDY	3 50
" "	LESLIE'S WEEKLY	5 70
" "	DEMOREST MAGAZINE	4 00
" "	SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN	5 00
" "	SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN SUPPLEM'T	6 50
" "	N. Y. DAILY SUN	8 00
" "	" SUNDAY "	4 50
" "	CASSELL MAGAZINE	3 75
" "	ARGOSY	3 50
" "	PUBLIC OPINION	4 50
" "	SUNDAY WORLD	4 75
" "	CRITIC	5 50
" "	FORUM	5 00
" "	NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW	6 50
" "	TABLE TALK	3 25
" "	NINETEENTH CENTURY	6 25
" "	CONTEMPORARY REVIEW	6 25
" "	FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW	6 25
" "	BLACKWOODS MAGAZINE	6 25
" "	TRUTH	6 25
" "	DELINEATOR	3 50
" "	VOGUE	5 50
" "	TOWN TOPICS	7 50
" "	DAILY JOURNAL	5 00
" "	SUNDAY JOURNAL	3 75
" "	ILLUS. AMERICAN	5 75

TALES OF THE DAY.

Guzman Blanco, for many years Dictator for Venezuela, called upon Baron Rothschild for the purpose of negotiating a loan for his Government. He remarked, by way of compliment, on the honor of interviewing the head of the richest banking house in the world. "And I," returned the Baron, "am honored by receiving a call from the richest man on earth." "You overestimate my resources," answered Blanca. "I am not nearly so rich as reported. But even were I possessed of as many thousands as they say, my fortune would still fall short of your own." "Who but Blanca," said Rothschild, "has estates comprising hundreds of thousands of square miles of territory? Who else has an income of thirty-seven millions? Who else has two and one-half million slaves?" Blanca smiled sweetly, and replied: "Baron, I see you understand the politics of Venezuela."

That story about Washington, saying that he would not be outdone in politeness by a negro, has evidently been taken to heart by Mr. Thomas Reed. Reed was sauntering up a fashionable Washington avenue during calling hours, when two colored brethren, decidedly the worse for wear, in battered remnants of clothes, lifted their ragged caps as he passed, saying: "How do you do, Mr. Speaker?" Instantly Reed raised his hand to his hat, and lifted it, with a profound and courteous bow. The cynical smile, which habitually plays around his lips, turned to one of extreme cordiality, as he said: "Good day, gentlemen."

A certain Berlin banker lost his hearing and an eminent physician prescribed an evening at Lohengrin as a possible cure, the ailment being of a character amenable to concussion. Doctor and banker went together, and took seats in the front row, beside the orchestra. The trombones were right beside them. There came the celebrated passage which these instruments render with a terrific blast, and at the end of it the banker turned round and whispered ecstatically, "You have saved me!" The physician paid no attention. Forgetting music and audience the banker shouted in his ear, "Doctor! Doctor! I can hear! Congratulate me." The doctor heard not. He had himself become deaf.—Youth's Companion.

An old lady of Fife, noted for possessing a sharp tongue, and a tendency toward taking down conceited people, was entertaining a number of young folk at an evening party. The guest of honor was a young man who had obtained an appointment in China, and he was so much elated over his prospects that he talked throughout the evening of himself. As he stood up to go, the old lady, who had been rather silent, said to him, "Tak gude care o' yoursel' when your awa', for mind ye they eat puppies in Cheena."

Emperor William III. was a very small boy at the wedding of the Prince and Princess of Wales, which he attended in charge of his two uncles, the Duke of Edinburgh and the Duke of Connaught, who, following the Queen's instructions, wore Highland dress. The royal youngster fidgeted vigorously during the ceremony, and consequently received occasional warning taps on the shoulder. He revenged himself by kneeling down and biting their bare legs with much earnestness.

Judge Campbell tells a story about the cross-examination of a bad-tempered female in his court. She was an Amazonian person. Her husband, obviously the weaker vessel, sat sheepishly listening. The opposing attorney pressed a certain question rather urgently, and she said, angrily, "You needn't think to catch me. You tried that once before." The lawyer said: "Madam, I have not the slightest desire to catch you, and your husband looks as if he was sorry he did."

Warden Hale of San Quentin tells this tale on himself: On the morning of an execution, he asked the prisoner what he would have for breakfast. It is the custom to give the unfortunate, on that occasion, whatever luxury he desires. "Give me some peaches," said the prisoner. It was in the dead of winter. "Peaches!" said the Warden. "Why, they are out of season, man. There are none ripe now, of course." "That makes no difference," said the prisoner, "I can wait for them."

Congressman Gillett of Massachusetts, a bachelor, called on Speaker Reed in the House to ask consideration of his bill making obligatory a year's residence in a territory before commencing a divorce proceeding. "Your personal interest in this matter, I take it, Gillett, is purely anticipatory."

Stewart Cumberland, in his book on South Africa, tells a story about President Kruger having accepted an invitation to open a new synagogue at Johannesburg. After a few preliminaries, he announced, in his loudest voice, to the amazement of all present, "In the name of the Lord Jesus Christ I declare this building opened."

FREE EDUCATION AND PROFESSIONAL TRAINING

"THE WAVE'S" LIBERAL SUBSCRIPTION OFFER.

The proprietors of THE WAVE have made arrangements with the most prominent schools and colleges throughout the State, and are now prepared to offer scholarships and courses in the leading educational institutions free of charge, for all who will obtain subscribers to this popular weekly.

UNIVERSITY COURSES.

A single year's course at the University of California, or at the Leland Stanford Junior University, for 185 annual subscribers. This offer includes room and board, and all other necessary expenses attached to the course. For 750 subscribers we offer a four years' course.

MEDICAL COURSES.

One year at the Cooper Medical College will be given for 125 subscribers. This includes books and incidental expenses attached to the course.

A single term at the Medical Department of the University of California for 100 subscribers.

For 500 annual subscribers we offer the full four years' course at the Cooper Medical College. This offer includes all incidental costs and fees, except board and lodging.

We offer the four years' course at the Medical Department of the University of California, for [illegible] subscribers.

The two year's course at the State Normal School at San Jose, for 600 subscribers. This offer includes board, lodging, and books. A single year for 160 subscribers.

The course at Hastings Law College for 250 annual subscribers. This includes books and other expenses attached to the College, for a period of three years, and the privilege of studying in a first-class law office.

A three years' course at the Mark Hopkins Institute of Art for 250 annual subscribers. A year's course for 85 subscribers.

A course in any department of Van der Nailen's School of Electricity and Engineering (except Department of Assaying) will be given for 125 annual subscribers. A course in the Department of Assaying) for 20 annual subscribers.

A six months' course in either the Business Department, or the Department of Stenography and Typewriting of Heald's Business College, for 50 annual subscribers.

A nine months' course in the Columbia School of Dramatic Art for 75 annual subscribers.

A three months' course at the Meisterschaft School of Languages for 40 annual subscribers.

The course at the California School of Elocution and Oratory for 35 annual subscribers.

Tuition in music, vocal or instrumental, from Francis Stuart, S. G. Fleishmann, J. H. Dohrmann, Sigmund Beel, Nathan Landsberger, Lesley Martin, or H. J. Stewart. A course of twenty lessons from any of these gentlemen for fifty annual subscribers. For 100 annual subscribers a course of twenty lessons each in piano, singing, harmony, or any other branch of music.

PACIFIC TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH CO.

Long Distance Telephones for $2.50 per month and 5 cents per switch

Kitchen Telephones will be furnished FREE by application to your grocer

L. H. JACOBI
Contract Agent
216 BUSH STREET

BAJA CALIFORNIA
DAMIANA BITTERS

"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular)

NABER, ALFS & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

HIRSCH-KAHN & Co.
MANUFACTURING OPTICIANS
IMPORTERS OF OPTICAL GOODS
PHOTOGRAPHIC APPARATUS & SUPPLIES etc.
333 KEARNY STREET
SAN FRANCISCO CAL.

THE WAVE

VOL. XV. NO. 14. SAN FRANCISCO, APRIL 4, 1896. PRICE, TEN CENTS.

CALIFORNIA STATE LIBRARY

THE WAVE

Is published every Saturday, at the Crocker Building, corner Market and Post Streets, San Francisco.

SUBSCRIPTION, $3 per year, $1.50 six months, $.75 three months. Foreign subscriptions (countries in postal union) $5 per year. Sample copies free on application. The trade is supplied by the San Francisco News Co., 210 Post Street; East of the Rocky Mountains by the American News Co., New York.

THE WAVE is kept on file and is for sale at Brentano's, 17 Avenue de l Opera, Paris, France; 31 Union Square, New York City; 1015 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.; and 206 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

ADVERTISING rates and all other matters pertaining to the business of the paper, address Rooms 220-221-222 Crocker Building. Eastern Agent, E. Katz, 186-187 World Building, New York.

HARRISON M. PARKER, BUSINESS MANAGER.

Entered at San Francisco Post-office as second-class matter

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY.

SAN FRANCISCO, APRIL 4, 1896.

CONTENTS.

EDITORIALS—
The Campaign of the Women 1
The Political Outlook 2
The Newspaper Controversy. 2
An Opportunity in Dried Fruits 2
Not a Closed Incident 2
The Practise of Substitution. 3

CAUSERIE—By John Bonner 4

STORY—"The Exit of Dress-suit Bob"—By Gellett Burgess 4,5

EASTER EVEN—By Juliet Wilbor Tompkins..... 6

SEGOMMER—An Interview—By E. D. H..... 6

THINGS AND PEOPLE—By The Witness..... 7

THE THEATERS—By Peg Woffington 8

THE NOVEL CONSCIENCE—By J. W. T..... 8

THE WEEK IN SOCIETY—By The Gossip.....10, 11

RIPPLES—Presumably Humorous—By Bruno..... 12

THE WHEEL—Competent Cyclists on Current Contentions.13

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Magazines..... 9
Dramatic Notes..... 9
Fashions and Frivols.....14

ARBORICIDE—Poem—By Louise Imojen Guiney..... 6

Tales of the Day.....16

Recently several cases have been brought to the attention of THE WAVE in which young men, anxious to secure an education, had undertaken to work their way through the University. The spirit that hungers for knowledge is not met with as frequently as one might wish, but the example of the youth in question has led the proprietors of THE WAVE to devise some means by which such persons, either male or female, might secure the education which they sought. On page 16 of this issue may be found an offer of scholarships at either of the two Universities, offers of the facilities of reputable business colleges, medical colleges, schools of electrical, mining, mechanical and civil engineering and architecture, schools of dramatic art, and scholarships at the Meisterschaft School of Languages and schools of elocution and oratory. In addition to these, THE WAVE has been enabled to make arrangements with Nathan Landsberger, S. M. Fleishman, H. J. Stewart, Sigmund Beel, J. H. Dohrman, and Lesley Martin, for courses in vocal and instrumental music, including piano, organ, harmony, and vocal art. This offer is something of a novelty in California, and is not lacking in generous features.

THE CAMPAIGN OF THE WOMEN.

Already the right to vote has been accorded to women in Wyoming, Colorado, and Utah, and now the strength of the movement is being concentrated upon California. The gallantry of the westerner inclines him to grant to women whatever he thinks they want. It is a part of the same spirit that prompts him to give up his seat in a street-car. But quite possibly an unfair advantage may be taken of this tendency to be courteous, and the instinct of chivalry may be misled.

California is not to be measured by any of the States that have already taken step with the Amazonian march. Wyoming is sparsely settled, and has not even a single large town. Much of the population is scattered over dreary ranges on which the presence of a woman is as rare as an angel's visit. There are "cow camps" in plenty in which woman is an unknown quantity, and among the mines there are but few of the gentler sex. Naturally, the men, deprived so largely of associations that enter into the ordinary life and form the best part of it, were ready to bestow upon the distant and idealized woman any favor that they believed to be desired by her. It was simply an exhibition of gallantry. Wyoming does not possess the elements of population or variety that would make the experiment there a fair test. Colorado took a similar step, owing to the determination to fight a life-and-death struggle on the subject of free coinage. It was felt that vital necessity existed for making a brave show in favor of silver, and that on this subject the sentiment was unanimous. The votes of the women could not change the complexion in any manner, but they could add to the volume of expression and make it a more emphatic rebuke to the "gold bugs"; so the women were given the ballot. Good women voted. There was novelty in the experience. Hackloads of the scarlet sisterhood rolled up to the polls and voted. There was a similar novelty in the experience for them and the additional benefit of getting solid with the officials, who, at times, had harassed them for infractions of the law. Some good women did not vote. No member of the scarlet sisterhood failed in performing the new duty.

The situation in Utah was unique. There was a brand of shame on the brow of the Territory, and entering the Union it wished the brand effaced. At one time, women there were in a situation worse than ordinary serfdom. That was long ago, but the memory of it lingered and rankled and would not be thrust aside. So the women were given the ballot. It was their reputed pledge of safety, and came as reparation for years of shame. In no other part of the United States could a case in any degree analogous be cited. In its history and its present composition Utah is absolutely alone, and there is none other to be judged by its standards.

These three instances, and the elaborate campaign now under way in California, show that the deliberate plan is to first make a concerted assault upon the existing order of things by capturing the West, and from the vantage ground thus gained move against the conservative East and the even more conservative South. The opponent of suffrage is placed in a position not wholly pleasant. In replying to the chosen orators of the mistaken cause, he is apt to be regarded as including in his condemnation the millions of women who are not clamoring noisily for "emancipation." The idea that he does not consider these orators as representative of anything but a spirit of discontent not shared in by women of the nobler type, such as all honor, and honor most in trying to protect from the Shaws and Stetsons and the delusions of sophistry, for some reason is apt not to be grasped. Yet this idea is the center and soul of his opposition. He reveres the good woman as she is. He does not object to her elevation; he objects to having her placed on a plane lower than that on which she stands. He must also expect to be charged with relying upon theories exploded twenty years ago. It is true that theories concerning a matter discussed actively for generations can not be wholly new. It is equally true that the theory sound a score of years ago is sound to-day. The commandment "Thou shalt not steal" loses nothing of moral worth because here and there a scoundrel has stolen his way to affluence and died in the odor of purloined sanctity. Yet as a theory it is ancient, and has been subject to occasional explodings.

It would be folly to claim that Californian women intellectually are incompetent to vote. It is wisdom to claim that by becoming voters they would lower themselves. Many women are physically competent to shovel coal, or dig a ditch. It by no means follows that for them to do either of these things would be proper or desirable. The spectacle would be repellant. Many a man might direct the servants of his household, and many a wife might direct her husband's clerks, but either one in doing so would be straying from the natural and seemly field of endeavor. Let each attend to the duties that befall. Such is the only commendable course. The teachings of centuries of civilization are not to be blown aside by the vociferous breath of a band of screamers, albeit they be individuals of brains and character. They lack sex. Having, for the most part, no husbands, they know all about the management of husbands. Being generally childless, they are conversant with every need of children. These simple facts should shake faith in the ability of them to become teachers of women who have husbands, children, who love and are loved. People still ask questions that were asked before they were born. They say "Who will attend to the baby while the mother sits on a jury?" It is a mean question. It produces confusion, yet the necessity for asking it remains, from the circumstance that it has never yet been answered. Of course it does not concern the spinster, or the ex-wife unblessed by little ones and blessed by ample alimony, or the elderly woman whose children have grown up and gone into the world; but these do not constitute the body or necessarily the flower of the sex. Then we take the liberty of asking again about that baby. Surely the occupant of the cradle has some rights. To pause for an adequate reply would mean an eternal silence.

Aside from sentiment there are physical reasons innumerable why women should not become voters and office-holders, and these reasons are not to be evaded. They exist, and there can be neither concealment nor logical denial of them. It is impossible at this time to even mention the more prominent. Rather let a glance be taken at what is proposed to be accomplished, and patent fallacies that the scheme generously overlooks. The great hope, often an actual belief, is that if women are given the ballot, purity will come upon the land. On what is this hope based? On a shadowy dream. With regret it must be admitted that all women are not good. Politics is not wholly clean. The crystal stream running into a stagnant pool becomes a part of it. The crystal of the stream is lost; the pool remains. If the good women were all to vote one way they would have an effect; they might stir the pool. But their votes would be divided just on the lines of votes of husbands and brothers, not from any coercion, but because there would be uniform environment and a sameness of influence. There would be more votes. On the other hand would be the vote of an army of female outcasts. There are women in jail in this city for neglecting their off-spring. These would be at the polls there to jostle with decency. Many respectable citizens neglect to vote. The wives of such men would also be neglectful. There is every reason to suppose that the vicious element would, after the first novelty had vanished, be far more potent than the element embracing the interests of home and order. This has not been positively demonstrated yet, but is slowly proving itself. At least, for California, the experiment would be dangerous and useless.

But, conceding that all women are good, and that all women would vote one way—which is the teaching from the campaign rostrum—it would mean the lumbering up of the statutes books with laws demanding impossible reforms. There are more laws now than can be enforced. Women could not do police duty—although some of them want the privilege—any more than they could do military duty. But in carrying a club or a musket they would not jar on the sensibilities of men any more harshly than they do in the wild demand for a chance to become voters. They simply ask to be translated to a sphere foreign to them. It is comforting to know that the tumult is created by only a few, and that womanhood is not in revolt. As well judge femininity in general by the degenerates who carry blossoms to an assassin, as by the vanguard now making its wordy campaign. The vanguard constitutes the entire force. There are no legions behind it.

As two wrongs cannot make a right, it is idle to plead that because ignorant men are permitted to vote that all restrictions should be thrown away. There would be no remedy in allowing the wife of the immigrant to have the ballot because he has it. She would merely double a power for evil, a power that ought never to have been conferred.

But the subject cannot be treated adequately in one article, and an old truth may be worth repeating as the warrioresses go forth to battle.

THE POLITICAL OUTLOOK.

Mr. Clarkson of Iowa visited California and returned to the East to announce that this part of the country was ablaze with enthusiasm for Senator Allison as the Republican candidate for President. Mr. Manley of Maine came here ostensibly for his health, but no sooner had reached his Atlantic home than he confided to the newspapers that "Tom" Reed was the popular man on the Pacific Slope. Mr. Depew of New York is now enjoying Californian climate, and incidentally remarking to all who approach his private car that Governor Morton is the one man sure to win, because he has New York behind him, and New York is still a pivotal State. Although he does not claim that Governor Morton is a hot favorite in California, he is pleased to discover, however, that underneath the apparent enthusiasm for McKinley there is a strong conservative sentiment for the New Yorker, and this, he thinks, will bring California into line when the right time comes.

It is an old saying that people can always hear what they want to hear, and politicians are especially fortunate in this regard. To them the silver lining is always to be seen behind the darkest cloud. Until defeat has actually overwhelmed them they are sure that the sign will appear in the sky that will bring victory. The uncertainties of politics give them hope. They know that in the homestretch many a leader has gone down. It is manifest that what little enthusiasm there is for any candidate it is for Major McKinley, the Napoleonic leader of the high-tariff army; but early booms, like early flowers, are apt to suffer from spring frosts. And in this there is consolation to the leaders of all other booms.

It is by no means a foregone conclusion that McKinley will be nominated at St. Louis. Blaine had a greater following in 1876, but the stranger from Ohio got the nomination. Grant, with his 308, had to yield at last to the Blaine combination for Garfield. Harrison was far in the rear when Platt, Depew, and Quay united their forces and destroyed Sherman. Cleveland alone among all the recent candidates for the Presidency has had a support that has been sufficient to set at naught the machinations of the politicians. While Major McKinley is having things very much his own way just now, he is in reality very little nearer the nomination than he would be if he had shown but half as much strength. Then he could have combined against the favorite, whereas now all the others are combined against him. His manifest strength is one of his greatest weaknesses. This the people do not appreciate as the politicians do, hence the difference in prophecies as to the outcome.

Two of the candidates are rich men and two are poor. Senator Allison is the leading private banker of Iowa, and has by means largely of his money been able to keep himself in the Senate for nearly thirty years. Governor Morton made his money as a member of the banking house of Bliss, Morton & Co. He could contribute more to the campaign fund than any other candidate, and no doubt his assessment would be beyond anything ever before known in our history. His fight for the governorship is generally believed in New York to have cost him over half a million dollars, and his contribution to the Harrison-Morton campaign fund is said to have been an equal amount. Such a candidate would please the politicians, but Platt and Depew and Warner Miller, who are his chief boomers, have no idea that Morton will be nominated. The same game that was played with the name of Depew in the Convention of '88 will be played this time with Morton's name; it will hold the delegation together until the leaders have made terms with the man they want to win. The same game is being played by Quay in Pennsylvania. He carries the delegation in his pocket as he might so much coin. Platt and Quay made Harrison the nominee, but Harrison failed to keep the promises his lieutenants had made, on the ground that they had no authority to make them. They now propose to unite at the right time to name a man who will have no chance to escape—the nominee must be their man. Perhaps this man is Speaker Reed. It was reported at the organization of the present Congress that the House patronage had been turned over to the New York and Pennsylvania bosses as earnest of the great harvest that was to be theirs when Reed became President. Knowing that Reed could not carry the two largest delegations against McKinley and Allison, it was a bit of shrewd politics for Platt to make Morton a candidate and for Quay to name himself. With New England solid, a portion of the Southern delegates, and a few scattering votes through the West, Reed will be a figure of consequence, and when New York and Pennsylvania are needed, he can have them. This seems to be the program of the bosses.

McKinley stands alone as the stalwart figure of the contest. He represents the great principle over which the battle will be fought, and represents very little else. His strength is with the people, although he has wealthy friends who have raised a modest fund for campaign expenses. McKinley is a clean man, an intense Republican, an ex-soldier and uncommitted on the troublesome money question. The Democratic press is quite generally of the opinion that he would he the weakest candidate the Republicans could name, but the Democratic politicians would hardly be so frank if it were true. They would keep it to themselves in the hope that he would be nominated.

From all present indications the Democratic party will have little to say as to this year's result. Unless the Republicans make some tremendous mistake at their convention or good times return like a hurricane, there need be little discussion of Democratic candidates.

THE NEWSPAPER CONTROVERSY.

"The Wave" has steadfastly kept aloof from participating in the recent attacks made upon the Examiner. In adopting this course we have not been prompted by any affection for that journal, for in the past in our discussion of its editorial and general policy, we have not minced matters, nor softened our criticism of what not only appeared to be an unwise and unfair course, but have strongly protested against its policy as distinctly detrimental to the interests of the State. The controversy now up, and which is receiving so much attention, partakes more of a personal quarrel in which, under existing circumstances, we have no part. It is a controversy wherein much may be said on either side, but, as we would not treat the matter from any point of view but our own, and as that point of view would not be flattering to either party, "The Wave" has refrained from any mention of the subject. In passing, it may be said, however, that we do not believe Mr. Hearst would be guilty of selling the opinions of his journal. Confessedly, however, from our point of view, he might do so and better serve the interests of the State.

There are likely to be many unfortunate results coming out of a controversy such as that in which the Examiner, the Chronicle, and the railway are embroiled. It serves the enemies of the railway admirably in many respects. It serves to fortify the noisy fellow who is continually charging that the papers defending or adopting a fair and equitable policy toward the corporation are paid to do so. It serves the fellow who advises a timid man not to be fair to the corporation for fear his motives will be suspected. One of the difficulties standing in the pathway of decent journalism in this State, and one of the most insurmountable difficulties at that, is the prevalence of the belief that editors are paid for espousing the railway side. Suspicion is general, and the charge universal, that a paper having anything to say in defense of the California railway institution is paid for making that defense. No matter how outrageous the imposition threatened, no matter how great the wrong, how unwise the course, how infamous the suggestion, if it be against the California railway, and the editor raises his voice to oppose its consummation, he is met at the threshold with the charge that he wears the iron collar, and is upon the pay roll of the institution. Wherever one comes to the defense of the railway his motives are impugned, his honesty questioned, and the charge of "hireling" hurled at him. This is not a healthy state of public mind, and the condition of it is not improved by exploiting such performances as that under consideration, even if the railway should prove to the minutest detail every count in its bill of indictment. Suspicion of men who desire to act fairly in railway matters is not confined to cheap and small men, but it is an impression that is very general, and does much to restrain honest men, not only of the press, but in legislatures, and elsewhere, from expressing honest convictions often favorable to such institutions.

However great the provocation, it would be difficult for the Examiner to justify its course in proceeding deliberately to injure, if not destroy, the reputations of the employees of the railway institution simply because they are in that employ. It is not a crime to earn a monthly salary from the railway corporation, and the average California railway employee is far above the ordinary, and, for the most part, they are men of integrity and honor. It is no part of decent warfare to personally malign and abuse innocent and inoffending men for some real or fancied grievance against their employer. This is a new tack in California journalism and one that should not be tolerated for a moment. If the Examiner can trace its trouble to any individual in the railway's employ, it might be excused for entertaining and expressing its views concerning that individual. The heat of anger might lend excuse to such a course, but it is apparent at a glance that the broad field of abuse, in which it is undertaking to engage, is directed by no such discriminating sense, and includes employees who, from the very nature of things, could have nothing whatever to do with its troubles. We do not mention names in this connection, for the manifest exceptions are self-suggestive. The whole controversy is a miserable mess and one that had much better be dropped and allowed to sink out of sight. It is unprofitable, disquieting, and objectionable, and should never have been exploited in the first place.

AN OPPORTUNITY IN DRIED FRUITS.

The last number of the United States Consular Reports contains a communication from Consul General Mason of Frankfort, in which he submits a number of facts for the consideration of fruit growers in California. He states that sun-dried California apricots, peaches, and pears sell at retail in the vicinity of Frankfort at from twenty-two to twenty five cents per pound, and even at this price their consumption is steadily increasing. He says:

"Assuming, for greater certainty, that the fruit-grower on the Pacific Coast sells his sun-dried apricots and peaches for eight cents per pound, there is still a margin of sixteen cents, or two hundred per cent between that figure and the retail price in Germany, which is absorbed by freight, import duty, and the profits of the successive dealers and commission merchants through whose hands such fruits now pass in the transit from the producer to the German consumer. How much of this margin is necessary expense, and how much is profit for some one? The inquiry should interest all California fruit-growers who are ambitious for the largest success of their business."

It strikes the Consul-General as curious, as it must the whole world, that most of the California dried fruit exported to Germany does not come direct from this State, but has been carried by rail to Chicago in bags, there repacked in boxes, sent by rail to New York or Baltimore, and there shipped to Europe, and he very pertinently asks the question, "Who or what is responsible for this very complicated and costly method of transit?" He concludes that the responsibility lies with the fruit-growers themselves, who decline to take the trouble to select and pack their dried fruit in boxes for export, but dump it into bags and sell it to the first comer. To-day, Chicago is the principal export market for dried fruits destined for Germany, and by reason of the costly and repeated handling before it reaches its destination, the price has been so increased that it is out of the reach of all but the well-to-do classes, and even they, Mr. Mason states, complain of its high price while conceding its excellence. There is force in everything that the Consul-General has to say about our method of handling our dried fruits, and his suggestions are valuable and entitled to the highest consideration. It seems to present an opportunity for a man with capital to embark in a new enterprise, one which would not only benefit the farmer of the State, but more than likely enrich himself. His proposition is practically this: That the fruit-growers and packers of California organize an export association, and adopt a uniform system of packing dried apricots, peaches, pears, and prunes in neat wooden boxes, with the top and bottom layers of fruit laid regularly, so as to make a showy appearance when opened and displayed in the grocer's window. He then suggests that the association ship its fruit by way of Panama or by rail to New Orleans, and thence by ship to wholesale agencies in Hamburg or Bremen. He recommends that traveling salesmen be employed to exhibit and sell the fruit throughout Germany, and states it to be his conclusion that after a year or two of such effort, a large and permanent market would be established which would practically take care of itself. The same association, he suggests, could likewise handle canned and otherwise preserved fruits. The superiority of both canned and dried fruits from the Pacific States is generally recognized in Germany. Native fresh fruits are always expensive there, and, in comparison with those of similar species from this Coast, are flavorless and poor. It would not require much money, nor much risk for that matter, to embark in an undertaking of this character, and the volume of business promises to be enormous. The suggestion, coming as it does from an intelligent American who is upon the ground, and who is familiar with the trade and its requirements and possibilities, should carry a great deal of weight. There are millions of idle capital locked up in our local banks, looking for investments, which might well be turned to this line of effort.

NOT A CLOSED INCIDENT.

Readers of "The Wave" will remember that mention was made last week of the murder of a man named Mars; that he was killed by some striking lathers, because, not having any occasion to be dissatisfied, he refused to join their ranks. As his own dying words expressed it, with pathos, dignity, and force, that was what he "got for trying to earn bread."

There is a tendency now to regard the incident as closed, but against this course every citizen not addicted to the strike habit will protest. Earning one's bread by honest toil cannot be regarded as a capital offense. The story must not be considered complete in its one chapter of violence, of cruelty, and of wrong. There is demand for a sequel. The slaying of a reputable citizen without shadow of palliation, because in opinion he dared to differ from another citizen evidently not reputable, is an outrage not only against the bereaved family, but against that liberty, on which rests the dearest rights of men.

The man who actually killed Mars has appeared already before the bar of the Police Court. There judicial wisdom, inscrutable less from its immensity than from its absence, chose to hold him for manslaughter in the trifling bail of five thousand dollars. Thus at the very outset of the struggle to punish a criminal was justice mocked by one of its own servants. The man who killed Mars was guilty of murder. The assault he made was wholly unprovoked, and no excuse yet appearing can serve, as in any manner, a mitigation. The assailant was, by his very presence, a trespasser. He came with threats on his lips. He carried the threats into execution. Yet a court has already said "manslaughter." If carried to a conclusion on the same lines, the prosecution will be tardy and lame, witnesses will be scattered, the blood that cried from the wounds of Mars be forgotten, and the charge fall at last, the transgressor go free, and the strike that regards assassination as a legitimate instrument, be vindicated. The course of the daily press thus far has not swerved from its standard of cowardice. There was no denunciation of the original crime. There was no word of condemnation for the judge who construed the wanton beating to death of an innocent man into manslaughter. The accounts of the murder were brief. The account of the preliminary examination was a mere memorandum. So far as the daily press is concerned the affair is at an end. The unions also have neglected an opportunity that would have given them standing that they have lacked for long. They do not advocate the bludgeon. Indeed, they are quite frank in declaring that their ways are ways of pleasantness, and their paths are paths of peace. This is a theory. They are ready to defend it to the last wag of the tongue. It is not uncommon for them to formally resolve that violence is wrong, and to spread the resolution on the records. At this point duty is regarded as having been honorably performed.

If the unions are in earnest, if there is in their composition less of the lion than the lamb; if they do not believe in the slaughter of workmen whom they have dubbed "scabs," now is a chance for them to prove it. Now is the opening through which they can enter into the respect of thinking people. Let them not pass the Mars murder with a mildly deprecatory remark that it does not meet the approval of organized labor. This murder, unavenged, must ever rest upon them as a shadow and a reproach. Let them, in their own interests, uphold the law that a striker defied. If they are in no measure accessory to bloody deeds, let them set upon such deeds the deep and indelible mark of detestation. Instead of shielding this offender, as has been their wont in other cases yet remembered, let them give the evidence that they know, try to assist instead of impede the law, and thus weed the vicious from their own councils, and from society. Having indicated practically that they do not connive at murder, they will be in a position to command attention and sympathy when need shall be. Approving of, even passively, the method employed to remove Mars, they shut themselves from popular support and become a class apart.

The country press has noted the murder of Mars, and has not spared the murderer, or the spirit that actuated the fatal blow. For this it is to be praised, and there will be bountiful occasion yet for it to comment upon the subject, keeping it fresh in the public mind. The Mars incident is not closed. There are those who intend to see that some sort of protection shall be afforded the man who earns bread, nor asks his idle neighbor's permission. That peculiar belief that a striker has unlimited rights, and that when intimidation is unsufficient, can, with impunity, resort to kicks, blows, murder, has been too much encouraged. The grave of Mars marks a turning point in the path of public sentiment.

THE "CENTURY" ON CALIFORNIA RAILWAYS.

The Century Magazine, which certainly is one of the leading periodicals published in America, has some things to say concerning our California railways which deserve more than passing notice, for its strictures are based upon a statement of fact that is manifestly an error. In its editorial department, an article, entitled "Plain Words to Californians," contains the following astonishing statement:

> But for the short-sighted and unpatriotic policy which has controlled its railway system, California would to-day be as well known in New York as any State of the middle West; and it is in keeping with the commercial enterprise of its people that in spite of such discouragements they boldly undertake to send across a continent a comprehensive exhibit of its imperial resources.

The impression left by the Century article is that the California railway corporations have been niggardly in their efforts to educate the people of the East as to the resources of this State. This is a most grievous error, and it is an injustice to an institution which, though it is accustomed to abuse and maltreatment from its local enemies, is entitled to fair treatment at the hands of so impartial and prominent a publication as the Century, It is common knowledge out West that this railway corporation has expended hundreds of thousands of dollars in the very line of endeavor regarding which the Century charges them with neglect. At its own expense, it has twice fitted out a car, popularly called "California on Wheels," in which was contained a complete exhibit of the chief products of the State together with a most comprehensive series of photographs, pamphlets, and other matter calculated to awaken an interest and give information regarding our resources. This car was placed in charge of Messrs. E McD. Johnstone and Howard Tibbets. Mr. Johnstone was a boon companion of Mr. Muir to whom the Century gracefully refers in the same article. They left San Francisco December 18, 1888, and traveled continuously in the East until September 7, 1889. The same car, with a replenished exhibit, again left San Francisco December 3, 1889, and traveled continuously throughout the East and Canada until February 28, 1891. An advance agent preceded and advertised the car. Lectures were given by Mr. Johnstone, illustrated by stereopticon views by Mr. Tibbets, who is an expert in that line. At every hamlet and village on the journey where hall room was available, lectures were given. The car was thrown open to the public, pamphlets were distributed, information furnished, and everything possible was done to inform the Eastern farmer and agriculturist concerning our State.

Again, at the New Orleans Cotton Exposition, the California exhibit consisted almost wholly and entirely of goods gathered together by the Southern Pacific Company at its own expense. This exhibit was most complete and comprehensive, and the entire expenditures in connection therewith were borne by this railway institution. The jars of fruit and other fixtures and appurtenances to the Car exhibit and the New Orleans exhibit were presented to the California State Board of Trade, of which we believe the land agent of the Company is now the presiding officer. That California had any of its products on exhibition at the Atlanta Exposition last fall was due to this railway organization which carried the complete exhibit free of all charge. So far as pamphlets and descriptive matter go, the railway has distributed such by the millions. Indeed, so far has the company gone to induce immigration to California, so far has it gone to lay before the people of other States and other nations the inducements here offered to the farmer of small means, that a howl once went up protesting against their bringing more people into the State. Strange as it may appear upon its face, this is the truth. From what source could the Century have procured the facts upon which to base its statement that "but for the short sighted and unpatriotic policy which has controlled its railway system" California would be better known in the East?

LOVE AT FIRST SIGHT IMPOSSIBLE.

The iconoclasts of science are out after the sentiments. Not content with destroying the superstitions of humanity, belittling our faith, and dissecting our morals, they have love in their laboratories, resolving it into subdivisions, dissolving its components in corrosive acids, taking observations of its origin and influence, comparing evidence as to its cause and effects—collecting statistics, as though the fever of the divine passion were but a vulgar disorder traceable to a microbe, the consequence of a poison. The first expression of these investigations is the announcement of Dr. Allen Fitch, of Bellevue Hospital, that "love at first sight is impossible." In his professional capacity, Dr. Fitch is County Examiner in lunacy, and he was called to testify recently if the love of Daniel Levy for Mrs. Harriet Lipman was emotion or madness. It may be explained that the former had pursued the latter with unwelcome attentions and had evinced a quality of devotion that incarceration, abuse, violence, or threats failed to diminish. Finally, the lady charged her admirer with lunacy and the result was his commitment—a somewhat melancholy termination for an unreciprocated attachment. Distinguishing between love and lunacy, Doctor Fitch permitted himself the generalization to which we have alluded. Deliberately he stated that the condition is impossible—instantaneous admiration he admits, but only of the character which is inspired by a picture, or a fine house. Love is a secondary phase, the offspring of approbation, but vitally distinguished from mere approval. If these axiomatic differentiations were not sufficiently debatable this daring expert in lunacy declared that no man could fall in love with a picture. He may admire the beauteous lineaments or the character which they express, but it is admiration not love which moves him.

There then is the contention of science, or rather of a lunacy expert. Before proceeding, it is well to remember that the most intimate knowledge of insanity does not necessarily comprehend an acquaintance with the mysteries of passion. Love is not lunacy, though it is said to be near allied to madness. At the worst, the enthralling sentiment is labeled "infatuation," and is not supposed to cloud the understanding nor derange the mental faculties. It is possible, then, Doctor Fitch's conclusions are unwarranted by authority; that his generalization is insufficiently founded by data. Who would apply to an expert on insanity to authenticate his passion? The subject of love contributes to a great extent to our libraries. The passion of man for woman has been explained and described, diagnosed and dissected in its thousand phases. It is the subject of half the literature of the world. Is it conceivable that the declaration of Doctor Fitch will weigh against Marlowe's fine interrogation, "Who ever loved that loved not at first sight"? To deny the theory of an enkindling flash is to rob love of its most ennobling feature; to despoil romance of its most cherished inspiration. Doctor Paolo Montegazza, whose Physiology of Love is a standard work on the subject, states that there may be a love at first sight, but he calls it "the most fortunate combination in the hazardous game of life. All at once to meet, to admire, to desire to embrace, with a look like the lightning flash—to feel oneself inundated by another's gaze equally passionate and penetrating—all this is a joy too rare, too perfect, that few have known and few will ever experience." The most instantaneous loves, he says, are not the most lasting, but he continues: "A healthy love well constituted and destined for a prolific existence should begin with a violent shock, which measures the depths from which the warm sympathy springs."

So there is your flash. Indeed, Montegazza adds "Where a coruscation of the heavens and a trembling of the earth does not accompany the new love; where Nature does not hurl forth a cry of voluptuousness, or of pain—no one can deceive me—a friendship, a benevolence, any kind of a sentiment has sprung into being, but to the new-born I shall certainly not give the holy baptism of love."

Thackeray in Vanity Fair laughs at what he calls the romance of love—"This fine picture of Jenny and Jessamy falling in love at first sight, billing and cooing in an arbor, and retiring to a cottage afterwards to go on cooing and billing. Pish, what folly is all this rubbish. I don't say that a young man and woman are not to meet and to fall in love that instant, and to marry that day year, and love each other until they are a hundred—that is the supreme lot—but that is the lot which the gods only grant to Baucis and Philemon, and a very, very few besides." But he admits what Doctor Fitch so strenuously denies—the possibility of the condition. However, the subject is as infinite as the possibility of quotation, for it must be remembered that though the main facts of love are identical, the details of individual cases are rarely similar.

CAMERA CLUB.

The Camera Club has every right to be proud of its exhibition. Doubtless it is, and doubtless it would be just as proud without any right at all, for we human beings have a way of admiring our own productions, even if we have nothing better to show than a malapert child or a new game of solitaire. Still, it is pleasant to know that they have a substantial basis for their opinion of themselves, whatever it may be. If it is high—there's Hosmer; if modest—well, we'll not specify, but they can find grounds for that, too, if they try hard enough.

In looking at the collection, the first fact to thrust itself upon one's notice is the infinite superiority, from an artistic standpoint, of those pictures which show cloudy skies, or have a background of foliage. The bright, sunny sky, when photographed, makes the objects in the foreground look like silhouettes on white cardboard, and the blankness of the background grates on the nerves and robs the picture of all depth and softness.

Though the exhibit of H. B. Hosmer is without doubt the best, there are a great many other excellent photographs, two or three of W. J. Street's being particularly beautiful.

Among the other exhibits, perhaps one of the cleverest things, from a technical standpoint, is the picture of a brook, which leaps from the underbrush, "tumbles down stones, rushes on to the plains," and may become "clearer than amber," but this we are not permitted to see, as it is but a small photograph. A diminutive edition of it is, I think, to be seen on the little cards which the Club issued. Another good picture is a waterscape in an exhibit by the door, of what I believe to be (because mysterious noises and individuals issued therefrom) the developing room. Pardon me, sir or madam, for so designating you, but, you see, I have forgotten your name and could not describe the picture to save myself from boiling oil; but I remember that it pleased me vastly, even as much as those of H. B Hosmer, who has a knack of catching Nature in her most meaningful moods. Many of his photographs, notably two pieces of marsh (or something that looks like marsh) and several little bits of water fringed with darkness and mystery, are full of suggestion. They seem to be striving to express something; the waters and the trees whisper to us—"strange things," they murmur, "strange things have happened here; stay but a little and we will tell you all."

H. B.

CAUSERIE.

BY JOHN BONNER.

Wary politicians will watch Governor Morton of New York. He towers head and shoulders over his rivals as a statesman; he is not surpassed by any one of them in the arts of the politician. He is a lucky man. Ever since he came to New York to seek his fortune he has succeeded in everything he has tried. When he was Minister to France, it was said that he was a power in French politics. He has never been an orator, a framer of policies, or a boss of parties. But wherever he has been, he has exerted a silent influence which has laid upon men a stress which they could not resist. He possesses, in a large degree, the magnetic power which was the source of Blaine's strength. To him Kinglake's remark on Sir Stratford Canning might be applied: "It was almost impossible to come into contact with him and then to oppose his views."

* * *

Are not Governor McKinley's friends rather overdoing it? They claim to have bowled out Tom Reed, Allison, Morton, and all the other favorite sons; is not this placing their man in the open, where every rival can pour a volley into him as he rides past? McKinley is undoubtedly the logical candidate of the Protectionists, but a good many disciples of that faith would have liked to let the tariff drop this year, partly because their belief in protection has been shaken since McKinley drew his bill, and partly because there is a dark suspicion that it has ceased to be a drawing card among the farmers, who are feeling that a protective duty on wheat does not help them in the least, while an increased duty on woolens and hardware would come out of their pockets.

* * *

Chandler of New Hampshire is boiling over again. He has discovered that the McKinley men have taken time by the forelock, and have fried all the fat out of the manufacturers for the coming campaign, so that when the Reed men and the Morton men and the Allison men go round hat in hand to the beneficiaries of a protective tariff, they find there is no more fat left to be put in their frying pan. This is very unkind and very unjust; it is no wonder that Chandler froths at the mouth. Your Ohio politician has the cunning of the serpent. If the election is to be bought, it is but fair that the buyer should be he who laid down his life on the altar of protection. As for fellows like Morton and Reed who did not bear the heat and burden of the battle, the proper answer to them, when they bring their fat-kettles round, is Tarde venientibus ossa.

* * *

To-morrow morning, at the sound of the Easter bells, fair angels with azure wings will descend from heaven, bearing baskets of eggs which they will deposit in the houses of the faithful. Some of them will be gilded, some red, some violet, some blue, some green; but whatever their hue, the young man who presents one of them to a girl—however high her station—to-morrow morning before he has broken his fast, may kiss her on the cheek. 'Tis a good augury for every virtuous maiden to dye a number of eggs scarlet and to present the finest of them to her priest or clergyman; thus she will show her great love for the church, and provide her beloved pastor with the egg which he must deposit at the gate of paradise when he knocks for admission. If to-morrow morning before breakfast a lad meet a lass tripping daintily in the Easter sunshine, he may take her by the hand, exchange eggs with her, and crying "Christ is risen," may kiss her on the lips, and may continue the kissing for four days. At least, he could do so if he were in Russia; and may not a freeborn American do anything which a Russian can?

* * *

The good Christians who worship at Grace Church will to-morrow celebrate Easter by the benediction of a processional cross and a memorial cross presented by two ladies of the congregation. Thousands of years ago, similar objects were erected in temples in honor of Astarte, the goddess of love; a few hundred years ago, according to Godfrey Higgins, "our Protestant females would have been shocked at the idea of setting up a cross, as smacking of Popery." In our day, few remember the story of the true cross. Happily, the manuscript of Tentzelius is still extant; it tells how Adam was dying, and begged one of his sons to fetch him out of the Garden of Paradise a branch of the tree of life, so he could gaze on it before he died. The branch was brought, was planted over Adam's grave, and grew into a mighty tree; in the course of ages, it was cut down, and Christ's cross was made out of its wood.

* * *

Tiffany & Co., the New York jewelers, have issued a monograph on diamonds, which contains curious facts. Thirty years ago, the importation of diamonds into this country was $1,318,617; in the ensuing ten years it doubled; ten years afterward, it amounted to $10,831,880; in 1892, it was $14,521,851. Then commercial depression cut down the consumption of luxuries, and in 1894 the import of diamonds fell to $6,768,393. In 1895, it is estimated that it was not over $5,000,000. It appears that the consumption of diamonds is an accurate measure of general prosperity.

* * *

Once more the story goes round that the opal is superseding the diamond. It has been discovered that instead of being unlucky, shining with radiance insincere, the opal is really a symbol of hope, innocence, and purity. The trade in the gem has increased two hundred to four hundred per cent in the last four or five years. Stones which were hard to sell for ten dollars ten years ago are worth several hundred dollars now. People are getting over the superstition for which Anne of Gierstein is largely responsible; it is based on nothing more than the fact that the opal will change in luster in consequence of emanations from the body in certain forms of disease. The changes may be traced to the variation in the moisture in the tiny crystals of the stone.

* * *

Judge Coffey's going on the stand in a will case, and then, on resuming his seat on the bench, ruling out his own testimony, recalls to mind a story of the late General Bragg, who commanded the Confederates at the Battle of Murfreesboro. He was at one time quartermaster as well as captain of a battery, and commanding officer at a post in some Western territory. As captain of artillery, he requisitioned for certain needed supplies. The requisition went to himself as quartermaster. He refused to comply, and indorsed his reasons upon the requisition with a few sarcastic remarks. The refusal was referred by himself as Artillery Captain to himself as commanding officer, and he reindorsed the paper with a genial assent to the requisition. On reflection, however, he rereferred the case to Department Headquarters, with a recommendation that the application be not granted.

* * *

He whose wrath boils over at the shortcomings of American journalism may derive comfort from recent exposures of the European variety of the article. A bevy of Parisian journalists lately hounded to his death a poor devil who had more money than morals, and whom they blackmailed past endurance. And now Dr. Lawson Tate of Birmingham, England, has discovered that the London papers, including the Times, have been in the habit of inserting in their Society columns accounts of the movements of prominent individuals "at the rate of one guinea for three lines, and half a guinea for every additional line." That is a branch of industry which, so far as is known, has not been established in this country. There are places where it would flourish.

* * *

Dr. Playfair, the most fashionable physician in London, disclosed to his wife and others discoveries which he had made in his professional attendance upon a lady in the best society, the result being that the lady in question was cut by every one, and expelled from the realms of the blessed. For so doing the lady sued the doctor for libel, and the jury gave her $60,000 damages. All England declares the doctor to have been rightly served. There, as here, the secrets of the consulting room are and ought to be sacred; a doctor who sees and tells ought to lose his practise, and be treated with a cane.

* * *

A. Signor Grinaldi is trying to do for cats what M. Garnier claims to have done for monkeys. He says he has discovered the cat language. Of course, the basis of the language is "Meouw"; but, like Chinese words, meouw varies in signification with the inflections in which it is pronounced. Meouw, in an ordinary tone of voice, means no more than "how do you do?" uttered in a high tone with the accent on the "me," it signifies anger or hatred; when it is prolonged, as in "meouw, vow, wow, yelow, yow, tiouw, wow, ys-s-s-syow," it means war, battle, and sudden death.

* * *

Scandals in what the French call "hig lif" are furnishing Society with abundant material for gossip. A vigorous attempt was made nearly a year ago to reconcile Mr. Blaine's daughter and her husband; the latter went away, but a baby came, and now it is hoped that the infant will accomplish that which its mother could not effect. On the stage, children often bring mother and father together after an estrangement; but the juvenile mediator is not usually in long clothes.

Would you be an actress or a vocalist? See how you may have the best tuition free of charge. Page 16.

THE EXIT OF "DRESS-SUIT BOB."

BY GELETT BURGESS.

It was, though I did not know it, my last night in San Francisco, and a nasty night it was, too. There was a soaking thick fog that blanketed everything but the gas lamps and the few windows that were lighted, for I was away from the cable-cars, out on one of the hilly streets in the Addition.

I was cocked and primed for a sure-enough thing, I thought to myself, for I was still absolutely unknown to the police, and had had a straight run of luck that had turned my head pretty badly, having worked the town all alone in my own way, asking no favors from the fraternity, and doing fairly well without the regular fences. I had a good eye for metal, and ran my little private mint, mine-marking the slugs so they traded like coin, and I was well content to let the professionals pick up all the swag I left behind. They call me "Dress-Suit Bob" now, and my style began to be copied after this game came out, but up to this time I was, as you might say, a dilettante, and I thought myself very clever.

So I braced up the street as if I owned the whole block, with an Inverness on over my evening dress and a crush hat that had been my magic invisible cap on many an expedition. Now, I am not going to begin moralizing at this late day, and I'm not proselyting for my private code of honor, but to appreciate my play, you must understand that I was born and bred a gentleman, and could sign this story with an S. B. after my name, if I had that much conceit. I have, besides, cultivated and expensive tastes, and if I take my own peculiar methods of gratifying them, it is nobody's business but my own and the Department's.

Well, it was easy enough to get through the garden, around to the back of the house; the fog lay like smoke in the bushes, and left me no particular credit, after I had located the watchman. I worked my way along to the rear door, where I had decided to do the act, trying a window or two meanwhile, just for the fun of it, to see how the place was fixed, when I struck one that was loose in the dining-room. This saved me a deal of trouble; but first I stood a while in the shadow of a tree, balancing up the chances pro and con, like Robinsou Crusoe, as I have a way of doing, being of a scientific and philosophical turn of mind, and priding myself on my systematic theories. I suppose, too, not being exactly of the criminal type, I always stand in need of fortifying myself with a little reasoning, where the crooks would take something stronger.

So I slid up the sash and got in. It was black as paint inside, and I sat down in a chair till I got used to the dark and my eyes stopped seeing sparks and complimentary colors, which are interesting enough when you have nothing else to do, but are rather in the way in my business. After a while I got the lay of the land better, and I felt my way around the table by the chair-tops, making for where the door ought to be, having decided to do the upstairs' rooms first, where I generally had the trick of finding what I was after. I had the plan of the house pretty well in my head, not having studied the outside for nothing, and these double bay-window houses being as alike as peanuts.

It was a good big house, what they call "an artistic residence" in the weeklies, fitted up in the old style, with window hangings and the like, and owned by a lady named Weathersmith. She was away, as I found out, and her son, an all-around society chap, was batching it with only one man-servant. It was about half-past eleven, a pretty safe hour, I thought, for the habits of the young swell, and I expected no trouble with his man.

I got to the dining-room door all right, and was making sure of my bearings, when I thought I heard a little noise above, in the hallway, and I'll be damned if there wasn't a man coming down the stairs! He had a bull's-eye lantern with him that shot a little wisp of yellow light ahead of him on the balusters, and he was picking his way down the treads like a monkey on a tightrope.

It was a pretty good joke on me, after all my trouble, but I was in no mood to play second fiddle to any professional, and I decided to have a go at him for my share, anyway, if I had to jump him for it. So I slipped back behind the doorframe, and lay for him with a little shotbag I had tied around my neck for an emergency.

The fellow made straight down the hall toward the dining-room, as I knew he would, remembering the open window I had come in by, but as bad luck would have it, he was a little too free with his lantern, and I got a streak of light dead in my face before I could dodge. He jumped as if I was a ghost, and danced back into the hall in a hurry, and tried to pull out a gun. I didn't give him long to think it over, but I landed on him a-flying, and grabbed his arms.

"Keep your mouth shut!" I hissed at him, "and let me in on this if you want to get out of the house alive. So hand over what you have with you."

The man was paralyzed at that, for my get-up had given him a different idea of my character, but he growled under his breath. "Oh, dat's your game, is it? We're pals, are we?" and "Take dat," he said, breaking away and letting out at me in the face; "dat's your share!" But he missed me, and I countered on him and bowled him clean over onto the floor. He dropped his light and I fell on top of him, and we began the liveliest kind of a scrimmage in the dark. He managed to get a hand free and clawed at my face like a wildcat, foaming mad, and spitting a filthy string of oaths between his teeth. I kept my wits cool, but I felt nasty, too, by this time, for he had queered me, nobody ever having caught me at my work before. We settled down to it in earnest, panting like dogs and slipping all over the oak floor, smashing our heads on the corners of chairs, and dragging the rugs around like fiends.

What a nightmare that fight was! The hall was pitch dark, of course; we didn't care to let go our grip, and stabbed away at each other, using hands and feet, yet keeping as silent as we could, by common consent. Try my best, though, I couldn't get at my club to hit him with, and we were hugging each other like bears, when all of a sudden there was a noise outside, and, before we could get free of each other, there was a key in the latch and the door opened. We slackened our grip and lay as still as mice, hoping somehow we wouldn't be noticed, and then the gas was turned on with a rattle of electricity and the place blazed up like a calcium light, and we were in for it!

There stood young Weathersmith in an overcoat and tile as like me, when I got into the house, as all the world. God! he turned white, though, when he saw us on the floor, and he grabbed his stick and took hold of the door knob to get out.

But we were up in a hurry before he could turn the handle, and ran at him in a bunch. I got a bad jab in my side with the cane, and the other chap caught the young fellow's fist in his eyes at the first whack; but we were too much for him, and as soon as I had a little room I bumped him in the back of the head with my shotbag, and he dropped like a log on the door mat, before he had time to cry out, and lay there as if he had just fallen asleep.

This was the first chance I had to look at my new pal, and I saw he was a stocky Swede, dressed in a shiny blue coat and overalls like a plumber's man. I could see he hadn't been long at this business, though, and I thought I could manage him.

He straightened himself up, and he said, "Now, we'll talk business. Dis ting's went fur enough; we'll yust step out doors and settle it outside, for it's time to be a goin'."

I had hardly opened my mouth to answer him, when I caught sight of Weathersmith's man-servant upon the landing at the top of the stairs, in his night shirt, hanging to the rail, as white as a sheet. I didn't see his gun till he threw up his arm and plugged away down the stairs, shutting his eyes like a girl as he fired. The bullet went zip! into the plaster wall above our heads, and the man was a deal more frightened than we were, with his eyes goggling, and his body shaking with the fear and cold.

Then my new pal whipped out his revolver and leaned over the sights as cool as ice, and took a slow pot-shot at the bare legs up on the next floor, and, sure enough, they caved in, and the fellow dropped in a lump, shutting up like a pocket-knife where he stood. I couldn't tell whether he was winged or not, but I was sure enough he was quieted for good, for he had the worst scare on him I ever saw.

"Now you've done it," said I; "there's one for you and one for me, and the place is getting too hot for us!"

We both made a break for the front door, and I got it open, and was just sliding out, when the police whistles began to go off outside like Fourth o' July, and I could hear the officers running up the block for all they were worth. I slammed the door, slipped the chain and put out the hall light before you could say Jack Robinson.

"Get hold of him!" I sang out to my pal, who was half-way to the window by this time. "It's too late to get out now; the police are outside there—we'll have to hide this man first off. Run him into the bathroom back there," I said, "and perhaps I can stand 'em off!"

Well, the Swede came back like a trained dog, fairly whining with dread of the police, but he took Weathersmith's shoulders and I grabbed his knees, and we ran him down that hall in the pitch dark, like an overland express train on the down grade fetching up at the end of the passage with a bang. There was a bathroom under the stairs, and I kicked open the door, chucked him in, and jammed the Swede after him.

"Lock the door," I said, "and don't open it till I tell you!"

I hatched the whole game when I heard the whistles, and I played it like a star. It was the only thing to do, and I did it up brown, taking the chances as I found them. First, I got back into the dining-room and put my foot through the window-sash, breaking a hole big enough for a man to jump through, and then I slipped up a flight of back stairs I happened to find and got into the front part of the house. I wondered where the servant was as I ran through the hall, but I had no time to investigate matters and I braced into a front chamber threw up the window and yelled "Police!" There were a couple of officers in front of the house, just coming up the steps.

"What's up," they shouted.

"Thieves!" I said, "Go around to the back, they've just got out there!"

By that time another one had come up and he sang out, "Open the door!" while the other two dodged around back of the house, one going each way. I shut the window and started down. Well, just as I got to the stairs I tripped over something, and sure enough there was Weathersmith's man on the floor. I grabbed his collar and dragged him back into the room and looked at him to see if he was hurt. There wasn't a spot on him anywhere and I saw plain enough he had just naturally funked away. I hated to do it but I had to give him one to keep him still for a while anyway. Then I locked him into the room and ran down. The officer was banging away at the door like a fireman, and I let him in with my heart in my mouth, you may be sure.

"Are you sure they've gone?" he said.

"I hope so," said I, with a kind of a sickly grin as if I was half scared to death, which I was sure enough, too, though for a different reason. "You can go in the dining-room and find out if you want to, I've had enough of this!"

We had the gas lighted, and he pulled out his gun and went back into the dining-room and lit up there.

"I guess they left in a hurry," he said, looking at the smashed window. "I'll bet they got scratched up pretty good!"

He threw up the sash and called to the officers outside to get after the burglars and he'd stay and investigate. He came out into the hall again and looked around pretty sharp. "What's this?" he said, and good God! there were a couple of rolls of coin on the floor, and a broken one that had scattered twenty dollar gold pieces all over the country!

"Well, I swear!" said I; "you've saved my life." And I began scrabbling up that coin like a chicken after corn, shoveling it into my coat pockets till I had them bulging full.

"It's pretty good pickings," said the officer. "I'm sorry this ain't my huckleberry pasture."

"You're a good prospector," I replied, "and, seeing as you located the ore, here's your salary," and I handed out three twenties, which he pocketed with a very comfortable expression.

Now, this being in the hallway and quite convenient to the bathroom door, I must say I wasn't very easy about the Swede, who was pretty sure to be at the keyhole if his prisoner was still quiet. So I led the officer into the dining-room, and we sat down while I gave him a first-class fairy story about the affair.

He was very amenable to my hospitality, for the gold in his pockets had put him into a deuced good humor, so that I had no trouble in getting him to accept the refreshment I found all ready at hand on the sideboard, and before long he was very well primed with the liquor I had mixed for him.

I made out I was a chum of Weathersmith's who had come in early and was waiting for him when the burglars got in, and he made a few notes in his book with a stumpy lead pencil, looked at the bullet hole in the wall, and after an interminable delay, it seemed to me, he said there was no use staying round any longer and he'd go and report to the station; so at last he went away, with the description of two toughs I had cooked up for him impromptu.

You can imagine I lost no time in finishing up the business. I might have sloped immediately and left the Swede to suck his thumbs until some one came to get him, but I felt rather sorry for the fellow, and, with the stuff in my possession, I thought I could do no less than to give him a show to get away.

When I unlocked the door, I thought I should have died of laughing; he had Weathersmith doubled up in the bathtub, gagged, and tied with strips of towels, and was sitting on the floor, looking as mad as a hatter, and worried almost silly to know how he'd get out of the scrape.

There was no doubt, though, he had considerable more respect for my ability than when he first met me, for he minded me like a child, and without a question, while I bundled him into a big overcoat I found on the hat rack and gave him a brown derby hat that by rare good luck fitted him fairly well, and we made ready for a respectable exit.

The Swede balked at the door, shivering like a leaf when it came to going out. "Are you sure they're gone?" he asked. "Faith, I've talked to them inside," said I, "and I'm not afraid of 'em outside; we've got to make the break now, you're with a gentleman, so get onto yourself and brace up and do me credit," and I shoved him out first and shut the door behind us.

The fog was still fairly thick, though it had begun to rag out somewhat, and my nerves were pretty steady, being keyed up to concert pitch with the excitement.

Just as we got to the sidewalk, a man came running up to us, and I recognized the special watchman.

"The house has been robbed!" he said, all out of breath.

"So I understand," said I, "and where the hell have you been, that was paid for a watchman?"

"I've been chasing a couple of men down on Scott Street," said he. "I saw them running when you blew the whistle; there was a tall man and a short man, but I couldn't catch them."

"You've been chasing them in the corner grocery, if I'm not mistaken," I replied, and moved off.

"Where's Mr. Weathersmith?" he asked. "We're going to look him up," I said; "his man and I will try to find him. You'd better sit on the steps and wait, in case he comes home before we do, and tell him I saved his dough all right."

So we got away at last, I putting on a bold front and guying the Swede for his cowardice all the way. He was fairly rattled, and babbled like the freshman he was, till we struck California Street where we found a cab going in town. I hailed it, and we piled in and drew a long breath.

The moment we were inside my pal began to bluster and I saw the steak wasn't cooked yet. "Now we'll divvy," said the Swede, "Yust hand over dat stuff, half and half for you and me."

"I'll see you in San Quentin first," I replied, "you have a murder to account for, my Scandinavian friend, and if you don't care to have me tell what I know about that fellow we left up stairs with a hole in his head, you'd better forget all about my perquisites, for it's little enough to pay for what I've done for a white-headed rat like you."

He fell right down at the bluff and his flimsy braggadocio gave way to a most distressing panic. "My God," he whimpered; "did I kill him?"

"You drop in at the Morgue to morrow, if you don't believe it, and you have the stomach," I replied, and we rolled down town with no more said till I called out to the driver to put me down at the Baldwin, which was as near my rooms as I dared to risk.

For the rest, and to finish a rough-and-tumble tale (of which I am not too proud), I shipped the Swede off to the Mission, with a twenty to pay the driver, and got to my room by two o'clock.

There I found myself about twelve hundred dollars to the good, against a slim chance of getting away safely with the stuff, but this I managed after all, very successfully, crossing the ferry by the first boat, and making myself up as a hobo I tramped it northward till the thing blew over and then got East by a devious itinerary to my joint in Boston, where I have already a good scheme well under way that I hope shall put me on my feet again.

San Francisco, April 4, 1896.

A sad incident of carnival week in Paris was the appearance in the witness box, during the Arton trial at the Palais de Justice, of M. Baihaut, the Cabinet Minister and ex-Deputy sentenced in 1893 to five years penal servitude for receiving bribes from the Panama Canal Company, and who alone of the people implicated has not been set at liberty. The Paris correspondent of the Tribune thus describes the scene:

Few who were formerly acquainted with the man, at one time so well known about town, recognized in the bowed, shrunken, and cadaverous-faced convict with snow-white hair and beard the portly, jovial, and sturdy M. Baihaut of three years ago. His appearance aroused the sympathy of all present, and when in the course of his examination he explained that he had surrendered to the State his fortune of eight hundred thousand francs in order to atone for having accepted a bribe of barely a third of that amount, that he had not been permitted to give a farewell embrace to either his wife or to his favorite daughter, both of whom have died since his incarceration, and when he finally described the misery of his prison at Etampes, where he is undergoing solitary confinement and compelled to don the hideous black mask or hood concealing the head and face and leaving nothing but two little peep-holes for the eyes whenever he is taken out for exercise (this being a rule to which all prisoners at Etampes are subjected to prevent their recognition by their fellow-convicts), a great outburst of indignation, which the judges were powerless to suppress, took place in court against those in authority who are responsible for the continued punishment of this so sorely tried man. Indeed, the expression of sympathy on his behalf has been so unanimous that the Government has not ventured to send him back to Etampes, but has kept him here at the Conciergerie Prison, preparatory, it is believed, to his early liberation.

Complete Treasury figures for the calendar year 1895 show the total amount of the foreign trade of the United States in merchandise to have been, in round numbers, sixteen hundred and twenty-six million dollars. Almost exactly two-thirds of the exports were of agricultural products; and one-quarter was of manufactured products. The value of goods sold abroad amounted to about twenty-three million dollars more than that of goods purchased. The exports of merchandise were slightly less, and the imports very much larger than those of the previous year. The net exports of gold were about seventy-two million, and of silver forty-two and a half million dollars. The number of immigrants was about two hundred and twenty-five thousand, or seventy-five thousand more than those of the previous year.

Do you wish to learn the languages, or music, or oratory, or elocution from the best teachers and without expense to yourself? See page 16.

EASTER EVEN.

BY JULIET WILBOR TOMPKINS.

SCENE — A cathedral. Eleven o'clock the night before Easter. A woman, in nun's dress, kneeling.

She—Oh, dear, I'm so tired. My knees, how they ache!
Why haven't they cushions? I can't keep awake
A whole hour more of this wearisome night.
I hope no one's coming, I look such a fright
In this dud of a gown and this stuffy old hood.
I'm dreadfully tired of being so good.

A man enters dressed like a monk. He kneels beside her.

He —I weep for the sins of this black, wicked world.
She—I pray that the throne of the devil be hurled
Into infinite space.
He — May the earth be made new.
She—May Satan be vanquished.
He — Oh, goodness, it's you!
She—Yes, I. Have you missed me these six weary weeks?
He —Can a ten-cent museum get on without freaks?
Is a barber complete if he loses his pole?
Can a clergyman preach if he hasn't his stole?
What's a Chinaman's rank when he's minus his cue?
What's a bird without fizz? What am I without you?
She—I've missed you most awfully. How have you spent
The evenings that used to be mine before Lent?
He —I've treated the fellows to raspberry shrub,
Sweet cider and sassafras down at the club;
Played muggins and slapjack, casino and hearts,
For prizes tied up in pink ribbons; took parts
In charity blowouts, made calls on the old,
The poor, the infirm—was, in short, good as gold.
And you?
She— Well, I haven't once tasted dessert,
Nor candy, nor ices. I didn't once flirt,——
He —Oh, come!
She— Well, a trifle; no frantic affair.
I haven't bought anything pretty to wear,
I've sympathized sweetly with ailments and ills,
I've howled over jokes that were old as the hills,
I've made up a lot of back calls, and I've taught
Little indigent girls to embroider. In short,
I've been such a righteous, demure little nun,
I'd barter——
He — Be careful! The farce is not done.
She—Oh, thirty more minutes.
He — Have patience.
She— I can't.
They'll never be over.
He — Let's join in a chant.

They sing:

There was a little world
That was very swiftly twirled
Down the middle of the blue empyrean;
And when she was bad,
She a wicked record had,
But when she was good she was guyin'.

She had a satellite,
A wicked Prince of Night,
And most commonly she blessed the day she got him;
But when goodness was her aim,
She'd forget his very name,
If she met him on the boulevard, she cut him.

He —Suppose you confess all the times you have swerved
From the path of strict duty, the fasts unobserved,
The troubles and discords for which you're to blame.
It will hurry the time.
She— And will you do the same?
He —Most gladly.
She— I've broken some hearts, just a few.
All women do that.
He — Or they think that they do.
But the hearts that are broken by you never heal.
There's a triumph in that! Your refused never kneel
At the feet of another. You smile, lead them on
With your splendor and beauty, then presto! they're gone,
Wiped out and forgotten forever. That's Art!
Sweet sinner what next?
She— Oh, I haven't the heart
To enumerate all. Nothing dreadful or great:
White lies, bogus money dropped into the plate,
A poor jealous wife left alone and in tears,
A swell congregation all set by the ears,
Some tact with a Customs official displayed
And a subsequent trial of local free trade,
A belt drawn unduly, a soupçon of paint,—
Of such are my failings and sins.
He — You're a saint
When your small peccadilloes are placed beside mine.
Why, child, I have tempted with bumpers of wine,
I have vanquished with love, I have purchased with gold,
I have boasted my warmth to the shivering cold,
I have laughed at remorse till it laughed in its turn,
I have blown deadly sparks till they kindle and burn,
With evil and darkness I've walked hand and glove,
I have brought you to sin, you, the woman I love!
How is that for a record?
She— For forty long days
I swore to renounce you, abandon your ways,
Give alms and do good without stopping for breath.
He —And how did you like it?
She— It bored me to death.
No halo for me! I have come back to you.
He —Heart and soul?
She— Heart and soul.
He — It is striking—one, two!
Come, fling off your robe: I will tramp on my cowl.
She—How my diamonds gleam!
He — How the people will howl
With joy at our merry reunion. Nine, ten!
She—To the mad, laughing year that's before us!
He — Amen!
She—How the horns will prick through!
He — How the wings will be furled!
She—Dear Devil, I come!
I am waiting, sweet World!

SEGOMMER.

There has been a wonder in ventriloquism over at the Orpheum, during the past week, and lovers of vaudeville have had an unusual treat watching his skilful physical and vocal manipulation of various figures, representing animals and also individuals of the human race.

This wonder is a good-looking, clear-skinnned bright-eyed young German, named Segommer, who does things with his throat, tongue, and lungs, certainly never before equaled in this city, and assisted by certain electrical and mechanical contrivances gives a very remarkable as well as amusing performance. He not only imitates perfectly the cries and calls of various beasts and birds, but by his fluency in some half dozen languages is able to make his men and women talk in your own tongue or some other, throwing his voice clear across the stage into property or people alike, while his own face remains immobile. Standing in the middle of the stage, looking right at his audience he controls animals to the right of him, and animals to the left, without apparent effort or interference on his part, and, aside from the merely mechanical contrivances which help him to move his figures, he does all the rest himself, by some peculiar combination of muscle, tissue, and ligament, which remains even to-day somewhat of a mystery to himself.

"I cannot tell you just how it is done," he said. "From early childhood I had a fondness for animals and a fancy for communicating with them, as I thought, by imitating their cries. Long before I understood at all that by controlling or working certain muscles I could make certain sounds, and many years before I thought of putting this faculty to use, my friends all knew me as a mimic and imitator of animals and musical instruments."

Segommer first saw the light of day in quaint old Aix-la-Chapelle, the capital of Rhenish Prussia, which contains the fine old Coronation Chapel of the German Emperors—the birthplace of Charlemagne, and his burial spot—a city full of historical association, the town of all others in which an imaginative boy of Segommer's talent and temperament could find food and opportunity for developing his peculiar ability—with its annual fairs, its museums, and its periodical pageants—with its crowd of foreign travelers hurrying to and from the famous baths in the vicinity.

His father was connected, in some way, with mines, and expected his son to follow in his footsteps, but Segommer jeune preferred something else to burrowing in the earth, and, watching for his opportunity, he ran away. After knocking around a while, but always on the alert for work, he finally found his way to the stage, and began life as an actor at nineteen years of age.

"It was during my season on the stage that the keystone to my future career was laid," said Segommer, when relating, the other evening, how he engaged in his present work. "We were rehearsing a play in which an entertainment was to be given. At first the manager thought of giving a play within a play, but finding that not quite feasible, the idea was dropped. Then a young friend of mine proposed I should do some of my imitations as an entertainment; this seemed impossible, I had never conceived of such a thing—however, we carried it through, and the exhibition being quite new, it was, of course, received with enthusiasm. It finally made such a hit that it set me thinking, and just as things were beginning to take shape in my mind, a young man of my acquaintance came to see me, and said:

"'My friend, you are wasting your time; you could make a fortune if you would get up an exhibition of your animals and puppets on a larger scale, and travel.' This furnished the finishing touch to my own dreams. I left the theater, and began there and then this work, and I have never had reason to regret it. Of course," he continued, "my business has been very much enlarged since then. I own now several hundred figures, which I control by strings, wires, and electric buttons. But here, at the Orpheum, on account of the size of the stage, I am able to exhibit but a few at a time. I carry only about forty of these wires, etc., about my person nightly, while here."

I asked him what brought him to America. It was the usual answer—curiousity—he had heard so much about this country.

"I wanted to see America and its people."

I suggested that possibly the clink of the American dollar had something to do with it.

"Yes," he admitted, "of course. Artists are always well paid in the United States—much higher than in Europe."

Probably Segommer found that while honor and glory are delightful in their way, they are not particularly nourishing—although he looks well fed enough—in these days—and well groomed, too—a very spick and span, alert little man, with big bright hazel eyes, limpid and clear as a child's. According to Segommer, ventriloquism has its utilitarian as well as its amusing aspect. He was recently traveling from Prague to Vienna, and had with him a small dog. In Europe dogs must pay fare. So Segommer wrapped his up in a traveling shawl and placed him in a rack overhead. When the conductor came along the footrail, outside the windows, as conductors do in Europe, the dog barked. The conductor looked about, said whoever had a dog must pay his fare. No one would acknowledge having a dog.

Segommer adds:

"I finally convinced him it was all ventriloquism, imitating several dogs. The conductor was highly amused, complimented me on my skill as an imitator, and left, satisfied there was no dog in our compartment."

Mme. Segommer travels with her husband. Whenever they are to remain over a week anywhere, they rent a flat and keep house—and during his leisure hours, Segommer paints landscapes and sketches. Some one told me he owned a lovely villa near Aix-la-Chapelle. I asked him if he made it his home. He answered, hesitatingly:

"Yes—but just now we prefer to travel. Our two little children died there a year ago, and we will stay away awhile."

Later, Segommer gave us some illustrations of his art—a dog barked in the next room, where there was no dog. Hens clucked, and ducks quacked behind us and underneath our chairs, all as naturally as possible, while the ventriloquist looked us serenely in the face, without making any apparent motion or effort.

Whatever he has accomplished has been done without influence or even much capital in the beginning—the pure result of energy and ingenuity. Wires and strings are simply the servants of his peculiar genius, which has, over and above the merit of amusing the public, the very distinct charm of raking in the shekels to the tune of about five hundred dollars a week. E. D. H.

THE SOUTH WIND.

BY ROBERT BRIDGES.

I.

The south wind rose at dusk of the winter day
The warm breath of the western sea
Circling wrapp'd the isle with his cloak of cloud,
And it now reach'd even to me, at the dusk of the day,
And moan'd in the branches aloud:
While here and there, in patches of dark space,
A star shone forth from its heavenly place,
As a spark that is borne in the smoky chase;
And, looking up, there fell on my face—
Could it be drops of rain,
Soft as the wind, that fell on my face?
Gossamers light as threads of the summer dawn,
Suck'd by the sun from midmost calms of the main,
From groves of coral islands secretly drawn,
O'er half the round of earth to be driven,
Now to fall on my face
In silken skeins spun from the mists of heaven.

II.

Who art thou, in wind and darkness and soft rain,
Thyself that robest, that bendest in sighing pines
To whisper thy truth? that usest for signs
A hurried glimpse of the moon, the glance of a star
In the rifted sky?
Who art thou, that with thee I
Woo and am wooed?
That, robing thyself in darkness and soft rain,
Choosest my chosen solitude,
Coming so far
To tell thy secret again,
As a mother her child, in her folding arm
Of a winter night by a flickering fire,
Telleth the same tale o'er and o'er
With gentle voice, and I never tire,
So imperceptibly changeth the charm,
As Love on buried ecstasy buildeth his tower—
Like as the stem that beareth the flower
By trembling is knit to power:—
Ah! long ago
In thy first rapture I renounced my lot,
The vanity, the despondency, and the wo,
And seeking thee to know
Well wasn't for me; and evermore
I am thine, I know not what.

III.

For me thou seekest ever, me wandering a day
In the eternal alterations, me
Free for a stolen moment of chance
To dream a beautiful dream
In the everlasting dance
Of speechless worlds, the unsearchable scheme,
To me thou findest the way,
Me and whomso'er
I have found my dream to share
Still with thy charm encircling; even to-night
To me and my love in darkness and soft rain
Under the sighing pines thou comest again,
And staying our speech with mystery of delight,
Of the kiss that I give a wonder thou makest,
And the kiss that I take thou takest.

—The Pageant.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

NOWADAYS it requires talent and imagination to manage a savings bank. Since the granger has ceased to pay interest on his mortgages certain financiers have had sad times with their accounts. The liberty their customers have taken may not be enjoyed at the expense of those sensitive creatures, the depositors, who, at the first word of retrenchment, would promptly turn in their pass-books. How very awkward it would prove to have a run in these dull days, is best realized by those who have recently tried to dispose of country lands. Yet, in the face of dull times and a declining market, I perceive the usual dividends were declared, and have permitted myself to wonder whence the profits were conjured from. A gentleman of experience enlightened my ignorance. It's the latest application of the parable of the Unjust Stewart. For instance, Jones, who has 500 acres down in San Joaquin County, owes the Liberty Bell Bank $10,000, and has paid it no interest for several years past. He stands indebted to the institution then for some two thousand dollars in interest say, and collection is out of the question. What must be done to protect both? The bank has no desire to seize Jones's property—it does not desire to enter the ranching business, so the old mortgage is withdrawn, and a new one signed—this time for $12,000. There you have a profit at once—sufficient of an appearance of gain, at least, to make a showing on the books. The law provides that no banking institution shall pay dividends, save it has earned profits; but, then, income is often only a matter of bookkeeping, and surely the means justify the end. Next year it will be on the cards for these saving concerns to begin seizing and selling, and that will be the proper time to buy ranches. Sooner or later there must come a readjustment of California land values, for acreage rates still rule too high, and the banks which have loaned on boom valuations are partially to blame for the preposterous prices still demanded. However, low rates mean new immigration, for, after all, it is a fresh accession of people we want, as prosperity is most liable to be woed back to us by new faces.

* * *

The end is foreshadowed in the subdivision of such great properties as the Chino and Santa Margarita ranchos. Their sale to English capitalists and the promise of an immigration of English farmers is a fine augury of the future. There can be no disappointment with the character of the land, for the two tracts embrace some of the finest soil in the State. Once the success of these experiments is demonstrated, there will be many imitators, and a revival of that influx of population diverted for so many years. Colonizing on a smaller scale, by Chicago capitalists, is proceeding in the Sacramento Valley. I am told of two hundred families of well-to-do Hoosier farmers who have transferred their holdings from Indiana corn lands to Sacramento Valley orchards. They have bought farms upon the Clark-Cox tract near Haggin's great rancho, and are so provided with coin as to patiently endure the tedium of waiting for the ripening of their fruits.

* * *

Apropos of population, can it be possible there are no new accessions to San Francisco? The city grows at a great rate. There is continual new building; new houses keep rising like mushrooms through the Western Addition. The Richmond district and the lands beyond the Park are all being taken up and built over. It may be true, indeed, that the miserable shanties of Brannan and Bryant Streets are being deserted to furnish tenants for the hundreds of new flats and new villas arising in the suburbs, but not altogether. There is surely an influx, persistent and strong, to the peninsula, or this apparent growth would not be possible. Of course, it must be remembered our capitalists are all in real estate, forced by the absence of responsible securities to place their earnings in real property or mines. During late years there has been a gradual turning of mercantile stocks into money, which has been salted down in lands and houses rather than converted into new feeders. With the revival of business, however, the reaching out after new markets, the development of new enterprises, there will be fresh scope for idle capital, and then the old aspect of prosperity may return us her shining visage.

* * *

WANDERING along Pacific Avenue and its environing streets, the most casual observer is struck with the innumerable fine houses which have risen there within the last half decade. They are all the habitations of wealth—not necessarily the abodes of millionaires, but representing incomes of over five thousand dollars per annum. Inquire the names and the identity of these householders and there is revealed to you the existence of individuals of whom the Blue Book or the newspapers tell nothing. They may be styled the Unknown Rich. These are the people who make possible the existence of luxurious stores and art-emporiums here, who lunch at the Palace Café, who think nothing of repeated five dollars for the privilege of listening to Paderewski, who will flock to Seidl, and will support Duse, when she appears at the Columbia. You hear but little of them; their names are no revelation to the mind, they are no part of our history, they figure but infrequently in Society, and yet it is their presence here that makes San Francisco the Paris of the Pacific Coast. They represent the successful miners of the Sierras, the prosperous speculator of Arizona, the bankers of Utah, the great landholders of the interior valleys, the coffee and sugar planters of Central America and the Hawaiian Islands. Their interests demand attention but their incomes justify the enjoyment of metropolitan luxuries. Who shall say how many millions are swallowed up in the Western Addition? Our mines produce vast sums of gold annually—it does not all revert to the British or the Bostonians. One hears of great deals in which millions change hands, and after that there is never a word of the fortunate recipients. They don't go to Europe or New York. Unless our people have five million they remain here. Depend on it they have settled in one of those elaborate villas out on Broadway and will do as little as possible for the rest of their days. Our Unknown Rich are an interesting feature and are really worth more attention than they obtain.

* * *

LIKE other great men, J. B. Haggin is afraid of his watch. It is an eminent timepiece, with all manner of interior decorations, and so delicate is its mechanism that a hard word spoken in its vicinity has been known to throw the wheels out of gear. In olden days, Colonel Andrews had his Diamond Palace under the office of Haggin & Tevis, and it was the custom of the former to visit the Colonel every morning, for the purpose of having the precious watch wound. This function the affable Andrews performed with his own hands, and there generally ensued five minutes of conversation. One day, during this exchange of ideas, the Colonel asked Haggin about a certain monetary transaction, in which it was a question whether he should accept a due bill or a promissory note, and the millionaire, who was then practising his profession as a lawyer, promised to examine the law and let the jeweler know. The required information came punctually enough, and a week later appeared a bill for fifty dollars. Next morning Andrews inquired very casually, as he wound the watch, what the bill was for.

"That legal advice I gave you the other morning—about that due bill, you know," returned Haggin

"Ah, I remember—that's right," said the Colonel.

The same day there arrived for J. B. Haggin a bill from Colonel Andrews—To services rendered, $365, and next morning it was the latter's turn to inquire the wherefore of the account.

"Oh," explained Andrews, indifferently, "that's for winding your watch for a year—one dollar a time, you know."

They finally equalized accounts by exchanging receipted bills.

* * *

For the purpose of this tale it must be remembered that Judge Coffey has red hair, Perhaps the shade is more properly termed "ginger," but then, a chevelure approaching rubescence is ever dubbed red. Ex-Judge Bowers, a venerable jurist, who in early days was a light of the Superior Bench, was arguing a law point of some importance before Judge Coffey. He has a trick of emphasizing his periods with an uplifted forefinger, and, after defining his views, ended up very solemnly:

"I see around me many gray-haired lawyers, whose opinions, I have no doubt, agree with those I have just expressed to your honor—men whose snowy locks testify to——"

At this juncture, Judge Coffey leaned over his desk, and, in his mildest tones, interrupted:

"I have no doubt you are right, Judge, and your reference to gray-haired men is very appropriate, but I'd like to remind you there's a red-headed man whose opinion is of most importance in this case.

* * *

WITH DEEP apprehension I learn it is possible that Deacon Fitch may again engage in journalism. This consummation, devoutly to be prayed against, is threatened by the Spreckels, who, rumor says, have invited the old gentleman to preside over the editorial page of the Call. Of course, the name of Fitch is still synonymous with the moral virtues, but it is highly questionable if the old gentleman could be converted into an available factor in adding to the circulation of the Call. In fact, he has a proper contempt for journalistic novelties, and it is said he has been known to shy at the sight of a Hoe Press. Illustrations he regards with as much detestation as the devil does holy water, and earnestly believes that the opinion of any man who has not attained the age of sixty-four is absolutely worthless.

* * *

The participation in politics of Superintendent Daggett is a puzzling factor in the Democratic situation. Curiosity to learn the motive is general, as it is admitted there is slight opportunity of the party electing a successor to Perkins, and it was understood that the Superintendent's ambitions were purely senatorial. I am told, however, his determination nowadays is to discredit Congressman Maguire, and also to show the men who believed him disbarred from the Democracy the importance of his figure in the party. A laudable ambition, truly. It would be easy to forgive Mr. Daggett his aspirations if it were not that he confuses the little with the great. Not content with desiring to aid in determining the presidential nomination at Chicago, he wants also to be a factor in the selection of poundkeeper in San Francisco. Indeed, the man seems to have delivered himself to Sam Rainey, whose lieutenants figure as his advisers, and whose will is his conscience. Beyond the patronage which he has mortgaged to secure the success of his aspirations, Daggett's political ambitions are not expensive. Though he has "money to burn," no one has smelt a whiff of its combustion. As the readers of this column may remember Daggett's "Black Bear" mine is again a large gold producer, and yields him some five thousand dollars per month. This and other properties render him a member of the great capitalist class, though, unlike Colonel Dan, he evinces no desire in the direction of diamonds or extravagance.

* * *

A VALIANT foeman is President Foster of the San Francisco and North Pacific Railway. He dares to keep his opponents at bay by pure force of muscle, and sweeps legal technicalities aside with a fine impatience worthy of medieval times. Twice has victory been within Sydney Smith's grasp, but each time Foster has snatched the prize from his trembling fingers. There is a good story about the last meeting of the Board which has thus far eluded the dailies. When Smith and his men, armed with their authorizations, headed for the council chamber, Foster stood at the entrance and admitted Stetson and Borel of Smith's party, but banged the door in his face. That worthy hammered and jammed at the entrance, but he was powerless to effect ingress with the president's huge shoulder against the sash. However, when there arose the suggestion of a demonstration on the part of the others, Foster twisted the key, called the meeting to order, and offered to purchase the rival interest or sell his own. I believe the offer was a reasonable one, and was made in a vehement speech, which Smith punctuated by banging at the door. However, nothing was done, though the fight is by no means over. Every possible subterfuge will be resorted to for the purpose of obstructing the scheme of saddling the Broad Gauge with the debts and inefficiencies of the North Pacific Coast. It may be achieved, but only at a tremendous cost to all concerned.

THE WITNESS.

The German Emperor has serious ideas of his capacity as a conductor. Being serenaded recently by a band of the Uhlan Regiment during dinner, he rose from the table and put the musicians right about their time, which he declared to be too slow. Since that occasion he has announced his intention of writing a pamplet on "How to Conduct an Orchestra." Even the al fresco bands of music that play about Berlin are not safe from their Kaiser's critical ear, as he repeatedly sends the imperial servants out to them with requests that they tune their instruments and play in time.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

THE NOVEL CONSCIENCE.

ITS UNCERTAIN ACTION AND INCONSISTENT WAYS AS EVINCED IN NEW BOOKS.

"If you had a narrow red book with rough edges and wide margins named Sinners Twain, what would you expect of it?" asked the man of letters.

"London society, scandal, and epigrams," said his wife, promptly.

"Exactly," said the man of letters, expanding with the satisfaction of having a wife who thought what you wanted her to, without any prompting on your part. "I was all worked up to fin de siècle pitch—"

"'Pitch' is good," she murmured.

"And expected the usual cynical worldling with a title to make love to the usual unhappy wife, whose husband is flirting with the usual beauty of the season," he went on, "set with the usual house parties, afternoon teas, runaway horses, twisted ankles, and passionate kisses. I never dreamed—"

"Oh, it's by John Mackie," she interrupted, picking up the book. "He writes about the Northwest, doesn't he? The snow-shoe on the cover ought to have enlightened you. They aren't used in the first London circles."

"Well, I didn't examine it," said the man of letters, a trifle impatiently. "I merely said that the name was misleading."

"Yes, of course. Who are the sinners, and what did they do?" she asked, with mollifying interest.

"Nothing worthy of the name," he answered. "The mounted police were after her father for smuggling whisky, and she saved him from justice—for love of him, not of the whisky. She persuades the Sergeant, who is in love with her, not to stop her when she slips out to warn her father, and he doesn't. That's the crime."

"Bad from a military standpoint, but highly human," she commented.

"He was tried for neglect of duty, and could easily have exonerated himself, but made no defense, and was reduced to the ranks," he continued. "I wonder how many men in real life would have done that?"

"The novel conscience always works so beautifully," she said, with a small sigh. "It is always either obeyed and rewarded or disobeyed and punished. In life there are so many sidetracks one can slip into, which are neither steep and narrow nor broad and easy, and which seem just as likely to lead up as down."

"Life isn't always a choice of extremes, thank goodness," he said. "Most of us belong to a sort of third estate, a cross between saint and sinner, which doesn't make very good copy. Conscience has its place, but it is a business-like, unpicturesque one, not so prominent as in books. Take this one of Dorothea Gerard's, The Wrong Man. Radford disables a man in a duel, which proves to have been unnecessary and unjust, and thenceforth all that this jolly, popular young cavalry officer lives for is to make reparation."

"But he has ruined Milnovics' career, and with it the only hope of that desolate family of his," she said. "It was only natural he should do everything he could."

"Yes, he might have given up the girl he loved; but not his Sundays," said the man of letters. "Those are fine scenes between the two men, though."

"I liked it, having Milnovics harsh and unforgiving," added his wife. "Don't you know when he says, 'Leave me alone, Radford; it is all the mercy I ask of you. You have got my forgiveness, but in the name of heaven, spare me your friendship!' and Radford keeps right on in his earnest, tactless way, and finally wins him. Of course, he gets the girl, too, in the end, but that couldn't be helped if she loved him best."

"It's the same old fate," he said:

> "He was first, always. Fortune shone in his face.
> I fought for years; with no effort he conquered the place.
> We ran; my feet were all bleeding, but he won the race."

"That is the keynote. 'Once I staked all my heart's treasure; we played—and he won.' The book is sombre, but it's strong, and I liked it. But when Rosa Nonchette Carey builds a novel on a struggle of conscience, then good——"

"Don't misuse the Litany," she interrupted. "Keep it for things worth while. But really, I was rather interested in Mrs. Romney."

"It's readable, if that's what you mean," said the man of letters. "Most trash is. It ought to have been called 'Much Ado About Nothing,' if the title hadn't been used already. Any woman with an atom of sense would have told her husband the whole thing without a moment's hesitation."

"But with no mystery and no repentance there wouldn't have been any story," she objected.

"So much the better," was the severe answer.

"To me, the most unnatural part is all that fuss about obedience," she said. "Do you think women obey their husbands now?"

"No, I'm quite sure they don't," said the man of letters.

"Children obey—or they don't," she said, "but it isn't an appropriate word to use between husband and wife. I'd change the service to 'love, honor, and respect your wishes,' if I had my way. Mrs. Romney's anguish and abasement at having disobeyed her husband's commands does make me so tired. It may be the English way of looking at things, but it isn't in accordance with the spirit of the times."

"If you did something that I didn't want you to, wouldn't your conscience bother you?" demanded the man of letters.

"Um—— but I wouldn't have nervous prostration over it," said his wife, evasively. "You'd despise a wife that did."

"I'd rather marry Mrs. Romney than A Professional Beauty," he answered. "Those little repentances of hers aren't even skin deep."

"I wonder if Elizabeth Phipps Train really believed in them herself when she wrote the book?" said the wife, musingly. "Evelyn waits till she has completely broken a man's heart, then begins to realize that he is suffering, and is quite sorry for him."

"I've no faith in her. I wouldn't be in Paul's shoes for worlds," he said, energetically. "Her hints about having been different if she had had a less worldly mother, don't sound sincere, however true the abstract fact may have been."

"Isn't it queer how you form your own opinion of a character, quite independent of the author's," she said? "Evelyn is pictured as being deeply in love with Paul, yet all the time I am morally certain that what she calls love is merely astonishment at his refusal to fall down and worship her. Now that she has him—well, time will tell. I never have much faith in a woman who talks about her lovely rounded arms and dazzling beauty even in an autobiography."

"It's too honest. It jars on one's sense of probability," said the man of letters. "She'll be in the divorce courts yet, you'll see."

"If she is, I suppose she will go on with the autobiography," said his wife. "It ought to be thrilling."

"If you want thrills, why don't you read a good, rousing novel like this of John Bloundelle-Burton's?" he said.

"In the Days of Adversity? Oh, it's historical," she objected.

"You needn't mind that. There isn't any useful information to annoy you," he said, a little sarcastically. "The hero is a young widower, unacknowledged heir to a French dukedom, who has his life attempted and his child kidnapped, fights duels and is sent to the galleys, takes part in the battle of La Hogue on the English side, and is condemned to be broken on the French wheel in consequence, and goes through enough trouble to crush the average man's spirit and ruin his constitution for life; but in the end he marries, settles down into an English country gentleman, and lives happily ever after. It's fine."

"I don't like exciting books," she said, shaking her head. "Outward events don't interest me half so much as relations between people and subjective happenings."

"Then you ought to like Elizabeth Stuart Phelps's last, The Supply at Saint Agatha's," he said, picking up a white book with a gold cross on the cover. "Beautiful though it is, with me the fact that it could never have happened leaves a little unsatisfied feeling."

"Take it just as a lovely idea, not as a story," she said. "Elizabeth Stuart Phelps is always a little weird and given to things supernatural, but she does it delicately and artistically, and leaves you a loophole to explain it in some other way if you can. She never once says that the strange man who preached at Saint Agatha's was Christ, though of course it was"

"She believed it, anyway," said the man of letters."

J. W. T.

THE THEATERS.

O'NEILL AS A PERFECT GENTLEMAN—ROYLE'S OPINION OF ROYLE AND OF CRITICS.

Why, oh! why, does not poor, dear, handsome O'Neill "emerge" (as the play-bill has it) "from the husks of Monte Cristo into something better" and stay there? Judging from Monday night's audience there is no money in it and he must feel acutely the frivolous and hilarious manner in which the house always receives Monte Cristo's melodramatic "One," "Two," "Three," etc. A broad smile passed over the audience at each killing Monday night, and nothing but Jamie's general attractiveness, and the good feeling we have for him, kept it from developing into a full grown laugh. The "one, two, three" is bad enough in the book, but to force a poor actor-man to get up in the presence of his peers and declaim these words in sepulchral tones is inhuman; the S. P.C. A. ought to look into it. I resented also the poor fellow being called a "perfect gentleman" right to his face, too, by his own son at that. He looked (in spite of his diamond head-lights) so emphatically aristocratic and handsome that it seemed a positive shame to apply such an offensive epithet to him, even if he had talked shop in a drawing-room, boasted of his wealth, and topped off this vulgarity by forcing a quarrel in the presence of women.

It is really unpleasant to O'Neill's friends and admirers to see him in such an anomalous position. If he must, for some unthinkable reason, produce Monte Cristo, why doesn't he play Nortier and let us be proud of him? Even this arrangement would have its drawbacks, however, for then Hallet Thompson would "want a situation," which would be a pity, for he is a handsome, delightful creature, and a very good actor indeed. He and William Dixon (Caderouse) carried off the honors (all that O'Neill left), though Florence Rockwell did well, and Kate Fletcher made a good Carconte. The latter would improve her part appreciably by restraining her noisy tongue and feet a bit as she mounts the stairs to her bedroom, hatchet in hand and murder in her eye (or rather back). Unless her prey was dead or deaf he would certainly become aware of her amiable designs ere she reached his door, for she made as much noise as the clattering milkman does on his early morning rounds, who seems to say: "If I can't sleep, you bet nobody else shall either,"—and a great many people don't.

The play of Monte Cristo is doubtless so familiar that no one is ever disappointed now, but fancy an admirer of the story seeing this dramatized version for the first time; how disappointed he would be; but he would deserve it for liking the story. It would be as if he expected a tree and was given a twig, or a dinner and received only the appetizers and a cup of black coffee.

* * *

It is painful to confess a weakness, but as it would be sure to leak out in the course of my remarks, anyway, I may as well put a bold front on and confess in the beginning that I was not particularly bored by "Friends." In fact, I laughed uproarously all through the first act, and got in such a good humor that even the limp, bifurcated second act, the clumsily arranged third, and the flat fourth, left me still with enough tenderness for Royle to make me believe he could write a play if somebody would only furnish him with the backbone of one to start with. Just fancy having a whole play turn upon a woman's notion that she was damned because her mother (an honorable woman) was deceived by a mock marriage. It was never even suggested that her blackguard of a sire was her disgrace. Oh, no! her disgrace consisted in nature's refusal to recognize our laws, and in her mother's confidence in the man she loved. Because of this misfortune, she (the daughter) sobs, suffers, and prepares to give up her lover—a poor musician, to whom, as his wife, she would have been the greatest possible assistance- and this without even telling him of her "disgrace." Later on she does accumulate enough gray matter to explain, and he, of course, says he would marry her "if she had never had either father or mother," so great is his love. Nevertheless, on finding her, a few days later, in another man's rooms, he immediately, without waiting an instant for explanations, accuses her of—well, never mind what, but he behaves in a rude, rude manner, and gets his congé, and a bullet into the bargain.

Taken as a whole it is a poor play, liberally sprinkled with bunkum, but it is very amusing in parts and has clever touches. The introduction of Lucius Henderson's piano recital is not one of these, however; it gives the act a broken-backed effect. In fact Henderson himself is a mistake; at all times florid and artificial, as the pianist Karje, he is exuberantly bad, and a blot on an otherwise good cast. He seems, however, to be freer from conceit than most young actors, and he can keep his eyes off the audience, which is more than Edwin Milton Royle can do. But you see Royle evidently thinks a lot of Royle and that sort of thing will out. With the exception of the first act, which he over-did a bit and talked too loud, the latter was capital as John Paden, Jr. He has acquired the art of being natural and infuses a fine sincerity into his every word and inflection. Selena Fetter Royle had an opportunity this week to show her ability. She is a very good actress, careful and intelligent with gestures that convince and an occasional note in her voice which has a ring of the real thing.

Ben Johnson, who was so good a South Carolin' Jim, in "Captain Impudence," was even better this week as Hans Otto, but I can't say that the D. T.'s are just what one likes to see when on pleasure bent, even if tactfully represented. William Bittner, was again, as in "Captain Impudence," the irritable, irrational, blustering father—the part a burlesque, but well done.

In "Friends," Royle finds an opportunity to throw bouquets at the critics, and tells 'em how it hurts to be roasted. He doesn't say them himself, of course, but artfully puts them in the mouth of Marguerite Otto, doubtless thinking they would be more effective there, as most critics are men. I wonder if people ever consider how hard it is for the poor critic? It seems to me he has the worst of it, after all. He goes to the theater until the stage with its footlights and fearful foliage is obnoxious to him; then the cramped seats are generally insufferable, and most plays wearisome. The artificiality, the unreality and worthlessness of it all, overwhelms him; and yet he must say something, and that something must be "crisp and readable." It is possible to cast truth to the dogs, and praise mediocrity, but it is tremendously hard to discuss it or criticise it without roasting in a way that will not make your editor say ——but its useless to finish that sentence, for he would never, never print it.

PEG WOFFINGTON.

THE MATINEE CONCERT.

The gem of this, the last concert given by Materna and Ondricek, was undoubtedly Elsa's Prayer from "Lohengrin," rendered with such artistic taste and finish by the charming singer. With Ondricek it seemed to be an off day, for his interpretations were somewhat wanting in color, and he fiddled more or less out of tune. Mr. Luckstone's conception of the Rubenstein sonata for piano and violin was broader and more musicianly than that of his brother artist, although the entire performance was thoroughly enjoyable. For the first time, the audience appeared to be aware of Mr. Luckstone's ability, and the advent of Mr. Arthur Fickenscher, making comparisons inevitable, but served to augment his success. Whence came Herr Schott and his accompanist? Their appearance in San Francisco was rather unexpected, to say the least. It is doubtful, too, if their joining forces with Materna and Ondricek increased either the popularity of the concerts or the box receipts. With a voice entirely gone, Schott can hardly expect to rely solely upon art. Quite different is it with Materna. In addition to her art, she still has sufficient voice to sing beautifully, where the strain is not too great. Certainly, hers is the greatest dramatic singing heard in this city since the days of the National Opera Company Technically, Ondricek surpasses any violinist who has ever visited the Pacific Coast. Despite this, he failed to arouse his hearers to the pitch of enthusiasm created by the more magnetic Sarasate or Ysaye.

P. C. A.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

"In the Days of Adversity," by John Bloundille Burton. Appleton & Co., publishers. For sale by Wm. Doxey.

"The Supply at St. Agatha's," by Elizabeth Stuart Phelps. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., publishers.

"Mrs. Romney," by Rosa Nouchette Carey. J. B. Lippincott Company, publishers.

"The Wrong Man," by Dorothea Gerard. Appleton & Co., publishers.

"Sinners Twain," by John Mackie. The Fred. A. Stokes Company, publishers. For sale by Wm. Doxey.

"A Professional Beauty," by Elizabeth Phipps Train. The J. B. Lippincott Company, publishers.

THE MAGAZINES.

CONTENTS AND CHARACTERISTICS OF THE MONTHLIES.

The April Overland Monthly has an article on "International Bimetalism," by John J. Valentine. J. A. Filcher describes the exhibit of California at the Atlanta Exposition. There are some rather clever illustrations from Raschen's work done in half-tone, together with several stories, including a continuation of "The Quicksands of Pactolus," "True Tales of the Old West," "Jim Towne's Bride," and an interesting article on the study of history by Thomas R. Bacon. The Grand Army comes in for extensive illustration.

The main feature of the latest issue of The Ladies' Home Journal are five letters from Louisa M. Alcott to young girls. These letters were written during the busiest period of Miss Alcott's life, and present a pen-picture of the author drawn by her own hand. There is another instalment of Miss Wilkins's "Neighborhood Types." Ex-President Harrison continues his talks on "This Country of Ours." General Greeley writes about the personal side of Washington's character. There is a fine half-page illustration, by C. D. Gibson, to Miss Magruder's story, and Miss Lillian Bell is at her brightest on the philosophy of clothes. In addition there is a "Colonial Dame Waltz" by John Phillip Sousa.

Current Literature gives us an extract from De Fournier's "Escape"; a reading from Halton's new book, "When Greek Meets Greek," a clever story; "Gabriel Foote, Highwayman," from Quiller-Couch's new book, and an extract from Chevalier Girard's exploits, showing how the Brigadier was tempted by the Devil. Otherwise the number is particularly readable, containing much that is entertaining in the way of literature, science, sport, statistics, and travel, together with any quantity of poetry and literary gossip. As a matter of fact, Current Literature contains more really available reading than any other monthly, and one seldom meets in its pages an extract that is not timely and intelligent.

There are some celebrated names in Harpers' Magazine this month, and some excellent articles. Joan of Arc is concluded in several ways. For instance, her execution is depicted in the frontispiece and her biography is terminated on another page. She is next to appear in book form, I believe. Casper Whitney's "Snow Shoes to the Barren Grounds" is also among the concluded journeys, but Poultney Bigelow is still with us, and George W. Smalley writes about Mr. Lowell in England. Brander Matthews contributes a story, which he calls "A Spring Flood on Broadway"; Henry D. Fowler writes of "Inter-Collegiate Young Men's Christian Associations." Mr. Black's "Briseis" approaches the climax of its action; Theodore Roosevelt contributes a paper on "Mad Anthony Wayne's Victory," and there is the usual installment of poems and pictures completing a very interesting number.

As usual, McClure's Magazine treats of the timeliest topics. For instance, there is a capital interview with Professor Roentgen by Harry Dam, capitally illustrated, in which the great scientist gives an interesting account of how he discovered the cathode ray. Another instalment of Abraham Lincoln's Life follows—his engagement and marriage being treated of. Three chapters of Anthony Hope's new story called "Phroso" is a notable feature; Will Low writes about "Barbizon," the painters of the school, and illustrates by means of full page half-tones. A new story by "Q," a ballad by Rudyard Kipling, and much other stuff equally interesting is found within the covers of this publication for ten cents.

The Bookman contains the usual instalment of literary gossip. Andrew Lang is the subject of a critical essay; there is a clever little interview with Alphonse Daudet; H. T. Peck writes of American feeling toward England; Mrs. Lynn Linton details personal recollections of Lander, Dickens, and Thackeray; there is another instalment of "Kate Carnegie" by Ian McClaren; Mr. Sherard talks about French celebrities; and there are book reviews, brevities and other matters, making up a journal that those interested in literary matters simply must have.

The leading article of the latest Century describes the old-time Olympic games, and is illustrated with admirable pictures by Castaigne. We have some more of Sir George Tressady; Professor Sloane writes on Napoleon as the assailant of Nationality; there is a pretty little story by Gilbert Parker called "The Little Bell of Honor." An interesting contribution entitled "Four Lincoln Conspiracies," describes important episodes in the life of our greatest president. Mrs. Schuyler Van Rensaeller writes of the churches of Angoulême, which Joseph Pennel illustrates. Mr. Howells wants to know who our brothers are, and there is a particularly charming poem, "Arboricide," by Louise Imogen Guyney. The artistic features are a reproduction of a picture by George de Forrest Brush, "Mother and Child," Vibert's admirable compositions, of which three are given, and the exquisite drawings of Pennel.

The political articles which the Atlantic is publishing this winter are worthy the attention of thinkers. It is conducting two series of papers which all Americans should read. In one there is a clever effort to analyze the influence on our race of the blending of nationalities, showing the characteristics of the various elements. The first paper exhibited the effects and influence of the immense Irish immigration in a manner so fair and clear that the truth of its criticism cannot be gainsaid by the most enthusiastic of partisans. This month, the Scotch element is treated in a similar spirit of impartiality. The relation of certain aspirants to the presidency is being handled by writers of evident competence. We have, this month, "Senator Allison and the Presidency." Mr. Atkinson treats of the case of the public schools. Lafcadio Hearn contributes a paper on China and the Western World. Henry James contributes a story, "The Old Things," and Alice Brown writes of "Latter-day Cranford." The comment on new books is as good as usual and the "Contributors' Club" is the best department of its kind among the periodicals. This summary affords a fair impression of the amount of good reading the April Atlantic contains. Lovers of English prose will undoubtedly be attracted by the names of James and Hearn, who are to-day among the most admirable stylists we have.

BOOK NOTES.

The enormous circulation of such a magazine as The Ladies' Home Journal can, in a sense, be understood when it is said that during the last six months of 1895 there were printed, sold, and circulated over four million copies—(in exact figures 4,058,891).

In the April Nineteenth Century there is published a symposium on the Life of Cardinal Manning. The contributors include Cardinal Vaughan and Mr. Wilfrid Meynell.

We are promised a volume of new verse by Bret Harte. How many years have gone since the author of the Heathen Chinee has rendered to the world aught of the fruit of his muse? Does the old, bright spirit still throb buoyantly in him, I wonder? Like Kipling, he is one of the literary forces of our generation, and those who have grown enamored of the style and charm of his early songs will not rest content with aught lacking the gaiety, spirit, and lilt of the '49 verse.

The Appletons have been fortunate in the publication of new books by American authors. They announce for the near future Green Gates, a story of New York and of Long Island country house life, by Katharine McCheever Meredith; and Sir Mark, a tale of the first capital, by Anna Robeson Brown.

The Boston Journal recently printed the views of Dr. Butler, President of Colby University, on literature. He condemned Robert Elsmere, She, and other novels, saying they belonged to the Duchess class. They were but the chaff, he said. A few days later the same paper printed statements from President Eliot of Harvard, Mrs. Margaret Deland, Mrs. Elizabeth Stuart Phelps Ward, Mr. Nathan Haskell Dole, and others. President Eliot said the definition was too severe. Mrs. Deland said the criticism was a flippant generalization. The others, without exception, caviled at Dr. Butler's generalization, Prof. Marsh of Harvard holding that his method of exclusion was a dangerous one to follow. "As I study the history of literature," he said, "the impression that those literary works are most successful which seem most completely to fulfill their functions at the moment they are produced, becomes deeper. That is the feasible criterion to apply to literature."—The Critic.

Reduce your obesity by taking Brooke's Phytola ca. Pleasant to take. Makes walking a pleasure. No diet necessary. Trial size 50 cents. Try it. Get it at 119 Powell Street. Mailed free on receipt of price.

EASTER!

New Easter Cards
New line of Prayer Books
Fine Stationery at

DODGE'S

Our New Store
Our only one
112 Post St., the
Yellow Store next
The White House

DRAMATIC NOTES.

COMING EVENTS IN THE THEATER WORLD.

The Baldwin suffered a change in its audiences this week. The play of "Monte Cristo," which Mr. O'Neill declares has been a steady money-maker, certainly has not proved any great attraction here. "Virginius," which has been done to death in this city, did not prove any better card. "The Courier of Lyons" seems better suited to Mr. O'Neill's abilities. The matinée this afternoon will be devoted to "Virginius," while "Monte Cristo" will be presented to-night and to-morrow night. Next week Mr. O'Neill will present another varied repertory.

The Tivoli is again favored with crowds nightly, who witness an excellent performance of "Said Pasha." The company is rehearsing the coming Easter spectacular, "Blue Beard."

The bill at the Orpheum this week has preserved the best features of last week's performance, with several new people added. Segommer has given some very good new imitations and repeated his old ones, besides making a number of rather skilful lightning sketches. The Marvelles are clever pantomimists, and Bruet and Riviere continue to draw big applause for their vocal imitations. Next week, Elena Leila, a soprano prima donna, La Bella Carmen, a Terpsichorean wire artist, and Ames Adonis, contortionist, are among some of the new people.

Seidl and his Metropolitan Orchestra will make an extended Western tour, beginning at Rochester, May 2d, and reaching San Francisco, it is said, about May 18th, where the company will remain for two weeks. They are to play under the management of Friedlander, Gottlob & Co.

Peter Dailey comes next week to the California, in his new play entitled "The Night Clerk."

One of the New York papers contains the following: "What a contrast this engagement of Duse has been compared with the first! It took ten days for the reviewers to get it through their heads that Duse was not a commonplace, ineffective mediocre actress. The public seemed to be equally slow to grasp the quality of her work. Her early performances were not honored by large audiences. All this is changed now. The Rip Van Winkle critics have awakened to a fitting knowledge of her art and her genius, and very large receipts have been the rule during her stay at the Fifth-avenue Theater."

Notwithstanding much adverse criticism, "Sinbad" has continued on its merry way, packing the Columbia during all the week. Next week Frank Mayo will open in his dramatization of Mark Twain's "Pudd'nhead Wilson," one of his greatest successes.

"The Red Pocket Book" has brought the customary crowds to Morosco's this week. The story is a French one, full of rather picturesque melodrama. It was very well played by the company, and its stage setting was such as to put many productions at higher-priced houses in the shade. One or two members of this company have become settled in certain mannerisms, a danger to which the members of stock companies are nearly always liable, and should bestir themselves in the matter. The voice that suits one character does not always suit another, and while it may be difficult to do so, it is often as necessary to give a voice to a certain part as a make-up, in order to make it realistic. The stage manager should look to this.

Leonard Grover's Alcazar is still in the continuous show business. There are several bright people connected with his company who are seen in a short comedy or a farce just before the vaudeville performance begins, and who are worthy of better plays than those to which their energies are usually devoted. A few crisp, up-to-date little curtain-raisers would be very well suited to these indefatigable workers, who deserve really more success than they are getting.

An elaborate program has been prepared by the students of the Columbia School of Art, for next Thursday afternoon April 9th, at the Columbia Theater. Besides the first public appearance of a number of students, there will be an overture by the Mascagni Mandolin Club of fourteen young ladies, directed by Professor Piccirillo. The comedies entitled, "Parents' Tribulations," "An Oak in the Storm," and the New York Herald prize play, "Hearts," will be presented here for the first time. There will also be songs by Frank Coffin and Miss Norah Malley. In addition to the above, some of the students will be heard in an original opera by Mr. Rohrer, while the garden scene from "Marie Stuart" will be acted by Miss Freda Gallick and Miss Colby. Other students will be seen in the various specialties taught in the School. General admission will be fifty cents, to any part of the house.

9-10

of the shoes sold as "hand-sewed" are Goodyear Welts. They're better than hand-sewed, but cost less to make. The dealer gets a handsome profit; you get better shoes. The honors are easy.

Goodyear Welts are leather shoes not rubber

BALDWIN THEATRE — Al. Hayman and Co. Incorp'd Props

Next Week—Monday, April 6th

Second and last week of MR. JAMES O'NEILL

Monday and Tuesday — VIRGINIUS
Tuesday and Sunday — COURIER OF LYONS
Wednesday and Saturday — MONTE CRISTO
Thursday — HAMLET
Saturday Matinee — RICHELIEU

Monday, April 13th—Richard Mansfield

CALIFORNIA THEATRE — Al. Hayman and Co. Incorp'd Props

Monday April 6th—The creative comedian
PETER F. DAILEY
In John J. McNally's latest and greatest laughing success
The Night Clerk
Direct from One Hundred Nights in New York

Columbia Theatre
Friedlander, Gottlob & Co. Lessees and Managers
A Great Story—A Pacific Coast Man wrote it
A Great Play—A Pacific Coast Actor Author wrote it MARK TWAIN'S
PUDD'NHEAD WILSON
Frank Mayo and a great company, in his greatest success, at the COLUMBIA
Two Weeks, beginning Monday April 6th
Coming—EZRA KENDALL

ORPHEUM
Week of Monday, April 6th
A Magnificent New Show
4—New Acts—4
ELENA LEILA, the celebrated "Singing Doll" from the Folies Bergeres, Paris.
ROSIE RENDEL, the great international dancer from the Alhambra, London.
ADONIS AMES, gymnastic elastique performer from the Casino, Paris.
LA BELLA CARMEN, the sensational tight wire dancer from the Casino, Paris.
SEGOMMER—And a Brilliant Vaudeville Co.

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE
Handsomest Family Theatre in the World
WALTER MOROSCO, — Sole Lessee and Manager
Last Performances of The Red Pocket Book
MONDAY, APRIL 6th
Robert Drouet's Masterpiece
DORIS

TIVOLI OPERA HOUSE
MRS. ERNESTINE KREELING, Proprietor and Manager
To begin Monday, April 6th—(Every Evening)
Our Spectacular Easter Burlesque
An Arabian Knights Dream of Loveliness
BLUE BEARD
Beautiful scenery—Dazzling costumes—Entrancing ballets—Appropriate accessories—Brilliant light effects—Great cast—All the latest European and American novelties in song, dance and humor
POPULAR PRICES — 25 and 50 Cents

GROVER'S ALCAZAR
TO-NIGHT—Matinees Saturday and Sunday
THE HOMESTEAD
LEONARD GROVER, HIS HIT
Lorraine & Howells — Brown—Davidson Trial
Prices, 10c, 15c, and 25c. — Reserved Orchestra, 25c.
Monday—RANCH 10

NATIVE SONS' HALL
Mason St., between Post and Geary
Tuesday Evening, April 7th
Grand Farewell Concert tendered to S. Homer Henley
Prior to his joining the Tavary Opera Company. Assisted by Bernhard Mollenhauer Violin Virtuoso, Sigismund Martinez, Pianist, and a Host of Talent.
Tickets, including reserved seat, 50 cents. On sale at Byron Mauzy's, 308-314 Post Street.

METROPOLITAN TEMPLE
THE FAMOUS Salt Lake City MORMON Tabernacle Choir
175 Voices. 5 Grand Choral Concerts.
Wed., Thurs., Fri., Sat., and Sun., April 15th to 19th, 1896. No matinee. Prices, including reserved seat, $1.50 and $1.00. Season tickets, reserved, $5.00 and $4.00. Advance sale opens at Sherman, Clay & Co's for season tickets, April 6th, and for single nights, April 9th. Concerts begin at 8.15 P.M.

SPLASHES.

LATEST ADVICES make it improbable that the St. Louis Polo Team will visit the Coast. It is a far cry from the Mississippi here; but that does not mitigate the disappointment of learning the St. Louis Country Club is not to participate in the tournament at Burlingame. A definite refusal has been received; so the conflict for honors will again be between our men and the Riverside Team. The date of the meeting has been set for April 25th, and a close contest is promised, for, while the San Francisco men have improved materially in form, and are putting up a capital game, there is no denying that the Riverside contingent make formidable competitors. Their team will include Bettner, Seymour, and Waring, and H. Maude, a very strong player, has been substituted for Woods. In the meantime, the Burlingame men are playing for all they are worth, and the practise games are the sharpest ever seen at the Country Club. The Tobins, Baldwin, Lawson, Hobart, and McCreery are playing for places. An informal practise game took place on Sunday, but the regular practise days are Saturday and Wednesday afternoons.

* * *

The Union League Club stole a march on the Bohemian Club, with the result that while Chauncey Depew accepted the former's, he was forced to decline the latter's invitation to dinner. George Pippy telegraphed his Club's invitation to El Paso. Louis Sloss's dispatch to the same effect on the part of the Bohemians only intercepted the train bearing the magnates to the land of flowers at Yuma. That Chauncey has been regretfully obliged to decline, is a matter of some chagrin to Bohemian post-prandial speakers, who were hard at work preparing impromptu responses calculated to electrify the peerless after-dinner orator.

* * *

The café-au-lait tints of the Bohemian Club dining-room have been so much criticised that frescoers and tinters are again at work. The Club members are nothing if not esthetic and critical.

* * *

Miss Virginia Fair it seems has gone to Europe under the ægis of Mr. and Mrs. Oliver P. Belmont, which means the young Californienne will be a guest of honor at Blenheim Palace. See what it is to be an heiress under good auspices in New York. There it is possible to rise in the social arena far above the heads of the groundlings. We will hear next, I suppose, of Miss Virginia's exchanging her fortune for some historical name, though it is said Maitland Kersey is her first choice and that the object of her visit to Europe is to see the Pope for the purpose of obtaining a dispensation which will enable her to marry said Kersey. His first wife, Ivy Wandesforde, resides in Oakland still. I give this story for what it may be worth.

* * *

Neally O'Sullivan has made quite a hit in "Shamus O'Brien" which he is playing in London. He gained great kudos by his performance with the Carl Rosa Opera Company, and was selected by Doctor Stanford for the star role in his Irish Opera. It is a great success in its way, and is pronounced by the critic of the Saturday Review "a masterpiece that will probably keep the stage longer than any opera yet written by an Englishman or even an Irishman." Mr. O'Sullivan's impersonation of the role has been generally commended and his musical future is certainly assured.

* * *

Raoul Duval, who was here recently, says that '92 was one of the greatest champagne years in history—better, even, than '84. That is a point for the connoisseurs to remember. Nowadays the stock of the latter year is rather low, and the connoisseurs have diverted their attention to '89 wine, which was a capital vintage. Apropos of clarets, he states there has been drunk a good deal of the '87 vintage, which produced a very good and rather strong claret; '90 was an excellent year and produced a crack wine, but the '93 crop is enormous, and to his mind that year will be as notable for clarets as '74.

* * *

The finances at Burlingame are in an excellent condition. The recent edict of the managers has brought the delinquents to time. There is now an overflowing treasury, and I believe the outstanding dues are considerably under $1000, with prospects of final settlements ere the end of the month.

* * *

The exiles are gradually turning their footsteps homeward. Mrs. Delmas and the Misses Delmas have written announcing the tidings of their return. They are to be back here early in July, I believe. The Lows are in Paris also, and it is arranged they are to be here about the same time and will once again occupy their home on Sutter and Gough Streets. But Mrs. Easton, who was expected this year, has elected to remain until 1897 in Paris with Colonel Fred Crocker's children. By the way, they are getting along famously under the tuition of a visiting governess. Letters from Count and Countess Festetics convey the intelligence that they are still infatuated with life on the ocean wave. They are once again down in the South Seas, on the "Tolna," voyaging from coral reef to atoll, and the idea of returning does not seem to have suggested itself to them.

* * *

Milbrae is to be inhabited this summer not only by D. O. Mills, but also by Mr. and Mrs. Whitelaw Reid, who have spent the winter in Arizona. I learn that Mr. Mills has regained something of his former strength, and the beautiful country house will doubtless be the scene of some pleasant gatherings.

* * *

It is a very quiet Easter that is outlined for us. We are promised no festivities of prominence during the week following the spring festival. There are announcements of dinners, but nothing in the direction of entertainments of note nor even of weddings. This is a bit curious and suggests possibly an earlier summer than usual.

* * *

Mrs. Hagar is still indignant over the undue publicity given her theatricals, and vows that the entertainment will be her last. One cannot believe she will adhere to a determination so adverse to her character, and doubtless the performance will be followed by other festivities at which she will continue to figure as hostess. The rehearsals of "A Modern Ananias" are progressing in a manner satisfactory to Leo Cooper, who declares the dramatis personæ conduct themselves with rare industry.

* * *

I am told Mrs. Major Darling's cotillion, which was promised for Easter week, has been indefinitely postponed. The reason given is the absence of Miss Jennie Catherwood, who is still at Coronado with her aunt, Mrs. Jerome.

* * *

Mr. and Mrs. Burke Holladay, née Carrie Huntington, are back from their wedding tour, and have installed themselves in the Holladay mansion on Clay Street Heights. Mrs. Holladay is a woman of many talents and generous education, and should be a figure among the literary set here.

* * *

Mrs. Donahue and Mrs. Martin are looking anxiously forward to moving into their new home out on Broadway. The mansion is on the verge of completion, and they talk of a house-warming in the shape of a big ball.

* * *

Mrs. Munroe Salisbury left for the East quite unexpectedly to attend to certain business interests of her husband. Is it not a compliment to the capacity of this lady that her spouse, being unable to make the trip to New York at this time, felt perfectly safe in delegating his interests to her care? He even stated to a friend who interrogated him on the subject that she could negotiate and settle just as well as himself, if not better. It is a matter of fact that the brightness and intelligence of Mrs. Salisbury do not receive, out of the inner circle of her intimates, the recognition which is undoubtedly their due. She is one of the few very clever, responsive, and intelligent women composing our society, is interested in most subjects, and can hold her own in a conversational duel with most of the competitive sex.

* * *

Already people are talking about their summer excursions. According to all accounts Sausalito will enjoy much popularity. Mrs. Osgood Hooker is arranging to have house parties throughout the season, and will doubtless have her sisters as permanent guests. Miss Jennie Catherwood has declared in favor of California for the summer, and will be installed at Madrone Villa in Napa County. She proposes also to have house parties, and will certainly entertain sets of young people between Saturdays and Mondays. The Tevises, together with the Breckenridge youngsters, are going to Santa Monica for the months of June, July, and August, and Mrs. Will Tevis will spend part of the latter month with the family. Princess Poniatowski is at Santa Barbara for the moment, and, by the way, I hear the Prince is dabbling in mines. Mrs. Lawrence Poole announces her intention of spending the summer at Castle Crags. Mrs. Stanley and Miss Garber go to Napa Soda Springs. The Kruttschnitts have decided for Clear Lake where Mr. and Mrs. Babcock will be installed. Indeed, I hear considerable talk about Lake County resorts, and anticipate considerable popularity for that region.

* * *

Judging by the number of fine voices which are developed in San Francisco, it looks as though California would yet be regarded as the Italy of America. We are supplying contraltos, sopranos, bassos, and baritones to the great musical organizations, and it looks as though the supply would be adequate to the demand. The latest among our vocalists to graduate from the amateur into the professional ranks is S. Homer Henley, who has been engaged by the Tavery Opera Company to sing baritone roles. He is to have a farewell concert at the Native Sons' Hall on the evening of April 7th, and will have a number of eminent vocalists and instrumentalists assisting him.

* * *

Another musical event of note is the promised concert of the Mormon Tabernacle Choir. This is one of the great musical organizations of the country and consists of one hundred and seventy-five voices. It won the cash prize of one thousand dollars at the World's Fair in '93, and at its Spring Festival in Salt Lake recently, Paderewski played with it. The choir's excursion to California is purely a pleasure trip. It is to give eight concerts on the tour, of which five will be given in Metropolitan Hall, the first on the evening of April 15th.

* * *

There was a gay gathering at the Art Students' League, Tuesday evening, honor of Elizabeth Curtis-O'Sullivan and Miss Heyneman, who, in the early future, leave for London. The affair had the form of a surprise party; the artists' hostesses were arrayed in peasant costumes; the maccaroni band discoursed Italian and other strains, and, altogether, it was a proper and enthusiastic farewell. Mrs. O'Sullivan and Miss Heyneman propose opening a studio in London.

* * *

Easter week in Oakland is full of the promise of gaiety. There is the marriage of Miss Hattie English, the Stolp's tea, Miss Floy Brown's tea, and the big tea at Belle Rose for which the Garbers have issued invitations on Saturday. Nor must I forget the invitation german which is to be given by certain of the University boys in the Harmon gymnasium on Friday. That is to be a real function of distinct social importance and all the pretty girls of Oakland and Berkeley will be there.

* * *

The latest amusement of Washington Society is that of testing the curious theory of the hand clasp, which a certain eminent palmist has propounded. It is said that in the manner of interlacing the fingers, it is possible to obtain a vital indication of character. For instance, if the right thumb is clasped outside the left, it exhibits a vigorous temperament, and indicates the probability of control in married life. If, on the contrary, the left thumb is set on the outside when the fingers interlace, it is supposed that in the marriage relation, the wife will rule the roost. At recent Washington gatherings, there has been much fun over these tests. The manner of procedure is to persuade the victim to join his fingers naturally and without thought. Then if the left thumb prevails, he is at once accused of being his wife's subordinate, and it is suggested that he is henpecked.

* * *

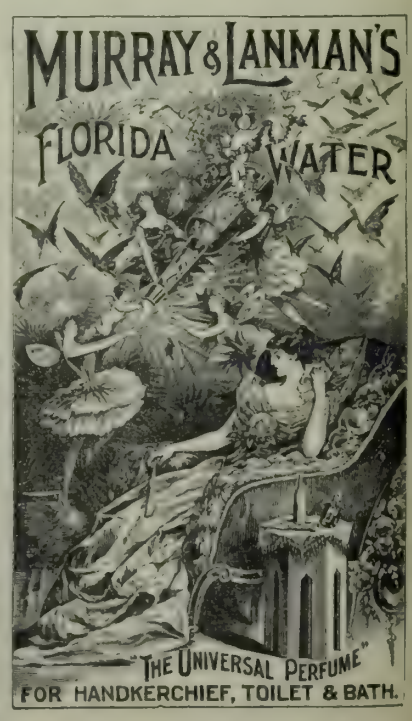
A certain Bohemian light had a birthday last Saturday, and was brilliantly entertained by his many friends. Some one presented him with a very handsome silk umbrella, which he promised never to part with; but his excellent intentions were shattered by another friend who put him in possession of some thirty-one leaden discs, which, I regret to say, are intended for the confusion of nickel-in-the-slot machines. The maker wittily calls them "telephone tokens." However, the young man marched around town with a collection of intimates, worked all the slot machines in town, and was enormously lucky, but, as a result, lost the umbrella. However, he was given a party the same evening, at which there was an admirable representation of theatrical celebrities.

* * *

The musical crowd has had considerable to entertain it of late in the way of receptions and dinners. Mrs. Birmingham was given a dinner by Mrs. Mariner Campbell on Sunday afternoon last, preparatory to her departure for the East. The guests were all of musical proclivities, and the conversation ranged over the broad field of harmonic endeavor. Another musical entertainment was a little festival given in honor of William Simonson by Mr. A. F. Schleicher, who has a charming residence near the corner of O'Farrell and Franklin Streets. Mr. Schleicher has a charming taste in decorations, and his rooms certainly evidence an ability at floral adornments, for they are beautifully fixed up with fruit blossoms and flowers of varied hue. Quite a party of musical celebrities were pres-

Swain's, at 213 Sutter Street, is the only place in the city at which one can find first-class pies, cakes, and confectionery.

Chew Adams' Pepsin Tutti-Frutti. It is sovereign for Indigestion and agreeable to the taste.



A Prominent Feature

of the

World's Leading Hotel

The Grill Room of the Palace.

PHOTOS BY TABER.

ent, including Frank Coffin, Mrs. Van Vlack, Doctor Sieberst, M. Delpiane, and many others, all of whom were heard either in singing or selection. Mr. Simonson, by the way, is a brother of the San Francisco cantatrice, Madame Saville, who is singing at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York, and has been one of the celebrities of the opera season there. He goes on to join her.

* * *

The sash worn by his deceased Majesty King Kalakaua, on the occasion of his coronation, has been presented by Ensign Stearns of the "Bennington" to the Bohemian Club, and will find a place on the walls of the Red Room.

* * *

Horace Platt's portrait in oils is ready to be added to the gallery of past presidents of the Bohemian Club, and will be hung, after his successor is chosen on April 13th, in the library. The portrait is by Ernest C. Peixotto, and is now installed on an easel, in the Café, to be criticised by the members. On the whole, it is a very good piece of portraiture. The pose is true to life, is, in fact, characteristic, and the expression of the face lacks little to make it a perfect counterfeit.

* * *

The coming event in artistic circles is a "Trilby" night at the Art Students' Studio, 610 Montgomery Street. The young ladies who preside over the destinies of this studio have invited the newspaper illustrators to an entertainment, and promise them refreshments, liquid and otherwise, in return for their presence. The feature of the evening will be a keg of beer, of which Hayden Jones has been appointed custodian, while Robert Edgren, the eminent hammer-thrower who wields a pencil in the Examiner art room, is to pose as "bouncer." The features will include Jimmie Swinnerton, Phil Hastings, Bob Mitchell, and various other celebrities of similar ability. The evening should be an important contribution to artistic endeavor.

* * *

The latest novelty at the Woman's Exchange is "afternoon tea." Hereafter, ladies on shopping bent may wander into the Exchange rooms between the hours of three and five, and be regaled with a cup of the beverage that cheers without inebriating. The new custom is to be duly initiated at an inaugural tea on the afternoon of April 9th.

* * *

The marriage celebration of Dr. Hatch and Miss Greenebaum somewhat resembled an afternoon reception. The ceremony was performed at four o'clock with Dr. Voorsanger officiating, in the presence of the innumerable friends and relatives of the bride and groom. The bride wore a tailor-made costume of cadet blue material, and looked decidedly handsome. She is really one of the best-looking girls in Society. Her two sisters were bridesmaids, and Mr. Morrow officiated as best man. It is alleged that the presents of the two uncles, Louis Sloss and Louis Gerstle, took the shape of substantial checks. However, there were some very pretty articles de vertu among the gifts, including a beautiful fish set from Herman Shainwald and a set of crystal glassware from the parents of the groom. The happy pair are to reside at Jackson, Amador County, where Dr. Hatch is to practise his profession.

* * *

Miss Alice Coleman, whose beautiful contralto voice attracted considerable attention while she was yet at school, is about to develop into a real celebrity. She sang for Madam Materna recently, and that cantratrice pronounced her voice a great organ and promised her a brilliant future. Indeed, she went so far as to say that it was among the very best natural contraltos she had ever heard, and with proper cultivation would win its owner world wide prominence. Miss Coleman is to proceed to Paris at once for a thorough musical education, and will, I presume, add something more to the fame of San Francisco. She is a sister of Charles Coleman and a niece of Police Commissioner Gunst.

* * *

It seems much discussion has been aroused by the action of Doctor Voorsanger, who presided at the marriage of Doctor Hatch and Miss Millie Greenebaum, when he refused to perform the marriage ceremony for Mr. Ferguson and Miss Eppinger, in which the conditions were similar. In both instances the brides were of the Jewish faith, but in the case of Miss Eppinger the Rabbi declined to relax the rule. The motives of his liberality in the instance of Miss Greenebaum are variously attributed.

* * *

The Misses Hyman have as their guest at the Richelieu, Miss Feldberg a decidedly handsome young lady from St. Helena. She is tall and stately and, like the maidens of that northern region, rather given to athletics. There was a lunch in her honor on Saturday at which she met quite a number of Miss Hyman's friends.

* * *

There are to be several theater parties on Monday night at the Pete Dailey opening. Mrs. Lièvre has invited some thirty of her friends, and Mr. and Mrs. Edmund Tauszky have quite a large gathering for the same show.

* * *

IT WOULD BE HARD to express accurately the character of the late Mrs. Chris Miller without seeming effusively eulogistic. She was a rarely endowed creature, beautiful, fascinating, and intelligent. A casual meeting convinced one that she possessed charming manners, an equable disposition, and a delightful tactfulness in addition to the obvious charm of a lovely face. As Ena Tucker, she was unquestionably the most beautiful member of a family notable for its good looks and it is admitted she was as pretty a girl as ever made a début in Oakland Society. Unconscious of her charm, she made no effort at cultivating the vogue which her physical grace and magnetism immediately won but seemed better content to remain home or in the society of her friends than to accept the multitude of invitations which would have afforded her a broader sphere of conquest. Some six years ago Miss Tucker married Mr. C. O. G. Miller, and her life since has been conducted under those auspices of plentitude and contentment which, we are told, furnish the highest basis of happy living. Only two years ago, the consumption, from which she died, showed itself, and she and her husband started off on a southern trip, voyaging as far south as New Orleans, and lingering some time in Southern California, but she hated travel and longed to be home again with her children. Since then, she has been more or less of an invalid, appearing at parties, it is true, being hostess herself at intervals, but her activity has been spasmodic. Her ailment became active three months ago, and since then it has simply been a struggle with death. Her loss is the disappearance of a rare and beautiful personality.

* * *

East Oakland Society is still celebrating Mrs. Strong of Chicago, and is entertaining her at dinners and lunches, and other forms of gastronomic enjoyment. Mrs. Curtis had a euchre party for her; Sumner Bugbee entertained her at a dinner, and I believe there are to be several informal receptions and other things ere she flits to the windy burg of her adoption.

* * *

IT IS holy week in Oakland as much as elsewhere, and Oakland is living up to it. Just at the moment, nothing is happening in the social way. The influences of sanctification have even stilled the gossip of recent engagements. One hears some little talk of Miss Stebbin's gymnasium project, and the manner in which biceps may influence the cut of evening gowns—that is all. The daily service of the Episcopal Church rejoices in almost a Sabbath congregation, though I regret to admit that the attendance during the previous weeks of Lent has been extremely slim. The fact is, the observance of the holy season is confined nowadays to abstinence from dancing. The creed of debutante and belle permits indulgence in all sorts and conditions of delights save those of Terpsichore. They will drive with you, ride with you, dine with you, lunch with you, but they will not dance with you; and they feel themselves very virtuous for this renunciation.

* * *

There is some talk on Jackson Street over my comments on the domesticity of Oakland. In all seriousness, can it be denied that Oakland is little more than a country town? Its business streets are lined with unattended buggies and carriages, and a mere candy store is the meeting place of its social forces. After calling, the several sets inevitably converge at Lenhardt's, and you hear there the latest gossip aired to the accompaniment of ice-cream soda. There is, of course, considerable small sociability in Oakland—informal dinners and less formal lunches. No one thinks anything of dropping in to dinner at a friend's house. When at home, maids and matrons live at the telephone—indeed, telephoning is a favorite diversion of the social populace; it exchanges invitations and news over the wires; it gets prices and does its marketing through the phone, and, indeed, conducts an integral portion of its daily life by means of this useful medium.

* * *

The engagement of Miss Myra Prather and Mr. Harry Miller is being celebrated by the several clans with proper feasting. Mrs. Tom Prather gave a dinner the other night to the happy twain, and invited to her board the most intimate friends of the betrothed couple. It was a decidedly handsome dinner and very gay, and I believe it transpired that the engagement had been in existence some six months. Mrs. Albert Miller, on Saturday, had some twenty-two girls to lunch, members of the Jackson-street set, of course, with a few married women. Altogether, the affair is duly proclaimed, and Miss Myra is receiving generous congratulations on all sides. In Oakland it is regarded as a specially happy fate to have a member of the Miller family as husband, for the men of that clan are supposed to be peculiarly gifted with domestic virtues.

* * *

The D. K. E. Fraternity, at Berkeley, are to produce a play in Shattuck Hall which Raymond Russ has written. Some five hundred invitations have been issued for the occasion. This is rather an innovation in Berkeley entertaining inasmuch as the "Frats" have generally confined their hospitalities to the limits of their own club house. The play is said to be quite a clever arrangement and the boys are rehearsing for all they are worth.

THE GOSSIP.

A PANEGYRIC.

"More than any other volume it is indispensable to the student and the scholar.

"It is a working library in itself, and will answer almost every question we can put to it.

"It contains more knowledge than any other single volume in the world.

"It is a photograph of the present state of civilization. All sciences, philosophies, arts, customs, and histories are condensed and reproduced in it.

"If one were required to deposit a single volume that would reveal to future ages the present state of the world, the Standard Dictionary would be the book. More than any other volume it would tell the story.

"It is full of suggestion, and the imagination flames as we look through it.

"It is stored with the raw materials of all science and literature.

"The thoughts of coming generations are already mirrored on its pages. Coming events here cast their shadows before.

"Matchless poems lie scattered through it; all that is needed is the poet's pen to pick them out and put them together.

"Words that breathe and thoughts that burn are here waiting to thrill the world. 'Nothing is wanting,' says Emerson, 'but a little shuffling, sorting, ligature, and cartilage.'

"To turn its pages and become familiar with it is an education.

"It is the latest university.

"After the Bible it is the first book one should own.

"Sell your coat and buy it.

"Keep it in the study, home, office, store.

"No one can live with this book and not have his thoughts widened with the process of the suns.

"For twenty-five years to come it will shine in the literary heavens as a star of the first magnitude, to enlighten and guide the millions of the English-speaking world."—REVEREND J. H. SNOWDEN, in The Home Journal.

E. D. Bronson & Co., Pacific Coast Agents, Standard Dictionary, 933 Market Street, San Francisco, Cal.

The merchants of San Francisco are fast awakening to the fact that advertising, to ensure the best results, must be done through an expert, and this is made more evident by the fact that the business of Wilder & Co., the leading advertising specialists of this city, has increased to such an extent that they have been obliged to move to larger quarters in the Esterbrook Block at 22 Geary Street. Although Wilder & Co., have been in business only a few years, they have built up a business which is unrivaled west of Chicago. At the present time, they are writing and placing about thirty seven and one-half per cent of all the advertisements which appear in the daily papers. By their removal, Wilder & Co. were enabled to add an art room to their establishment in which are designed circulars, posters, and all other work which requires artistic ability and a thorough knowledge of the advertising business. They have also added a Coast advertising agency by which they are now enabled to give merchants all information desired relative to the value of different western papers as advertising mediums. Most of large Pacific Coast papers are kept on file, and any merchant desiring to advertise his business outside of San Francisco should not fail to call and talk the subject over with Wilder & Co.

Adams's Tutti-Frutti Chewing Gum for Indigestion.

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist, 806 Market St.

Kelly's Corn Cure never fails. 25 cents. 102 Eddy Street.

New Season——

EEL RIVER CREAMERY BUTTER

Finest on the Market

Good Appetite

Is restored and the disordered Stomach and Liver invigorated by taking a small wineglassful, before meals, of the celebrated . . . . . .

Peruvian Bitters

GEO. GOODMAN

Patentee and Manufacturer of Schillinger's Patent Artificial Stone In all its branches

SIDE WALK and GARDEN WALK A Specialty

Office, 307 MONTGOMERY ST. Nevada Block, SAN FRANCISCO

LA GRANDE LAUNDRY CO. Telephone, Rush 12

Principal office, 23 Powell St., Branch, 11 Taylor St., Laundry, Twelfth St., San Francisco, Cal.

All odd jobs mending, sewing on buttons etc., free of charge. Orders left at either will receive prompt attention. Work called for and delivered to any part of the city, free of charge.

Wedding Invitations are properly engraved and in correct form, at ROBERTSON'S

COMET OOLONG——

The oldest and most reliable brand of Tea on the market. Sold only in ⅓ pound papers at 20 cents per paper.

——All grocers keep it.

Gladness Comes

With a better understanding of the transient nature of the many physical ills which vanish before proper efforts—gentle efforts—pleasant efforts—rightly directed. There is comfort in the knowledge that so many forms of sickness are not due to any actual disease, but simply to a constipated condition of the system, which the pleasant family laxative, Syrup of Figs, promptly removes. That is why it is the only remedy with millions of families. and is everywhere esteemed so highly by all who value good health. Its beneficial effects are due to the fact, that it is the one remedy which promotes internal cleanliness, without debilitating the organs on which it acts. It is therefore all important, in order to get its beneficial effects, to note when you purchase, that you have the genuine article, which is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only, and sold by all reputable druggists.

If in the enjoyment of good health, and the system is regular, then laxatives or other remedies are not needed. If afflicted with any actual disease, one may be commended to the most skillful physicians, but if in need of a laxative, then one should have the best, and with the well-informed everywhere, Syrup of Figs stands highest and is most largely used and gives most general satisfaction.

J. F. Cutter

EXTRA

Old Bourbon

has been a staple family and medicinal whiskey for a quarter-century

E. MARTIN

—AND—

CO.

411 MARKET ST.

SAN FRANCISCO

FOR GRIPPE IT'S A DANDY

VINA BRANDY

AND

It's Pure! That's Sure!

VINA DISTILLERY CO.

819 Market St., S. F.

RIPPLES.

TROUT FISHING.

It is unprofessional to fish for trout with bait with which you know you will be able to catch a few fish. For instance, if you use salmon roe for bait and catch a couple of hundred trout, you are not considered in it; but if you bait your hook with a piece of common red brick and catch one fish, you are a sportsman of the first water.

To be a sportsman among anglers, and to have your name appear regularly in the Rod and Reel column of the papers devoted to the so-called sport, you must catch fish merely for the pleasure of depriving them of life. Should you catch them merely because you like their flavor and prefer them to any other kind of meat, you are not a sport, but a pretender, who fishes for the purpose of satisfying an epicurean appetite—a gourmand.

"Why," some will explain, "he doesn't fish for sport, but for the purpose of eating his catch." Oh, horrors!

Some people cannot fish unless they are provided with a split-bamboo pole, reel, and a whole lot of unnecessary paraphernalia. I was the same way once myself, but soon caught on. I concluded that the easiest way to catch fish was by the use of a certain kind of bait which was never known to fail.

Instead of walking up stream seven or eight miles and whipping it down, as I formerly did, I now walk up stream a half or a quarter of a mile, select a nice, shady tree close to the water, unpack my basket, which is stocked with everything worth eating and drinking, get out my periodicals and cigars, and put in a pleasant day undisturbed by any one until about three or four in the afternoon, when a barefooted boy, with a broad-brimmed hat on his head, invariably puts in an appearance with a mess of fine trout strung on a willow branch, which I manage to catch and transfer to my basket with the aforesaid never-get-left bait, which, I presume, you have all used yourselves at times.

"How many fish did you catch?" some one will inquire at the hotel.

"Well, I brought home an even ninety-nine," I will reply.

"Yes, I know; but how many did you catch?"

What's a person to reply to such a query as that? If you are a sportsman in the full sense of the word, you will tell him the truth, for who ever heard of a true sport fibbing about the number of fish he brings home, or the size, weight, etc., of any particular fish? If you are a novice, and, of course, not a sport, you will tell that which never happened. The time you had in landing the largest one; how you came near losing him; how the reel hummed when he shot down stream, and that you were exactly forty-five minutes by the watch in landing him. Then you can state that you had another hooked about three times the size of the largest one you brought home, but he snapped the leader and got away; that you would have given ten years of your life to have landed him. However, you intend to try for this big fellow again some day.

Then some fireside fisherman sitting at the other end of your line of admirers will ask, "How far up the creek was it that you hooked the big fellow?" and you will reply, "Close under that big bluff of rocks, quite a piece up." You can always say that with safety. The other fellow will then be sure to say, "What? Just this side of where that big tree has fallen across the creek?" And upon you replying in the affirmative, he will then state, "Why, I've had that big fellow hooked a dozen times, if I've had him hooked once. No use trying to catch him; he's too big to land."

I could go fishing every day in the week, excepting Sunday, and enjoy myself. It is foolish to waste your time fishing on the Sabbath, for you will not catch enough fish to pay for your trouble. It was a long time before I could understand why I could not catch as many fish on the Sabbath as on week days; but I finally observed that there was a reason and a good one, which was not because the parents of the barefooted country boy insisted upon his remaining at home and perusing his catechism on that day, but because there were always more fishermen on the Sabbath than any other day in the week. Ministers never fish on Sunday; on that day they put in their spare moments digging bait, that they may fish on Monday.

SURE.

Done up Brown—Mrs. Davidson.

MOST ASSUREDLY.

The female who is most persistent in her objection to bloomers is the young girl who has just donned long dresses.

MOST OF THEM DO.

Teacher—What does h-a-m-m-e-r spell?

Tommy—Don't know, ma'am.

Teacher—What does your mother drive nails with, stupid?

Tommy—A stove lifter.

YES.

Mr. Blossom—My dear, there are times and times.

Mrs. Blossom—Yes, and you've been on 'em all.

WELL NAMED.

"That boy of mine is a regular flying machine."

"How's that?"

"He won't work."

OF COURSE.

"What makes your husband look so sober to-night?"

"I presume it's because he's drunk."

NEWS.

Mr. Blossom (looking up from the paper)—By Jove! I see that Joe Jobson was shot by a woman last night.

Mrs. Blossom—Who is Joe Jobson?

Mr. Blossom (resuming his paper)—Hanged if I know; but I see he was shot by a woman, just the same.

WHEN SHE OBJECTED.

Bloomer—Doesn't your wife object when you go to lodge?

Blossom—No; but she objects when I get home.

WE ALL OBJECT.

Sniggles—What do you think of the X rays?

Wiggles—I object to 'em. The first thing you know they will be getting up an X ray for our wives to photograph our breaths when we come home at night to see whether we have been drinking or having bay rum put upon our mustaches.

IN FRISCO.

She—Sir, you have insulted me.

He—Pardon me, but I cannot insult any one. I am a minister, and what I have done is only indiscreet and ungentlemanly. A minister can never insult. BRUNO.

Sing a song of microbes,
System full of germs!
Twenty thousand typhoids—
A rise in doctors' terms.
When the well is opened
Long-vanished puss is found,
Isn't it a mercy
We're not all under ground?

—New York World.

For relieving throat diseases, coughs, and hoarseness, use "BROWNS' BRONCHIAL TROCHES." Sold only in boxes. Avoid imitations

When you are selecting a wedding present, go to S. & G. Gump's, 113 Geary Street. They have a magnificent variety to choose from.

Does your hair need a tonic? Quinania removes scurf and cleanses the scalp; strengthens the hair, renders it soft and brilliant, and prevents falling out. Price, 35 cents per bottle. If your dealer doesn't sell it, get it at Lederer's, 111 Stockton Street.

IN THE DAYS OF RALSTON.

One's memory need not run back to any great length to recall the days when Ralston and Reese and other of our prominent citizens walked to North Beach for the sake of an invigorating salt water plunge. That era, happily, has gone by. The Lurline Baths provide the best imaginable facilities for swimming, and the institution is almost in the very center of our city. The latest feature which the Olympic Salt Water Company has added to the luxuries of its menage is a Russian Bath with Needle Shower. This latest improvement is now in working order, and proves a great attraction. The price for the above, which includes the Swimming Bath, has been established at the low rate of fifty cents.

There may be other Shirts as good as "STANDARD," but they cost more. There may be others the same price, but they are not as good. There may be others even that are as good and as cheap as "STANDARD," but they are not Californian.

LOOK FOR THIS MARK ON EVERY STANDARD SHIRT

Napa Soda Springs California's Famous Mountain Spa!

HAVE YOU BEEN THERE LATELY?

1000 feet above Napa Valley. Climate unsurpassed. Views magnificent. Table supplied from orchard and ocean, field and farm Hot and cold Napa Soda water baths. Telephone and Postoffice. Burros to ride. Bowling alleys, tennis, croquet swings and hammocks New improvements every year. Gas and running water in every room. Relief for asthmatics WARM WATER SWIMMING TANK. An ideal summer resort. Children's paradise, mothers' delight, husbands' rest. Address ANDREW JACKSON, Napa Soda Springs, P. O.

APRIL SHOWERS

may bring May flowers, but they also bring many a cold and many a rheumatic twinge. A good place to spend April is at Byron, for the weather is perfect, and your ills, if you have any, are sure of a cure in the waters there.

BYRON HOT SPRINGS

Contra Costa Co., Cal.

TAVERN OF CASTLE CRAG

QUEEN OF ALL MOUNTAIN RESORTS

The Tavern of Castle Crag, the most beautiful, attractive and accessible of all mountain resorts, will open for the reception of guests, June 1, and will close October 1, 1896.

GEORGE SCHONEWALD, Manager

ROOM 59, UNION TRUST BUILDING
SAN FRANCISCO

SEA BEACH HOTEL, SANTA CRUZ, CAL.

The Ideal Summer Resort should offer gaiety for the gay, rest for the weary, a beautiful country for the nature lover, a pleasant home and genial climate for all. These and many other attractions may be found at the Sea Beach Hotel, within easy reach of San Francisco. For additional information, address—

JOHN R. CHACE,
Proprietor.

Beecham's pills are for biliousness, bilious headache, dyspepsia, heartburn, torpid liver, dizziness, sick headache, bad taste in the mouth, coated tongue, loss of appetite, sallow skin, etc., when caused by constipation; and constipation is the most frequent cause of all of them.

Go by the book. Pills 10¢ and 25¢ a box. Book free at your druggist's or write B. F. Allen Co., 365 Canal Street, New York.

Annual sales more than 6,000,000 boxes.

PERRIER-JOUET CHAMPAGNE EXTRA DRY "SPECIAL"

Also specially selected stock of Clarets and White Wines on hand.

W. B. CHAPMAN, Sole Agent Pacific Coast
123 California Street

THE WHITE FLYER IS THE MOUNT FOR '96
BARNES BICYCLES
HOOKER & CO.
16-18 Drumm St.
RETAIL STORE:
1640 Market St.
San Francisco, Cal.
THE WHITE RIMMED HUMMER IS THE COMER

A CARLOAD OF '96
PIERCE TRIED AND TRUE CYCLES
JUST RECEIVED
Many Superior Improvements. Ask to see the
Pierce Crank Hanger
Holbrook, Merrill & Stetson
Pacific Coast Agents
MARKET and BEALE STREETS
SAN FRANCISCO
Ask for Catalogue

A HOME PRODUCT
AXLE-EASE
THE VERY BEST AXLE GREASE
Made by—
AMERICAN OIL CO.
SAN FRANCISCO

GEORGE E. HALL
Agent and Importer of Foreign Wines
MUTUAL LIFE BUILDING,
222 Sansome Street

THE WHEEL.

CONTRIBUTIONS FROM SOME COMPETENT CYCLISTS ON CURRENT CONTENTIONS.

With this issue, THE WAVE establishes a department devoted to the interests of cyclists and the wheel. It will not attempt to furnish the news of the wheeling fraternity, for that is already done with more or less of thoroughness by the daily press, but the endeavor will be made to supply such comment and criticism on wheeling affairs as may from time to time seem apropos. It is the purpose, further, to publish short articles on various subjects connected with cycling, the distinguishing feature of which will be that in every case they come from an authority on the subject treated.

THE RELAY RACE.

BY C. MICHENER.

The eight or ten thousand wheelmen who live around the Bay are all athrob with an anticipation that grows tenser as the days pass.

Who will win the Relay? That is the question that fills the air in all the club-rooms; for this, the most important race of the year, will be decided within the next few days. The most important race of the year? Yes, and the phrase is used with no limitations as to place, for it is a matter of universal concession that the hundred-mile relay of the California Associated Cycling Clubs is planned and executed on a larger scale than any other wheeling contest in any part of the world. From the mere fact that, including the officials, the contestants, their trailers and assistants, the race involves nearly a thousand participants, the magnitude of the event is apparent. Then it is a road race, and despite the opposition of the track-racing men to this branch of the sport, there is no doubt of its superior hold on the public interest.

This is so for several reasons, but most of all because it is less artificial, as it were than a race upon a track, and seems more of a demonstration of the practical possibilities of the wheel. The bicycle, naturally, is for use upon the road, and it is to that use only that ninety-nine out of every hundred of the spectators at a race meet of any sort put the machine. Then, too, the Relay is a race from start to finish; not a contest for position and a clever final sprint of an eighth or a fifth. As for the excitement and thrill of it, there can be no comparison. Its dangers are of an order that every one of the onlookers must share in some degree every time he rides over the road, while the risk of mishap on the track is much less nearly related to the experiences of the audience.

Of course in a road race it is out of the question to keep the riders in view for any great portion of the distance. Still, it is easily possible for the San Francisco and Alameda County wheelmen to see both start and finish of this particular struggle for club supremacy. Probably the best place for observation on this side of the Bay is the top of the six-mile hill on the San Bruno Road, a point about in the middle of the first and most difficult relay. Then, after the riders have passed, the time is of course ample to get over to the finish in Alameda.

The recent meeting of the Board of Governors and their action in postponing the Relay to the twelfth inst. calls for some comment. The ostensible reason for the change in date was that the fifth of April fell on Easter Sunday, and that it would be jarring to many to make the day the occasion of such a contest. It is quite possible that some of the delegates really have such finely graduated consciences as to enable them to condone Sunday racing in general and yet condemn a race on Easter Sunday, but in the case of the majority of the members of the Board it is pretty safe to say that beyond and below their religious qualms there lurked other motives for the postponement. Perhaps the Garden Cities thought an additional week might do something toward improving the state of Hardy Downing's nose; perhaps the Olympic Wheelmen had in mind the benefits of another week of training to their recently married champion; perhaps—but speculations are useless. No, nothing can explain the change except the fact that Easter Sunday is the first Sunday in April.

Now, what will be the effect of the week of waiting? Will the great axe fall during the last few days of suspense?

The Headsman is silent—characteristically silent—on the subject. Still, an involuntary gesture toward the clouds, a twitching of the eye-muscles, and divers and sundry internal and unintelligible vocal rumblings proclaim to the knowing ones all too surely that Uncle Robert is thinking, that he is restraining himself, that the restraint is an effort. From the point of view of the Relay, the club that would suffer most notably, should Mr. Welch exercise his authority and render apparent the dread possibilities of the "suspicious circumstances" clause of the League Constitution, is the Olympic Club Wheelmen. That three of their best riders might be relegated to the professional class is a possibility not noticeable for its remoteness. Then the Bay Cities might very probably feel the force of the blow in one or two instances. Yes, it is a safe bet that if any change is made in the status of any rider, three clubs will alter the make-up of their teams, as to the last Relay at least.

A SECOND OF CYCLING.

BY C. S. WELLS.

The most exciting second of my life? Well, it isn't hard to pick out, although I have had a good many exciting seconds since my connection with cycling began that were full enough of interest to make them not easily forgotten.

I have ridden around tracks pretty fast on several occasions, and have felt the thrill a person experiences when, having watched his competitors through the grind, he summons up his energies for the final sprint, and wins out or is beaten by a tire-width. There is often an excitement about the last jump of such a struggle that a man does not soon forget. But there has come within my wheeling experience a moment of excitement of another kind which is almost unique, and the memory of that second is so vivid that it will not soon depart.

It was just about the middle of February last. The Syracuse team was at San Diego, where we were engaged in placing world's records to the credit of the crimson rims with clock-work regularity. On this particular morning I was feeling just fit, and the team manager determined to send me against the world's record for the mile, paced by the sextet.

You have seen one of these big machines, no doubt—there were two at the late Cycle Show here—and can appreciate the mass and strength of the two hundred pounds of tire and tubing that support the weight of six riders.

We started off gently and warmed up for two laps. Stone was steering, and Schmidt, Washburn, Terrill, Vaughn, and Swanbrough manned the machine. Then came the real start, and they crossed the tape at better than a 1:40 clip. I was following within three inches of the big rear tire, even touching it now and then with my front wheel. In work of that kind you watch the rear tire all the time and let the world fly under you.

We had gone about half a lap in this way when I heard the sharp report that means a bursting tire. Keep the speed in mind now and try to think what a mile in 1:40 means. The sextet wobbled and swung toward the fence. Then I commenced to think. Before that I had been watching that tire with every nerve. But now the tire was gone. The whole thing was the matter of a second, and yet in that little time I remember thinking if they keep on in that way I could pass them, but the fence would tear their legs off, sure as fate. Stone knew that. He turned the machine round, and there it lay sprawled out straight across the track, trembling like a live thing. I had swerved as much as I could away from the sextet, hoping to pass it, but going at that clip you can't make much of a change of direction in a moment. It brought me right opposite the third man. I could see him lying there pinned down by the machine, and I thought: Here goes for Washburn! It wasn't a matter of choice. I struck him in the middle of the back, and that raised me up in the air, and I went along, still riding, for about ten feet. Then I don't know what happened. I know I landed somewhere on the other side of the six-seater. As soon as I struck the ground I was up, comparatively unhurt, and the most exciting second of cycling in my experience was over.

THE POLICY OF THE LEAGUE DIVISION.

BY F. H. KERRIGAN, CHIEF CONSUL.

The remarkable increase in membership of the League of American Wheelmen throughout the United States last year called for much comment, but its growth since the beginning of the present year has been much more surprising. New members have been coming in at the rate of two thousand a month, and last week showed an increase of more than nine hundred. Meanwhile the North California Division has not been idle. Since the beginning of the year it has added more than four hundred to its list of members. With this increase in membership there is naturally a proportionate increase in the power of the League for work along the lines for which it was organized, and the present administration feels confident of definite and immediate good results in this Division.

The first step of our work is to unite with the League of American Wheelmen every eligible cyclist in California. Progress in this direction has already been rapid and satisfactory through the energetic efforts of the Membership Committee, assisted by the full Board of Officers. These gentlemen have visited the various wheeling clubs of San Francisco and vicinity, and now intend to carry the campaign further into the interior, preaching the League doctrine, the gospel of good roads, throughout the territory of the Division. Visits to Sacramento, Santa Rosa, and Petaluma are already planned, and no club of any size will be overlooked.

The Highway Improvement Committee is actively engaged in uniting the users of roads and streets, whether wheelmen or not, that all may be ready for definite action should any nominee of any of the political parties prove unwilling to declare himself wholeheartedly in favor of any measure looking to the improvement of our highways. In connection with the other organizations, the League will endeavor to effect the passage of such legislation both by Boards of Supervisors and the Legislature as will tend to this end.

Partisan organizations of wheelmen for political purposes are a menace to the power of the League for good. As wheelmen, we are all in politics, but for the purpose of bringing about the election to office of men because they are in favor of road and street improvement because they are in favor of the maintenance of the rights of wheelmen as the users of vehicles, and not because they are Democrats, Republicans, or Populists.

fail

Stand close to a high fence and try to leap over. You fail. Walk back a few steps, get a good start. The fence is easily cleared. Neglect your cough, never mind your loss in weight, and when consumption faces you, your strength may not be sufficient to carry you over the danger-line. If you could only go back a few weeks and make a good start, you might win.

Scott's Emulsion of Cod-liver Oil, with Hypophosphites, is for you even if you are only a little thin.

SCOTT'S EMULSION has been endorsed by the medical profession for twenty years. (Ask your doctor.) This is because it is always palatable—always uniform—always contains the purest Norwegian Cod-liver Oil and Hypophosphites.

Put up in 50 cent and $1.00 sizes. The small size may be enough to cure your cough or help your baby.

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco
33 Post Street, below Kearny, Mechanics' Institute Building
Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000
JAS. D. PHELAN, Pres. GEO. A. STORY, Cashier
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.
DIRECTORS—Jas. D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. P. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.
Interest paid on term and ordinary deposits.
Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.
When opening accounts, send signature.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE
OF LONDON
Incorporated by Royal Charter A. D. 1726
Capital Paid Up, $3,406,100 Assets, $21,584,413
Surplus to Policy Holders, $5,978,281
ROBERT DICKSON, Manager
NATHAN & KINGSTON, San Francisco Agents
501 MONTGOMERY ST.

Sun Insurance Office OF LONDON
Founded A.D. 1710 Cash Assets, $10,270,535
Oldest Purely Fire Insurance Office in the World
The Lion Fire Ins. Co. Ltd., OF LONDON
Established A.D. 1879 Cash Assets, $1,108,095
The Imperial Ins. Co. Ltd., OF LONDON
Instituted A.D. 1803 Cash Assets, $9,362,920
40 Years in Business on the Pacific Coast
Manager for the Pacific Coast, WM. J. LANDERS
205 and 207 Sansome Street, near Pine

Aachen and Munich Fire Insurance Co.
Of Aix La Chapelle, Germany. Established 1805
Capital, $2,250,000.00
Total Assets, $6,854,653.65
United States Department
204 SANSOME STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

A. D. CHESHIRE, Pres. and Manager
W. O. MACDOUGALL, Secretary
CALIFORNIA UNDERTAKING CO.
Fine Funeral Furnishers
Telephone, Main 971 123 STOCKTON ST., Cor. Geary
Finest Funeral Parlors in the City
Embalming a specialty Open day and night

—SPRING SEASON, 1896

GRAND OPENING

OF

FRENCH PATTERN BONNETS

AND — HIGH ART NOVELTIES

MARIA J. STACOM

531 Sutter Street - San Francisco

MENNEN'S BORATED TALCUM

TOILET POWDER

Approved by Highest Medical Authorities as a Perfect Sanitary Toilet Preparation

For infants and adults

Delightful after shaving.

Positively relieves Prickley Heat, Nettle Rash, Chafed Skin, Sunburn etc. Removes Blotches, Pimple, makes the skin smooth and healthy.

Take No Substitutes. Sold by druggists or mailed for 25 cts.

SAMPLE MAILED (Name this paper) FREE

GERHARD MENNEN CO., Newark, N. J.

CHARLES S. WHEELER ERNST H. LUDWIG

Ernst H. Ludwig & Co.

THE MODEL AMERICAN CATERERS

Supply Wedding Breakfasts, Luncheons, Dinners, Matinee Teas and Receptions on shortest notice. Also Terrapin Entrees Luncheons and Dinners. Ice Cream, Cake, &c.

Telephone 2388 1206 SUTTER STREET

E. H. M. SPECIAL

The best WHISKEY for family use and Medicinal Purposes

RECOMMENDED

By all first-class Physicians. Sold everywhere.

E. H. MICHELS

Sole Controller

408 SANSOME ST. SAN FRANCISCO, CAL

NOBBIEST STYLES NEATEST FIT BEST MATERIALS

Up-to-Date Ideas.....

In HATS Spring and Summer Styles. now in

AT HARLOE'S

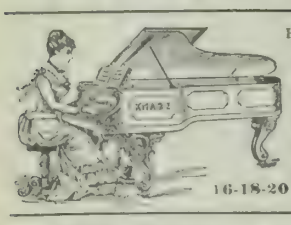
237 KEARNY ST. PHONE, RED 361

ITO, SOTOMI & CO.

JAPANESE GOODS

ART POTTERY, CURIOS AND RUGS A SPECIALTY

116 Sutter St. Bet Kearny and Montgomery San Francisco, Cal



Established 1856

Benj. Curtaz & Son

Pacific Coast Agents

16-18-20 O'Farrell St

MRS. EDITH E. McLEAN

PHYSICIAN FOR THE HAIR

Has a Canadian Vegetable Tonic for the Hair that will make it grow when all else fails. Dandruff removed. Terms moderate. High-class references.

Office Hours 10 to 12 and 1 to 6.

Rooms 45, 58 and 60 ST. ANN'S BUILDING SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

NEW YORK HAIR DRESSING STORE

MME. E. KESSING, Proprietress

Artistic Hair Dressing and Shampooing. A new preventive for the hair falling out. Superfluous hair removed. 1704 Market Street, San Francisco

FASHIONS AND FRIVOLS.

Yea, verily! So it is decreed. The big sleeve—the immutable friend of all shapes and figures, the graceful covering that converts alike the scraggy arm and the flat, flabby arm, into rounded, well-molded members, is to be relegated to that dreadful epoch known as the past, and stored away in lavender-scented trunks with grandmother's things. But the big sleeve, figuratively speaking, of course, is as brave as it is graceful and pretty, and is prepared to resist to the last.

Paquin, the celebrated, from whose dictum there is no alternative, was the first to affix his signature to the big sleeve's death warrant. The Faithful, who had never been known to do such a thing before, protested. There were disturbing murmurs on all sides, and it looked as though a petty revolution were brewing.

Paris—fashionable Paris—trembled. The blush died out of New York's cheek, and white lines began to show around the mouth. And San Francisco, placid and serene—she is so far away, just shrugged her pretty shoulders, raised her chin, and spread her sleeves.

But alas! and alack!

"All things must change
To something new, to something strange;
Nothing that is can pause or stay,
The moon will wax, the moon will wane;
The mist and cloud will turn to rain;"
The big sleeve to small sleeve again—
"To-morrow be to-day."

It is the law of Nature—and of Madam Baer, and when she speaks, Fashion humbly obeys and follows.

And so the big sleeve is going. Slowly, with many a faltering step and backward glance, but surely.

Mrs. Osgood Hooker is among the first, if not the very first, to champion the cause of the diminished sleeve. I saw her at the Columbia the other evening in a snug velvet bodice, whose sleeve, I am willing to wager, did not consume more than a yard and a half a sleeve. But Mrs. Hooker has such a pretty firm rounded arm. I admired that little knot of soft, white lace, right under the chin, the only bit of embellishment the modish corsage could boast of.

Have you a grass linen gown? If you have not see that you get one immediately. One with fanciful drawn designs, made sweetly and simply over a shot, or changeable silk foundation. If you don't want an entire grass linen gown, have embroidered bands on a drawn jacket front, it is permissible. In fact, it is the extreme of fashion to combine the modish linen with velvets and costly silks and even laces.

I saw a Paquin gown at Baer's the other day, in which this seemingly incongruous combination was most effective. The jupe was of point d'esprit, over a black satin foundation, and the bodice, a bewildering, stunning combination of turquoise velvet, grass linen, and black satin. It was just the Frenchiest thing, and—oh, yes! there was trimming on the full graceful skirt.

For skirts are going to be trimmed again. Surely but slowly it is coming upon us. Front gores are outlined with bands of jetted passementerie, or of velvet 'neath appliqued lace.

A pretty gown with trimmed skirt was one made for Miss Leah Gerst. The costume was fashioned of a very pale-tan crepon, made over a foundation slip of apple green silk. The entire front of the corsage was studded with fine steel beads, the fullness being confined with green velvet bands, appliqued with butter-colored lace medallions. The full, large puffed sleeve was finished with a deep flaring cuff of green velvet.

The green velvet stock collar was finished with a bow of honiton and tulle, fastened immediately below the chin, in the meshy folds of which nestled a fine steel ornament.

The skirt was fetching in the extreme. It was a Paquin of course, and the front gore was outlined by two graduated green velvet bands, one overlaping the other. The longest band reached to the knee, and a medallion of the lace marked the starting point at the waist line.

One of the prettiest gowns it has ever been my lot to see, was a reception gown made for a bride of last week, Mrs. Chas. Rosenbaum (née Schwabacher). It was of a mille fleur silk plaid, the ground the color of the petals of the tea rose, and the crossbars of the plaid of those exquisite mille fleurs, the bright, gay colors blending softly and the flowers natural enough to pluck. The corsage was covered entirely with yellow tulle, embroidered on stripes of color and gold. The sleeves were full, and reached just to the elbow. And oh! cunning conceit—in the ample folds of the sleeve nestled a pocket.

A narrow belt and collar of magnolia velvet completed the glories of the bodice. The skirt was full and plain.

Another stunning costume for a bride was a calling dress for Mrs. Fleishman, née Heller. It was a cameo silk in which blue, pink, green, and yellow merged into one another, the whole perfectly and harmoniously blended. The jupe was perfectly plain and the corsage embellished with inserted bands of grass linen embroidered in gold. The belt and collar were of magnolia velvet.

The latest in wraps is the fichu wrap. I saw an imported one the other day of accordion-plaited point d'esprit over black satin, the fichu ends fastening in the back with a knot of black satin ribbon and lace. Another pretty one was of accordion-plaited brown tulle edged with narrow butter mechlin and made over Nile green silk.

Easter, and not a word about hats! An unpardonable neglect, and I hasten to atone by submitting what an authority has to say on this all important subject:

"The test of a fashionably dressed woman is decided by the tilt of her hat. If its brim raises ever so little of the shadow from her eyes "the truth is not in her," and she is not "smart." The more acute the angle the more fashionable the hat. Even the beautiful, becoming big Louis Seize hats are tilted forward this season. One of the smartest hats has the full, soft-looking crown and the brim of rough, black chip. It is raised a little from the hair at the back on a big bow of serpent-green satin ribbon, while at one side a small black ostrich tip droops downward on the hair. There is a high triple plume of black ostrich feathers at one side, and a branch of pink roses at the other, which looks as if it had been newly broken from the bush. Whether this tip-tilted style of chapeau will be as becoming as it is fashionable is much to be doubted. Many faces look better in a frame rather than under a glorified extinguisher."

BABETTE.

THE WHITE HOUSE.

The other day I chanced to be in an art gallery, and, while examining the pictures, I heard a young man, whom I imagined to be a Londoner, say to a gentleman whom he addressed as Colonel:

"Do you know that in all my travels I have never been to a city which has so many interesting and curious characteristics as San Francisco—characteristics of a kind that I have never seen before."

This is exactly the fact. Where can any one expect to see such people, such typical western buildings, such objects of interest, and such commercial enterprises as are exhibited in this western metropolis?

Speaking of commercial enterprises, it many be interesting to say a few words in favor of what we may call an old house, while, at the same time, it is a new house. It is the White House, situated in the most central part of the city, on the corner of Post and Kearny Streets. It was established in 1854, and from that time until to-day its pace forward has never been impeded, and it stands now as the first and largest dry goods house on the Coast. So increased has the business been within the past two years, that an enlargement was necessary, and for this purpose the adjoining store, formerly occupied by Fratinger, has been taken in, thoroughly renovated and decorated, the partitions torn down, and, as completed, it is called the White House Annex. With this accession the store has 54,000 square feet of floor room. The space is so divided that it is easy to find one's way around from department to department. The various articles of dress and luxury are all segregated according to their kind, and it is only a matter of passing from aisle to aisle to have all one's wants gratified.

Most ladies will decide that the principal attraction of the White House is the counter at which may be seen the silks and velvets, the variety and extent of which cannot be equaled out of New York. Indeed, of this department it may be said that its reputation is far spread, I know of tourists desiring to purchase the latest in these goods deferring their purchases until reaching San Francisco. They are to be congratulated on their judgment, for the house has special connections which enable it to obtain the latest examples of these Lyon's fabrics. While there recently, I was shown pieces of the latest style velvets in chameleon shades, besides other novelties I have not space to detail.

In the annex is a counter devoted exclusively to black dress goods patterns, such as Henriettas, drap D'Almas, dragonets, etamines, cheviots, and mohairs, and other materials plain or with brocaded figures. Running at right angles, and extending to the old dress goods department, are places where one finds the latest things in handkerchiefs, fans, perfumery, and other trifles so dear to a woman's heart. There are also departments of kid, cotton, and leather goods; for laces, such as Valenciennes, Point de Luc, and others; for elegant ribbons of every variety, shade, and color. In that department you may obtain the latest designs in buttons.

But speaking of the annex, the gentlemen's furnishing department should not be overlooked. Its stock is the very finest in the city, and those purchasing here may rest assured that they are getting the finest and the latest in collars and neckwear and cuffs, the prime requisites of masculine attire.

On the lower floor one finds the department for curtains, linen goods, printed goods for summer and spring, and other fancy household articles, located as before. The stock, of course, in each is the latest obtainable and of the finest quality. The organdies, dimities, and such light goods are not to be duplicated in any other house on the Coast.

The second floor is devoted to a ladies suit and cloak department. This department is handled in the same manner as in the highest class Parisian houses, and it is a pleasure to make a purchase there through such expert salesmen and fitters. On this floor then will also be a space to show off the latest things in covert cloths, meltons, and gorgeous brocaded silks.

On the third floor are the art rooms. We all know the seductions of this department, and the exquisite articles de vertu it contains. Bronze and antique statuary are here in profusion, the work of the cleverest sculptors, and the beauty of their designs is such as veritably to draw the dollars out of one's pocket. There is nothing in America like the show. The Dresden china, cut glassware, and Venetian glassware of this department are as fine as you can get in Paris or Vienna and the prices are lower than those ruling in New York.

Tourists traveling through San Francisco should certainly not miss the opportunity of visiting these rooms, even though they do not purchase. They will always remember The White House as one of the features of San Francisco. After speaking of the institution and what it contains, one is led to dilate on the clever management by which all this has become possible. There are not more competent or obliging salesmen in town, and they remain with the house, know the goods and the customers. When you consider the excellence of the stock and the ability of the management, it is not astonishing that The White House has had and always will have among its patrons the richest residents of San Francisco.

Madam de Soto makes a specialty of making ladies' underwear and children's garments. The best of materials are used, the prices are moderate, and no one should think of buying any of these articles without seeing Madam de Soto, at 414 Geary St., and inquiring as to her price for making.

Would you be an architect, a painter, a surveyor? See page 16. Free instruction for subscriptions.

SPRING OPENING

MISS I. E. CONNER

Late of E. E. Caswell

FINE FRENCH MILLINERY

36 GEARY STREET

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

GOULD & CURRY SILVER MINING COMPANY

Assessment ..... No. 78
Amount per Share..... .....15 cents
Levied.....March 25, 1896
Delinquent in office.....April 28, 1896
Day of sale of Delinquent Stock ..... May 20, 1896

ALFRED K. DURBROW, Secretary

Office—Room 69, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE.

BULLION MINING COMPANY.—LOCATION OF principal place of business, San Francisco, California: location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the eighteenth day of March, 1896, an assessment (No. 47) of ten cents (10c) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, room 11, No. 331 Pine Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the twenty-second day of April, 1896, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on THURSDAY, the fourteenth day of May, 1896, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

R. R. GRAYSON, Secretary.

Office—Room 11, No. 331 Pine Street, San Francisco, California.

Danger Signals

More than half the victims of consumption do not know they have it. Here is a list of symptoms by which consumption can certainly be detected:—

Cough, one or two slight efforts on rising, occurring during the day and frequently during the night.
Short breathing after exertion.
Tightness of the chest.
Quick pulse, especially noticeable in the evening and after a full meal.
Chilliness in the evening, followed by Slight fever.
Perspiration toward morning and
Pale face and languid in the morning.
Loss of vitality.

If you have these symptoms, or any of them, do not delay. There are many preparations which claim to be cures, but Dr. Acker's English Remedy for Consumption has the highest endorsements, and has stood the test of years. It will arrest consumption in its earlier stages, and drive away the symptoms named. It is manufactured by the Acker Medicine Co., 16 and 18 Chambers St., New York, and sold by all reputable druggists.

Hotel Del Monte

America's Famous Summer and Winter Resort

The Most Elegant Seaside Establishment in the World

"Where a leaf never dies in the still blooming bowers,
And the bee banquets on thro' a whole year of flowers"

G. H. ARNOLD,
—MANAGER—

Monterey, Cal.

Flower Festivals
Fiestas
Rose Carnivals

. . . and the like, will be the delight of California for the next two or three months.

Santa Barbara Flower Festival, the fame of which is world-wide, and the glory of which, like that of Solomon, is not half told, opens April 15. Queen Flora will reign 3 days an arbitrary and absolute despot.

La Fiesta de Los Angeles, now fixed in the chronology of California feasts, and not less illustrious than its older prototypes, commences April 22, and the riot of fun will spread over 4 days.

The Carnival of Roses, to take place in San Jose, May 6th to 9th, inclusive, though a more recent candidate for favors of the fun-loving world, yet because of the limitless possibilities of the Garden City for anything that is made of roses, is quite as full of promise.

REDUCED RATES

will be made by the SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY for all these brilliant events. Arrange your programmes accordingly, and call on agents for particulars.

COOLGARDIE GOLD FIELDS
(FREMANTLE) AUSTRALIA

ONLY SIX DAYS TO HONOLULU — S.S. AUSTRALIA

First-Class.....$220
Steerage 110
Lowest rates to CAPE TOWN

S.S. "Alameda," via Honolulu and Auckland, Thursday, April 2, 1896, at 2 p. m.

S.S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, April 7, 1896, at 10 A. M.

Special Parties—Reduced special rates for parties March 10th and April 7th, 1896.

Ticket Office—114 Montgomery St.
Freight Office—327 Market St.

J. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO.,
General Agents

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.

Dispatch Steamers leave San Francisco for ports in Alaska.

For British Columbia and Puget Sound ports, Feb. 19, and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Wednesdays, 9 A. M.

For Newport, Los Angeles and all way ports, every fourth and fifth day, 8 A. M.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Hartford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles (Santa Monica), Redondo (Los Angeles) and Newport, every fourth and fifth day at 11 A. M.

For ports in Mexico, 25th of each month.

Ticket Office, Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.,
GENERAL AGENTS,
10 MARKET ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

THE LICK HOUSE

Occupies the block bounded by Montgomery, Post and Sutter Streets

IT IS——

——scrupulously clean;
——accessible to all street car lines and places of amusement;
——conveniently situated for business men;
——a quiet, model place for a family to spend the winter;
——moderate in price, yet first-class in every particular.

AMERICAN OR EUROPEAN PLAN

K. B. SOULÉ, Manager

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention

A QUIET HOME
CENTRALLY LOCATED

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL
SAN FRANCISCO

WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

Pacific Towel Co.

Telephone 1780 — No. 9 Lick Place, San Francisco

GEO. E. MOORE, Proprietor

The Club Hotel — Hotel Metropole

5 Bund, Yokohama — 1 Tsukiji, Tokyo

First-class Hotels, centrally situated, well furnished. ENTIRE FOREIGN MANAGEMENT. Experienced English Matron in attendance. Excellent table under the superintendence of qualified foreign Chef.

The Hotel steam-launch attends steamers arriving and departing. Passengers are met at the Railway Station. Visitors have the option of messing either in Tokyo or Yokohama, without extra charge—The only Hotels offering such an advantage. Certified Guides are in attendance at both Hotels. European Hair-Dresser on the premises.

THE CLUB HOTEL COMPANY, Limited, Proprietors

E. C. SIOEN, Manager
YOKOHAMA

E. DEWETTE, Manager
TOKYO

THE GRILL ROOM SERVICE
—OF THE—
PALACE HOTEL

Has been extended to what was formerly the City Restaurant. This immense room, which has a direct entrance from Market Street is known as - - - -

"THE LADIES' GRILL ROOM"

NEW DEPARTURE—CHARACTERIZED BY PROMPT SERVICE—MODERATE CHARGES

$6.50 PER TON DELIVERED

COOS BAY COAL

SOOTLESS
SMOKELESS

ORDER YOUR CARRIAGES AND COUPES OF THE
PACIFIC CARRIAGE CO.
At Baldwin Hotel
209 Sutter Street, corner Kearny
48 Eighth Street, or
St. Nicholas Hotel, Market and Ninth Streets
Steamer and Train Service a specialty 'Phone 1950

THE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
510 MONTGOMERY ST., S. F.,

Reads all papers on the Pacific Coast, and supplies clippings on all topics, business and personal.

CRESTA BLANCA WINES

AWARDED
THREE HIGHEST AWARDS
AT

THE ATLANTA EXPOSITION

OF SIX MEDALS
AWARDED TO CALIFORNIA

Cresta Blanca Wines

OBTAINED THREE

WETMORE-BOWEN CO.

140 Montgomery Street
Under Occidental Hotel

Horses Pastured

$1.50 PER MONTH

GOOD FEED AND CARE. Send for circular.

F. A. HYDE, 630 Commercial St.

HIRSCH-KAHN & Co.
MANUFACTURING OPTICIANS
IMPORTERS OF OPTICAL GOODS
PHOTOGRAPHIC APPARATUS & SUPPLIES ETC.
333 KEARNY STREET
SAN FRANCISCO CAL.

BAJA CALIFORNIA

DAMIANA BITTERS

"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular.)

NABER, ALFS & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

Ask your Blacksmith to shoe your horse with

PHŒNIX HORSE SHOES

GIVE THEM A TRIAL

DR. THOMAS L. HILL
DENTIST
Office, Odd Fellows' Building,
S. W. Cor. Seventh and Market Streets
Office Hours, 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.
Consultation Hours, 4 to 5

ABRAMSON-HEUNISCH CO. (Incorporated)
IMPORTERS AND JOBBERS OF
Brewers' and Bottlers' Supplies, Corks, Druggists' Glassware, Etc.
26-28 Main St. San Francisco

REMOVAL

Rountrees English Chocolate, Kohlers Swiss Chocolates, and all brands of Foreign and Eastern Confectionery, imported by . . . .

W. L. GREENBAUM,

of 205 SUTTER ST., will, after December 1st, be found in large and commodious quarters at

128 POST ST., Bohemian Club Bldg.

TALES OF THE DAY.

The Youths' Companion tells a story of the difficulties of obtaining juries in the olden days of New York. A case of considerable importance had been adjourned from day to day on account of the mysterious disappearance every morning of some of the twelve men who had been drawn and sworn on the jury. The Judge expressed his anger furiously, and finally the Sheriff grew equal to the occasion. The following morning he came bursting into the courtroom, his face flushed with victory. "It's all right now, your Honor. We can try the case by noon to-day, sure. It's only ten o'clock, and I've got eleven men locked in my barn and we're after the twelfth with the dogs, your Honor."

In a Western court, a witness who had served in the Civil War and been severely wounded, was called upon to testify. "Hold up your right hand," commanded the Judge. "I was shot in that arm, and can't hold it up," responded the witness. "Put up your left arm, then," continued the Judge. "Can't do it, Judge; they hit me there too." The Judge glared sternly at the afflicted witness. "No man can be sworn in this court unless he holds up something," he said. "Sit down, man, and hold up one of your legs, and I'll let it go at that."

During the siege of Paris, Marshal Canrobert found himself for a moment in the presence of a party of ladies. They were much agitated, and, in reply to his question as to what the trouble was, Madame Brohan answered, "We are on the eve of battle, and fear certainly affects us." "Fear," echoed the Marshal, looking puzzled, "what is that?" Madame Brohan rang the bell. "Marie," she said, when her maid appeared, "bring a dictionary for the Marshal."

Cardinal Manning was not popular in Rome where his impatience of Italian ecclesiastical conventions had made him enemies. He never hesitated to denounce his opponents. Once, having reason to complain of a Monsignor who had got away from him an altar shown at the Vatican exhibition of 1888, which he had intended for the cathedral of Carthage, he opened the door of the Pope's study, and pointing to the prelate who was on duty, shouted: "There, Holy Father, is a thief."

Carl Hertz, the conjuror was exhibiting in Nashville, and prepared in the usual way for the well-known trick of passing a marked coin into the center of an uncut orange. He found an intelligent urchin and promised to pass him into the show provided he agreed to come on the stage at a given signal. Of course, the urchin assented. Hertz provided him with a marked dollar, and when the curtain rose there sat the youthful confederate in the front row. The Professor proceeded to borrow a dollar in the audience, marked it similarly to the one in the urchin's pocket, and, after some flourishes, passed it into the orange, from which he extracted it. "Now," he said, "I'm going to ask some member of the audience to step on the stage, and then I'll pass the dollar into his pocket without going near him" The youngster stepped up; the conjuror made the usual flourishes: "Now, my boy," he said, "put your hand in your right-hand trousers pocket and give me the dollar." The boy looked a bit sheepish, but he dived his fist down. Then, to the unutterable horror of Hertz, he produced a handful of silver and said: "I've only got ninety cents of it left, sir."

When a young man, Bismarck was employed as an official reporter in one of the courts of justice. Questioning a witness one day, he lost his temper at an insulting retort, and said: "If you are not more respectful I shall kick you out of the room." "Young man," said the Judge, "I would have you know that this is a dignified court of justice, and if there is any kicking to be done the Court will do it." "Ah! you see," said Bismarck to the witness, "if you are not more respectful to me, the Court will kick you out of the room."

When General James Oglethorpe, who founded the colony of Georgia, was young, says the Youth's Companion, he served in the Austrian army under Prince Eugene. Once while seated at table with a prince of Wurtemburg, the latter playfully flipped some wine in Oglethorpe's face. Afraid lest a challenge would be unfavorably regarded, and yet determined not to let the slight pass, the young man had a second's indecision, then, smiling, as if at a jest, he responded: "Mon prince, that's a good joke, but we do it much better in England," and threw a whole glass of wine in the prince's face. The prince half-rose from his chair, hot with anger; but an old general who sat by checked him and said, "He has done right, my prince; you began it."

The Congressional Committee on Prison Reforms investigated jails throughout the Southern States. Each jailer was invited to send in a report. An Arkansas functionary made this return: "My jail is 8x10, and all gets out as wants to."

FREE EDUCATION AND PROFESSIONAL TRAINING

"THE WAVE'S" LIBERAL SUBSCRIPTION OFFER.

The proprietors of THE WAVE have made arrangements with the most prominent schools and colleges throughout the State, and are now prepared to offer scholarships and courses in the leading educational institutions free of charge, for all who will obtain subscribers to this popular weekly.

UNIVERSITY COURSES.

A single year's course at the University of California, or at the Leland Stanford Junior University, for 185 annual subscribers. This offer includes room and board, and all other necessary expenses attached to the course. For 750 subscribers we offer a four years' course.

MEDICAL COURSES.

One year at the Cooper Medical College will be given for 125 subscribers. This includes books and incidental expenses attached to the course.

A single term at the Medical Department of the University of California for 100 subscribers.

For 500 annual subscribers we offer the full four years' course at the Cooper Medical College. This offer includes all incidental costs and fees, except board and lodging.

We offer the four years' course at the Medical Department of the University of California, for 400 subscribers.

The two year's course at the State Normal School at San Jose, for 600 subscribers. This offer includes board, lodging, and books. A single year for 160 subscribers.

The course at Hastings Law College for 250 annual subscribers. This includes books and other expenses attached to the College, for a period of three years, and the privilege of studying in a first-class law office.

A three years' course at the Mark Hopkins Institute of Art for 250 annual subscribers. A year's course for 85 subscribers.

A course in any department of Van der Nailen's School of Electricity and Engineering (except Department of Assaying) will be given for 125 annual subscribers. A course in the Department of Assaying) for 20 annual subscribers.

A six months' course in either the Business Department, or the Department of Stenography and Typewriting of Heald's Business College, for 50 annual subscribers.

A nine months' course in the Columbia School of Dramatic Art for 75 annual subscribers.

A three months' course at the Meisterschaft School of Languages for 40 annual subscribers.

The course at the California School of Elocution and Oratory for 35 annual subscribers.

Tuition in music, vocal or instrumental, from Francis Stuart, S. G. Fleishmann, J. H. Dohrmann, Sigmund Beel, Nathan Landsberger, Lesley Martin, or H. J. Stewart. A course of twenty lessons from any of these gentlemen for fifty annual subscribers. For 100 annual subscribers a course of twenty lessons each in piano, singing, harmony, or any other branch of music.

—A—
SAFE GUIDE

No man knows all there is to know about advertising. The subject is too profound, too complex, too perplexing, for any single person, or for any dozen persons, for that matter. The path to success in advertising is full of dangerous places. All business men would do well to engage a safe guide to conduct them past the danger spots—to tell them what to do and what to avoid doing.

PRINTERS' INK

Is a weekly journal for advertisers, published at 10 Spruce St., New York. It is a magazine of ideas, of suggestions, of advice. Advertisers the world over read it and write for it. It is the advertising authority of America—probably of the globe. Business men will find it a safe guide. To secure its services as guide costs $5 a year. A sample copy costs nothing.

J. R. SMITH & CO.

230 BUSH STREET
And Room 7, Rotunda, Mills Building

W. HALL, Successor

MERCHANT TAILORS

Will make garments to order
—At Great Reduction for Cash—

J. R. SMITH - - Manager

BICYCLE and GOLF SUITS

H. S. BRIDGE & CO.

Merchant Tailors

Many Novelties in Imported Wear. Shirts to Order a Specialty.

622 Market Street, San Francisco
(Up-stairs, opposite Palace Hotel)

BEST SUITS ON EARTH

26 MONTGOMERY STREET

TO ORDER $15.00 AND UPWARDS

J. W. HAWES, Formerly Crocker Bldg.

COTTON SAIL DUCKS

22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard

ALSO

Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks
From 30 to 120 inches wide
Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks
Manufactured by Murphy, Grant & Co.
Mount Vernon Company Pacific Coast Sole Agents
Baltimore

BONESTELL & CO.

Dealers in PAPER

Fine Coated Papers a Specialty

401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

THE WAVE CLUBBING LIST

FOR 1896

By special arrangement with the Publishers, THE WAVE is prepared to offer the following list

SUBSCRIPTIONS MUST BE PAID IN ADVANCE

THE WAVE and CENTURY	$6 00
" " ARENA	5 00
" " LITTELL'S LIVING AGE	7 75
" " ART AMATEUR	5 75
" " LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE	4 50
" " MUNSEY'S	3 50
" " ATLANTIC MONTHLY	5 75
" " YOUTH'S COMPANION	3 75
" " NEW ENGLAND MAGAZINE	5 00
" " HARPER'S MAGAZINE	5 50
" " HARPER'S WEEKLY	5 70
" " HARPER'S BAZAAR	5 70
" " HARPER'S ROUND TABLE	4 00
" " SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE	5 00
" " REVIEW OF REVIEWS	4 50
" " ST. NICHOLAS	5 00
" " OVERLAND	4 75
" " COSMOPOLITAN	3 50
" " FRANK LESLIE'S MAGAZINE	4 90
" " PUCK	6 50
" " JUDGE	6 50
" " LIFE	7 00
" " LIFE'S COMEDY	3 50
" " LESLIE'S WEEKLY	5 70
" " DEMOREST MAGAZINE	4 00
" " SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN	5 00
" " SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN SUPPLEM'T	6 50
" " N. Y. DAILY SUN	8 00
" " " SUNDAY "	4 50
" " CASSELL MAGAZINE	3 75
" " ARGOSY	3 50
" " PUBLIC OPINION	4 50
" " SUNDAY WORLD	4 75
" " CRITIC	5 50
" " FORUM	5 00
" " NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW	6 50
" " TABLE TALK	3 25
" " NINETEENTH CENTURY	6 25
" " CONTEMPORARY REVIEW	6 25
" " FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW	6 25
" " BLACKWOODS MAGAZINE	6 25
" " TRUTH	6 25
" " DELINEATOR	3 50
" " VOGUE	5 50
" " TOWN TOPICS	7 50
" " DAILY JOURNAL	5 00
" " SUNDAY JOURNAL	3 75
" " ILLUS. AMERICAN	5 75

THE WAVE

CALIFORNIA STATE LIBRARY

VOL. XV. NO. 15. SAN FRANCISCO, APRIL 11, 1896. PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE WAVE

Is published every Saturday, at the Crocker Building, corner Market and Post Streets, San Francisco.

SUBSCRIPTION, $3 per year, $1.50 six months, $.75 three months. Foreign subscriptions (countries in postal union) $5 per year. Sample copies free on application. The trade is supplied by the San Francisco News Co., 210 Post Street; East of the Rocky Mountains by the American News Co., New York.

THE WAVE is kept on file and is for sale at Brentano's, 17 Avenue de l'Opera, Paris, France; 31 Union Square, New York City; 1015 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.; and 206 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

ADVERTISING rates and all other matters pertaining to the business of the paper, address Rooms 220-221-222 Crocker Building. Eastern Agent, E. Katz, 230-235 Temple Court, New York.

HARRISON M. PARKER, BUSINESS MANAGER.

Entered at San Francisco Post-office as second-class matter

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY.

SAN FRANCISCO, APRIL 11, 1896.

CONTENTS.

EDITORIALS—
The Incident Remains Open.. 1
The Annual Sale 1
Eastern and Western Orators 2
General Hubbard's Interview 2
The Crimes of Clairvoyancy.. 3

CAUSERIE—By John Bonner.... 4

HARU—By Lafcadio Hearn.... 4

RHODES AND THE REPORTERS —By Frank Norris 5

HOW WOMEN MAY WOO..... 5

A TEN THOUSAND DOLLAR NOVEL 6

FRANK MAYO—An Interview By E. D. H..... 6

THINGS AND PEOPLE—By The Witness 7

TWO DOWNFALLS..... 8

THE THEATERS—By Peg Woffington 9

THE WEEK IN SOCIETY—By The Gossip.....10, 11

RIPPLES—Presumably Humorous—By Bruno..... 12

THE WHEEL—Comment and Criticism—By C. Michener; Tandem Riding—By R. L. Long 13

MISCELLANEOUS.

Book Notes..... 8

Dramatic Notes..... 9

Fashions and Frivols.. 14

Tales of the Day..... 16

Recently several cases have been brought to the attention of THE WAVE in which young men, anxious to secure an education, had undertaken to work their way through the University. The spirit that hungers for knowledge is not met with as frequently as one might wish, but the example of the youth in question has led the proprietors of THE WAVE to devise some means by which such persons, either male or female, might secure the education which they sought. On page 16 of this issue may be found an offer of scholarships at either of the two Universities, offers of the facilities of reputable business colleges, medical colleges, schools of electrical, mining, mechanical and civil engineering and architecture, schools of dramatic art, and scholarships at the Meisterschaft School of Languages and schools of elocution and oratory. In addition to these, THE WAVE has been enabled to make arrangements with Nathan Landsberger, S. M. Fleishman, H. J. Stewart, Sigmund Beel, J. H. Dohrman, and Lesley Martin, for courses in vocal and instrumental music, including piano, organ, harmony, and vocal art. This offer is something of a novelty in California, and is not lacking in generous features.

THE INCIDENT REMAINS OPEN.

The Voice of Labor takes issue with an editorial in last week's "Wave." Its manner is so dignified and its sincerity so evident that the task of enlightening it becomes at once a duty and a pleasure. The editorial exciting the courteous reply was one deprecating the murder of Mars by a striker, and deprecating also the spirit of violence that made such a murder not only possible, but divested it of surprise. The Voice of Labor raises itself to so high a key as to condemn the crime in emphatic terms, this being a long step in the proper direction. But it fails to adequately condemn the motive actuating the fatal blow, and calmly assumes that the inspiration sprang from something not within union lines, whereas the deed was the logical culmination of the teachings of unions since unions have been. In support of this, examples are so plentiful that to mention them would be waste of space.

It is in an attempt to shift responsibility for this crime that the Voice of Labor builds on false premises, and so at the breath of reason its structure of words albeit nicely joined, falls to the ground. The dissenting editor argues that the Southern Pacific is not responsible for the acts of employees, and by analogy, that a union is not responsible for the acts of its members. A little reflection shows this not to be the case. The Southern Pacific has many times had to pay high for the errors of train men, and yet there was nothing in its instructions intended to, or likely to, induce these men to indulge in mistakes. The citation of Durrant lacks even more markedly all semblance to a parallel. "Is the Baptist Church responsible for the fiend?" is asked Assuredly not. But this foul assassin was not following even in the most remote manner the teachings of the church. He was not an enthusiast impelled by the counsels of his associates to go to an extreme suggested by them. His wretched and perverted nature did not develop as the result of listening to the gospel He did not catch his primal idea from the fiery words of a pastor. On the contrary, his deeds were repugnant to the fundamental principles of all that is godly. Instead of being overzealous, and so misled, he stepped apart from the very influences that would, if anything could, have kept subdued the devil that was within him. Of course, he does not hurt the church. It is not suspected of sympathy with him. He is not supposed in any degree to have followed out its instructions The allusion of the Voice of Labor to Doctor Brown is equally unfortunate for it. Doctor Brown's personal shortcomings do not necessarily injure the church, yet, if his guilt be established, and the fact glossed over, then injury will be done. But all fair-minded people must concede that the church never taught Doctor Brown to stray. It would fain have kept his feet from wandering. Can the unions say as much for those of their members who defy, as did the slayers of Mars, divine and human laws?

On the point that union offers were made to provide a lawyer for the accused man, the Voice of Labor contends, with weakness most palpable, that this course did not indicate sympathy. The State it says, furnishes a lawyer to the worst offender, and is not accused of leaning toward his cause. But the State also furnishes a lawyer for the prosecution. The individual becomes to it merely a unit, and devoid of personality To the circumstance that laboring men have served faithfully on juries, this organ of unionism gives undue weight that truth has no bearing on the matter under consideration. It is not to be inferred that there is distrust of the laboring man. This would be a peculiar anomaly in a nation of workers. Laboring men as a whole, are in no sense on trial, but only such of them as separate into classes, proclaim themselves masters both of capital and labor, and wonder why the world refuses to acquiesce in their view. Nobody objects to the workingman, for all must toil or be drones. It is only when he refuses to work or to allow others to work that he becomes objectionable. He then assumes a power to which he has never received clear title and probably never will.

A slumbering sense of injustice is awakened by the fact that a few are so rich that they may be idle, and much less useful than the ordinary citizen, but the utility of railing at them has not yet appeared, and the strike just over, involving as it did great delay, heavy loss, and no profit, found no legitimate pretext in the existence of great fortunes. That some men have bank accounts furnishes no excuse for a strike resting on the ground that a certain contractor would not force his employees to join a certain union which they were at liberty to join, had they so chosen. No system of logic attempting to view these as cause and effect can stand inspection.

The Voice of Labor is concerned about the "wage slaves," by that term apparently meaning to embrace all who, by effort, earn a stipend Do not the unions, for which it speaks, try to enforce slavery? Do they not try to rob the laborer of freedom? Mars could have joined a union and been alive to-day. While work on a great structure was at a standstill, on a pretext most shadowy, 600 men and women, who are to be permanently employed in the completed building, were waiting anxiously the time for their pay to begin. These hundreds had no rights. Alas, they do not belong to a union. The general situation is serious, the popular temper inexplicable, when the opening of a busy season is welcomed apparently only as an opportunity to strike, and close it again.

There is hope that some day universal brotherhood shall prevail among the sons of men, but every person with a bludgeon in his hands, or words of unreasoning hatred on his lips, or who yields absolutely to the rule of selfishness, retards the coming of a better day Leaders who lead to inevitable disaster, and shout the wolf away from their own doors regardless that they are scaring it to the thresholds of other men who pay for the poor privilege of being led, disgrace and threaten the real cause of labor. Better be led by the blind than the vicious, for the blind may stumble aright. The men who ordered the recent strikes owe to every striker an apology, and the amount of wages lost. They owe to the slayer of Mars the admission that they were accessory before the fact. It was they who nurtured and loosed the murderous spirit of discontent.

THE ANNUAL SALE.

There are some themes to which the constant addition of material or the continual shifting of personnel gives a freshness ever new. One of these is the manner in which fortunes acquired by traffic in soap and hides, or in some manner perhaps equally respectable, are exchanged for titles acquired oftentimes by methods upon which considerate people refrain from turning the light, but which, as commodities, may generally be reckoned particularly worthless dross. It is a trifle irritating to see good American dollars thrown at the birds of prey, especially as these birds are often of sorry plumage, and far from having nests, are in quest of the wherewithal to supply the nest and furnish the same with lining.

Daily papers of the current week state that Newport is expected soon to swarm with heiresses, and then proceed in perfect good faith to give a list of the swarm, together with the amount of honey that each bee is believed to have stored subject to call. Each heiress is supposed to have enough gold in prospect to dower her to her dimpled chin in coin of the realm. There is the $20,000,000 brand of heiress, and a whole lot more ranging down to the mere six figure lady whose capital is not deemed worthy of exposure in precise terms. All this is very interesting, but it is only a beginning.

The Duchess of Manchester, of record not exactly saintly, is about to bring over her son, who is too young to have achieved a record of any kind. She is coming to act as his matrimonial agent and supervise his selection of a wife. Incidentally, she may pick up a bargain in the way of a husband herself, but this is foreign to the main issue. The inference plainly is that all these heiresses, financially the cream of the country, are to be on exhibition much as blooded cattle are shown at a county fair for a blue ribbon, and that the premium they seek is a callow duke with absolutely nothing to commend him but a title. There is in the account no intimation that such a procedure is not entirely proper and to be expected. Of course, a blush cannot be typographically expressed, but the entire absence of any feeling such as might prompt a becoming flush of shame, is noted as characteristic of the following extract, a fair sample of the whole:

> The Duchess of Manchester, it will thus be seen, will be surrounded by almost an embarrassing amount of wealth and beauty, and if the young Duke returns to England without a bride it will not be because of a scarcity of girls from which to select.

There is no intimation that some girl in this entrancing swarm might have the womanliness to reject an offer which could come from the Duke only as a piece of insulting impertinence; that could be only an indecent proposition from acceptance of which she should scornfully shrink. The clearest inference is that the Duke has but to look the stock over, select his goods, and that they will be delivered with grateful speed. Unless the article is based on a total misconception of the worth of the daughters of wealth, it shows a state of tolerated degradation that prevailing among the daughters of the tenements would make of them outcasts from contact with whom the silken skirt of the heiress would be drawn in disgust. Let it be hoped that the papers are in error, that the correspondent is simply a fool. As he raves about the beauty of these girls in a similarly exalted strain there is reason to entertain this kindly suspicion. The Gould who married Count Castellane had been dealt with by Nature with a hand so rude that not even the art of the photographer could disguise the marks. The Vanderbilt who has the distinguished honor of maintaining the vast castle that another American had repaired is not repellant to the eye, yet one cannot walk a block in San Francisco, especially at the hour when factory girls are leaving their work, without seeing a dozen who are from every physical standpoint her superior, and, mentally, there is every reason to suppose, at least her equal.

Laying aside the fact that the idea of having girls put on the market does not, on moral grounds, commend itself, in a business way the plan is serious. Great fortunes are yearly sent abroad, and no equivalent is given in exchange. The foreigners get the best end of the transaction. They obtain money in such large amounts that the incumbrance of accompanying wives they can easily endure. Generally paupers, and accustomed to being supported in idleness, to have a new source of income with which to indulge their profligacy, is an exceedingly pleasant circumstance. But they play a confidence game. They could more honorably sell gold bricks. Neither is it fair in their quest for lucre to drag down the girl so unfortunate as to be attached to it. Yet, it is folly to pity the victims who walk frankly and fully warned into the trap. The Duchess is to be congratulated on her good judgment. Desiring a bargain or two, she comes to the proper shop. But the good lady should not assume too much. It is only just that she make the Duke pay the wedding fee. When wealthy people thus frankly confess to being upstarts and vulgarians, they merit this small balm.

EASTERN AND WESTERN ORATORS.

Whatever may have been the purpose of Mr. Depew's visit to California, one benefit has come from it, one that he could not have anticipated, one that he rarely confers on any place he visits. Mr. Depew taught us to appreciate our own orators.

All the world knows of Chauncey Depew. Not as railroad president, politician, or lawyer is he so widely known but as the peerless orator of our greatest city. Ask the average New Yorker whom he considers the wittiest and most brilliant of all mankind and he will reply, without the slightest consciousness of his own provincialism, "Our Chauncey." General Horace Porter he regards as a story-teller of skill, a rhetorician of fluency; Frederic Coudert as a witty Frenchman once removed, a scholar and a master of indirection; Joseph Choate as a speaker of great charm and power, but Chauncey Depew is easily first in the New York mind among the orators of the day, either on the stump or beside the dinner table. This estimate, we do not hesitate to say, is a false one. There are men in New York and other Eastern cities who are, in all the essentials of the perfect orator or the graceful after-dinner talker, equal to Mr. Depew, and his superior. But Manhattan will not have it so.

It would astonish New York to be told that Mr. Chauncey M. Depew is not an orator, yet that is the fact if he is judged by any classical standard. Mr. Depew is an entertainer, not much more. He is without dramatic action, which removes him from the class of Patrick Henry, Chatham and Gambetta. He is without the poetic spirit, marked elevation of mind, which bars him from the school of Wendell Phillips, Beecher, Lincoln, in his Gettysburg address, and Webster. He is without feeling, as is manifest to any one who ever heard him, and there can be no oratory where there is no play upon human sentiment. Mr. Depew has a knack at story-telling which is highly pleasing, a platform tact that is well nigh perfect, a manner that is graceful, and a rhetorical skill of little more than mediocre quality. These things, added to a good voice and a quick mind, do not make an orator, though they may make a man much more agreeable to listen to than was Burke. New York is not blessed with many orators and those she has are foreign to the Island. Col. Ingersoll, John R. Fellows and Bourke Cochran, all three come from other places, one from the West, one from the South and the third from Ireland. They represent three different and distinct styles, Ingersoll the rhetorical and strongly emotional, Fellows the more severe and elevated of the best Southern school, and Cochran the cumulative and somewhat ponderous style, lacking simplicity but full of power. There are several others but they are of minor importance.

The point we would make is that the great city is not productive of great speakers. The young men who go from New York to college return to become scholarly and able but are seldom given to public speaking, and when they are their speech is heavy, precise and logical, good argument but not oratory. New York draws her supply of men of high emotion from other States or countries where the emotions are allowed more sway than in her tense commercial life.

The reason for the appreciation with which Doctor Depew meets in New York is that he is the business man idealized. The brokers and bankers who sit about the tables and admire have all the delight in hearing Depew that the rough father has in contemplating his college-bred son. They can say to themselves—"And yet this man is but a railroad president. Surely, he is greater than all others, for no other railroad president ever spoke as he speaks." New York is easily bored, especially with things intellectual. The strain of its life calls for relaxation, and that of the most frivolous order. Away with Curtis and Carter, Breckenridge and Wilson; give us "our Chauncey"; he knows our moods, and will not tire us. It is impossible for oratory to be developed in such an atmosphere—inartistic, hard, and mathematical.

California is the very land in which to breed and cultivate the orator. Here are a people, emotional, artistic, full of ideals, responsive, and poetic. It would be contrary to the law of nature for men to express themselves here in the cold severity of the commercial New Yorker. The voice becomes mellow, the ear resents discords, the nature becomes sensitive to suggestion and appeal, and these things draw forth the orator. He comes here because he is in demand here.

Those who have lived in Eastern cities have remarked often on the number of our Western orators—men who in more central cities would have made for themselves National reputations. In early days we drew such fiery spirits as Baker and MacDougall, and in these quieter days we are developing men fitted in intellectual temper to the softness and richness of our landscape.

There are more young men in San Francisco gifted with unusual power of eloquent speech than can be found in the political and social clubs of greater New York. We have the soil to raise the orator, New York has not.

GENERAL HUBBARD'S INTERVIEW.

General Hubbard, representative of the Searles interest in the railway companies, is just now very much in the public eye. The portion of the press that is given over to abusing the railroad during twelve months of the year is now industriously at work on this gentleman in the hope of breeding internal discord in railway affairs. Taking on for the moment the outward appearance of a friendly interest in the corporation in one column, (and roundly abusing it in another), the Examiner brims over with kindly advice and bristles with important suggestions. It did the same thing during Sir Rivers Wilson's visit West, and was anxiously solicitous for the welfare of the Central Pacific Railroad which for years it had attacked, maligned, pursued, and attempted to destroy; taking on a similar temporary friendly vein, it then strongly advised the divorcement of the Central from the Southern Pacific management. One acquainted with all the facts and surroundings can find some amusement in this proceeding, as probably its authors do.

The railway management in California is not perfect, but it is not the thoroughly disgraceful thing its enemies would have us believe. If it was guilty of one-half the crimes laid at its door its conduct would be most iniquitous and reprehensible. The truth of it is, the more serious derelictions charged against the corporation are without the slightest foundation. If any honest citizen will take upon himself an investigation of any one or more of the grave charges made against this corporation he will more than likely find either that they are falsehoods, plain and inexcusable, or that the charges made are totally at variance with the facts as proved. The California railway managers make mistakes, but the man who makes no mistakes is the man who does nothing.

In an interview upon the subject of railway affairs, General Hubbard gave voice to some terse, well-chosen remarks on the situation in California. He has a faculty of stating his position in a clear and comprehensive, yet brief, manner. Taking up the question of politics, he expressed himself in language that was plainly opposed to political interference of the company further than might be absolutely necessary to protect itself from its open and avowed enemies; to interpose a barrier between an office and the wretch whose bids for votes are based upon the boast that he would punish the corporation if elected. With this announcement in its mouth, the Examiner beats the air and finds noisy fault with the alleged railway interference and political pollution. Heaven knows, if there is any one factor in the State that tends to keep the railway in politics it is the Examiner. No man is so low, no creature so mean, no candidate so disreputable, as not to come within the dead-line of its approval if he can but show an unrelenting, unjust, undying hatred toward the corporation. It is the nomination of the Sutros, the Davies, the Bassets, and the Larues that make it necessary for this corporation, as a mere matter of self protection, to enter into politics. It is a party platform demanding that the quasi judicial officers of the State pledge themselves to a line of official conduct antagonistic to the corporation before hearing a single word of the evidence, and without knowledge of a single fact, upon which their judgment is to be based, that creates the necessity for their interference. It is a horizontal twenty-five per cent reduction of rates in political platforms that urges the corporation to act on the defensive. It is the persistent, malignant, unfair, and false attacks made upon this corporation that divert its attention from its legitimate business for the protection of its property from the political highwayman and marauder. It is the Examiner and its followers that drag the railway owners out into a field of action that must be intolerable and detestable to them. Let the Examiner be fair. Let the conventions nominate only men who are honest and unbiased, and no man will ever again dream of linking the name of the railroad with politics. Once admit that men are nominated and supported solely because they are anti-railroad, and are expected to administer unwisely and unjustly the powers delegated to them by the people, and you at once confess that self-protection demands that the corporation take some steps to save its property from the hands of such spoliators. We have said before now, and now repeat it, that the man who seeks and obtains office for the purpose of wreaking vengeance upon a corporation or individual; the wretch who assumes a public trust for the purpose of harassing and annoying his enemy, is as base, as vile, and as contemptible as is the super-serviceable tool who seeks a place to blindly serve his corporate friend. If either one of this class of officers is better than the other, it is the latter, for he at least may be guided by honest friendship and affection, while the former is dominated alone by a brutal passion.

Somehow, the foundation appears to be wrong. The bases upon which is built the public's hopes and fears, conclusions and beliefs, are out of gear. Let an honest and fearless man, be he editor or public officer, express his indignation at some contemplated wrong that is to be visited upon this corporation, and the suspicion at once springs up in the public mind that he has been bought. It is the fear of this charge; it is the shrinking from being the object of this foul suspicion that has led many an honest man to bite the tongue that was eager to frame an indignant protest against a contemplated crime. To achieve a reputation for honesty in public office one has but to persistently take sides against the corporation. It is a certificate of good health. It requires distinct moral courage, and a certain sacrifice for one to be even fair in the face of such conditions. An independent and fearless protestant should not be met with suspicion, but rather should his conduct fix the conviction in the public mind that here was an honest man who feared not to speak for the right as he saw it. We pointed out last week the results that must follow in the train of charges such as have been made against the Examiner. This is one of them.

One may not always defend or speak words of commendation for the manner in which those entrusted with the charge have handled the political affairs of the corporation. Its political friends often have seemed possessed with the idea that there can be no political affiliations on behalf of the corporation, except with the worst elements of each party. On credible authority, we are told that the only reason the Democratic State Central Committee passed resolutions unfavorable to the Railway Funding Bill, was that the political friends of the corporation were supposed to have allied themselves with Buckley in an inter-party strife, and that the Anti-Funding Bill Resolution was passed merely because it was supposed that its defeat was entrusted to Mr. Buckley's henchmen.

So long as it is possible for men to be nominated for office solely to wreak their vengeance and vent their spite on railway corporations, just so long will it be necessary for the assailed to interfere and protect themselves. It is a difficult thing to draw the line and say just where this interference should begin and where it should end. Politics, after all, is very largely a matter of trades and bargains. It is seldom that a candidate receives the nomination at the hands of his convention without having first agreed to deliver his strength to other candidates seeking other offices in return for their support of his candidacy. To defeat its enemies, the railway must resort to similar practises. It must trade and bargain, and, in doing so, must make itself a party to the defeat of the aspirations of other men who hold no grudge against them, and who are seeking offices which can have no possible relation to railway affairs. This is why it is difficult for the political friends of the railway to keep aloof from controversies in which its interests are only collateral. Once inside of politics and no man, however wise, can say where the end may be. So long as it is popular among certain committees to be a noisy, anti railroad agitator just so long will the corporation be confronted with this problem. The ultimate remedy lies not in defeating the enemy before the convention or at the polls. Such a proceeding is a mere temporary stay calculated to breed new enemies as well as defeat ancient foes. The true solution lies rather in a well-directed line of education that will correct the public mind and render it unprofitable and unpopular to be a noisy agitator. The politician and the people should be taught that it lies with them alone whether or not this corporation shall attend to its purely legitimate business and have no hand in or care for politics. Otherwise it will be difficult to "get out" of politics. This is the problem that confronts the railways and the people too, and which, when solved, will bring peace along in its train.

In the same interview General Hubbard gave voice to a statement that might form a text for a sermon. He said:

If there is any feeling here because the company is trying to enjoin the Railroad Commission from reducing its rates twenty-five per cent, I think that feeling is wrong. The company could not stand a reduction of that kind. It has never paid a dividend on one dollar of its stock.

There is a world of meaning in this statement, and a world of information in it. In another form it says the company is seeking to enforce what it considers to be a legal right. To protect that right from what it deems an unwarranted and destructive invasion, it appeals to the courts to preserve inviolate that sacred principle which hatred has set under foot. It appeals to the court to preserve the principle and protect its property from spoilation. It stands before the bar of justice defending a concrete legal right. To struggle for one's rights, and to resist an invasion, and a violation of them, is to exercise one of the highest and holiest duties of citizenship. It is a duty that the individual citizen owes not only to himself, but to Society, to neglect which is cowardice. The wretch who flees or stays in hiding while the battle is in progress is a coward. That he alone forsake his arms and lurks secure in some safe hiding-place, does not of itself determine the battle against his side, but should his craven example be imitated by his fellows, the land which looks to him for protection would soon be overrun by an invading army. And so it is in the law. The man who abandons his legal rights, and with cowardly instincts flees before the contest, is morally as great a coward as is the man of arms who seeks to escape injury to his person by the sacrifice of his honor. All rights would perish if all refused to protect them from invasion and assault Great principles would be swept into oblivion if none defended and maintained their integrity. The struggle of legal right against injustice is a common struggle against a common enemy. Even the humblest citizen of the State reaps profitable advantage from the legal battles of his richer brother who seeks to maintain the principles of right upon which the Nation's laws are founded. A great German writer on the law says:

The existence of all the principles of public law depends on the fidelity of public officials in the performance of their duties; that of the principles of private law, on the power of the motives which induce the person whose rights have been violated to defend them; his interest and his sentiment of legal right. If these motives do not come into play, if the feeling of the legal right is blunted and weak, and interest not powerful enough to overcome the disinclination to entering into a controversy and the disposition to go to law, the consequence is, that the principle involved finds no application. When arbitrariness and audacity boldly dare to lift their head, it is always a sure sign that those who are called to defend the law, have not done their duty. But each of us, in his own place, is called upon to defend the law, to guard and enforce it in its own sphere. In defending his legal rights, he asserts and defends the whole body of the law, within the narrow space which his own legal rights occupy. When the master shall no longer insist that the servant shall do his duty, when the creditor cannot enforce payment by his debtor, when the public attach no importance to correctness of weights and measures, can it be said that nothing is imperiled but the authority of the law? When these comes to pass, the order of civil life is sacrificed in one direction, and it is not easy to say how far the disastrous consequences produced may reach; whether, for instance, the whole system of credit may not be seriously affected thereby. For every man will do all in his power to have nothing to do with people who force him to wrangle and struggle where his legal right is clear; and he will transfer his capital to other places and order his goods elsewhere.

Under such circumstances, the lot of the few who have the courage to enforce the law becomes a real martyrdom. If I were called upon to pass judgment on the practical importance of the two principles "do no injustice," and "suffer no injustice," I would say that the first rule was: "Suffer no injustice," and the second: "Do none."

These are the words of one of the ablest German writers on the law. From his point of view, and from ours, the resistance on the part of the railway company of what they consider an encroachment of a concrete legal right is not a struggle for themselves alone, but one in which all society is interested. It has been maintained time and again in these columns that the welfare of the citizen, his individual property rights, and all that goes to make up his enjoyment thereof, are so firmly dove-tailed and interlocked with corporate property rights, that to invade or imperil one would, to a like extent, destroy the other. The principles protecting the property of the corporation from destruction and confiscation are the same great principles that protect the humblest citizen in the enjoyment of the fruits of his thrift. When the rich and powerful struggle to keep untouched and undefiled by the hand of the despoiler its own property rights—when they do battle to uphold the principles that protect them, they are doing a similar service for all mankind. A nation made up of men who would not be inclined to resist encroachments upon their individual rights, would be but little inclined to resent the encroachments of a neighboring belligerent nation upon the country of their birth. Was America a nation of men who were lazily indifferent to their own rights, how could it be presumed that such men would have more concern for the rights, the honor, or the integrity of their Nation? We can only repeat what General Hubbard states: that "if there is any feeling here because the company is trying to enjoin the Railroad Commission from reducing its rates twenty-five per cent I think that feeling is wrong."

THE CRIMES OF CLAIRVOYANCY.

Clairvoyancy or spiritualism, or whatever else you may call it, has been responsible for one of the most deplorable tragedies that ever occurred in this city. The community was startled a few days ago by the announcement that a Mrs. Deuss, an unfortunate and misguided woman, had deliberately taken the life of her three little children as well as her own. At the Coroner's inquest the fact developed that some miserable, prophesying, spirit-communicating wench was responsible for the crime. Mrs. Deuss had been told by the soothsayer that her husband was unfaithful, and was about to elope with another woman. Weak of mind, wrenched by suspicion, inspired by jealousy, in despair she killed herself and children. She paid the penalty of death for her own weakness. But the mischief-breeding clairvoyant who sowed the seed of discord—the hake who planted the suspicions that led to the awful tragedy, still lives, still moves about in the world, cunningly waiting, furtively watching for another victim into whose ears she may pour the poison of suspicion.

Again, we hear, from another quarter, that a certain Professor Eugene and another certain Professor Van de Vere have squeezed from the slender purse of one Bell, the sum of $1100 upon a pretext which, in the cold light of print, appears most absurd and ridiculous. Bell, it seems, was an old man, an ex-postmaster in a Nevada town, who, by dint of economy, had accumulated some $1500 which he purposed investing in a ranch. He became a convert to spiritualism and had the happy habit of holding séances in the post-office. On an unlucky day he fell in with the two clairvoyants. To one, Professor Eugene, he paid $170 for laying "an evil spirit" that was blocking his way. Professor Van de Vere then took hold of the victim. The man of trances and the familiar of spirits fell into a deep sleep, during which he received communications from the friends of the gullible Bell. Bell was informed, by the spirit route, that awaiting him in Scotland was a fat and hitherto unclaimed estate of £13,000,000. Having located this fabulous sum, it remained only to devise some means of obtaining the money. Professor Van de Vere had a convenient friend, a certain Hodson, located at Chicago, who, for $2000, would proceed to London and attend to the details. Bell had only $800 left, but the Professor was not inclined to let the $800 slip away from his grasp, and kindly offered to advance the balance. Bell parted with his money, and now the two worthy professors languish in the city jail.

The world is getting pretty old, and this is the year 1896; yet, pick up any daily paper and you will find at least a column of advertisements devoted to the announcements of two or three dozen astrologers and clairvoyants who are willing to divulge to their poor dupes "the past, present, and future." These frauds are all probably representing to their customers and dupes of to-day their great delight that Eugene and Van de Vere are caught. They are probably declaring, with much show of indignation, that it is imposters such as the apprehended twain who bring their very respectable profession into disrepute. That such men and women can prosper and thrive in an intelligent community is most astonishing. Here is an advertisement setting forth the claims of Professor Eugene. It is taken from one of the daily papers. If the Maker of the universe should visit earth He could not promise to do more than this very clever fellow:

A RARE Opportunity to Consult the Great Clairvoyant,
Prof. F. Eugene.

People of San Francisco, as well as other cities, marvel at his power. Lawyers, speculators, business men of all grades, and ladies from every walk in life, together sound his praise for the benefit they have received. All are pleased. Professor Eugene gives advice on business, speculation, investments, love, courtship, marriage and divorce; settles lovers' quarrels, reunites the separated and causes a speedy and happy marriage with the one of your choice. He locates mines and buried treasures, tells of your friends and enemies, removes evil influences, gives advice pertaining to lawsuits, locates and recovers old estates. The troubled and unfortunate should seek his counsel. Thousands of families long separated have been reunited by his efforts. All persons unsuccessful in business, who seem to be unlucky, should visit him, seek his aid and start aright. Thousands have become wealthy through his advice. Young men starting in business will find it greatly to their advantage to consult him on all matters of financial interest to themselves. Hours 10 A. M. to 8 P. M. Letters with stamp answered. PROFESSOR EUGENE, 1728 Market street.

Men and women following this line of endeavor make a living in this city, and a good one, too. The mere statement of that fact is, in itself, astonishing. The mischief that they breed, no one may measure. Chance brought out the fact that one of their kind stands morally responsible for three murders and one suicide. How many lives, how many divided homes and broken hearts may be charged to them, how much of misery and crime they have caused, can only be a matter of speculation. Dupes will they have so long as their signs hang from out their doorways. Poor humanity is always caught by the mysterious and the occult. We seem to be drawn toward that which affects to peer into the future and promises happier and better days. In our hours of depression, we are inclined to search for that which vouchsafes to us a bright and glittering delusion that we may hug, and so break the force of present pain by contemplation of our future happiness; so make ourselves half-contented with our present poverty by regarding the prosperity the future has in store for us. Somewhere in Draper's works, he speaks of this characteristic of mankind, and says the brain is divided into lateral halves, the one of which, the romantic half, entertains the other, the practical side, by weaving romances of wealth, building air castles, and whispering the prophecies of great achievements which are to come, yet which both know to be impossible. The press may protest and expose, the police arrest and convict these charlatons of fraud and theft; but, probably until the end of time, weak men and women will be ready to offer themselves as fresh victims for the cupidity of the cunning fraud.

On the first page of the San Francisco WAVE, date March 14th, there is an editorial under the head, "The Teachers of Anarchy," that is one of the most trenchant, searching articles we have read for many a day. It is couched in the purest of English, and scintillates with genius. It is pregnant with thought. It is scholarly, and betrays an unusual depth of erudition. We know not who wrote it, but it stamps its author as a man of thought and learning, a man who is a master of the art of using words, as the skilled mechanic uses tools. If you have not read it, get it and read it, not once, but often.—Citrograph, Redlands, Cal.

On Pitcairn Island, which was peopled by the Mutineers of the Bounty, there is a population of one hundred souls. It forms a fairly socialistic community; its members aid one another in all undertakings, but it seems they experience frequent changes of religion. Some years ago, the Church of England claimed the entire population. Shortly afterwards, some Seventh Day Adventists from San Francisco appeared and converted the entire island to their tenets. Subsequently a detachment of Baptist missionaries showed the population the error of the Adventist way, and they were again baptized. Just now a Roman Catholic priest is engaged proselytizing, and doubtless the mass will rule ere next we hear from the environment.

Miss Mary H Kingsley, who seems to have been a missionary in Africa, doubts the value of the present method of regarding the African mind as a jug, which has only to be emptied of the stuff that is in it, and refilled with the doctrine which the missionaries teach. She says the moral results of missionary teaching are defeated by the doctrine of the efficacy of repentance. An African chief gets drunk, beats his wives, steals his neighbor's jackknife, sells his neighbor's daughter to the Arab traders, and then consoles himself by singing the touching hymn:

A little talk with Jesus
Makes it right,
All right!

It appears to be the purpose of the leading newspapers of this city to prove to the world that they are venal. Of the contract between the Examiner and the railroad there seems to be no possible explanation. But Mr. Hearst's paper shrieks daily to the Chronicle "You're another." By and by our papers will wonder at the scant respect they command at the East.

It appears that the Sugar Trust is supplying funds to the Cuban rebels, in order that the rebellion shall go on for another year, so as to enhance the value of stock on hand and to insure the fulfilment of pending contract. What people would like to know is—who holds the bonds of the future Republic of Cuba?

CAUSERIE.

BY JOHN BONNER.

The unions which "struck" the Parrott Building, and threw several hundred men out of work, appeared to be bent on bringing the question between "organized" labor and free labor to a clean-cut issue. In order to establish their monopoly, the unions tried to compel workmen who had no grievance to throw up their jobs under pain of violence and death. It was then for the workmen to say whether they would let their wives and children go hungry in order that union bosses should vindicate their theories. It was for them to decide whether, in joining a union, they parted with their freedom to work at their trades, and surrendered the sovereignty which is the birthright of every American citizen. They decided, as it was obvious from the first that they would, that they would retain their sovereignty under their own hat.

* * *

When work was slack last winter, the completion of the Parrott Building was hastened in order to give employment to mechanics who would otherwise have been idle. They were employed at the current rate of wages, and for the usual hours of work. They do not pretend that the terms of their contract were violated by their employers. They were "called out" because the demagogs who manipulate the unions put forth new demands which were not thought of last winter, and which are not essential to the well being of the mechanics.

* * *

The workmen, their wives and children were in fact required to give up their means of livelihood in order that the officials of the unions should win a victory over their employers, and should demonstrate to the men that they are useful, and that they ought to be supported in idleness out of the funds of the unions.

* * *

A bill which is known as the Raines Bill was lately passed by the New York Legislature, abolishing free lunches in saloons. It is said that seven thousand lunch counters were abolished at a blow, between Lake Erie and Coney Island. Public opinion sanctions the reform. The free lunch is a heresy. It induces men who need lunch to take drinks which they do not need, and it compels saloon-keepers to dispense cheap liquor, because they cannot afford to supply wholesome liquor and to throw a free lunch into the bargain. It is inconsistent with business principles. Many men in San Francisco get a two-bit lunch with a fifteen-cent drink, and then they wonder that the saloon-keeper fills his decanter with forty-rod whiskey.

* * *

In the course of a pleasant talk on California wines, Dr. Depew combined with some judicious suggestions a few trifling errors. He complained that our champagne is too beady and not pleasant to the taste. He seems to imagine that it would contain less alcohol if the grapes were grown on hillslopes instead of low lands. Inquiry would have satisfied him that the alcholic strength of Californian champagne is about the same as that of the French champagne which is imported to this country, and that the site of the vineyard does not affect the matter. The trouble with our champagne is that its makers have not yet learned their trade. Over two centuries have elapsed since the vine-growers of the Maine learned to make an effervescent wine by a double fermentation, to blend the various growths, and to ascertain exactly what proportion of rock candy and cognac must be added to the wine. When our winemakers have been one-tenth of the time at work, they will turn out a wine which will compare favorably with Mumm or Roederer.

* * *

The genial doctor took pains before he left to recant his awful statement that he had seen no pretty girls here. Had he not done so, he would have shared the fate of Orpheus. He had probably been unlucky enough to meet a homely girl or two on his arrival in the State; and he was like the Englishman who lay for three weeks drunk at Calais, and being waited upon by a red-haired bonne, wrote home that all Frenchwomen had red hair, and carried a bottle under their arm.

* * *

Eleonora Duse's performance of Magda in Suderman's "Heimat" is said to place her above Sarah Bernhardt, who made a hit in the same part. Her acting it imbued with a simplicity and sincerity which actually inspire terror; it is stateliness, dignity, and pathos incarnate. She is just the actress to interpret Suderman, whose single-hearted sincerity, and honest purpose, combined with his admirable literary workmanship, have placed him at the head of the dramatists of the day. It is to him that the reading public owe the only counterpart to Anna Karenina—the romance entitled Es war.

* * *

An unknown poet paints the Dervishes who are now harrying the Italians and the English in the Soudan, in a single couplet:

Of tribes that in the desert fell
The wandering souls are we;
Wind-scattered seed of Ishmael
Upon the sterile sea.

* * *

Miss Carrie Bowes, a young lady who has been four years in Europe, studying music at Mayor Sutro's expense, has come home, and proposes to pursue her profession here. I wish her every success, and I will make her return the text for a little sermon. There is in this city a natural growth of musical taste which is perhaps not equaled in any other city in the Union. As the poor far outnumber the rich, it is more frequently observed among those who cannot afford the expense of a musical education than among those who can. Among the pupils of the common schools there are many mute inglorious Calves and Nordicas, Gounods and Bizets.

* * *

In France, young people who show high promise, may compete for the Prix de Rome or for less splendid prizes at home. The conservatoire may be opened to them, and the highest training placed at their disposal by the munificence of the Government. Our political system does not permit such farsighted liberality here. But the city and the State abound with rich men, who could afford to maintain a promising student of art or music for three or four years at the great schools in Europe. Miss Bowes is not the only young lady who has found a generous patron to enable her to prove her merit. Why should not the example become general? A list of a score of gentlemen could be counted on the fingers, every one of whom could afford to expend $1000 a year to keep one pupil at Paris or Rome or Milan for a few years. Why not start the fashion?

* * *

Except when Reed talks, the Republicans do not effulge with wit. But there are flashes. Senator Cullom of Illinois was asked, "Who will be the Democratic candidate this year?" "My opinion is," said the Illinoisan, "that Democrats will nominate Horace Greeley." "Why, he is dead." "So is the party," responded the Senator, solemnly; "only they don't know it." The corpse may be lively.

* * *

Fraulein Elizabeth Mals is writing in Germany on the Woman question, and argues that the Scriptures, understood rightly and in their original intent, favor the ideas and ideals of woman's emancipation. The fraulein is not familiar with the history of her own country. As Professor Boyesen has shown, the women of Germany possessed full political and social equality with their husbands, their fathers, and their brothers long before Christianity invaded the Fatherland. They were members of national councils; they spoke in debate; they accompanied their husbands to the field; no right which was enjoyed by men was denied to women. What Christianity did for women was to degrade them to the position of weaker vessels, who were subject to their husbands, and lost everything—even their own names.

* * *

A literary critic has some severe things to say about Queen Victoria and her advisers because Rudyard Kipling was not appointed Poet Laureate. It will be admitted that he has written finer verse than Mr. Austin, who did win the prize. But there were circumstances, which, perhaps, I may narrate in the language of a British officer lately returned from India: "Kipling? Oh, yes, I know him very well. Dirty little blackguard! Used to go up to Simla when it was full of army men and officials of the civil service, and used to hang round the billiard tables and verandas, to listen to everything that was said, and printed it all in a dirty little paper of which he was a reporter—a sneak, and an eavesdropper; a dirty little blackguard. You never could tell a secret among friends that he did not ferret it out, and print it. And he drew us so that the portraits were unmistakable, by Jove. A dirty little blackguard, sir; a chee-chee."

* * *

The playful ways of the Southern politician are always entertaining. In Saint Landry parish in Louisiana, a party of negroes started to register against the coming election. On their way they were halted by a party of white supremacy men and fired upon; two were killed and six or seven others wounded; of those who did not fall under the fire, fifty were whipped. Does the world move, or not?

HARU.

BY LAFCADIO HEARN.

This exquisite and most pathetic little sketch is from Kokoro, Lafcadio Hearn's new book on Japan. The wistful sadness of the tale is matched by the inimitable art of the rendering.

Haru was brought up, chiefly at home, in that old-fashioned way, which produced one of the sweetest types of woman the world has ever seen. This domestic education cultivated simplicity of heart, natural grace of manner, obedience, and love of duty as they were never cultivated but in Japan. Its moral product was something too gentle and beautiful for any other than the old Japanese society; it was not the most judicious preparation for the much harsher life of the new, in which it still survives. The refined girl was trained for the condition of being theoretically at the mercy of her husband. She was taught never to show jealousy, or grief, or anger, even under circumstances compelling all three; she was expected to conquer the faults of her lord by pure sweetness. In short, she was required to be almost superhuman—to realize, at least in outward seeming, the ideal of perfect unselfishness. And this she could do with a husband of her own rank, delicate in discernment, able to divine her feelings, and never to wound them.

Haru came of a much better family than her husband, and she was a little too good for him, because he could not readily understand her. They had been married very young; had been poor at first, and then had gradually become well off, because Haru's husband was a clever man of business. Sometimes she thought he had loved her most when they were less well off; and a woman is seldom mistaken about such matters.

She still made all his clothes, and he commended her needlework. She waited upon his wants, aided him to dress and undress; made everything comfortable for him in their pretty home; bade him a charming farewell as he went to business in the morning, and welcomed him upon his return; received his friends exquisitely; managed his household matters with wonderful economy; and seldom asked any favors that cost money. Indeed, she scarcely needed such favors; for he was never ungenerous, and liked to see her daintily dressed—looking like some beautiful silver moth robed in the foldings of its own wings—and to take her to theaters and other places of amusement. She accompanied him to pleasure-resorts famed for the blossoming of cherry-trees in spring, or the shimmering of the fireflies on summer nights, or the crimsoning of maples in autumn. And sometimes they would pass a day together at Maiko, by the sea, where the pines seem to sway like dancing girls; or an afternoon in Kiyomidzu, in the old, old summer-house, where everything is like a dream of five hundred years ago, and where there is a great shadowing of high woods, and a song of water leaping cold and clear from caverns, and always the plaint of flutes unseen, blown softly in the antique way—a tone-caress of peace and sadness blending, just as the gold light glooms into blue over a dying sun.

Except for such small pleasures and excursions, Haru went out seldom. Her only living relatives, and also those of her husband, were far away in other provinces; and she had few visits to make. She liked to be at home, arranging flowers for the alcoves or for the gods, decorating the rooms, and feeding the tame goldfish of the garden-pond, which would lift up their heads when they saw her coming.

No child had yet brought new joy or sorrow into her life. She looked, in spite of her wife's coiffure, like a very young child; and she was still simple as a child, notwithstanding that business capacity in small things which her husband so admired that he often condescended to ask her counsel in big things. Perhaps the heart then judged for him better than the pretty head; but, whether intuitive or not, her advice never proved wrong. She was happy enough with him for five years, during which time he showed himself as considerate as any young Japanese merchant could well be toward a wife with a finer character than his own.

Then his manner suddenly became cold,—so suddenly that she felt assured the reason was not that which a childless wife might have reason to fear. Unable to discover the real cause, she tried to persuade herself that she had been remiss in her duties; examined her innocent conscience to no purpose; and tried very, very hard to please. But he remained unmoved. He spoke no unkind words—though she felt behind his silence the repressed tendency to utter them. A Japanese of the better class is not very apt to be unkind to his wife in words. It is thought to be vulgar and brutal. The educated man of normal disposition will even answer a wife's reproaches with gentle phrases. Common politeness, by the Japanese code, exacts this attitude from every manly man; moreover, it is the only safe one. A refined and sensitive woman will not long submit to coarse treatment; a spirited one may even kill herself because of something said in a moment of passion, and such a suicide disgraces a husband for the rest of his life. But there are slow cruelties worse than words, and safer,—neglect or indifference, for example, of a sort to arouse jealousy. A Japanese wife has, indeed, been trained never to show jealousy; but the feeling is older than all training—old as love, and likely to live as long. Beneath her passionless mask the Japanese wife feels like her Western sister,—just like that sister who prays and prays, even while delighting some evening assembly of beauty and fashion, for the coming of the hour which will set her free to relieve her pain alone.

Haru had cause for jealousy; but she was too much of a child to guess the cause at once; and her servants too fond of her to suggest it. Her husband had been accustomed to pass the evenings in her company either at home or elsewhere. But now, evening after evening, he went out by himself. The first time he had given her some business pretexts; afterwards he gave none, and did not even tell her when he expected to return. Latterly, also, he had been treating her with silent rudeness. He had become changed, "as if there was a goblin in his heart," the servant said. As a matter of fact, he had been deftly caught in a snare set for him. One whisper from a geisha had numbed his will; one smile blinded his eyes. She was far less pretty than his wife; but she was very skillful in the craft of spinning webs,—webs of sensual delusion which entangled weak men, and always tightened more and more about them until the final hour of mockery and ruin. Haru did not know. She suspected no wrong till after her husband's strange conduct had become habitual, and even then only because she found that his money was passing into unknown hands. He had never told her where he passed his evenings. And she was afraid to ask, lest he should think her jealous. Instead of exposing her feelings in words, she treated him with such sweetness that a more intelligent husband would have divined all. But, except in business, he was dull. He continued to pass his evenings away; and as his conscience grew feebler, his absences lengthened. Haru had been taught that a good wife should always sit up and wait for her lord's return at night; and by so doing she suffered from nervousness, and from the feverish conditions that follow sleeplessness, and from the lonesomeness of her waiting after the servants, kindly dismissed at the usual hour, had left her with her thoughts. Once only, returning very late, her husband said to her: "I am sorry you should have sat up so late for me; do not wait like that again!" Then, fearing he might really have been pained on her account, she laughed pleasantly, and said: "I was not sleepy, and I am not tired; honorably please not to think about me." So he ceased to think about her—glad to take her at her word; and not long after that he stayed away for one whole night. The next night he did likewise, and a third night. After that third night's absence he failed even to return for the morning meal; and Haru knew the time had come when her duty as a wife obliged her to speak.

She waited through all the morning hours, fearing for him, fearing for herself also; conscious at last of the wrong by which a woman's heart can be most deeply wounded. Her faithful servants had told her something; the rest she could guess. She was very ill and did not know it. She knew only that she was angry—selfishly angry, because of the pain given her—cruel, probing, sickening pain. Midday came as she sat thinking how she could say least selfishly what it was now her duty to say—the first words of reproach that would ever have passed her lips. Then her heart leaped with a shock that made everything blur and swim before her sight in a whirl of dizziness, because there was a sound of karuma-wheels and the voice of a servant calling: "Honorable-return-is!"

She struggled to the entrance to meet him, all her slender body a-tremble with fever and pain, and terror of betraying that pain. And the man was startled, because, instead of greeting him with the accustomed smile, she caught the bosom of his silk robe in one quivering little hand, and looked into his face with eyes that seemed to search for some shred of a soul, and tried to speak, but could utter only the single word, "Anata?"* Almost in the same moment her weak grasp loosened, her eyes closed with a strange smile; and even before he could put out his arms to support her, she fell. He sought to lift her. But something in the delicate life had snapped. She was dead.

There were astonishments of course, and tears, and useless callings of her name, and much running for doctors. But she lay white and still and beautiful, all the pain and anger gone out of her face, and smiling as on her bridal day.

Two physicians came from the public hospital, Japanese military surgeons. They asked straight hard questions—questions that cut open the self of the man down to the core. Then they told him truth cold and sharp as edged steel, and left him with his dead.

The people wondered he did not become a priest,—fair evidence that his conscience had been awakened. By day he sits among his bales of Kyoto silks and Osaka figured goods, earnest and silent. His clerks think him a good master; he never speaks harshly. Often he works far into the night; and he has changed his dwelling-place. There are strangers in the pretty house where Haru lived; and the owner never visits it. Perhaps because he might see there one slender shadow, still arranging flowers, or bending with irisgrace above the goldfish in his pond. But wherever he rest, sometimes in the silent hours he must see the same soundless presence near his pillow, sewing, smoothing, softly seeming to make beautiful the robes he once put on only to betray. And at other times—in the busiest moments of his busy life—the clamor of the great shop dies; the ideographs of his ledger dim and vanish, and a plaintive little voice, which the gods refuse to silence, utters into the solitude of his heart, like a question, the single word, "Anata?" [Houghton, Mifflin & Co., publishers.]

* "Thou?"

RHODES AND THE REPORTERS.

BY FRANK NORRIS.

I think all of us—that is to say, all of the fourteen first cabin passengers aboard the "Moor" on her homeward voyage—rose a bit in our own estimations when we found out that the Honorable Cecil Rhodes (the Collosus of Rhodes, as South Africa calls him) was to be our fellow passenger for the next two weeks. I am sure the other thirteen have gone their thirteen different ways and have told their thirteen different stories as to their intimacy with the great man during that long voyage. Somewhere upon the face of the globe you will find thirteen different versions of the matter. This is the fourteenth.

If you should ever meet with one of the "Moor's" passengers of that trip, and he should tell you that it was true he had made the voyage with the Honorable Cecil, and that he had become acquainted with him, and that they had talked together, don't believe him. It is not true that he talked with Mr. Rhodes, or did any more than look at him very humbly and at a respectful distance. Mr. Rhodes talked to the table steward when he ordered his meals, presumably he talked to his secretary, and once I heard him say "Good-morning" to the Captain of the ship. But I am sure that was all.

He boarded us after the "Moor" had left the docks at Cape Town and had anchored out in the stream, and he left us at Plymouth early in the morning in a very gay little steam-yacht, all white paint and nickel railings. Between the two ends of the voyage he walked up and down the docks, or leaned over the side, or read a very great deal in a red book called the Sorrows of Satan. But he kept his own counsel and never talked or laughed or descended to anything like familiarity.

Of course, the extraordinary news that he was on his way to England was wired all over the world, and when the ship called at Madeira the reporters and correspondents took us, as it were, by assault. They foregathered in the smoking-room and glowered at one another and began asking us all manner of questions. Most of them were English but one was an Anglicized American, who said he represented a syndicate. We told this one that Mr. Rhodes was not to be approached and that he would not raise a line of "stuff" out of him. He wanted to bet us that he would, and offered great odds and talked very large. Of all the reporters who had stormed the ship, I suppose he was the most "enterprising." But afterward we were all sorry we had not taken him at his word and made a bet with him. I do not believe he even saw Cecil Rhodes. The great man took himself off to his stateroom at once and was either very sick or pretended that he was. None of us ever saw him after leaving Madeira and I am sure the reporters did not. They would congregate about the passageway that led to Mr. Rhode's stateroom, peeping and peering, very alert and "enterprising," but they had their trouble for nothing. Rhodes did not even come out for his meals but had them brought to his room by the steward.

They would send their cards to him or notes or verbal messages, and for answer would be referred to the secretary, a fearful looking fellow who was monosyllabic and impolite and who swore at them like any troop-sergeant.

Finally, they gave it up, even the Anglicized American who was "enterprising," and who had talked so large. And then, by common consent, they fell upon Captain Thatcher.

Poor Thatcher! I can see him now, with his red face and awkward gestures, relating the story of the raid for the hundredth time, horribly bored, repeating the same expressions over and over again. He had been with Jameson from Ptsanni to Krugersdorp, but he never knew his misfortune until the reporter fell foul of him. He had told his story some twenty or thirty times in Johannesburg, as often again in Cape Town, and fully twice as often aboard ship, always winding with the same account of how he had besought Mr. Leonard of the Johannesburg Reform Committee for five hundred men to make a dash for Pretoria, and of how Mr. Leonard had replied that he could not give him fifty.

It was considered an amusement aboard ship to listen at the windows of the smoking-room while the miserable Thatcher was once more grinding out his tale. We would call one another to listen to him in his travail, and would hurry to the round ports of the smoking-room, on tiptoe, waiting patiently for the invariable climax which never failed of effect.

"And," Thatcher would say, "I said to Leonard—'for God's sake, give me five hundred men and I'll make a dash for Pretoria and give 'um what for!' And he says to me—'My dear Thatcher' (here he would make the queerest, most awkward gestures with both arms, his fists closed tight) 'My dear Thatcher, I can't give you fifty.'"

This was funny. Somehow it always sent us into spasms of laughter, and we would tiptoe away, shaking our fists awkwardly, and exclaiming, "He says to me, 'My dear Thatcher, I can't give you fifty.'"

FEMALE WOOING.

HOW FAR A WOMAN MAY GO TO ENCOURAGE A PROPOSAL OF MARRIAGE.

The most interesting of the several prize contests evoked by the advent of Leap Year was that of the New York Herald which offered a prize of one hundred dollars for the best answer to the question, "How far may a woman go to encourage a man to propose marriage?" The competition proved a great "copy" producer, for the communications filled several columns of the Sunday edition and were read and noticed throughout the country. They ranged from grave to gay; some were in prose, but many appeared in verse, and the degree of ingenuity exhibited and suggested left the ordinary bachelor wondering at his single blessedness and the normal husband considering the details of his own wooing. After due consideration the prize was awarded to the following missive from a Mrs. James Gilmour who is the mother of three sons and three daughters:

Solomon, the wisest man that ever lived, says of a good woman: "Her price is far above rubies." Certainly, from his extraordinary and extensive experience with the sex, I should consider him competent to pass judgment.

We will presume that you are a "good, womanly," woman, such as he describes, and that you are desirious of approaching a man on the subject of matrimony; that you are anxious to induce him to propose.

First—Select the man on whom you intend to bestow the privilege of your attention, note his behavior and general conduct, and then, if you deem him worth the winning, hold fast to him. We are strictly enjoined to "Hold fast to that which is good."

Second—In your after companionship with him bear in mind the fact that you are a woman of great price, "far above rubies," and you will never compromise yourself by any indecorousness of speech or manner.

Seek his society in such a manner that he is not cognizant of being sought after; be bright and cheerful in his presence, sympathize with him in his troubles, stimulate him to best efforts in his business affairs, cheer him when he is despondent and encourage him to confide in you.

Dress becomingly for him, but never gaudily. When he is absent from you write him a few interesting, chatty letters, wherein, if you are an adept in the art, you can weave a few insinuating expressions, which may work wonders. "The pen is mightier than the sword."

Above all else, prove yourself a good listener. If he monopolizes three-thirds of the conversation, you will have the more chance to study his character, for "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." I guarantee that you will get in your thirds in the sweet by and by.

I should scarcely advise your treating him to specimens of your cookery. His mother might excel in the culinary art. Moreover, it was an uncooked apple with which Mother Eve beguiled Adam. Of the righteousness of that transaction, I shall say nothing; of the success everything, in that she molded Adam to her will. Time enough to "feed the brute" when you have to do so; then feed him to your heart's content, and feed him well.

If you are making any progress with him accord him trifling familiarities, which may be increased in proportion to his affability and his interest in you. Your womanly intuition should by this time enable you to judge whether or not you have found favor in his sight and to act accordingly. "Be ye wise as serpents, but harmless as doves."

Should there spring up between you a mutual regard, treat him to some of those dainty feminine touches which are indescribable, not because they are womanly or wrong, but because their language is mute and sacred to the two persons most concerned.

Do not always agree with him; it is sometimes wiser to agree to disagree.

If you have a spark of wit in your nature you ought by this time to have made yourself so necessary to his existence that he will miss you sadly when absent, and will begin to realize that "It is not good for man to be alone."

Though all progtesses well, draw the line at promiscuous osculation. Never permit him to kiss you; that is the privilege of the engaged. But since the Apostle says, "Greet ye one another with an holy kiss," you might vouchsafe him just one—some night at parting, perhaps. But if he attempts to return it do not permit it. Tell him "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

Finally, you might inform him that you can put him in the way of finding a "good thing," and refer him to the eighteenth chapter of Proverbs the twenty-second verse. If he be a manly sort of fellow, and cares anything for you, he will doubtless follow the exhortation of the prophet, and thus find favor with you and the Lord.

Should your innate modesty rebel somewhat at this suggestion, you may console yourself by remembering that it is indeed your leap year privilege.

If you are the dear, womanly, nestling creature you ought to be, he must have proposed long ago. If he has not, discard him, for either he is not worthy of you or you are not "en rapport" with him.

In that case try again. BECKY SHARP.

A TEN-THOUSAND-DOLLAR NOVEL.

THE FANTASTIC TALE OF AN IMPOSSIBLE CONSPIRACY.

A critique of A Fool of Nature is inevitably colored by the wonderful fact of its success. This is the book to which the New York Herald's $10,000 prize was awarded. It won the greatest of modern literary competitions, and, if for no better reason, is therefore noteworthy. Had the volume been placed before me with no name on its title page, I should at once have ascribed it to Edgar Saltus. The plot is sufficiently preposterous and the dialogue commensurately cynical to justify the reputation of the author of Mr. Incoul's Misfortunes. If epigrammatic rejoinders and pessimistic reflections were not adequate to vindicate that assumption, there are the dramatis personæ rejoicing in names as violently improbable as anything in the directory. What thinkest thou of a hero who figures through various adventures as Murgatroyd Whiterduce, son of Pynchepole Whiterduce; or of Reverend Christopher Plukerose Agabag, pastor of the Church of St. Sacrosanct; or of the novelist, Verinder Vyse; or of General Stepyngstone, Judge Roger Hemynge, Devereux Scaramanga, besides Mrs. Dorothy Tiptoft, and Miss Aurelia Estengrewe, not to mention Polydore Scammel, or Gabriel Negus—the latter an astrologer? There is a nomenclature for you, and attached to personages as extraordinary—and all grouped round Pynchepole and his offspring, Murgatroyd. There is nothing to remind you they are human beings, these persons, save indeed their circumstances and attitudes. The mere details and facts of existence are not permitted to embarrass Mr. Hawthorne's narrative, which bounds genially onwards in a course as eccentric as the skirts of Loie Fuller.

This is the tale of a mysterious conspiracy directed at the American government, which Pynchepole Whiterduce aims at overthrowing, replacing the system with a limited monarchy. The society of which he is the unknown chief spreads over the country; its members recognizing each other by a hand clasp, but the various circles know nothing of the connecting links which make the great chain of the plot. The murder of Whiterduce after he has had an explanation with his wife, affords the pretext of the subsequent revelations, and serves to introduce the personality of Doctor Maydwell, the extraordinary physician, the musician Polydore, and the Astrologer Negus, who form the little circle of Murgatroyd's friends. That worthy is happily married at the end of the volume by the beauty to whom he has been betrothed by his parent, and the curtain is rung down to the music of marriage bells. There are subordinate complications, involving seductions, mysterious substitutions of children, together with matrimonial infelicities, and narrow escapes. So it is impossible to find objections on the score of absence of action, or mystery, or interest. The book is melodramatic and brilliant, but the impression derived is seriously consider it as a wok of art. Indeed, one cannot but regret at the waste of Julian Hawthorne's powers—powers which consistently exercised in a legitimate direction could not but win him fame.

One cannot fail to be amused at the smart talk of the group of unconventional people who are gathered round Pynchepole Whiterduce's dinner table to celebrate the coming of age of his son Murgatroyd. They are characterized in clever phrases, and are illuminated by breezy reflections on Society and affairs; indeed these initial chapters are the best in the volume. Here they are assembled at the board.

Dinner is served. The damask tablecloth is lustrous in the soft light. The flowers are massed in the center of the round table, glowing with color and breathing perfume. There is a sparkle of silver, crystal, and porcelain. The subdued cheerfulness of conversation begins to murmur and undulate. Deft servants exchange noiseless signals and step hither and thither. Dinner has begun. There is not a fool present, or not more than one.

The advantage of a round table is that the head of it is always where the best thing is being said. Any one who can prove a right to it may occupy the position, without the pain of changing chairs. The host is on the same footing with his guests.

"Which do you prefer, Little Necks or Blue Points?" inquired Hannah Estengrewe, as she squeezed a segment of lemon over one of the first-named bivalves.

"Whichever I'm accustomed to," was Verinder Vyse's reply.

"Now, I should have thought you would like novelty."

"Not on the lower, at the expense of the higher plane. Novelty in dinners may be a gastronomic virtue, but it is a moral error."

"Do explain, Mr. Vyse. Can Little Necks be immoral?" said Mrs. Sharingbourne, smiling over graciously from Hannah's right.

"Mrs Sharingbourne, eating is, in the last analysis, an animal necessity. The degree in which we disguise that fact is the mark of our advance toward civilization. The most civilized dinner is that at which you know not what you eat—thereby liberating your intellect for conversation."

"Ah, that accounts for it, then," said the old lady, with the most innocent air in the world. "It is the dinner's not being civilized. I always thought it was something else!"

"You mustn't mind him, ma'am," chuckled old Roger Hemynge. "He's trying sentences out of his next novel on us."

Mr. Whiterduce gave the discomfited novelist a friendly nod. "It's the right social principle—the spirit against the flesh," he said. "The ox and the ass are always trampling us if we give 'em a chance—eh, Agabag?"

"And the swine turn again and rend us," assented the clergyman, unctuously.

Mrs Tiptoft sipped her hock and glanced across at the Judge. "You and I were brought up in a farm-yard, Judge," she remarked, "and we cherish the memory of our first loves!"

"Ay, ay, Mrs. Tiptoft. I may say I never saw to the bottom of my own nature until I read that passage about the pigs running down the steep place. If we can't be men and women, let's be swine. It's the first alternative."

"What a pearl hath our little clam produced!" said Vyse to Hannah.

"A black pearl, then," said Aubert Frewin. "Imagination is divine; it finds the human being in the animal—not the other way—and society out of solitude."

"Anachronism before soup," muttered the Judge, sotto voce, to Mrs. Tiptoft; "should have kept it for our coffee."

But Aurelia Estengrewe had heard and kindled.

"Mr. Frewin does say such soulful things in his strange way," she confided to Mr. Agabag. "Is it not true that imagination involves religion? It divines the unseen and eternal!"

At the same moment Mrs. Jellicoe, on his other side, asked his opinion on another subject:

"Tell me" she said, anxiously studying the empty shells on her plate through her eye-glasses, "do clams really have pearls? I never found one and I have eaten so many!"

The man of God disposed first of the material doubt.

"No pearls in Little Necks," he said, sympathetically. Then he turned to Aurelia. "The Church by anticipating the most transcendent surmises of imagination, relieves us of the responsibility of accepting imagination as our guide. Nor can imagination be deemed a trustworthy index of the moral."

"N—no; still, may not imagination be a sort of personal revelation—to the pure in heart, you know?"

"Beyond a certain point," struck in Scaramanga, tossing back his hair with a noble movement, "morality is pusillanimous. It is a temporary local substitute for spiritual perception. The child is carried whither his nurse thinks best; the man walks on his own feet where he will. Convention leads us until we are of a stature to think independently. After that my wrong may be your right—no general rule binds." As he spoke his eyes glanced across the table and rested an instant on Isabella Sharingbourne, seated nearly opposite, beside Murgatroyd. The color in her smooth, firm cheeks deepened slightly, but Scaramanga was the first to look away.

"A communist of my acquaintance," remarked Mr. Whiterduce, pleasantly, "was annoyed by some inauthorized intruder, who argued that, since communism held all things in common, he might sit by the communist's fire. 'I admit your right to sit there,' said my friend, 'as long as you don't interfere with my right to sit there alone.'"

Here the stately shoulders of Blackmore Risdon shook in a Jovian chuckle.

"That's the point, my boy," he rumbled, huskily, addressing, not Whiterduce, of course, but Scaramanga; "sauce for the goose, sauce for the gander. You have to keep your eyes on your example quite as much as on your rights. The non-conformist who isn't an outlaw must be a hypocrite. The majority rules."

MUSIC.

HAMILTON HOWE'S FAILURE—THE CAPACITY OF HOMER HENLEY'S VOICE.

Mr. Homer Henley was the unfortunate victim of hoarseness upon the evening of his farewell concert, and naturally failed to do himself justice. However, he was very acceptable in the "Creole Lover's Song" (Buck) and won much applause for the "Toreador" number, from Carmen. Mr. Henley has a magnificent voice, and is musical by nature, but he has almost everything to learn, as yet, from a vocal or an artistic standpoint. Mr. E. D. Crandall, tenor, displayed good taste in selecting short, appropriate songs for a concert program, which he also sang pleasingly. The fact that farewell concerts are largely affairs of friendship, disarms criticism, to a certain extent, especially if certain of the participants are not professional musicians. On this occasion, Miss Nellye Giusti was the soprano, and Mrs. Henley the contralto. Each gave a solo. Mrs. Henley sang a duo with her husband, and both took part in the last number, a mixed quartet. Mr. Martinez, the pianist, displayed a good technic, but was rather indiscreet with the pedal. He is happily free from all mannerisms. The first part of the "Papageno" Rondo (Ernst) was very well played by Mr. Mollenhauer, the violinist, but his double-stopping was throughout faulty of intonation. Mrs. Willard Batcuelder was the accompanist.

Until the production of Gounod's "Redemption" the critics had been rather lenient with Mr. Howe, presumably because, as there was little or nothing favorable to be written of the orchestral concerts, it was thought they would die of their own unfitness.

But Mr. Howe is irrepressible. He not only arranges to tide over the dull summer months, but, simultaneously with last week's very poor performance of the "Redemption," he announces Rossini's "Stabat Mater" and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise"—and with singers of national repute—for the future. This is too much. Mr. Howe has had ample time to show at least a little of what he might do, even under adverse circumstances. Unfortunately, he has but proved himself totally unqualified for the position he essays. The plea of insufficient rehearsals is no excuse, for no conductor has the right to appear in public under such circumstances. Mr. Howe, therefore, is chiefly responsible for the poor rendering of Gounod's oratorio, a detailed criticism of which is out of the question. The orchestra was markedly off pitch; there was no tonal balance, precision of attack, shading, or bringing out of subjects. Naturally, the soloists and chorus were at sea, whether good or indifferent, whether well acquainted with the music or not. Madam de Seminario (soprano) and Mr. E. D. Crandall (tenor) were about the best in their respective parts, although Mr. Crandall's voice is rather light for such work. Singers and instrumentalists neither help their own cause nor that of music by participating in such inartistic performances as that of the "Redemption." If it is to continue, the San Francisco Oratorio Society might do worse than to appoint a fourth advisory board, invested with the power to say when their work was ripe for a public hearing.

Mrs. Carmichael-Carr, so long and favorably known in musical circles, will be tendered a farewell concert prior to her departure for England, whither she goes to visit her aged mother, Mrs. Carmichael.

Unusual interest in the event is manifest, not alone because of Mrs. Carr's popularity here, but also because of her invaluable assistance to young musicians, whom she has introduced to the notable London musicians. The concert will take place about the end of this month. P. C. A.

FRANK MAYO.

PUDD'NHEAD WILSON'S REMINISCENCES OF OLD THEATRICAL DAYS.

The very able dramatizer of Mark Twain's "Pudd'nhead Wilson," is so much in evidence at present, and has been so thoroughly interviewed and reported, that it would seem impossible to say anything of him, which has not been said already. However, when I caught sight of the rather imposing face and figure of Frank Mayo, the other afternoon at the Occidental, I couldn't resist the opportunity of trying to draw him out a little more. He was starting out on a stroll over the city—"just to wander down through some of my old haunts," he said, in explanation.

"You know," he continued, "I remember when Washington Street was the city. As a boy, I used to saunter along that thoroughfare, and flatten my nose up against the shop windows, so as to see all there was behind them—just to amuse myself. I was only about sixteen; this hotel stood almost by itself then, with a sandbank over on that corner," pointing to the corner of Bush and Montgomery opposite, "and a little grocerystore on the other. There's been a great change around here, in these forty odd years, and I yet I meet a number of my old acquaintances on the streets, whom I remember well. I was a call-boy in those days," continued Mayo, "at the Maguire Opera House. Occasionally I went on for small parts at first—no—I had had no sort of training for the stage; indeed, until I reached San Francisco, I was not sure whether I wanted to go to the wonderful gold mines I had heard of, or if I wanted to ship as a sailor, but I went in o Maguire's, and, as I was saying, took small parts, and then came engagements with the various stock companies playing at the house. I remained at Maguire's seven years, beginning as a call-boy, and when I severed my connection, it was only to return as leading man."

"Was it not during your early career at this house that you had your falling out with Junius Booth, Jr.?" I asked.

"Oh, you mean when he kicked me out?—well"—smiling—"yes, I have never forgotten that."

"What made him do it?"

"Well, you see, I was very ambitious to make a good impression, and to rise," returned Mayo. "I was only a super then, and Mr. Booth had told us all that we must work up the scene during his address to the Peruvians. We were playing 'Pizarro' at the time. We were to shout vigorously when he gave us the cue, and the cue was the word 'change' in the line, 'No such change as they can give us;' but, you see, the word occurred twice in the whole line, which was: 'Tell them we ask no change—at least no such change as they can give us.' I listened very attentively, and when he spoke the first 'change,' I gave a tremendous shout at the top of my lungs, which set all the other supers and the audience to laughing uproariously. Of course, it spoiled his scene, and the curtain had to be rung down. Booth booted me all the way from the footlights to the stage door."

Soon after this little experience, Mayo went to New York, and was under various managements for several years, playing Shakespearian and romantic roles—then he himself became a manager, and it was while he had control of the Rochester Theater that Frank Murdoch brought him "Davy Crockett," which he accepted, and in which he created the title role with immense success. Mayo speaks of this with some quite natural pride.

"I cannot but think," he says, "that I offered a good bit of dramatic workmanship in the impersonation of Davy. I know I made a fortune with it. Then I lost it all, trying to stage new plays. The public would not have me in anything else. Whenever I returned to Davy Crockett the receipts would more than double. People get into habits—they see a man in a certain part, and they won't have him in anything else. Even an actor like Edwin Booth suffered from the same habit; he used to say he always had big houses if he played Hamlet or Richelieu or Iago, but let him try anything new, and the public would not come to see him. Look at O'Neill here—I consider him one of the finest actors of our time—his Virginius is one of his best roles and a very strong bit of acting, and yet I understand it does not draw like the other roles in which he has played so often."

Current gossip has always had it that Mr. Mayo was a Californian, but he isn't, for he was born in Boston. He, however, considers himself a Californian.

"I came here so young, you know," he says, "all my oldest and some of my warmest friends were made here. I had my start in life and grew up here. Why" he continued, turning to me, very earnestly, "I saw the birth of all the dailies here but one. I remember the first edition of the Call, the Bulletin. The Chronicle, at first, was only a dramatic sheet which used to be distributed at the theaters; then it began to include news items. It was managed by the two brothers then—very bright, energetic young fellows, those De Youngs."

It is always delightful to talk with a bright-minded man who has traveled and observed; he has always a thousand interesting things to tell one. Mr. Mayo has more than all this—charming manners, and a rather striking appearance. His massive, well shaped head, with its crown of snow white hair, to which the dark blue eyes lend such violent contrast, the tall figure and vigorous bearing, all combine to give him a most pleasing personality.

E. D. H.

English newspapers are gradually sifting out facts from fiction in the Jameson case. It is now learned his force was larger than the Boers' force, and that in all he only lost fifteen killed and fifty wounded.

Rabbi Leonard Levy of Philadelphia, who visited Palestine last year, learned that twenty Jewish colonies exist there. The three largest of them were near Samaria, Jaffa, and Safed. There is a silk factory at one of them, but the chief industry in each case is the raising of grapes and mulberries.

London dogs are muzzled at last, and the police and the Magistrates are overwhelmed with care. It is impossible to persuade some dog-owners that a muzzle is necessary for the public safety, or that it is anything but the invention of ignorant faddists. As for the police, who have to chase unmuzzled dogs, their lot is not a happy one. In one week 2000 dogs were gathered in.

A London weekly announces that the total fortune of the Rothschild family in England and on the continent is four hundred million pounds sterling. Herr Krupp, the great gun manufacturer, is the richest Prussian subject. He is taxed on an income of $1,784,000. Next to him is Baron de Rothschild, who has $1,462,000 per annum; Captain Hutten-Czapski comes next with $771,000. Herr Krupp pays $71,250 taxes.

The famous painter, Franz von Lenbach, says that Bismarck always treats him as one of the family when he is at the chateau painting the ex-Chancellor's portraits. "He always embraces me as I arrive and depart, and treats me as a Bismarck," says Von Lenbach. "He has a certain esteem for me, and tries to show that I am not an imbecile. However, in my work as a painter he has no interest whatever."

THINGS AND PEOPLE

THE BEST newspaper sensations are not those which the clash of events precipitate. A great editor often manufactures the conditions which culminate in a melodramatic occurrence, and, having arranged scenery and surroundings, has his reporters supply the incident. It is not often, however, that affairs turn so inaccurately as they did in Cuba recently. Charles Michelson, who left San Francisco to act as correspondent of Will Hearst's Journal, was superseded at the seat of war by that eminent editor Murat Halstead. Now, there is considerable honor in having as one's representative so eminent a personage, and the Journal was determined to obtain all the advertising possible out of its enterprise. So the wires were laid to have Honorable Murat arrested, and on receipt of the tidings of the event the paper was prepared to cover its entire front page with bewildering headlines announcing the insult to so prominent an American. Unfortunately the Spanish captured the wrong man. Instead of incarcerating the great editor they arrested Michelson and clapped him into jail; but though the Journal did its best with the affair, there was grievous disappointment over the miscarriage of the original scheme. On obtaining liberty "Mike" returned to New York, where, with Dryden, Davenport, and Bob Davis he aids in giving a California tone to Mr. Hearst's enterprise. Apropos of the Journal's circulation, it is told over in the Examiner office that the paper has at last achieved the 200,000 mark, and that great event was duly celebrated by a banquet to the staff at Delmonico's. The wonderful success which the Californian has made in the difficult field of Gotham journalism has been editorially commented on by his contemporaries, especially by the Sun, which took a most congratulatory tone in its felicitations.

* * *

AT THE Union League banquet Chauncey Depew told this story of the late Ward McAllister, which I don't remember to have seen previously in type. During the Columbian Celebration, at which the Duke of Veragua figured as guest of honor, Depew met that eminent Spaniard at one of the numerous banquets given in his honor. The day after, Chauncey and McAllister were parading Fifth Avenue as the Duke rolled by in an open carriage. With a profound sweep of his hat, Depew saluted the Duke, but to his surprise the leader of Society passed on with a stiff bow. So he said:

"Wherefore this coldness, McAllister? Is not Veragua worthy a more distinguished recognition? He represents the Spanish Government at our celebration, is the guest of the United States, and above all, is the descendent of Christopher Columbus."

"Perfectly true, my dear Depew," returned McAllister. "But I've been looking up the lineage of this man Columbus, and find he was a person of no social position whatever."

* * *

FOR THE BENEFIT of misinformed dailies, some one ought to explain the attitude of the Governor to the Prison Directorate. There have been rumors and brash statements that Budd has removed Mr. Devlin and appointed Senator Wilkins his successor. The ambition of the latter is father to that thought, for the breast of the Executive thrills with no such designs on the official person of Devlin. Though his term reached its span some months ago, he remains in harness until some one else is selected, and that, by signs and portents is a remote contingency. The fact is that the Governor and Mr. Devlin move in the same set both in Sacramento and Stockton; they enjoy several influential friendships in common, and not even for the sake of ex-Senator Wilkins will the Executive perform the process of decapitation when the beheading would do violence to several useful and agreeable intimacies. There is Director Hayes, however, a very mild and pleasant gentleman but whose line of endeavor is far removed from the range of gubernatorial sympathy—now if only he would resign, Mr. Wilkins's appointment would follow by telegraph. Unfortunately, Hayes sees no reason why he should make way for the Executive's obligations, and so the efforts at his dislodgement have aroused him to resentment rather than compliance. Of course, there is no doubt of Mr. Wilkins's ambition, nor of the promises made him at Sacramento, when he aided the Governor in several awkward situations; but Devlin is a capital fellow, and, as I said, has been singularly judicious in his friendships. Apropos of prisons, I have it on good authority that the active brain of Major Dick Hammond has conceived the idea of succeeding Warden Hale in charge of San Quentin. The motive of this especial ambition does not appear to the casual observer, though doubtless it is well founded. Maybe the plight of John Hays of the Hammond clan at Johannesburg, suggested the ambition to Richard P.—as forming a clever bit of contrast. However, if the condition preys on the latter's mind, let me suggest that arrangement be made for exchanging the brethren. Think of our Major in a veritably heroic role—imagine him succeeding Doctor Jameson!

* * *

HOSPITALITY is a virtue, but even a virtue may be carried to extremes. I forget what the official name of J. A. Fillmore's new position in the railway is, but that has nothing to do with the story—only with the manner in which he should be set forth in print. He plays an excellent poker game, does Mr. Fillmore—a fact that does figure in the forthcoming climax. Some friends had the genial railroad man to dinner at the Union League Club, and after a competent meal and good wine, one of the hosts proposed poker. "Fill" was delighted with the idea, but just as the party was heading for the cardrooms, some one remembered the Union League By-Law which restricts poker to members. He mentioned the fact to the host, who was much embarrassed. "I have invited Fillmore," he said, "and don't like to turn him down like this. However, if I must——"

So he explained the situation as delicately as possible to the railroad man, who replied:

"What, a mere question of membership standing between me and a game of poker! What's the matter with my joining your old club?"

"The very ticket," shouted the others, in voices full of relief.

So they found an application form, carefully filled it out—the hosts acted as sponsors—and five minutes later Fillmore was a duly accredited applicant, and as such dowered with all the privileges of membership. It costs some $50 to join the Union League Club, and the dues are $5 per month. From these figures it will be evident that Fillmore's suggestion was quite profitable, for when the game ended the railroad man was $250 ahead.

* * *

AMONG THE prominent figures of the Catholic aristocracy is a gentleman of great wealth and much oratorical talent, who, though ready to tramp the State for a holy cause, is absurdly economical in his monetary contributions. To describe him as closer than wall paper does violence to his frugality. Diving for buried treasures is a pastime in comparison with effort at exciting his liberality. However, every one is laughing at the manner in which Archbishop Riordan scored on his weakness at the Nugent lecture the other evening, though I believe the millionaire was blissfully unconscious of any application in the remarks to himself. It all happened at Metropolitan Temple, where there was an important gathering of the Hierarchy, and all its intimates, together with a fine assemblage of the populace in honor of Monsignor Nugent. This dignitary owes his fame to the organization of the League of the Cross, of which the Youth's Directory and the Cadets of the Cross are offshoots. To the economical aristocrat was assigned the task of congratulatory comment, and he soared into the empyrean in explanation of his joy and happiness over the good works of the honored guest.

"But a few months ago I was in New York," he announced, "and it was my privilege to pass the beautiful building of the Youth's Directory there. Gentlemen, I took off my hat twice—once in honor of the splendid institution, and once out of gratitude to its revered founder." And then he soared off amid the fixed stars on the wings of mixed metaphor.

Archbishop Riordan followed: "I, too, have experienced in New York the emotion which my friend so eloquently describes," he said. "But, gentlemen, there are Youth's Directories in California. Let me suggest that those of you who again feel moved to take your hats off to the institution, put your hands instead into your pockets, and we'll all have more reason for congratulation afterwards." The general laugh which followed showed how thoroughly the audience appreciated the point.

* * *

IF ALL the gold which the dailies have found in the Rawhide came up the shaft, Captain Neville would be erecting an Alladin's palace on California Street. It is a rich mine, but most expensive to work; there is water enough flowing into its lower levels to float an ocean steamer, and they pump a young sea out every night preparatory to commencing work next day. So, though I believe the Rawhide produces from thirty to fifty thousand a month, the solid gold bank of which the Call spoke had, I fear, its foundation in an inflamed imagination. Of course the mine is now listed in Boston and such tales do no violence to its market value. Apropos of mines, it is sometimes amusing to contrast such brilliant successes as the Rawhide and the Utica with the failures by which they are surrounded. In the neighborhood of Angels' Camp, where the great Hobart-Hayward property is situated, more millions than it has produced have been expended in attempted developments. Strange to say there are no other mines worthy the name there, though beside the Kennedy there is a group of rich gold producers.

* * *

The fallibility of experts was never better exhibited than in the incident of the Los Mulatos Mine. The story of its exploitation by Hobart and Hayward, and the subsequent announcement that the ore had been salted, is still familiar to miners. The wildest excitement followed the discovery, and Captain Egan, who has intimate relations in Mexico, was sent to the rescue of the half million which the owners had already received. Through the intervention of President Diaz, they were persuaded to disgorge, and for his success Egan was given a building on Montgomery Street valued at $60,000. Alas for the precipitancy of Hayward and the efficiency of his emissary. I am told that the Los Mulatos is now to-day a great bullion producer, and that the owners, forced to develop it themselves, have uncovered rich ore and in such quantities that they felt justified recently in refusing two millions for the property. Had it remained part of the estate, we'd have had Walter Hobart purchasing the Stanford Stock Farm, or importing Orloff trotters for his coach.

* * *

NO LONGER is Clara Belle McDonald an object for sympathy. She is now wealthy—and happy, I am told, for fortune has reversed the old score, and has compensated for the miseries of an unhappy marriage in gold. When the divorced wife of Dick McDonald left San Francisco, she had with her some five thousand dollars in coin, and, on the way across the Continent, she fell in with a kindly couple, who soon found out the story of her tribulations and accorded her a degree of sympathy which won her heart. They took Clara Belle to their home in Harlem, introduced her to their friends, and, subsequently, the husband, who is a speculator in real estate, induced her to join a syndicate which was dealing in Harlem River properties. She became a participator in the purchase of certain old homesteads, surrounded by broad acres which are now covered with residences, and form part of the Harlem extension. The speculation was so well directed that when there came a dividing of profits Mrs. McDonald found her five thousand converted into a hundred thousand dollars.

* * *

More important to California than the convention of the Christian Endeavor Societies, or the convocation of the Knights Templars, is the visit we are about to receive from the five hundred members of the Hotel Men's Association who are due here next week. They are coming to us in three special trains, headed first for the South and subsequently for San Francisco. Arrangements have been made for their entertainment by Manager Kirkpatrick of the Palace and B. K. Soulé of the Lick, and they are to be shown the resources in a manner liable not only to make an impression on their minds but on their palates. These men represent the leading hotels of the United States, and are caterers to millions of our fellow countrymen. The impressions they receive of our various products are liable to be translated on to thousands of bills of fare. The wines they will have the benefit of testing will show the capacity of our vineyardists; they will taste at first hand our oranges and our lemons, our raisins and our cherries, and I shall be surprised if there is not a subsequent increase in the demand for our commodities throughout the country. During their stay, the delegates are to be banqueted and shown the Bay. They will go to Del Monte, will be given a good time generally, and will go away with appropriate impressions of the glories of California.

THE WITNESS.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

TWO DOWNFALLS.

THE FAILURE OF "THE PHILISTINE" AND OF "A HOUSE OF CARDS."

A DECADENT DOWNFALL.

There's consternation in the camp of the Philistines, and the little butcher-paper magazine of that name is in eclipse. The Philistine was the organ of the decadents of East Aurora. Now, East Aurora is seventeen miles from Buffalo. It is the headquarters of the Cloverfield combine of cheese factories, and a horse named Mambrino King has his home there. Its chief product is ginger. "Can any good thing come out of Gallilee?" Evidently it can. The Philistine, a racehorse, cheese, soap, and ginger came out, and now, last of all, an edition of the "Song of Songs which is Solomon's."

This Song of Songs, together with Mr. Elbert Hubbard's odious comparisons of Jehovah and Dagon, which appeared in the Philistine, have combined to wreck the decadent movement in East Aurora, and so cause the publication of the little magazine to cease. (It should be set down in this place that Mr. Hubbard, besides being editor of the Philistine, is a manufacturer of soap.)

The comparison of Dagon to Jehovah did not jump with the religious views of Mr. Hubbard's printer, and in consequence he resigned. But the Song of Songs was too much even for decadent East Aurora. The book is an edition de luxe (something to be treasured by the lovers of binding and printing) and thus far it is fine; done by hand, with rubricated initials, on Ruisdall paper, hand made; the type cut after one of the earliest Roman faces. Oh, yes; from the printer's point of view the book is a joy forever. But the reading matter—well, let us not say much about that, when 'The caprice of sensual love,' and the "purring of a young barbaric chief to a sun-kissed shepherdess" is apotheosized till even decadent cheesemongers and decadent ginger manufacturers cry you mercy,—when it gets to be as bad as this it is time to draw a veil over the whole business. In the little magazine there are fig leaves over each paragraph, but the Song of Songs is prefaced by a red fleur de lis. I don't know what a red fleur de lis means, because I'm not a decadent (at least not a decadent of the school of East Aurora) but it surely must mean something indecent.

It has that look.

A CALIFORNIA GIRL'S NOVEL.

Miss Loys Yerrington is beautiful and clever, and a school teacher. She is dowered with great intellectual gifts and longs for leisure to write a novel. She is wooed persistently by Gregory Kendall, but, because he does not appeal to her heart, she refuses his oft repeated proffers of marriage. Lured by the prospect of a trip to Europe and a long rest, however, she finally consents to become his wife, and soon after the marriage meets the man whom Nature had ordained for her mate. In real life the union of preordained couples is attended with much storm and stress, even though both be free and unrestrained—for we are told the course of true love never runs smooth. In this instance, however, Mrs. Kendall has assured her husband that he shall never regret their marriage, and it is necessary, if she would preserve her consistency, to keep Bishop Yorke at a distance.

She does and dies.

This, in brief, is the plot of Miss Alice L. Wolf's novel, a House of Cards—a tale of San Francisco life, but with little that suggests San Francisco between its covers. The heroine, it is true, entertains the babies of a friend at Golden Gate Park, and has a charming residence on Pacific Heights. There are passing comments on the limitations of local living and an excursion or so to San Rafael, but from first page to last I did not find a distinctive, an identifying touch which could really be called characteristic. The tale would have been as entertaining and as intelligent set in Hartford or in Omaha. It bears no relationship to California.

Miss Wolf has selected for her dramatis personæ a set of individuals of whom she knows nothing. They are all strangers to her—their mode of life, their manners and attitudes. She does not attempt to depict her own people, nor the Society of which she is a member. No city in the world is so full of literary material as this in which we dwell, and in the sphere of Miss Wolf's own knowledge are men and women, situations and conditions which, if artistically depicted, would make the fortune of a novel. One hesitates to declare that the work of this volume is for naught; that the labor and pains expended in its construction are to no literary avail. Yet that is the fact. One reads the story through all its unnecessary complications, with the sad feeling which wasted effort inevitably provokes. If Miss Wolf will but put on paper the vicissitudes of certain old millionaires who coming here peddlers have developed into millionaires; if she will tell the love stories whose action forms the gossip of her set; if she will describe exactly the boys and girls with whom she has lived—not unpleasantly nor ungenerously, but realistically—then there will be something to criticize. But what can one say of Riker Van Arsdale, or Penelope Browning, or Bishop Yorke? They have neither veracity nor versimilitude. All of which may seem harsh and unnecessary to those who have read a pleasant story, but it is said with a full knowledge of the opportunities at Miss Wolf's command, and a sense where she has failed to do her talent justice.

[Stone & Kimball, Publishers.]

THE AUTHOR OF "PETER STIRLING."

Paul Leicester Ford, author of that notable American novel The Honorable Peter Stirling, was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., in 1865, and on his mother's side is a great-grandson of Noah Webster, says the Bookman. Except for six weeks in a kindergarten, he never received any regular education, owing to ill-health, but roaming at large in his father's library—one of the largest private libraries in this country—he went through what Carlyle has said is the best university for a young man—the college of books. With the help of a large printing outfit he learned how to write, spell, and punctuate, and became an expert compositor. In 1876 he partly set up a revised edition of Noah Webster's Webster Genealogy, and his name appeared on the title-page as the editor. Since then he has edited pamphlets and books without number almost wholly related to American historiography, the most important of which is perhaps The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. He has traveled in Europe, Newfoundland, South America, California, and the West Indies. He is an active political worker in his ward, and holds or has held official positions in the New England Society, the Hamilton Club, and other institutions. The writing of The Honorable Peter Stirling was taken up by Mr. Ford as recreation from his historical work, and the character of the hero is an attempt to blend in one man the qualities which from a close study of American politics he considers to be essential to political success in this country.

In a recent letter to THE WAVE apropos of his novel, Mr. Ford said: "I am not a novelist and therefore made my excursion into that field with a good deal of doubt, and only because I felt moved to say something on the subject of practical politics—a something drawn from work in my own primary, which happens to be a tenement ward in which is submerged, intentionally, a small section of brown-stone fronts. Apparently, what I said interested some people, so I feel that I have not quite written in vain."

BOOK NOTES.

The April Cosmopolitan contains the first instalments of Beatrice Harraden's "Hilda Strafford," and of "Mrs. Clift's Yacht," by Frank Stockton. The new story by the author of "Ships that Pass," etc., opens against the scenery of a San Diego lemon ranch, with English exiles as dramatis personæ. Hilda is the wife of Robert Strafford—at least I hope she is, for the introduction says nothing whatever about their marriage, and she arrives from England within the immediate cognizance of the reader. A strong, hard type, she is disappointed at the barren aspect of the region and regrets her self-imposed exile, but it is only the foundation of her character and the story we are given; it will be time for criticism as her development proceeds. Otherwise, the magazine is hardly as interesting as usual, though it has a poem by Sir Lewis Morris, a story by Paul Heyse, and the comment on literature and art. However, the pictures are excellent, save, of course, the colored cover with which the Cosmopolitan seems to have but poor success.

There's a charming little sketch in the April Harper's—in the "Editor's Drawer," called "A Goose Chase," by Margaret Sutton Briscoe. In it one finds that delightful blending of tenderness and comedy which so inevitably appeals to one's sympathies. The tale is brief, the idea is handled in an unaffected and very natural way, and it's really the best bit of fiction in the number.

Henri Rochefort is preparing for publication in England the reminiscences which have created so much of a sensation in France. He hated London, but lived there many years until the government permitted his return to Paris.

The title of Mr. George Moore's new novel, which is upon the subject of the perpetual problem between the spiritual and the sensual life, is Evelyn Innes. The heroine's father is engaged in reviving the music of the Roman Church—for instance, that of Palæstrina, Vittoria, and Orlando di Lasso. The girl has a beautiful soprano voice, and the materialist influence of a rich amateur impresario makes the ambitions of father and daughter hostile to each other. She subsequently meets a young musician who proves to her the subtlety of the emotion caused by the "desire to live from within," whereupon she enters a convent, where she passes through "soul-crises" as astonishing as those in the more worldly life. The book will probably not be finished before another six months have passed. The convent life has been treated from a sympathetic point of view, "as Mr. Moore feels that religion, like love, can be treated as a positive want."

The effects of Paul Verlaine, which have just been put under a judicial seal in the little room where he died, consist of some papers in a table drawer, a bundle of MSS. in a handbag, another—the work he was engaged on last—in the portmanteau which was presented to him the day before he came to London, and which was probably the only article of the kind he ever possessed, half a dozen of his clay pipes, and one of his pet cigarette-holders in the same unpretentious material, two pair of eyeglasses, a hat of the familiar pattern, and a nightcap.

Though it is full of glaring improbabilities, there is no decrying the interest of A Lady of Quality. The heroine is a sensational figure though she be so inconsistently irreproachable at the end of her days. In my critique I omitted to credit the volume to the publishers, Chas. Scribner's Sons.

MR. HIRSCHMAN REPORTS FAIR BUSINESS but is anxious to close out in the shortest possible time, and offers additional inducements. His stock of diamonds pearls, rubies, emeralds, etc., as well as complicated watches, silverware, and novelties in great variety, of first quality only—there is not an article in his entire stock that is not first-class. 113 Sutter Street, Lick House Block.

Would you be an architect, a painter, a surveyor? See page 16. Free instruction for subscriptions.

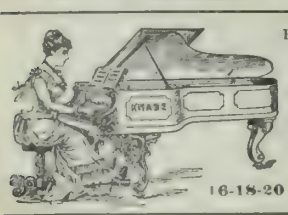
Kelly's Corn Cure never fails. 25 cents. 102 Eddy Street.

E. H. M. SPECIAL
The best WHISKEY for family use and Medicinal Purposes
RECOMMENDED
By all first-class Physicians. Sold everywhere.
E. H. MICHELS
Sole Controller
408 SANSOME ST. SAN FRANCISCO, CAL

NOBBIEST STYLES NEATEST FIT
BEST MATERIALS

HARLOE
'FRISCO'S FAVORITE HATTER
237 KEARNY ST.
Phone, Red 361

ITO, SOTOMI & CO.
JAPANESE GOODS
ART POTTERY, CURIOS AND RUGS A SPECIALTY
116 Sutter St. Bet. Kearny and Montgomery San Francisco, Cal



Established 1856
Benj. Curtaz & Son
Pacific Coast Agents
16-18-20 O'Farrell St.

MRS. EDITH E. McLEAN
PHYSICIAN FOR THE HAIR
Has a Canadian Vegetable Tonic for the Hair that will make it grow when all else fails. Dandruff removed. Terms moderate. High-class references.
Office Hours 10 to 12 and 1 to 6.
Rooms 45, 58 and 60
ST. ANN'S BUILDING
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

NEW YORK HAIR DRESSING STORE
MME. E. KESSING, Proprietress
Artistic Hair Dressing and Shampooing. A new preventive for the hair falling out. Superfluous hair removed. 1704 Market Street, San Francisco

100 Cards from plate for $1.00 at Dodge's new store, 112 Post
The finest work at reasonable prices. Visiting Cards, Wedding Invitations and new books.

FOR GRIPPE IT'S A DANDY
VINA BRANDY
AND
It's Pure! That's Sure!
VINA DISTILLERY CO.
819 Market St., S. F.

Good Appetite
Is restored and the disordered Stomach and Liver invigorated by taking a small wineglassful, before meals, of the celebrated . . . . . .
Peruvian Bitters

CHARLES S. WHEELER ERNST H. LUDWIG
Ernst H. Ludwig & Co.
THE MODEL AMERICAN CATERERS
Supply Wedding Breakfasts, Luncheons, Dinners, Matinee Teas and Receptions on shortest notice. Also Terrapin Entrees Luncheons and Dinners. Ice Cream, Cake, &c.
Telephone 2388 1206 SUTTER STREET

GEO. GOODMAN
Patentee and Manufacturer of—Artificial Stone
Schillinger's Patent In all its branches
SIDE WALK and GARDEN WALK a specialty
Office, 307 MONTGOMERY ST. Nevada Block, SAN FRANCISCO

A. D. CHESHIRE, Pres. and Manager W. O. MACDOUGALL, Secretary
CALIFORNIA UNDERTAKING CO.
Fine Funeral Furnishers
Telephone, Main 971 123 STOCKTON ST., Cor. Geary
Finest Funeral Parlors in the city
Embalming a specialty Open day and night

COMET OOLONG
The oldest and most reliable brand of Tea on the market. Sold only in ⅓ pound papers at 20 cents per paper.
All grocers keep it.

THE THEATERS.

AN UNPREJUDICED VIEW OF TWO COMEDIES AND A TRAGEDY.

Pretty, sir? Certainly, sir," I heard a voice to the right of me say, as we were squeezed slowly out of the Columbia Monday night. There was a certain old-fashioned punctiliousness in its intonations which caught my attention and made me think of lace ruffles and gold snuff-boxes.

"Pretty enough stage settings," it went on, "but, sir, the constructor of those houses could never have even seen the outside of the better class of Southern homes—the class to which Driscoll's (it is to be inferred) belonged. Why, sir, those things are like 'po'-white-trash' houses. I was born and bred in the South, but never, never, sir, have I seen anybody but a negro or a good-for-nothing white man live in such a cramped, tottering, ramshackle structure as we saw to-night. Where, sir, is there any suggestion in those little huts of the spacious rooms and the broad piazzas of the South?"

"I guess you didn't come from Missouri, Colonel," said his companion.

"No, sir; from Alabama, thank God," returned the old man, as we were shunted apart by two sporty individuals pressing between us.

"I tell you, Tom," said one of them, "'Pudd'nhead Wilson' is a mighty good play, and there's a moral in it, too—for you. The difference between the gait of the white boy and his half-brother, the octoroon, oughter larn you that the dam's everything and the sire next to nuthin', and that you wanter buy my bay mare."

"But it ain't so, at least it ain't with hosses," said the other, as they plunged across the street toward the Baldwin.

And what, I thought to myself, has most strongly impressed me about the performance—the play, Mayo, or something else? Finally I decided that it was the something else, and that the something was a boy's candid, manly face. Not a wonderful actor, though somewhat talented, is this Arnold Daly who played the part of "Chambers," but a boy blessed with a face so ingenuous and winning that Nature, in even her most hypocritical mood, could not, I believe, set it over any but a noble and generous heart; and alack! To think that it may be the mask for vanity, cowardice, and dishonesty. O Tempora! O Mores! Young man, try to live up to your face. 'Twill be difficult, I know, but try; and above all, don't let the admiration of foolish women like myself turn your head, if for no other reason than because if you did then your chief charm would be gone, unless you are a much better actor off the stage than on it. Not that you were not a good "Chambers," far from it; you were very good, indeed, though your manner to Rowy (excepting in the ruined mill scene) is faulty. No male slave, however white, or whatever his privileges, would have approached a white woman as you did Rowy, several times. You stood by her side with the air of an equal, though you often showed that you did not even feel yourself such. You fortunately make this mistake only when you stand in silence, not when you speak to her, so there is not the ludicrous contrast of your negro tongue to mark the fault. I'll admit that Rowy made it hard for you to maintain the proper demeanor, for though Frances Grahame is quite a charming little soubrette, she has not the faintest notion of how she would act towards a "Chambers." She positively coquettes with you—you! a slave. The citizens of Dawson should have been led to suppose Rowy in love with you, not because of her coquettish manner; but because of her extreme kindness to you, her confidence in, and her loyalty to you. It would have been unnatural for any girl of her education and surroundings to have given any other indication of her interest in a man whom she believed to be a negro, and knew to be a slave. Still, I forgive her even this fault, for it must be very hard to remember that you are—"Chambers." There is no fault to be found in Eleanor Moretti's "Roxy," though I don't care for some of her lines, but for these she is not to blame, and she really renders them excellently, while her laugh is the best imitation of a negro laugh I have ever heard.

Frank Campeau was very good indeed as the villain, Tom Driscoll; the rest of the cast satisfactory and the costumes charming. Mayo as Pudd'nhead, delightful old Pudd'nhead, is a gem. The impersonation is almost flawless, for he seems to be the very man who inspired Clemens. Twice his silence and facial contortions were too prolonged to produce the best effect, for he lost his grip on his audience perceptibly. This occurs when he is confused by the contradictory baby thumb-marks, and again when the solution of it flashes upon him. His woe, in the first case, is a trifle too evident, while in the second he sits and gobbles his breakfast a bit too long—not for nature but for art. These, however, are but slight defects in an irresistibly amusing performance. The play itself is capital; full of really dramatic situations and American to its very marrow. Its flavor and its humor is so markedly ours that it ought always to be warmly welcomed by us. Though it treats of the blot on our scutcheon—slavery and its evils—it is very fair, neither making the Southerner a monster for owning what was so necessary to him in the sultry, swampy South, or the Northerner a saint for dispensing with what he could get along better without.

In "The Night Clerk," at the California, Peter F. Dailey has been struggling manfully to make something out of nothing, with only very moderate success, for the piece is the most farcical farce it has been my misfortune to see in a long time. It is true that a few people in Tuesday night's crowded house did laugh a little, but I'll wager they don't know what about and that it was only Dailey's insouciance and pretended naive pleasure in himself which tickled them. His song "The Blow 'Most Killed Father" and a few, a very few, of the elaborately worked-up incidents were funny, but taken as a whole "The Night Clerk" would insult the intelligence of a Telegraph Hill goat. As for the rest, John G. Sparks was as amusing as his lines would permit, and "the young man up to date," certainly was very fetching in her dress coat and the rest of her dear little outfit; of course we were treated to "Sweet Alice,"—it has become the hall-mark of a poor show these days—and sad to relate it was one of the best things in the show. Gertrude Fort, the woman who sang it also did a rather good dance and wore a well hung pair of bloomers made out of an exceedingly ugly plaid. Perhaps the funniest thing in the conglomerate was the newly married man registering, and the prettiest was certainly one of the American girls, a young woman in pale green gown above which rose a rather pretty face and magnificent shoulders.

It looks as if "Monte Christo" has been James O'Neill's ruin for it is irritating to the discriminating to see a man of his talent so demean himself, while with the undiscriminating it gives him a bad name. In spite of his defects, it is absurd to deny that he has ability, for, in addition to the natural gifts of a handsome face a fine voice, and unusual magnetism, he adds the conscientious effort of an intelligent brain. Thursday night of last week a small but very enthusiastic audience listened to his "Hamlet." Possibly his interpretation lacks subtlety, but it undoubtedly interests. His audience listened intently and never since the days of Booth have I heard such vigorous applause awarded to an actor of this part. It is evident there must be some quality of greatness in an impersonation which so engrosses the attention and wins such sympathy and appreciation, for we are not prone to give o'er much attention to Shakespearian plays or to burst our gloves over them. As Keene has so recently been here, the comparison was inevitable and much in O'Neill's favor. Not so his company (barring Dickson who made the best grave digger I've seen in an age) for Florence Rockwell's Ophelia was not nearly so touching as Keene's charming young woman, and the ghost, "Alas! poor ghost," compared unfavorably with Hartwigs and finally capped the climax by falling down stairs at a great sacrifice of his dignity and —bones, if one may judge from sounds.

PEG WOFFINGTON.

Reduce your obesity by taking Brook's Phytola ca. Pleasant to take. Makes walking a pleasure. No diet necessary. Trial size 50 cents. Try it. Get it at 119 Powell Street. Mailed free on receipt of price.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

COMING EVENTS IN THE THEATER WORLD.

Richard Mansfield returns to this city on Monday, and opens at the Baldwin in "Beau Brummel," which will be continued throughout the first week. The second week of his engagement will include on Monday and Tuesday, "The Story of Rodian," Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday evenings and Saturday matinee, "Prince Karl," and Saturday evening, "Jekyl and Hyde." The third week's repertory has not yet been decided upon. Sale of seats began Thursday, at regular prices.

Another good bill at the Orpheum, with four new numbers added to the best of last week's program. Elena Leila has a soprano of surprising compass. La Bella Carmen is one of the best dancers seen at this house, and Adonis Ames certainly outdoes any other artist in "twists." The ventriloquist, Segommer, remains and still holds the interest of the nightly crowds.

"Blue Beard," the Easter extravaganza, put on at the Tivoli last Monday, has been a good attraction. The new soprano, Miss Aylward, is pretty and engaging, with a very sweet voice. Hartman, as usual, made the most of a not very interesting part, and Carrie Roma surpassed herself as his wife, also doing a very good bit of tough comedy with Miss Irene Cook in the third act. The ballets were all quite pretty, and the whole very effectively staged. This novelty will be continued probably some weeks.

The revival of "Ranch 10" at the Alcazar has been favored with smaller houses than it deserved. The company is a good one, and the prices for seats within the reach of all theater-goers.

Miss Lisle Leigh, the new leading lady at Morosco's, has been very well received. She is pretty, graceful, well dressed, and well suited, at all events, to such a part as "Doris," the only one in which she has, as yet, been seen. She was well supported by Mr. Hugh Ward and the stock company. Mr. Ward came directly from the Grand Opera House, Salt Lake City, to Morosco's, and so far proves himself to be a comedian of some ability and promise. Next week will give the public a further opportunity to judge of the respective merits of these acquisitions to the bright little company at the Grand Opera House when "Michael Strogoff" is produced.

The remarkable success of Miss Margaret Craven should interest her friends and admirers. She left here as leading lady to Harry Dixey's company, and appeared in Chicago contemporaneously with Crane of "Senator" fame, who saw her at a professional matinee, and pronounced her the most natural actress on the American stage. Soon after, his agent entered into negotiations for an engagement, and she is to appear with him for three weeks in Boston at the close of the season, and in autumn goes to his company as leading lady. This is indeed recognition, and Miss Craven is to be congratulated.

It is not generally known that S. H Friedlander, manager of the Columbia Theater, unites with his other accomplishments the education of a musician. He is a performer on several instruments, understands composition, and has to his credit a number of very pretty melodies. Among these is a "Japanese Lullaby," which was performed by the Columbia orchestra on Monday evening last.

Lisle Leigh, a very promising young actress, closed March 21st, with "Northern Lights," in order to join Morosco's Stock Company in this city, where she will appear April 6th, in the title role of "Dores." Miss Leigh has signed for six months.

Albert Chevalier, the English coster singer, who has been heralded more than any other artist who has appeared in this country of late, now heads the bill at Koster and Bail's, in New York. He says he did not come to America before because he was afraid people would not understand his songs. He was originally an actor in comedy, and doing very well, too, when he was approached by the manager of the Palace in London, and a tempting offer made him to originate a song and imitation feature. He refused, but, later, succumbed to the big salary offered by the syndicate which controls most of the London music halls; and he states he has never had cause to regret the step.

El Campo, the popular Bay resort, now open every Sunday during the season. Music, dancing, bowling, boating, fishing, and other amusements. Refreshments at city prices. Fare, round trip, 25c; children 15c, including admission to the grounds. The steamer "Ukiah" will leave Tiburon ferry 10:30 A. M., 12:10 P. M., 2 and 4 P. M. Returning, leave El Campo 11:15 A. M., 1, 3, and 5 P. M.

FOR BRONCHIAL AND ASTHMATIC COMPLAINTS, "Brown's Bronchial Troches" have remarkable curative properties. Sold only in boxes.

FINEST ON THE MARKET

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS

EEL RIVER CREAMERY

SEE THAT THIS STAMP IS ON EVERY END OF SQUARE

A FINE GRADE DELICIOUS FLAVORED BUTTER

If you appreciate a DELICACY Ask your Dealer for the BRAND

BALDWIN THEATRE — AL HAYMAN AND CO. INCORP'D PROPS

Monday, April 13th ... a brief ... engagement of RICHARD MANSFIELD and his New York ... Company in ... by Edward M. Moore. His last Success. In the Study, ... character ... BEAU BRUMMEL.

Monday, April 20th Second Week THE STORY OF RODIAN, Etc

CALIFORNIA THEATRE — SHARON & FLYNN INCORP'D PROPS

Next Week Monday, April 13th Second and last week of PETER F. DAILEY in John J. McNally's Greatest Laugh Provoker

The Night Clerk

Monday, April 20th ROLAND REED, in THE POLITICIAN

Columbia Theatre. FRIEDLANDER, GOTTLOB & CO. LESSEES AND MANAGERS

An emphatic hit—The greatest play in a century Only one more week

Commencing Monday, April 13th FRANK MAYO and his excellent company in MARK TWAIN'S

PUDD'NHEAD WILSON

April 27th EZRA KENDALL

THE AUDITORIUM

Friedlander, Gottlob & Co., Lessees and Managers

THURSDAY, APRIL 16th, at 8 o'clock The eminent American pianiste

Miss Carrie Bowes

Her first appearance since her great European triumph Assisted by a grand orchestra

JAMES HAMILTON HOWE, Conductor

Reserved seats now on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co's

ORPHEUM

O'Farrell Street, between Stockton and Powell

Week of Monday, April 13th

A Powerful Bill of Novelties

THE HENRETTYS, refined musical artists from Sydney, Australia

LADY ZEFFA, the celebrated mind reader in an entertaining exhibition, entitled "Tour of the Mystic Knight"

ELENA LEILA ROSIE RENDEL.

LA BELLA CARMEN.

ADONIS AMES SEGOMMER.

BRUEF & RIVIERE. THE MARVELLES

ETC., ETC.

Saturday and Sunday Matinees

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE

Handsomest Family Theatre in the World

WALTER MOROSCO, Sole Lessee and Manager

Last Performances of DORIS

MONDAY, APRIL 13th

Grand Production of the Great Dramatic Pageant

MICHAEL STROGOFF

TIVOLI OPERA HOUSE

MRS. ERNESTINE KRELING, Proprietor and Manager

Every Evening A Triumph

The Brilliant Spectacular Extravaganza

BLUE BEARD

Great cast Beautiful scenery Gorgeous costumes Bewitching ballets

The latest ... creation ... Rays of Light Whose ... an oriental dream of loveliness

POPULAR PRICES - 25 and 50 Cents

METROPOLITAN TEMPLE

THE FAMOUS Salt Lake City MORMON Tabernacle Choir

175 Voices. 5 Grand Choral Concerts.

Wed., Thurs., Fri., Sat., and Sun., April 15th to 19th, 1896 No matinee Prices, including reserved seat, $1.50 and $1.00. Season tickets, reserved, $5.00 and $4.00. Seats now on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co. Concerts begin at 8.15 P. M.

SPLASHES.

IS IT not curious Society should take Easter so coolly? Considering the opportunities, hospitality is absolutely at a discount. A number of card-parties are slated for next week, but the main talk is of vacation and the most appropriate place to spend the summer. I have noticed a tendency this season in the direction of country villas. All the house room in Sausalito has already been preempted, and for cottages in San Mateo there is a brisk demand. Quite a number of people have decided for Santa Cruz and the new Sea Beach, but I hear less talk of San Rafael than ever. Blithedale and Mill Valley will have their contingent. The Del Monte season begins in July. In the meantime there is sure to be an exodus to the Flower Festival at Santa Barbara, which promises to be the handsomest show that enterprising region has had. By the way, the Army people seem to favor Southern resorts this season.

* * *

I learn that Miss Alice Ames and her sister, who are studying music in Berlin, are doing admirably, and winning golden opinions at the conservatory where they are entered. Miss Ames has certainly a musical future. She found herself further advanced than her modesty would let her believe. She will soon be far enough advanced to take lessons from the great Joachim.

* * *

THE MOVEMENTS of Society form one of the few available topics for conversation. The Hellmans left on Monday for Europe; Mr. and Mrs. Charles Rosenbaum, after touring around San Jose, Del Monte, and the resorts, have started East. Miss Minnie Houghton spends the summer at Hartford with her sister, Mrs. Morgan Bulkley. The Oxnards are booked for Europe and intend making a tour of the Spas, Mr. Oxnard, being under the weather. General Forsythe, Major Bates, and Lieutenant Bell have gone South and will make Coronado their headquarters for some weeks to come.

* * *

Mr. Ernest de Saisset, son of the resident French Consular Agent, and of whose paintings frequent and commendatory articles have, during the past few years, appeared in the Parisian press, has just returned to his home in California. During the ten years of his residence in Paris he was a member of the family of his uncle, Count de Saisset, Admiral of the French Navy, and was afforded unusual opportunities and advantages for the study of art, of which he appears to have fully availed himself. For seven years he was a pupil of Bourguereau, who has given his work the highest commendation, and predicts for him a successful future. One or two of his pictures won Academy prizes, and his later paintings are said to strongly suggest the work of his great master. Although it is only within the few days past that the managers of the Art Association have been aware of the arrival of Mr. de Saisset, it is probable that he will be represented by one or more pictures at its coming exhibition.

* * *

Mr. and Mrs. Harry Jerome have decided to remain on the Pacific Coast during the summer, and have arranged, accompanied by Miss Catherwood, for a series of summer excursions. They are to be at Santa Barbara for the flower festival, going subsequently to Yosemite, and later to Alaska; returning then, they will spend the rest of the season at Del Monte.

* * *

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Carolan, who have gone East for the marriage of Miss Pullman and Mr. Frank G. Louden, have purchased the plans which the late Page Brown had drawn for his future mansion at Burlingame and purpose commencing the erection of the house in the very near future. The residence is the perfection of what a country home should be, inasmuch as Page Brown had given the subject of dwelling architecture considerable study, and his own residence expressed his most advanced theories. By the way, it is interesting to speculate whether the Spartan theories of Papa Pullman as to marriage settlements will rule in his treatment of his second daughter. He enunciates the doctrine that it devolves on a man to support his wife, and that he has no right to look to his father-in-law for assistance. This rule the millionaire insisted on in connection with Mrs. Carolan, and the first present she had from the parental treasury was a gift of $20 000 last year. I understand Miss Flora has drawn a liberal salary from the Pullman Company as remuneration for christening the cars.

* * *

Mrs. Downey Harvey is entertaining quite an eminent guest—Mr. William Grace, son of ex-Mayor Grace of New York. He is rich, distinguished, is said to be heart whole and fancy free, and so is eminently eligible. A dinner was given in his honor by Mrs. Harvey, on Tuesday night, at which he had an opportunity of meeting a number of the belles.

* * *

The excitement of decorating and furnishing has been too much for Mrs. Peter Donahue, who has been decidedly under the weather for some weeks past, suffering from an attack of nervous prostration, but is now convalescing in good shape. Her nephew, Peter Martin, is up from Los Angeles for a week or more.

* * *

The Bohemian Club election will take place on Tuesday, and the pink tickets of the regular candidates were distributed in the members' letter boxes early in the week. There are but eight names on the ticket—Doctor George Chismore for President; Peter Robertson, Vice-President; Donald de V. Graham, Secretary; James A. Thompson, Treasurer; and, for Directors—two terms—William Sproule, George F. Grant, C. H. Maddox, and George H. Mastick. The opposition have been unusually quiet, and though their candidates are formally posted in the Club office, the individual tickets have not yet been distributed. Last year the old Board was elected to serve again without opposition, and this year, unless the opposition be working a very secret and unexpected game, it will hardly be heard of.

* * *

Apropos of the polo game, the arrangements are still indefinite. The San Jose people are very anxious to have a polo tournament as one of the features of the rose carnival there, and, in order to harmonize with their arrangements, it is probable the date of the arrival of the Riverside men may be set forward. The probabilities are that the first game will be played at San Jose and the succeeding games of the tournament at Burlingame.

* * *

I regret to say my information in regard to Count and Countess Festetics last week, was at fault. The "Tolna" has not been heard from for some months. The last letters were postmarked Sydney, and requested that future communications be directed to Yokohama, where the young mariners expected to be. Since then nothing has been heard of them. There is no little uneasiness over their absence, though the Count is now so competent a sailor that it is presumed he could weather all the storms of the southern seas.

* * *

Mr. and Mrs. Robbie Coleman and Mr. and Mrs. Elliot McAllister are receiving congratulations. Both homes have been gladdened by the arrival of sons, and the mothers are reported doing well.

* * *

Yosemite is to be very gay, inasmuch as the entire Second Cavalry Corps has been ordered there for the summer. Colonel Young has decided to make the Stoneman House his headquarters for the season, and the chances are for a fine representation of Society in the Valley. By the way, Mrs. Captain Rodgers and Mrs. Benson will make Wanona their home during the summer months, thus obtaining comparative proximity to their husbands.

* * *

With extreme relief, I learn that the new proprietor of the Sea Beach Hotel has engaged a French chef. There is no decrying the beauties of Santa Cruz, and its charm and advantage as a summer resort, but living there, for a man with a palate and a digestion, has hitherto been impossible, as the food, though plentiful, was ever poorly prepared. However jovial and genial the hospitality of the late manager, his kindness of manner did not compensate for the aggravation of the cooking. Now, however, there is a competent chef in control, and the Sea Beach should become a possible factor in the peregrinations of Society wanderers. Manager Chace has certainly taken the first important step.

* * *

The return to San Francisco of Mr. and Mrs. Burke Holladay, née Carrie Huntington, is being celebrated at numerous luncheons and dinners. Mr. and Mrs. Rounesvelle Wildman entertained the happy pair on Tuesday night. Mrs. Major Darling had a luncheon for the bride at her pretty villa at the Presidio on Wednesday, and Mr. and Mrs. Jewett gave them a splendid dinner Thursday evening, this affair being followed by a reception. An interesting musical program was then rendered, with Mollenhauer and Hamilton Howe as instrumentalists, Miss Della Mills as vocal soloist, and Mrs. Edgerton reciting. Mr. and Mrs. Holladay are to reside in the Holladay mansion on the Clay-street heights. There are other festivities to be given in their honor in the early future. Movements and removals are announced—among others, that Mrs. George Howard has taken the corner house at 2500 Pacific Avenue, opposite the Kittles. The Dillons have returned to their Pacific Avenue home. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Hirsch and family have gone to Europe, and Mr. and Mrs. S. Wormser have taken their residence for the season.

* * *

Eminent propriety is the rule of the Cliff House, nowadays. However weak the Mayor's mentality may be, he is certainly not deaf to the criticism which was leveled at the old resort. The strictest propriety rules the roost on the ocean shore, and the supper-rooms are so fitted that they may be locked from the outside but cannot be secured from within.

* * *

ANOTHER Presidio engagement is announced. It is that of Lieutenant Gately and Miss Bessie Crabb, daughter of the Senior Captain of the Fifth Artillery. Mr. Gately is the latest addition to the Presidio force. He graduated last year from West Point with high honors and was detailed to the Fifth. He is a very nice young man, and possesses an independent fortune; so to Miss Crabb double congratulations are due. She is a decided blonde and one of the prettiest of the army girls.

* * *

MRS. HAGER'S entertainment for Monday night is engaging the attention of Society. It is about the only thing "the swim" has to talk of. Rather more invitations than were at first indicated have been issued, for a number of the older generation evinced a desire to see the performance. So I imagine the hall will be fairly well filled, though of course there will be a thinning out before supper. Three tableaux are arranged to precede the play; "The Summer Moon," by Lord Leighton, "A Reverie" by some one else, and "La Tosca" after Harburg, in which Miss Alice Hager appears as Sardou's heroine. Eight society men, whose names are involved in oblivion, are to officiate as ushers. I am told the performance is to begin at nine sharp; that guests must present their invitation cards or expect to be denied admission; that it is strictly full dress for the ladies; and that there must be seen neither hats nor bonnets. The hostess insists that this is to be her last entertainment. By the way, the guest of honor on that particular evening will be Miss Flora Lucas of St. Louis, Mrs. Hager's niece, who is to be with us in San Francisco throughout the summer. She is said to be a very good-looking girl, and has the advantage of wealth. Strange to say, Leo Cooper, who officiates as manager of "A Modern Ananias," is actually satisfied with the dramatis personæ. Its members are absolutely letter-perfect in their various roles, and show considerable histrionic talent. They are to have their portraits taken prior to the performance, and the finished photograph will adorn the lobby in true theatrical style.

* * *

Among the distinguished visitors at the Palace this week was Anson Phelps Stokes, the well-known New Yorker whose magnificent mansion is one of the features of Lennox. It has eighty bedrooms and is the scene of elaborate hospitalities. He is a millionaire many times over, and is, of course, traveling the Coast with all the luxuries of a private car and special trains. Mrs. Stokes spent most of the week at Del Monte with her children, coming to town via San Jose. Another distinguished millionaire at the Palace is Mr. Brewster, the Standard Oil magnate, who is accompanied by his daughter, Miss Pollie Brewster, an exceedingly handsome girl and a New York belle.

* * *

Musical people are much interested in the new tenor, William Simonson, whose voice was heard the other evening at a reception at which his master, Willis Bachelder, was the host. Mr. Simonson is a brother of Madam Saville, the new cantatrice, who has made such a success at the Metropolitan Opera House. He has a remarkable tenor voice of fine quality and great range, and is gifted with the real musical temperament. Indeed, he sings up to C with ease, and renders such morceaux as he has learned with spirit and a distinct musical sense. I believe he is to join his sister before very long, and will certainly be heard from within a few seasons as one of the world's great tenors. This is a good deal to say of a young man, but his voice is undoubtedly a fine organ.

* * *

Theater-parties have become more popular than ever. It is a convenient and easy method of entertainment, and when preceded by a dinner, forms a pleasant way of passing an evening in the society of one's friends. There must have been a dozen at least at the Columbia on the first night of "Pudd'nhead Wilson." The H.

The Original Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter Street, stands without a rival and has stood the test for years. The most delicious meals are served by gentlemanly attendants, and the management takes pride in having everything orderly. It is just the place for business men and ladies out shopping to lunch.

Chew Adams' Pepsin Tutti-Frutti. It is sovereign for Indigestion and agreeable to the taste.

Dainty and Refreshing

PAR EXCELLENCE

"THE UNIVERSAL PERFUME"

For the Handkerchief, the Dressing-table and the Bath.

Murray & Lanman's

FLORIDA WATER

Its fragrant, lasting sweetness exerts a subtile charm and never tires or cloys.

Ask your Druggist for the genuine Murray & Lanman's.

S. Crockers had a crowd; the Sylvains Weils had some twenty seats; Mrs. Lièvre had thirty in her party, and there were many others—James D. Phelan, Carey Friedlander, Mr. and Mrs. Tauszky among others. Notwithstanding the variety of Society gatherings, the garbing of the audience was not especially smart. There were a number of light waists, but more hats than bonnets. Indeed, there was a prolixity of Easter millinery creations, the majority of which needed but a hose or a watering-pot to be full-fledged botanical gardens. There was an overflowing audience to see Peter Dailey at the California, and I noted that the orchestra was rather more dressy,

* * *

Apropos of theater-parties, that which Mr. and Mrs. Leon Sloss have arranged for next Tuesday evening, at the Baldwin, is quite the most important of the season. They have taken sixty seats, and at the close of the performance the guests are to return to the Sloss house for supper. The Mansfield engagement is a topic of note in Society, and there is sure to be a jam the opening night in spite of the rival attractions of Mrs. Hager's show.

* * *

Since Lent, there has been but one opportunity for those who enjoy terpsichorean pleasures—the ball of the Saturday Night Dancing Class at the Native Sons' Hall, on Monday evening. This Club is composed, for the most part, of the maidens who may be expected to make their debut next season, besides others who came out last winter. Most of its members owe their allegiance to Miss West's School. The affair was a cotillion. Mr. Albert Russell and Miss Jessie Cheever led the first set, assisted by Mr. Greenway and Miss Romie Wallace. Several very graceful figures were danced, and it must be admitted that there were any number of pretty girls, among whom I noticed Miss Thomas, who was in pink satin and point lace, Miss Frances Currie, who was in white crêpe. Miss Rose Hooper in white satin, Miss Bates in blue, Miss Edith Bishop in yellow crêpon, Miss Weldon in figured dimity, and Miss Doane in green and white crêpe. The Hall was voted a capital floor for a dance, and it seems probable it will be the favorite meeting-place for Society entertainments next season.

* * *

The proposal to have a final Fortnightly has been agitated, but does not seem to find much favor. There is plenty of talent, of course, but the Fortnightly has had more setbacks this season than it can properly support.

* * *

Among the artists the topic, of course, is the forthcoming Spring Exhibition, which opens next week with the usual ceremonial. The indications are for an excellent display, inasmuch as some excellent work has been done recently by Keith, Matthews, Peixotto, Reiser, and the rest. There will be a private view, of course, on Thursday night, to which the members of the Association and their friends alone are bidden. Interest will doubtless be concentrated on the several canvases entered in competition for J. D. Phelan's one-thousand-dollar prize—for which Keith, Matthews, Pissis, and Reiser have entered. The second artistic event is the Black and White Exhibition of the Sketch Club, which opens on Wednesday. I believe this is the first display of its kind ever held here, and, considering the number of illustrators, designers, and students we have among us, it should develop some interesting results.

* * *

A very charming luncheon was given in the Tapestry Room at the Palace, on Tuesday, by Mrs. Kirkpatrick. The menu was really admirable and the decorations most artistic. Among the guests were Miss Newlands, Mrs. T. C. Van Ness, Mrs. Hall McAllister, Mrs. Lillie Coitt, and several others.

* * *

The Woman's Exchange reception, on Thursday, was quite a decided success, and inaugurated the new afternoon tea with fitting solemnity. Miss Laura McKinstry and Miss Ella Morgan officiated as hostesses, assisted by Miss Hoffman, Miss Bates, Miss McKenna, and Miss Smedberg. Miss McKinstry was in black with green at the waist, and Miss Morgan wore a very elaborate black waist with blue satin spangled straps.

* * *

To pronounce Miss Millie Siebe the handsomest of Easter brides would be an invidious compliment, inasmuch as weddings this season have been few and far between, but she is a decidedly pretty girl, a brunette, tall, graceful, and of more than ordinary charm, and in her wedding dress of cream satin and old Duchesse lace, she made a stunning picture. The marriage was celebrated in St. Paul's German Lutheran Church, after which the party adjourned to the Siebe residence, where there followed a reception. The groom, Mr. McWilliams, had Charles W. Fay of San Jose as his best man, and Miss Lillie Snowgrass was maid of honor. The presents were really very swell, indeed, consisting of all sorts and conditions of silver, old carved furniture, and some very beautiful cut glass. A capital supper was served, and, after the usual congratulatory speeches, the health of the happy pair drunk in foaming beakers of Roederer.

* * *

Among forthcoming events is the marriage of Miss Carrie Schweitzer and Mr. M. Hirsch, which is to take place at the Concordia on the twenty-first. Society in general has been bidden to the affair, which will figure as a social event.

* * *

IF THE feminine suffrage amendment is not passed, Oakland society need not accuse itself of the sin of omission. It is fêting the apostles of suffrage with all its might, entertaining them at suppers and dinners, organizing clubs to aid their cause, and behaving actually as though Miss Anthony and Miss Shaw were engaged to be married to members of the Jackson-street set. Indeed, these ladies are evoking more enthusiasm than if they were popular debutantes. The Ebell Society has entertained them at lunch; Mrs. Vrooman has had a dinner for them, at which a suffrage club was organized, with Miss Snell for president; the Gaskills and Mrs. Borland have fêted them, with similar consequences; and, altogether, Oakland femininity is up in arms for votes and will not be denied. This condition of affairs may complicate the politics of Alameda County in a most painful way. If the ladies are as insistent as they are energetic, there may be the devil to pay all round. But it is possible that as soon as the social feature of the agitation vanishes, and the great suffragists commence their campaign on free lunches in Stockton and Fresno, the enthusiasm of Oakland may wane. This is for the future, however; for the present, the feminine feeling is up to high C.

* * *

The intellectual element which composes the Ebell Society was much in evidence at Mrs. Stolp's tea on Wednesday last. The second tea of the week was that which Mrs. Brown and Miss Floy Brown had, at which the Jackson-street set appeared en grande tenue. To-day there is the Garber's tea at Claremont, for which a large number of invitations have been issued. This certainly promises considerable interest, as the garden is something to dream over at this season, overflowing with beautiful roses.

* * *

The "prettiest wedding of the season" occurs so often that it may sound invidious to pronounce the marriage ceremony which made Miss English Mrs. Maline of that category; but for all the stereotyped phrases that may be flung around it, the affair was very charming. The bride is really a pretty girl, petite of figure and graceful as a bird, and she looked lovely in her wedding gown. The groom is decidedly boyish in appearance, and the twain made a most youthful couple. The church was beautifully arranged with adornments of Easter lilies and pink roses, and any number of Deux Temps damsels in pink and white were there as audience. The bride is a daughter of Warren English, and a member of the Deux Temps and other clubs. The groom comes from British Columbia, and in the matter of age, I believe has but a year or two the advantage of Miss English. He is interested in the real estate business at Westminster. After the wedding, there was a dinner at the English house, and by this time the happy pair are safely ensconsed in their northern home.

* * *

Next week, the prospects for festivity in Oakland are slender. Already the talk turns in the direction of summer resorts, and arrangements for speeding to the mountains are under way. Oakland has ever had a partiality for Castle Crags, and appearances indicate that the Shasta resort will have the bulk of its patronage. But many of the young people are directing their steps toward Summit Soda, where a big party under the chaperonage of Mrs. Glasscock is heading. Among its members are the McKees, Mhoons, Palmers, Magees, and Baldwins, about the same party that spent last summer at the Crags.

THE GOSSIP.

R. B. HAYDEN:

In this age of cheap whiskies, it is gratifying to know that there are a few houses in Kentucky who place quality above everything else, and adhere faithfully to the methods of manufacture that have been the means of giving Kentucky Bourbon Whisky world-wide fame. Among these houses the Greenbrier Distillery Company, of Nelson County, Ky., is classed, and wherever its brand, R. B. Hayden, is used it is sure to make friends on account of its excellent quality and rich flavor.

CHARLES MEINECKE & CO.

Among those whose means and capacities enable the purchase of real estate, there is considerable interest over the sale of the McCreery block on McAllister Street, between Baker and Lyon. This property has been in the possession of Andrew McCreery for something like forty years, and was one of his very earliest investments. Some months ago he disposed of another block in this locality, and it is interesting to know that many of the purchasers made quite a good thing out of their investments. For instance, the corner of McAllister and Baker was purchased for $4500, and, the other day, it was resold for $6000, an advance of over thirty-seven per cent, and lots have been resold on the several boundary streets, in each instance at an advance of over twenty per cent. What Mr. McCreery's original outlay for this property was is not stated, but the region, when he invested there, was but a sandhill waste, and, in the light of latter-day developments, the investment seems like an inspiration. However, this is but one instance of his great judgment in real estate purchases, for in every instance the growth of the city has followed the lines of his prognostication. He is selling now because it has been represented to him that the vacant blocks in that neighborhood seriously retard the growth of the region.

IN THE DAYS OF RALSTON.

One's memory need not run back to any great length to recall the days when Ralston and Reese and other of our prominent citizens walked to North Beach for the sake of an invigorating salt water plunge. That era, happily, has gone by. The Lurline Baths provide the best imaginable facilities for swimming, and the institution is almost in the very center of our city. The latest feature which the Olympic Salt Water Company has added to the luxuries of its menage is a Russian Bath with Needle Shower. This latest improvement is now in working order, and proves a great attraction. The price for the above, which includes the Swimming Bath, has been established at the low rate of fifty cents.

BYRON

Rheumatism, Sciatica, Neuralgia, Chronic Malaria, Liver and Kidney Troubles, Bladder Troubles, Dyspepsia, Eczema, Gout, Obesity, Alcoholism in all its forms—can be positively cured at Byron Hot Springs.

CURES

TAVERN OF CASTLE CRAG

QUEEN OF ALL MOUNTAIN RESORTS

The Tavern of Castle Crag, the most beautiful, attractive and accessible of all mountain resorts, will open for the reception of guests, June 1, and will close October 1, 1896.

GEORGE SCHUNEWALD, Manager
ROOM 59, UNION TRUST BUILDING
SAN FRANCISCO

Blithedale

The nearest Summer Resort to San Francisco, and the most charming, is within five minutes' drive from Mill Valley Station. Wooded hills shelter it from the wind and fog. Rose paths and beds of fragrant clover surround the houses, and all around are the redwoods—300 acres of woods. The cottages have open-grate fires, and the table is supplied with vegetables and perfect sewerage. The never failing brook runs through the place. Table excellent—cream every day. Terms moderate. For particulars, address MRS F. RR. R, who will be at Blithedale after April 15th.

The place will open on May 1st.

Napa Soda Springs California's Famous Mountain Spa!

HAVE YOU BEEN THERE, LATELY?

1000 feet above Napa Valley. Climate unsurpassed. Views magnificent. Table supplied from orchard and ocean, field and farm. Hot and cold Napa Soda water baths. Telephone and Postoffice. Burros to ride. Bowling alleys, tennis, croquet swings and hammocks. New improvements every year. Gas and running water in every room. Relief for asthmatics. WARM WATER SWIMMING TANK. An ideal summer resort. Children's paradise, mothers' delight, husbands' rest. Address ANDREW JACKSON, Napa Soda Springs, P. O.

ELECTRIC..

Supplies
Construction
Repairs

CALIFORNIA
ELECTRICAL WORKS
....35 MARKET STREET

Wedding Invitations are properly engraved and in correct form, at ROBERTSON'S

SEA BEACH HOTEL, SANTA CRUZ, CAL.

The Ideal Summer Resort should offer gaiety for the gay, rest for the weary, a beautiful country for the nature lover, a pleasant home and genial climate for all. These and many other attractions may be found at the Sea Beach Hotel, within easy reach of San Francisco. For additional information, address—

JOHN R. CHACE,
Proprietor.

Adams's Tutti-Frutti Chewing Gum for Indigestion.

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist, 806 Market St.

RIPPLES.

HUNTING.

Many sportsmen consider hunting the sport. There are many hunters but few finders. I was always considered a successful hunter. I believe I have hunted for everything to be hunted from a grizzly bear to a collar button, and have found it easier to find a grizzly than a collar button.

I started in life as a hunter at an early age. My first experience being in hunting for our old brindle cow, which would, at certain seasons of the year, seem to take fiendish delight in making for the woods for no other apparent reason than to be devilish, and to cause me to forget my Sunday school teachings.

I never hunted "bar" but once, and then it was a matter of compulsion. In fact, before I finished hunting his bearship he turned the tables and hunted me.

It was a cold winter morning when I sat down to breakfast, and there was every indication of snow before many hours. The indications proved correct; for by the time my breakfast was finished, there was at least an inch of snow on the ground. Believing it would be an excellent time to hunt deer, I shouldered my forty-five-sixty, whistled to my hounds, and was soon on my way to Fern Ridge where I knew I would be able to find fresh deer tracks in the snow. Before reaching the Ridge, however, while crossing Windy Pass, called Windy, I presume, because it was never known to have blown there, I came to a place where a bear had crossed the trail going valleyward but a few moments ahead of my arrival. I did not stop to consider whether I had lost a bear or not, but almost immediately put the dogs on the bear track, and almost immediately afterward kicked myself for so doing. I started to follow the dogs, but the brush became so thick that I decided to retrace my steps and remain in the opening where I first discovered the tracks, and wait for the barking of the dogs to inform me that the bear had been treed, when I could go leisurely down the mountain and shoot Mr. Bear at pleasure.

I could hear the hounds running through the brush some distance down, but neither yelp nor bark came to my listening ear. I began to get nervous, and when I again looked at the bear track in the snow it seemed to have grown to twice the size it originally appeared when I first discovered it. I pictured to myself a big black bear (there being no grizzlies in the country in which I was hunting) as large as a mule suddenly confronting me, which made me think what a little insignificant cuss I really was, and what I would do if his bearship should put in an appearance, and what a blanked chump I was for allowing the hounds to go on the bear track. I had just turned around to see if I were being approached from the rear by any monster, when I heard the yelp of the hounds far down the mountain side, now to the right, then to the left, but drawing nearer and nearer at every yelp.

"Confound those mongrels!" I ejaculated aloud. "The first thing I know they'll drive that fool bear up here." And I immediately decided that if they did so, I would find accommodations in the branches of the nearest sapling, which I knew Mr. Bear could not climb on account of its size.

I could still hear the hounds yelping down the mountain side to my right, in which direction my gaze was fixed, when not resting on the selected sapling, when a slight noise to my left caused me to turn suddenly around, when, to my horror, out from the brush into the opening walked a black bear as unconcerned as possible. Talk about bears being as large as mules, this one looked to me as large as an elephant.

The bear evidently had not observed me, and might have continued on his journey had I not suddenly made a rush for my sapling, which I shinned up as rapidly as it was possible for a mortal to accomplish under the same circumstances. My sudden, unexpected, rushing movement must have startled the bear as much as his presence startled me; for he made a bee-line for the nearest tree, which he went up more rapidly than I thought it possible for a bear to go.

People who do not know me may consider that I am a coward; but I do not think so, and, for their benefit, will state that I have been married four times.

The majority of people who are considered brave are not brave, but simply indiscreet chumps. They have no reasoning powers, and are too obtuse to know what danger is. This is shown to be a fact in every-day history. You read of people doing so-called acts of bravery with wonderful calmness, saving lives of others at the risk of their own, where the chances are against the success of the hero one hundred to one of his coming out alive, leaving alone the saving of another. When successful, the hero usually faints away after he realizes what he has done, and he is called brave. If unsuccessful and he should lose his life, he is called a blank fool.

A man can generally find anything he hunts for, provided he is persistent, and he often finds the unexpected; for who has not found carpet tacks on the floor on a dark night when hunting for matches with which to light the alcohol lamp in order to warm baby's milk?

However, I digress. The bear is up one tree and I am up another, and, with your kind permission, kindly allow us to remain there. I might add in conclusion that the hounds were not chasing the bear, but had got on to a deer track and were chasing the deer from one end of the country to the other. When the bear was finally shot, it proved to be nothing more than a cub of a few months old, and, when dead, did not look quite so large as he did when he made his appearance. I do not say that I shot the bear, as I consider myself merely a hunter.

UNCLE ISAAC.

Vat, in dose vinter times? Der light suit, vat? Vell, I vonder. Vat? Den and a quarvarter for a peautiful suit of summer clothes like dot? Vat? Holy Abraham! My brices vas twovenly-seven and a helaver. If youse don't vant it, leave it alone. Ikey, come here cavick! Vat vas dot you say, you vill gife me seventeen dollars for dot suit? Not on your life times. Vait, vait, vait, Holy Rachel! You Christians vas such compulsive beobles. Don't go avay until I catch my preaths. Ven I say some tings, I tinks of some odder tings. Vat? Vell, I vonder!

Dot feller dot bawned dot suit is now sick vit dot consumption, and he oxpects to die at any times. Just vait a moments and I send my boy Ikey around dot corner to see if dere vas grape on der door. If it vas so, I vill be generous and let you have dot suit at your own prices. Ikey! Hurry and run cavick around dot gorner to Mr. Mulvaney's and see if dere vas der dead vaggon dere yet. Shut dot door as you go out and turn dot key on der outside; mine friendt vill vait until you comes back. Vat? Eh, her? Yah; you say dere vas grape on der door, Ikey? Dot vas a goot poy. Yer fadder vill dake you down and let you look at der ferry poats some days ven puisness vas pad. All right, mine friendt; you can take dot suit for seventeen dollars, and you vas getting it cheap. Vat? Vell, I vonder!

A CHANGE.

First Tramp—Hello, Cully! Dis is der first time I've seen yer in ten years. Can't say dere is much change erbout yer.

Second tramp—Right yer are, old pard; der only change erbout me is mer socks; just got 'em down here to der cottage.

OH, YES.

Jones—I tell you, Doctor, you must come; it is a case of necessity.

Doctor—A case of necessity, eh? That means a case of whiskey. (Aside.) He must have a touch of the D. T's.; he was always a heavy drinker.

APPRECIATED.

She (as he finishes an instrumental piece)—Don't you sing, Mr. Stringbroke?

He—No, I never sing.

She—I would much rather hear you sing than play.

EVEN.

Blossom—Say, Bloomer, that's a rank cigar you just gave me.

Bloomer—I was kind of leary of it myself; but it's the same cigar you gave me yesterday.

Blossom—That's one on you; for, if it's the same cigar, it's the one you gave me the day before.

AN EXPERT.

Dealer—But what experience have you had in the liquor business.

Applicant—Well, I served two terms in a Kentucky legislature.

OF COURSE.

Miss Bloomer—My feelings were hurt dreadfully to-day.

Mr. Shotly—How so, dear?

Miss Bloomer—I fell off my bicycle.

UNDOUBTEDLY.

He—Does your father object when I call on you?

She—No; he only objects when you leave.

NATURAL.

"Have you any objections to the women wearing bloomers?"

"No, indeed; in fact, I rather like 'em, so long as no female relative of mine dons 'em."

WHAT HE SAID.

Sister Ethel (to little Freddy, who has been doing the honors)—What has Mr. Stickney been saying to you, Freddy?

Freddy—He hasn't been saying anything. He just talked, and that's all. BRUNO.

FINAL SALE

AT AUCTION

THURSDAY, APRIL 16th

AT 12 O'CLOCK NOON

UNDER INSTRUCTIONS FROM MR. A. B. McCREERY OF HIS ENTIRE BLOCK

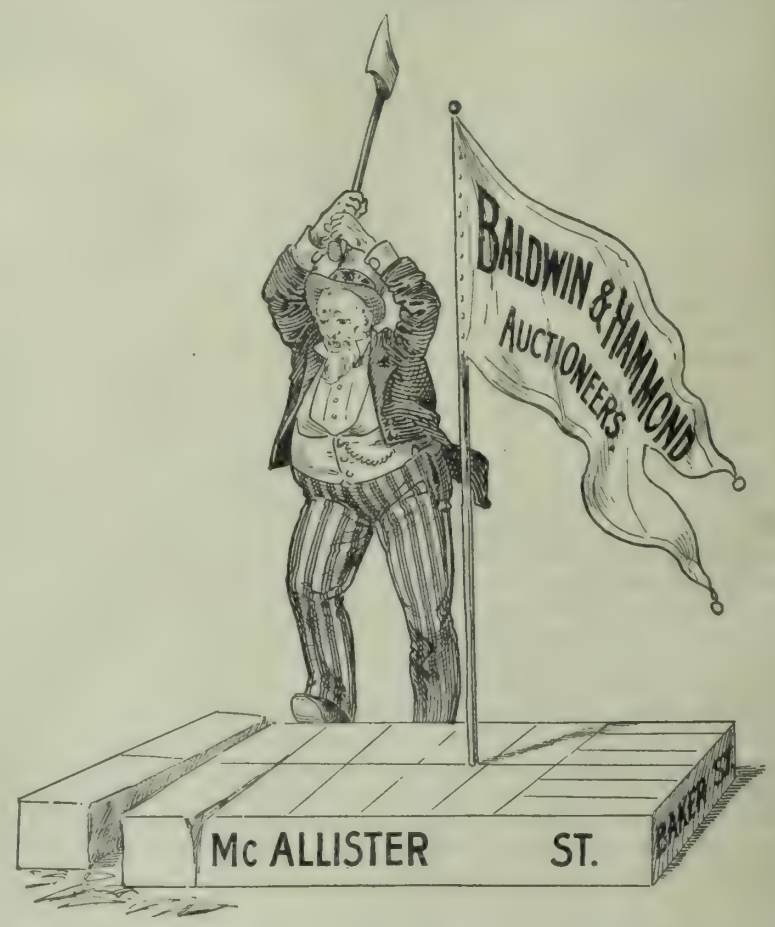
BOUNDED BY

McALLISTER, BAKER AND LYON STS.
AND GOLDEN GATE AVE.



See how we are cutting up this Beautiful Block

☛Title guaranteed by California Title Insurance and Trust Company for $10 per lot.

There will be 37 Lots—
Each one better than the other
Lots on Baker Street
Lots on McAllister Street
Lots on Lyon Street
Lots on Golden Gate Avenue

Sewers in All Streets
Stone Sidewalks all around the Block

THE BEST UNSUBDIVIDED BLOCK
IN THE WESTERN ADDITION

Every Lot to be Sold - - No Reserve

Terms, only ¼ Cash

Get off at Baker and McAllister Sts.
Our signs are there.

Balance in 1, 2 and 3 Years

BALDWIN & HAMMOND

AUCTIONEERS

10 Montgomery Street

thin baby

Poor baby! Your pity goes out to it and rightly. To be thin, for a baby, is to be deprived of its natural ease, to suffer and not be able to feel it; to wear a sad pinched face; to live on the edge of sickness; to grow imperfectly; and to lose the power of resisting disease. When a baby is thin it needs more fat than it gets from its food; it is starved, fat-starved. Scott's Emulsion is the easiest fat it can have; the fat it needs. Half of is taken by babies. Mothers like it because it brings the dimples back.

Scott's Emulsion

SCOTT'S EMULSION has been endorsed by the medical profession for twenty years. (Ask your doctor.) This is because it is always palatable—always uniform—always contains the purest Norwegian Cod-liver Oil and Hopophosphites.

Insist on Scott's Emulsion with trade-mark of man and fish.

Put up in 50 cent and $1.00 sizes. The small size may be enough to cure your cough or help your baby.

THE WHITE FLYER IS THE MOUNT FOR '96

BARNES BICYCLES

HOOKER & CO.
16-18 Drumm St.
RETAIL STORE:
1640 Market St.
San Francisco, Cal.

THE WHITE RIMMED HUMMER IS THE COMER

A CARLOAD OF '96

PIERCE CYCLES — TRIED AND TRUE

JUST RECEIVED

Many Superior Improvements. Ask to see the

Pierce Crank Hanger

Holbrook, Merrill & Stetson
Pacific Coast Agents
MARKET and BEALE STREETS
SAN FRANCISCO

Ask for Catalogue

A HOME PRODUCT

AXLE-EASE

THE VERY BEST AXLE GREASE

Made by—
AMERICAN OIL CO.
SAN FRANCISCO

McCUNE CYCLES

Moderate in price—
—As good as the best

ARMES & DALLAM
COAST AGENTS 230-232 Front St.

THE WHEEL.

COMMENT AND CRITICISM ON RECENT EVENTS IN THE CYCLING WORLD.

C. MICHENER.

At the last meeting of the Board of Governors of the California Associated Cycling Clubs, the promoter of the indoor tournament, recently held in the Mechanics' Pavilion, laid before that body his scheme for the construction and management of a six-lap board track in Central Park. His idea in doing this seemed to be prompted by the feeling that, without the support of the wheeling organizations and their semi-official sanction, at least, it would be an extremely hazardous investment. The success of such a track is without doubt entirely in the hands of the wheelmen, and it is certainly true that no amount of "promotion" would serve to counterbalance a determination on their part to kill the scheme, and yet, on the other hand, it has been pretty clearly demonstrated in this city that the wheelmen themselves are not sufficiently united to make a venture of this sort a financial success should it be undertaken by the clubs. It is not because the first cost of the track is so great—that would not amount to much more than the expense of taking part in a tournament—but the reason seems to be that all enterprises of that sort require at their head some one man, who can act quickly, definitely, and without the necessity of explaining his motives to a large governing body or board of directors in every case. Again, he must be a man of great experience in the promotion of such enterprises and of remarkable executive ability. Even if we assume that the Associated Clubs could get hold of such a man, the salary he would deserve and could command as the manager of a track proposition would be not at all disproportionate to all the profits the promoters of the Central Park track will make. On the whole, for the present season, at least, I think it is certainly a safer and very probably a cheaper plan for the Clubs to permit the track to be built and managed by an outsider.

Talking of tracks leads one to notice the surprising activity in this line throughout the northern portion of the State since the season has commenced. The fewness of the North California tracks used to be a matter of remark. While there were some eight good bicycle tracks in South California last year, in our own portion of the State there were but two. Now, however, track talk is developing into track work all about us. In Alameda County the movement is really astonishing. Aside from the Alameda track, others are actually in course of construction at Niles, Centerville, and Livermore, and another is about to be commenced at Irvington.

The recent meeting of the cycle dealers is an event worthy of comment. It was there proposed to effect a permanent organization having for one of its main objects the improvement of the streets of the city. The dealers in wheels have come to a realization of the fact that if they are to sell their goods there must be a marked improvement in the city's wheelways.

It is to be hoped that the new organization will bend its energies to the accomplishment of some single definite improvement instead of dissipating them in agitation for the improvement of our streets in general. The success of the Southside Improvement Clubs in obtaining the Folsom-street Boulevard demonstrates what can be done in this way. Should the new association devote itself to bringing about the bitumenizing of Market Street it would be attempting an enterprise not at all difficult of almost immediate accomplishment. There would be no factional strife over the proposition. The whole city is interested in practically a uniform degree in the betterment of that thoroughfare. Further, it is understood that in some cases the owners of large buildings recently erected will undertake the contemplated improvement, as to the section of the street in front of those buildings, at their own expense.

On Sunday, the 12th, the Relay will be run. There has been more or less of rain, but not enough to seriously interfere with the race. The arrangements are more perfect than ever before and the entries larger in number. With ten clubs in the competition and a hundred miles of riding before each, prophecy as to the outcome is hazardous However, barring accidents, the clubs will finish in this order: Bay City Wheelmen, Olympic Club Wheelmen, Acme Club, Garden City Cyclers, Reliance, California Cycling Club, Imperials, San Jose Road Club, Alameda Cyclers, San Francisco Road Club.

It is suggested that Cooper will ride for the Bay Cities and Coulter will ride for the Olympics. That both these men are professionals under the new definition of the League, no one doubts. But, under the recent ruling of Chairman Gideon of the Racing Board neither will be declared professionals by that body until he appears on the track. "If a man has contracted with a manufacturer to ride that manufacturer's wheel," says Mr. Gideon, "he is no longer an amateur, but we have no jurisdiction over him unless he appears on the track." Of course, under the Relay rules, no professional can compete. Now let us see what will be the effect of permitting the gentleman named—and there are others in this No one doubts that they will appear upon the track early in the season. They will then be transferred to the professional class. The act that made them professionals was the signing of these contracts. This was done before the Relay. Does it not follow irresistibly, then, that on the date of the race they were ineligible as participants?

TANDEM RIDING.

R. L. LONG.

The tandem is comparatively a new thing. It was not till the end of '94 that they were used in California at all. During the month of October of that year, the Rambler team at Sacramento employed tandems for pace-making, and they were used there that year in helping Otto Ziegler to his many world's records. At that time a tandem team made up of Delmas and myself established the world's tandem records for the quarter and half mile which still stand.

In the beginning the tandem was essentially a racing machine. As such, its first use was pace-making. Pace-making is the riding in front of a rider for the purpose of decreasing the air-resistance for him. Undoubtedly a large fraction of the power necessary to propel a bicycle is used in overcoming the air-resistance. This air-resistance increases tremendously as the speed increases. Now, if a tandem, or a single wheel even, is moving along rapidly, a rider immediately behind it is vastly aided on account of the lessened resistance of the air which he is obliged to overcome. He follows along so closely behind that the labor of breaking a way through the air is almost all done for him by the pace-makers.

As a machine for pacing, the advantages of the tandem were at once apparent. On a tandem it is easily possible to surpass the speed of an unpaced single wheel, for the reason that it has the power of two riders to overcome an air-resistance, but a little greater than the resistance of a single wheel experiences. Then, since the power is doubled, the gear of the machine may be almost double that of the ordinary form of bicycle. Further slight advantages are that the friction loss on a tandem is much less than twice that of a single machine, and that there is but one track to make.

All these things brought tandem-pacing into immediate and universal use, and it was not until they began to build triplets and quads, quints and sextets, that its value as a pace-maker began to decline, although it will always be used, on the smaller tracks, where the bigger machines cannot take the turns. The use of pace-making machines, however, as they are being more and more developed, is declining in popularity, and I understand that in France they are no longer allowed in competition races.

The first season of the tandems' work was, aside from pacing, devoted mainly to establishing records against time. Competition tandem races were a later development. It was natural enough that this should be so. Until the machine came into general use, the public interest in what could be done with it was not great, but with its increasing popularity as a machine for general road-riding, the interest in competition tandem races is rapidly increasing.

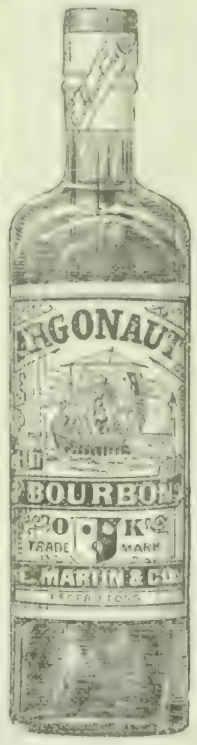
In the season of '94, I do not think there were any tandems used for road-riding in this State. In '95 the number was already large, and toward the end of the season the demand far exceeded the supply. This year the same state of facts exists, only more so. There are in this city at least three wheeling clubs who boast more than a dozen tandem teams, and the total number of the machines now in use on the Coast is very large, and is increasing as rapidly as they can be supplied. The growing popularity of the machine for two riders is not hard to understand when the advantages that have been already mentioned are considered.

A race between tandems is essentially a different contest from a race between single wheels. In the latter case everything depends on the skill and judgment of the rider—the selection of the jumping point, the regulation of the pace, the fight for position—and it may very easily happen that a superior rider physically is beaten out by a weaker but more clear headed opponent. In a race of this sort the pace is slow, as a rule, till the last fifth or eighth is reached and then the sprint ensues. In a tandem race, however, it is a dead hard grind from the first, and the strength of the riders counts for a good deal more. Here there is much less difference in the speed of the final sprint and the grind than in the case of the single, and there is practically no jumping. This is so for the reason that it is much more difficult to produce any sudden change of speed in the tandem than in the ordinary machine, owing to the greatly increased gear and the further fact that the work of two persons must co-operate to produce the effect.

The best racing tandem team would be made up of a man weighing from one hundred and forty-five to one hundred and sixty pounds on the front seat, the rear being occupied by a rider of from one hundred and sixty-five to one hundred and ninety pounds.

Beecham's pills are for biliousness. Bilious headache, dyspepsia, heartburn, torpid liver, dizziness, sick headache, bad taste in the mouth, coated tongue, loss of appetite, sallow skin, etc., when caused by constipation; and constipation is the most frequent cause of all of them.

Go by the book. Pills 10¢ and 25¢ a box. Book free at your druggist's or write B. F. Allen Co., 365 Canal Street, New York.

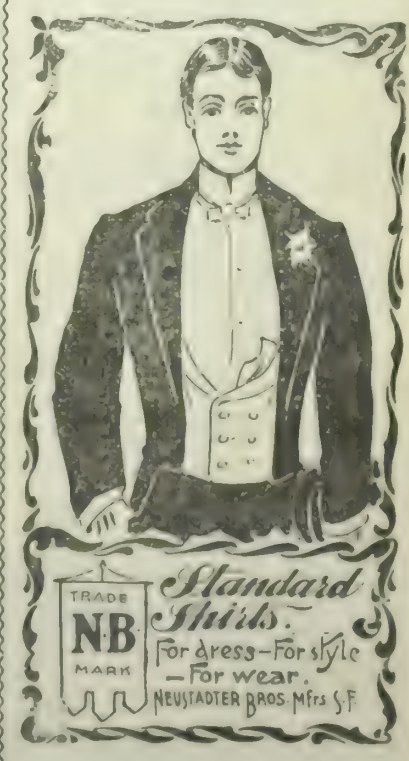


Argonaut OK WHISKEY

IS FIVE YEARS IN WOOD BEFORE BOTTLING

E. MARTIN —AND— CO.

411 MARKET ST.
SAN FRANCISCO



GEORGE E. HALL

Agent and Importer of Foreign Wines

MUTUAL LIFE BUILDING,
222 Sansome Street

Gladness Comes

With a better understanding of the transient nature of the many physical ills which vanish before proper efforts—gentle efforts—pleasant efforts—rightly directed. There is comfort in the knowledge that so many forms of sickness are not due to any actual disease, but simply to a constipated condition of the system, which the pleasant family laxative, Syrup of Figs, promptly removes. That is why it is the only remedy with millions of families, and is everywhere esteemed so highly by all who value good health. Its beneficial effects are due to the fact, that it is the one remedy which promotes internal cleanliness, without debilitating the organs on which it acts. It is therefore all important, in order to get its beneficial effects, to note when you purchase, that you have the genuine article, which is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only, and sold by all reputable druggists.

If in the enjoyment of good health, and the system is regular, then laxatives or other remedies are not needed. If afflicted with any actual disease, one may be commended to the most skillful physicians, but if in need of a laxative, then one should have the best, and with the well-informed everywhere, Syrup of Figs stands highest and is most largely used and gives most general satisfaction.

ART SALE AT AUCTION

BY ORDER OF

EDWIN DEAKIN, Artist

60

OF HIS CHOICEST

OIL PAINTINGS

In the Maple Hall

On the First Floor of the Palace Hotel

AUCTION SALES

Wednesday, April 15th at 12 o'clock, noon

Wednesday, April 15th, at 7:45 P. M.

Thursday, April 16th, at 12 o'clock, noon

—FREE EXHIBITION—

Commencing Monday, April 13, at 10 o'clock A.M., continuing day and evening until closing auction sale. The sale comprises architectural subjects, old buildings, mountains, mountain lakes, studies of fruit, and sketches of Paris Rues. In the collection are "Dent du Midi," "Westminster Abbey," "Scene of Grays Elegy," "Light in the Window," "Eagle Falls near Tahoe," "The Old Chateau," "Point Neuf Paris." This will be the last presentation by Mr. Deakin of his works at public auction.

Do not forget the days and hours of auction sales. Catalogues at Maple Hall, Palace Hotel, and at our office.

Connoisseurs will find this collection well worth a visit.

EASTON, ELDRIDGE & CO.

AUCTIONEERS

638 MARKET STREET

FASHIONS AND FRIVOLS.

Easter Sunday has come and gone and positively—I record it as a fact—more than one fashionable fair one, breathed a silent prayer for the sloppy, beastly weather the Creator of all things, good and evil, saw fit to send us.

No; the couturiere and modiste—despots and arch fiends—for once kept their word; and although many a handsome gown and modish bonnet was smuggled into dainty boudoirs at a ridiculously early hour on Sunday morning, they were all on hand when the glad Easter bells did peal.

On Good Friday already the struggle began. It had required no end of debate, discretion, and good hard reasoning to select the Easter gown. There were so many perplexing questions. There was the sleeve. Paris decreed a tight sleeve, London caped and beruffled the shoulders, and San Francisco, well that was the question, what was San Francisco going to do? Then there was the skirt. A trifle less wide—well that was easy enough—but "would you trim it or would you not?" was a problem not easy to solve.

And then the gown was ordered, and the fitting on came. That was Lenten penance. "What a fright I am with those tight sleeves. I don't care, they are fashionable." "I wish I had decided to take those tight-fitting sleeves. Susie has just returned from Paris, and she says a wrinkled gigot sleeve that is tight to the elbow and then bulges out to a medium-sized puff is the correct street sleeve." "My skirt worries me to death. I shall never dare to wear it. It is so narrow I look like a bean pole, and this trimming exaggerates my height." "Narrow skirts are not for fat people. You needn't tell me, Madam, I know it. I am fat and I won't go to church Easter, and I won't ever wear a clinging—well, I call this a clinging skirt—again." And then it rained. And that courage that blusters—at a distance from the fray—blithely said: "How disappointing. I should have worn my gown! if it is old style I like it" or "It is the latest thing, and somebody has got to start the style."

The real truth of the sleeve question is that they are just a little less extravagant than they were last year. But they are not the glove-fitting arm tights of ten years ago, notwithstanding some of the pictures which certain London designers have sent over here for adoption. The London sleeves are good instances of the attempt to straddle the question. They are tight all the way up with some ruffles at the shoulder, or at the elbow, and they are simply hideous. There is no possibility that any woman clothed in her right mind will supplement her attire with any such abominations.

There is a rage for extremely long sleeves. They even appear on evening gowns. A pretty sleeve in vogue is wrinkled to the pointed end, which extends well over the hand. The fullness is only at the top, ending half-way between the shoulder and elbow, where the contour of the arm begins to show. The sleeve gives the appearance of a sleeve and of a long, wrinkled glove in one. Another novel sleeve is not at all full, but much wrinkled. It is gathered or rather lightly shirred in both seams, the seams meeting on both the outside and inside of the arm in a double ruffle. The inside ruffle is only about an inch deep, while the outside measures three or four times as much. A fall of lace may be inserted on the outside ruffle from shoulder to wrist. This style of sleeve will be much used on summer frocks.

Skirts are just a shade narrower. The cut of the new skirts is not yet materially changed, for they are still full around the bottom, but not with exaggerated fullness, closely fitted about the hips, and made with an inside facing of hair cloth. About the only variation noticeable in skirts is in the front breadth, which is often cut very narrow and flaring and trimmed down either side on the seam. Five yards is a good width for the skirt around the bottom for cloth or any wool goods. Street skirts are cut short enough to clear the ground.

And now it is the round waist which is doomed. They continue to be worn, but they are in the minority, and will grow more and more so as the season advances. Nearly everything is made with a basque, and with the basques en garde for the return of the jacket.

BABETTE.

Madam de Soto makes a specialty of making ladies' underwear and children's garments. The best of materials are used, the prices are moderate, and no one should think of buying any of these articles without seeing Madam de Soto, at 414 Geary St., and inquiring as to her price for making.

Does your hair need a tonic? Quinania removes scurf and cleanses the scalp; strengthens the hair, renders it soft and brilliant, and prevents falling out. Price, 35 cents per bottle. If your dealer doesn't sell it, get it at Lederer's, 111 Stockton Street.

When you are selecting a wedding present go to S. & G. Gump's, 113 Geary Street. They have a magnificent variety to choose from.

PERRIER-JOUET CHAMPAGNE EXTRA DRY "SPECIAL"

Also specially selected stock of Clarets and White Wines on hand.

W. B. CHAPMAN, Sole Agent Pacific Coast
123 California Street

THE G-D "CHICAGO" YOUNG LADIES' WAIST. GAGE-DOWNS CO., MFR'S. CHICAGO, ILL.

USE THE CELEBRATED

C. D. CORSETS AND WAISTS

ALL FIRST-CLASS DEALERS KEEP THEM

SCHWEITZER & CO., San Francisco

Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast

SPRING SEASON, 1896

GRAND OPENING

..OF..

FRENCH PATTERN BONNETS

AND—HIGH ART NOVELTIES

MARIA J. STACOM

531 Sutter Street - San Francisco

SPRING OPENING

MISS I. E. CONNER

Late of E. E. Caswell

FINE FRENCH MILLINERY

36 GEARY STREET

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco

33 Post Street, below Kearny, Mechanics' Institute Building

Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000

JAS. D. PHELAN, Pres. GEO. A. STORY, Cashier
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.

DIRECTORS—Jas. D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. C. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. P. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.

Interest paid on term and ordinary deposits.

Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.

When opening accounts, send signature.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

OF LONDON

Incorporated by Royal Charter A. D. 1726

Capital Paid Up, $3,456,100 Assets, $21,584,413
Surplus to Policy Holders, $3,984,251

ROBERT DICKSON, Manager

NATHAN & KINGSTON, San Francisco Agents

501 MONTGOMERY ST.

Sun Insurance Office OF LONDON
Founded A.D. 1710 Cash Assets, $10,270,535
Oldest Purely Fire Insurance Office in the World

The Lion Fire Ins. Co. Ltd. OF LONDON
Established A.D. 1879 Cash Assets, $1,108,095

The Imperial Ins Co. Ltd., OF LONDON
Instituted A.D. 1803 Cash Assets, $9,362,920
40 Years in Business on the Pacific Coast

Manager for the Pacific Coast, WM. J. LANDERS
205 and 207 Sansome Street, near Pine

Aachen and Munich Fire Insurance Co.

Of Aix La Chapelle, Germany. Established 1805

Capital, $2,250,000.00

Total Assets, $6,854,653.65

United States Department
204 SANSOME STREET, SAN FRANCISCO

VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

LA GRANDE LAUNDRY CO. Telephone, Bush 12

Principal office—23 Powell St, Branch, 11 Taylor St., Laundry, Twelfth St, San Francisco, Cal.

All ordinary mending, sewing on buttons, etc., free of charge. Orders left at office will receive prompt attention. Work called for and delivered to any part of the city, free of charge.

DOCTOR

Acker's ENGLISH Remedy

for Coughs, Colds, and Consumption

is beyond question the greatest of all modern medicines. It will stop a Cough in one night, check a cold in a day, prevent Croup, relieve Asthma, and cure Consumption if taken in time. "You can't afford to be without it." A 25c. bottle may save your life! Ask your druggist for it. Send for pamphlet. If the little ones have Croup or Whooping Cough use it promptly. It is sure to cure.

Three Sizes—25c., 50c. and $1. All Druggists.

ACKER MEDICINE CO.,
16 & 18 Chambers St., N. Y.

MENNEN'S BORATED TALCUM TOILET POWDER

Approved by Highest Medical Authorities as a Perfect Sanitary Toilet Preparation

For infants and adults

Delightful after shaving

Positively relieves Prickley Heat, Nettle Rash, Chafed Skin, Sunburn etc. Removes Blotches, Pimple; makes the skin smooth and healthy.

Take No Substitutes. Sold by druggists or mailed for 25 cts. SAMPLE MAILED (Name this paper) FREE

GERHARD MENNEN CO., Newark, N. J.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT, IN AND FOR THE City and County of San Francisco, State of California, Department No. 9—Probate. In the matter of the estate and Guardianship of Emma Phyllis Clarke, a Minor. Order to show cause on application for Guardian for Order of Sale of Real Estate. It appearing to this Court from the petition this day presented and filed by Gustave H Umbsen, the Guardian of the estate of Emma Phyllis Clarke, a minor, praying for an order of sale of certain real estate belonging to his said ward, that it will be beneficial to said minor, and expedient and advisable that such real estate should be sold

It is hereby ordered, That the next of kin of the said ward, and all persons interested in the said estate, appear before this Court on Monday, the fourth day of May, A. D. 1896, at 10 o'clock A. M., at the courtroom of this Court, at the New City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, then and there to show cause why an order should not be granted for the sale of such estate.

And it is further ordered, That a copy of this order be published at least once a week for three successive weeks before the said day of hearing in THE WAVE, a newspaper printed and published in said City and County of San Francisco.

Dated April 3d, A. D. 1896.

J. V. COFFEY,
Judge of the Superior Court.

F. D. MADISON, Attorney for Guardian.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT, IN AND FOR THE City and County of San Francisco, State of California, Department No. 10—Probate. In the matter of the estate of Mary T. Thompson, deceased. Order to show cause why Order of Sale of Real Estate should not be made. A. J. Thompson, the Administrator of the estate of Mary T. Thompson, deceased, having filed his petition herein, duly verified, praying for an order of sale of all of the real estate of said decedent, for the purposes therein set forth.

It is therefore ordered by the said Court, that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased, appear before the said Superior Court, on Tuesday, the 12th day of May, 1896 at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at the courtroom of Department No 10—Probate—of said Superior Court, at the New City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said Administrator to sell all or so much of the real estate of the said deceased as shall be necessary, at public auction. And that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for four successive weeks, in THE WAVE, a newspaper printed and published in said city and county.

Dated April 9th, A. D. 1896.

CHARLES W. SLACK,
Judge of the Superior Court.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE.

BULLION MINING COMPANY.—LOCATION OF principal place of business, San Francisco, California: location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the eighteenth day of March, 1896, an assessment (No. 47) of ten cents (10c) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, room 11, No. 331 Pine Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the twenty-second day of April, 1896, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on THURSDAY, the fourteenth day of May, 1896, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

R. R. GRAYSON, Secretary.

Office—Room 11, No. 331 Pine Street, San Francisco, California.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

GOULD & CURRY SILVER MINING COMPANY

Assessment ..... No. 78
Amount per Share..... 15 cents
Levied ..... March 25, 1896
Delinquent in office..... April 28, 1896
Day of sale of Delinquent Stock ..... May 20, 1896

ALFRED K. DURBROW, Secretary

Office—Room 69, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Hotel Del Monte

America's Famous Summer and Winter Resort

The Most Elegant Seaside Establishment in the World

"Where a leaf never dies in the still blooming bowers,
And the bee banquets on thro' a whole year of flowers"

G. H. ARNOLD,
—MANAGER—

Monterey, Cal.

Flower Festivals
Fiestas
Rose Carnivals

. . . and the like, will be the delight of California for the next two or three months.

Santa Barbara Flower Festival, the fame of which is world-wide, and the glory of which, like that of Solomon, is not half told, opens April 15. Queen Flora will reign 3 days an arbitrary and absolute despot.

La Fiesta de Los Angeles, now fixed in the chronology of California feasts, and not less illustrious than its older prototypes, commences April 22, and the riot of fun will spread over 4 days.

The Carnival of Roses, to take place in San Jose, May 6th to 9th, inclusive, though a more recent candidate for favors of the fun-loving world, yet because of the limitless possibilities of the Garden City for anything that is made of roses, is quite as full of promise.

REDUCED RATES

will be made by the SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY for all these brilliant events. Arrange your programmes accordingly, and call on agents for particulars.

COOLGARDIE GOLD FIELDS
(FREMANTLE) AUSTRALIA

ONLY SIX DAYS TO HONOLULU — S.S. AUSTRALIA

First-Class.....$220
Steerage 110

Lowest rates to CAPE TOWN

S.S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, April 28, 1896, at 10 A. M.

S.S. "Mariposa," via Honolulu and Auckland, Thursday, April 30, 1896, at 2 P. M.

Ticket Office—111 Montgomery St.
Freight Office—327 Market St.

J. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO.,
General Agents

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.

Dispatch Steamers leave San Francisco for ports in Alaska.

For British Columbia and Puget Sound ports, Feb. 19, and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Wednesdays, 9 A. M.

For Newport, Los Angeles and all way ports, every fourth and fifth day, 8 A. M.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Hartford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles (Santa Monica), Redondo (Los Angeles) and Newport, every fourth and fifth day at 11 A. M.

For ports in Mexico, 25th of each month.

Ticket Office, Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.,
GENERAL AGENTS,
10 MARKET ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

THE LICK HOUSE

Occupies the block bounded by Montgomery, Post and Sutter Streets

IT IS—
—scrupulously clean;
—accessible to all street car lines and places of amusement;
—conveniently situated for business men;
—a quiet, model place for a family to spend the winter;
—moderate in price, yet first-class in every particular.

AMERICAN OR EUROPEAN PLAN

K. B. SOULÉ, Manager

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention

A QUIET HOME — CENTRALLY LOCATED

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL
SAN FRANCISCO

WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

Pacific Towel Co.

Telephone 1780 — No. 9 Lick Place, San Francisco

GEO. E. MOORE, Proprietor

The Club Hotel — 5 Bund, Yokohama

Hotel Metropole — 1 Tsukiji, Tokyo

First-class Hotels, centrally situated, well furnished. ENTIRE FOREIGN MANAGEMENT. Experienced English Matron in attendance. Excellent table under the superintendence of qualified foreign Chef.

The Hotel steam-launch attends steamers arriving and departing. Passengers are met at the Railway Station. Visitors have the option of messing either in Tokyo or Yokohama, without extra charge—The only Hotels offering such an advantage. Certified Guides are in attendance at both Hotels. European Hair-Dresser on the premises.

THE CLUB HOTEL COMPANY, Limited, Proprietors

E. C. SIOEN, Manager — YOKOHAMA

E. DEWETTE, Manager — TOKYO

THE GRILL ROOM SERVICE
—OF THE—
PALACE HOTEL

Has been extended to what was formerly the City Restaurant. This immense room, which has a direct entrance from Market Street is known as - - - -

"THE LADIES' GRILL ROOM"

NEW DEPARTURE—CHARACTERIZED BY PROMPT SERVICE—MODERATE CHARGES

$6.50 PER TON DELIVERED

COOS BAY COAL

SOOTLESS
SMOKELESS

ORDER YOUR CARRIAGES AND COUPES OF THE—

PACIFIC CARRIAGE CO.
At Baldwin Hotel
200 Sutter Street, corner Kearny
48 Eighth Street, or
St. Nicholas Hotel, Market and Ninth Streets

Steamer and Train Service a specialty 'Phone 1950

THE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
510 MONTGOMERY ST., S. F.,

Reads all papers on the Pacific Coast, and supplies clippings on all topics, business and personal.

CRESTA BLANCA WINES

AWARDED
THREE HIGHEST AWARDS
AT

THE ATLANTA EXPOSITION

OF SIX MEDALS
AWARDED TO CALIFORNIA

Cresta Blanca Wines

OBTAINED THREE

WETMORE-BOWEN CO.

140 Montgomery Street
Under Occidental Hotel

Horses Pastured

$1.50 PER MONTH

GOOD FEED AND CARE.

Send for circular.

F. A. HYDE, 630 Commercial St.

HIRSCH-KAHN & Co.
MANUFACTURING OPTICIANS
IMPORTERS OF OPTICAL GOODS
PHOTOGRAPHIC APPARATUS & SUPPLIES ETC
333 KEARNY STREET
SAN FRANCISCO CAL.

BAJA CALIFORNIA

DAMIANA BITTERS

"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular)

NABER, ALES & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

Ask your Blacksmith to shoe your horse with

PHŒNIX HORSE SHOES

GIVE THEM A TRIAL

DR. THOMAS L. HILL
DENTIST
Office, Odd Fellows' Building,
S. W. Cor. Seventh and Market Streets
Office Hours, 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.
Consultation Hours, 4 to 5

ABRAMSON-HEUNISCH CO. (Incorporated)
IMPORTERS AND JOBBERS OF
Brewers' and Bottlers' Supplies, Corks, Druggists' Glassware, Etc.
26-28 Main St. San Francisco

REMOVAL

Rountrees English Chocolate, Kohlers Swiss Chocolates, and all brands of Foreign and Eastern Confectionery, imported by . . . .

W. L. GREENBAUM,

of 295 SUTTER ST., will, after December 1st, be found in large and commodious quarters at

128 POST ST., Bohemian Club Bldg.

TALES OF THE DAY.

Early in his diplomatic career Bismarck represented the Prussian Government at the German Diet. Count Richberg, the Austrian representative, called on him to show a dispatch from his Emperor instructing that he vote with Prussia. Bismarck read the document and then returned it, saying, "This is evidently a mistake." Richberg changed color, for, instead of the official letter, he had given Bismarck his own secret instructions ordering that while countenancing Prussia that he intrigue against her interests. Bismarck remarked: "Don't be upset. You never intended giving me the letter. Ergo, you never gave it me; ergo, I know nothing about the whole matter!"—Youth's Companion.

Lord Tenterden one day, at his own table, asked a county magistrate if he would take venison. "Thank you, my lord, boiled chicken," was the reply. His lordship had contracted an inveterate habit of keeping himself and everybody else to the precise matter in hand. "That, sir," said the judge, "is no answer to my question. I now ask you again if you will take venison, and I will trouble you to say yes or no without further prevarication."

Judge Gary of New York listened patiently to a certain eminent attorney who was airing his indignation over the loss of an overcoat. He had been robbed. Yes, sir! robbed—in the temple of justice under the eyes of the law. Finally the Judge, growing impatient, asked: "What's the matter, now?" "Matter! It's a confounded outrage! Had my overcoat stolen right from this room." The Judge smiled a little. "Overcoat, eh?" he said, "Pah! that's nothing. Whole suits are lost here every day."

The Raines Bill is the new excise law passed by the New York Legislature, by which the license fees and bonds required of liquor dealers are materially increased. Its operation must force many of the saloons out of existence. It is said to be a scheme of Boss Platt to force the liquor dealers to obtain bonds from the Fidelity Deposit Company of Maryland, of which his son is agent. Apropos the Bill, Chimmie Fadden is heard from in the New York Sun:

Dr. Talmage says that Henry W. Grady, editor of the Atlanta Constitution made it a rule never to correct errors that had appeared in his columns. One time the Constitution published the obituary of a man reasonably well known and next day the alleged corpse appeared to demand a correction. Grady said he never made mistakes, but the corpse insisted on the wrong being rectified. "If you are determined to embarrass me," said Grady, "I'll make the correction, but you'll take the consequences." Next day he announced the existence of the supposed corpse, but under the head of "Births."

Richard Harding Davis does not care if people know that he "keeps a man." In fact, he rather courts the publicity. In registering recently at a Bryn Mawr Pa., inn, he subscribed himself, "Richard Harding Davis and valet." A Philadelphia gentleman immediately followed Davis in registering, and casting a quick glance at the scrawl above, wrote. "Bradley Warburton and valise."—The Chap Book.

A popular lecturer, says the Youth's Companion, invited by a woman's club to address its members on the business careers now open to the sex, made an excellent talk, and at its conclusion was asked by a pretty young woman to say how these new careers affect a woman's chance of marriage In a quandary how to reply he hesitated but finally arose and repeated the querry: "It's a grave question," he added, "and I cannot settle it, but let me tell you a story that some may think has a bearing thereon:

"In the town where I live there is an old negro named Jacob who is known as Professor. He whitewashes walls and fences, cuts grass and saws wood. A year ago Jacob took a young fellow named Tom as partner. Tom was quick, handy, and obliging and the business of the new firm increased. The Professor's hovel and cart bore the sign Jacob & Co. in large charcoal lettering. In a comparatively brief time, however, Tom disappeared, and the 'Co.' was blotted from the signs. 'Where's Tom?' I asked the old man. 'I know 'nuffin about Tom,' he answered. 'Don' want no sich partner as dat.' 'What was wrong, Jacob? He seemed industrious and clever.' 'Clever enough! Kin saw an' mow an' handle de brush 's well as I kin. But he took to wearin' my clo'es, 'n' smokin' my pipe, 'n' callin' himself de actin' pardner in de firm. Don' know he's place. He jes' t'ought he war me—me. Den, sah, I broke de pardnership.'"

The little King of Spain had for his lesson, the other day, the mottoes of the different European countries. He got as far as England, and promptly recited "Dieu et mon Droit," and then abruptly asked, "What is the motto of America?" Count Z ——, who happened to be in the room at the time, answered, "Dieu et Mon roe" (Monroe).

FREE EDUCATION AND PROFESSIONAL TRAINING

"THE WAVE'S" LIBERAL SUBSCRIPTION OFFER.

The proprietors of THE WAVE have made arrangements with the most prominent schools and colleges throughout the State, and are now prepared to offer scholarships and courses in the leading educational institutions free of charge, for all who will obtain subscribers to this popular weekly.

UNIVERSITY COURSES.

A single year's course at the University of California, or at the Leland Stanford Junior University, for 185 annual subscribers. This offer includes room and board, and all other necessary expenses attached to the course. For 750 subscribers we offer a four years' course.

MEDICAL COURSES.

One year at the Cooper Medical College will be given for 125 subscribers. This includes books and incidental expenses attached to the course.

A single term at the Medical Department of the University of California for 100 subscribers.

For 500 annual subscribers we offer the full four years' course at the Cooper Medical College. This offer includes all incidental costs and fees, except board and lodging.

We offer the four years' course at the Medical Department of the University of California, for 400 subscribers.

The two year's course at the State Normal School at San Jose, for 600 subscribers. This offer includes board, lodging, and books. A single year for 160 subscribers.

The course at Hastings Law College for 250 annual subscribers. This includes books and other expenses attached to the College, for a period of three years, and the privilege of studying in a first-class law office.

A three years' course at the Mark Hopkins Institute of Art for 250 annual subscribers. A year's course for 85 subscribers.

A course in any department of Van der Nailen's School of Electricity and Engineering (except Department of Assaying) will be given for 125 annual subscribers. A course in the Department of Assaying) for 20 annual subscribers.

A six months' course in either the Business Department, or the Department of Stenography and Typewriting of Heald's Business College, for 50 annual subscribers.

A nine months' course in the Columbia School of Dramatic Art for 75 annual subscribers.

A three months' course at the Meisterschaft School of Languages for 40 annual subscribers.

The course at the California School of Elocution and Oratory for 35 annual subscribers.

Tuition in music, vocal or instrumental, from Francis Stuart, S. G. Fleishmann, J. H. Dohrmann, Sigmund Beel, Nathan Landsberger, Lesley Martin, or H. J. Stewart. A course of twenty lessons from any of these gentlemen for fifty annual subscribers. For 100 annual subscribers a course of twenty lessons each in piano, singing, harmony, or any other branch of music.

—A—
SAFE GUIDE

No man knows all there is to know about advertising. The subject is too profound, too complex, too perplexing, for any single person, or for any dozen persons, for that matter. The path to success in advertising is full of dangerous places. All business men would do well to engage a safe guide to conduct them past the danger spots—to tell them what to do and what to avoid doing.

PRINTERS' INK

Is a weekly journal for advertisers, published at 10 Spruce St., New York. It is a magazine of ideas, of suggestions, of advice. Advertisers the world over read it and write for it. It is the advertising authority of America—probably of the globe. Business men will find it a safe guide. To secure its services as guide costs $2 a year. A sample copy costs nothing.

J. R. SMITH & CO.

230 BUSH STREET
And Room 7, Rotunda, Mills Building

W. HALL, Successor

MERCHANT-TAILORS

Will make garments to order
—At Great Reduction for Cash—

J. R. SMITH - - Manager

BICYCLE and GOLF SUITS

H. S. BRIDGE & CO.

Merchant Tailors

Many Novelties in Imported Wear. Shirts to Order a Specialty.

622 Market Street, San Francisco
(Up-stairs, opposite Palace Hotel)

BEST SUITS ON EARTH

26 MONTGOMERY STREET

TO ORDER $15.00 AND UPWARDS

J. W. HAWES, Formerly Crocker Bldg.

COTTON SAIL DUCKS

22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard

ALSO

Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks
From 30 to 120 inches wide
Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks
Manufactured by Mount Vernon Company Baltimore

Murphy, Grant & Co. . . Pacific Coast Sole Agents

BONESTELL & CO.

Dealers in PAPER

Fine Coated Papers a Specialty

401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

THE WAVE CLUBBING LIST

FOR 1896

By special arrangement with the Publishers, THE WAVE is prepared to offer the following list

SUBSCRIPTIONS MUST BE PAID IN ADVANCE

THE WAVE and CENTURY	$6 00
" " ARENA	5 00
" " LITTELL'S LIVING AGE	7 75
" " ART AMATEUR	5 75
" " LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE	4 50
" " MUNSEY'S	3 50
" " ATLANTIC MONTHLY	5 75
" " YOUTH'S COMPANION	3 75
" " NEW ENGLAND MAGAZINE	5 00
" " HARPER'S MAGAZINE	5 50
" " HARPER'S WEEKLY	5 70
" " HARPER'S BAZAAR	5 70
" " HARPER'S ROUND TABLE	4 00
" " SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE	5 00
" " REVIEW OF REVIEWS	4 50
" " ST. NICHOLAS	5 00
" " OVERLAND	4 75
" " COSMOPOLITAN	3 50
" " FRANK LESLIE'S MAGAZINE	4 90
" " PUCK	6 50
" " JUDGE	6 50
" " LIFE	7 00
" " LIFE'S COMEDY	3 50
" " LESLIE'S WEEKLY	5 70
" " DEMOREST MAGAZINE	4 00
" " SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN	5 00
" " SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN SUPPLEMT	6 50
" " N. Y. DAILY SUN	8 00
" " " SUNDAY "	4 50
" " CASSELL MAGAZINE	3 75
" " ARGOSY	3 50
" " PUBLIC OPINION	4 50
" " SUNDAY WORLD	4 75
" " CRITIC	5 50
" " FORUM	5 00
" " NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW	6 50
" " TABLE TALK	3 25
" " NINETEENTH CENTURY	6 25
" " CONTEMPORARY REVIEW	6 25
" " FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW	6 25
" " BLACKWOODS MAGAZINE	6 25
" " TRUTH	6 25
" " DELINEATOR	3 50
" " VOGUE	5 50
" " TOWN TOPICS	7 50
" " DAILY JOURNAL	5 00
" " SUNDAY JOURNAL	3 75
" " ILLUS. AMERICAN	5 75

CALIFORNIA STATE LIBRARY

THE WAVE

VOL. XV. No. 16. SAN FRANCISCO, APRIL 18, 1896. PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE WAVE

Is published every Saturday, at the Crocker Building, corner Market and Post Streets, San Francisco.

SUBSCRIPTION, $3 per year, $1.50 six months, $.75 three months. Foreign subscriptions (countries in postal union) $5 per year. Sample copies free on application. The trade is supplied by the San Francisco News Co., 210 Post Street; East of the Rocky Mountains by the American News Co., New York.

THE WAVE is kept on file and is for sale at Brentano's, 17 Avenue de'l Opera, Paris, France; 31 Union Square, New York City; 1015 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.; and 206 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

ADVERTISING rates and all other matters pertaining to the business of the paper, address Rooms 220-221-222 Crocker Building. Eastern Agent, E. Katz, 250-235 Temple Court, New York.

HARRISON M. PARKER, BUSINESS MANAGER.

Entered at San Francisco Post-office as second-class matter

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY.

SAN FRANCISCO, APRIL 18, 1896.

CONTENTS.

EDITORIALS—
The Mutual Obligation..... 1
Athletics in America..... 1
Must the Miracle Go?..... 2
Management of Street Railways 2
The Practise of Substitution. 3
An Industrial Renaissance in Japan 3

BANDY CALLAGHAN'S GIRL—By Frank Norris..... 4

THE SPRING ART EXHIBITS—California Painters at Their Best and Worst..... 5

"IN SEARCH OF QUIET"—And Several Other New Books—By J. W. T..... 6

A KING OF FORGERS—By Etc., Jr..... 6

THINGS AND PEOPLE—By The Witness..... 7

THE NEW BOOKS—By Oracle K. B. 8

THE THEATERS—By Peg Woffington 8

CHIMMIE FADDEN AGAIN—Comments on Politics..... 9

POEMS—By W. S. Yeats..... 9

THE WEEK IN SOCIETY—By The Gossip.....10, 11

RIPPLES—Presumably Humorous—By Bruno.....12

THE WHEEL—Comment and Criticism on Recent Events in the Cycling World—By C. Michelet and F. H. Kerrigan 13

MISCELLANEOUS.

Dramatic Notes—The Coming Events in the Theater World 9

Fashions and Frivols.. 14

Tales of the Day..... 16

Recently several cases have been brought to the attention of THE WAVE in which young men, anxious to secure an education, had undertaken to work their way through the University. The spirit that hungers for knowledge is not met with as frequently as one might wish, but the example of the youth in question has led the proprietors of THE WAVE to devise some means by which such persons, either male or female, might secure the education which they sought. On page 16 of this issue may be found an offer of scholarships at either of the two Universities, offers of the facilities of reputable business colleges, medical colleges, schools of electrical, mining, mechanical and civil engineering and architecture, schools of dramatic art, and scholarships at the Meisterschaft School of Languages and schools of elocution and oratory. In addition to these, THE WAVE has been enabled to make arrangements with Nathan Landsberger, S. M. Fleishman, H. J. Stewart, Sigmund Beel, J. H. Dohrman, and Lesley Martin, for courses in vocal and instrumental music, including piano, organ, harmony, and vocal art. This offer is something of a novelty in California, and is not lacking in generous features.

THE MUTUAL OBLIGATION.

In a recent paper W. D. Howells takes a particularly lofty stand in an attempt to answer the question, old as recorded time: "Who is my brother?"

In brief, the Howells's reply is that every man is every other man's brother and that the tie of blood should not be considered as sacred or as close as the tie of association and mutual environment. In his conception of an ideal, perhaps Mr. Howells is right. If ever he expects to see any degree of realization, he is a dreamer, a gentle dreamer who but spins a vision into a pleasing tale, and rears hopes that wither in the light of reason. There are many minds that have conceived the same dream, and here and there it has found expression. One who is history's noblest figure, and who died on Calvary, died because he had had this dream and had tried with its radiance to dispel the darkness that enwrapped the world.

But selfishness was the rule of action long before the Cross bore its burden, and the veil of the temple was rent in twain. Since Cain smote his kin to death there has been no general exception among individuals and absolutely none among peoples. Ever the strongest has had sway, and to-day nations stand armed against nations, while even the missionaries sent to bear the gospel to the isles of the sea sometimes come to possess the lands whither they went to teach. Communities spring into existence as the crystallization of the yearning for universal brotherhood, and are shattered in due course. Only the longing for brotherhood is there; selfishness at last sweeps the chimera away.

The see-saw of life has never found a balance and rested there. When one man has risen to fame another has been claimed by obscurity. Where one has become rich the clutch of poverty has tightened upon the throat of another. Such a thing as general equality is impossible. Behind such a proposition is the lesson of the ages. Men are not alike. If they could have the same starting point the impetus of varying intelligences would send them to different stages along the path of life. A man must use the spade, and his fellow must make the laws of the land, write its books, become part of its history. Ditches must be digged, but mighty deeds must be wrought.

There is one potent element in civilization that is lightly considered when theorists speculate on the loveliness of the day when all shall fraternally clasp hands and each labor for the good of the rest. This element is made up of the criminals, not unfortunates, forced, perhaps, by circumstances that might be amended, into lives of evil, but the natural criminal, the one with his nature molded awry, who comes into being with the stamp upon his soul of some foulness done by an ancestor long forgotten dust. Whose brother is such an one? Nobody wants to be brother to a Holmes or a Durrant. Let them be put into prison and reformed? There is a depth of malevolence for which no reformation exists. Let them be put to death? The heart rebels when to slay a brother becomes a duty. Until the criminal class can be utterly abolished there can be no great progress toward universal brotherhood, and ahead of crime, poverty must go. The heavens rolling up as a scroll would be a physical change no more startling than would the moral change that would involve the elimination of the obstacles now between this dream and the distant reality it represents.

The actual criminal displays only an aggravated type of selfishness. To declare that the world owes one a living is to have the criminal's instinct, but to lack his courage. One content to live in idleness and eat unearned bread, can, if he be observant, descry in the act of the footpad his own shortcomings taking form. The footpad goes upon the highway, demands the gold for which another has striven, and may be sent to a cell. The more cowardly idler weakens the social fabric by gnawing stealthily, and cannot be caught. Selfishness, however, does not necessarily assume either guise. The employer who oppresses his workmen, the workmen who oppress their employer, or the blatant disturber who fattens by the friction he creates between capital and labor, all are governed by the same rule.

One seeing the ills that beset may cry out for their removal. If poor in purse, he is a demagog; if rich, he is insincere. In either case he is viewed as a radical nuisance by the world at large, set down as a crank, pointed to as an example to be avoided.

These are the simple facts of life. Over against them is the dream of universal brotherhood, a sweet and fleeting fancy, painted by the mind that sorrow has mellowed or that the weight of years has robbed of passion.

ATHLETICS IN AMERICA.

More wreaths of olive were captured at Athens by Americans than by French, German, and English athletes combined. The Princeton and Boston boys have given to the United States a standing in athletics which places us at once as a leader in the sports of the track. In future no international games will be complete without the presence of the American. As the world is taking a very lively interest in games of all sorts this recognition has a distinctive value in its effect upon the estimate placed on the people of the United States by other peoples. Probably a more favorable impression has been made on Europeans by the exhibition of the skill and prowess given by these American boys, than by any other event since the Columbian Exposition. The world has not yet become indifferent, and we hope never will, to acts of physical daring, skill, and strength. Notwithstanding all that idealists may preach there is as much respect paid in this day of higher civilization to a good right arm as in any other day. Power is the god to whom all bow.

The Anglomaniac is a detestable creature, deserving only of jibes and sneers, but there is an intelligent imitation of certain English customs which is worthy. The most beneficial result which has followed from close social contact with England is the stimulus for outdoor sports which America has received. It is hardly ten years since it was regarded as undignified for a man of years and station to take part in athletics. There were a few oarsmen, one here and there who clung to the baseball field, but the college men as a rule gave up their athletics with their Virgil and Homer. Now, however, professional men find no embarrassment in having a love for sport. The writer has seen a Harvard professor, the Governor of Massachusetts, a lawyer, and a college student at tennis. Secretary Olney, as we have recently read in the papers, is a tennis devotee. Golf, however, is the more popular game among Eastern men of years, and in England, according to Secretary Chamberlain, no man can be considered a statesman who doesn't play golf.

One of the reasons for the remarkable popularity of the bicycle is that it was invented and became practical at a time coincident with the rise of the athletic spirit in our people. More wheels are to be found in America than anywhere else, and this is not only due to the larger proportion of Americans financially able to own wheels, but to the fact that as yet we have a narrower range of sports which all may enjoy. Just as we discovered that it was necessary to live out of doors and exercise in the air part of the time the wheel came along and we jumped on and have made wheeling to-day the National sport. Since baseball became a professional sport there has been no game in which all classes indulged until the bicycle arrived.

At this time there are more American men and women enjoying out-door exercise than there ever were before. This statement is hardly subject to doubt or qualification. More matter is published in our papers concerning amateur sports than is published on any other one subject. Within a decade the American people have been transformed from one taking but little exercise in the open air to one living a considerable portion of the time on the tennis court, the wheel, the yacht, the football or baseball field. This change must make for the physical and mental improvement of the people. Less will be heard in future of dyspepsia as the universal American complaint. Along with sound, strong bodies will come active minds, and from a good-working stomach and liver must follow a clear head. There will be less that is flabby in mind and body.

The universities have done a considerable share in developing this healthful love of exercise. The boys who have had football and tennis at college are loth to give up their sports when they return home. They become leaders in their communities, stimulate others and make their games fashionable. Inter-collegiate games, though sometimes unnecessarily rough, are indispensable as promoters of rivalry which leads to serious training and the ambition to excel. There can be no enjoyment where there is no competition. The man who meets with no opposition soon gives up the effort. The game of solitaire is not the most exciting of games, yet it is made endurable only by the element of chance which fights against the player. All true sports develop the spirit that makes good business men, successful men of any kind, and instead of developing a race of worthless "sports" they develop men quick of thought and action, men of courage and of will.

There is much to be hoped for of an improving nature in the interest now taken throughout America in athletic sports. Our victories at Athens will not be the last to which the attention of Europe will be called. But then victories are of less value to us than the universal love of outdoor sports which lies back of them.

MUST THE MIRACLE GO?

One of the characteristics of modern progress in thought is the rejection of the supernatural. This rejection is not a mere iconoclastic tendency, not designed to discredit records that have long been reverently accepted. On the contrary it seeks to explain by natural laws circumstances that must either be thus explained, or, in this latter day when the evolution of the world has been traced from remote ages, be looked upon as visionary, and unable to sustain the history of which they have become part. The miracle, subjected to the test of reason, may be a remarkable occurrence, and yet one so wholly possible that its relation in no way casts doubt upon the context.

When it is read that the sea was divided, and the water stood up as two walls between which the children of Israel passed in safety, doubt at once springs into the mind familiar with the properties of water. When these walls are said to have fallen and engulfed the pursuers, the doubt is in no manner lessened. But when a scientist who is a student of the Bible, a minister of the power of Lyman Abbott, declares from the pulpit that the action of the sea was simply that due to tide and wind, that where the crossing might once be easily made, at another time it would be impossible, reason is glad to welcome the explanation; not as overthrowing sacred history, but as establishing it on a firm basis. The poetry that appears in Scripture, some of it rising to unequaled grandeurs, proves that the writers of early days were guided by the instincts that are common to writers of the present. Poetic license is as old as the art of writing.

The nineteenth century comes nearer being the age of miracles than any other of which there can be definite knowledge. Such wonders have been accomplished that the very faculties of comprehension seem dazed. It would be almost beyond human power to outline a scheme so preposterous that the rest of the world would have the right to laugh at it in advance. When it has become common to see through solids, as solids have been understood, we can be prepared for almost anything. An instrument now projects light through a brick or a beam. Only a few months ago the scientist bold enough to assert that such a feat would ever be done would have been laughed to scorn. If he were now to announce his ability to walk through a wall without disturbing the mortar or endangering his own anatomy, people would be if incredulous at least respectfully so.

The nineteenth century, then, could not well be a time of arbitrary unbelief. It is rather a season for the quickening of faith by calling attention to apparent triumph over known laws. Yet, in each step forward, though at first there may be mystery, sooner or later there is explanation. The natural desire is to have the so-called "miraculous" similarily explained, and doubtless only the lapse of centuries and the insufficiency of detail prevent. In instances such as the one cited by the Reverend Lyman Abbott elucidation yet remains an easy task, although the preacher rash enough to undertake it must expect a storm about his ears, and Mr. Abbott has not been permitted to experience disappointment in this respect.

It is wisdom on the part of people who desire the Bible to continue to hold among the intelligent the place that has long been accorded it, not to rebel against the Abbotts of the pulpit with their explanations. Let the wind and the tides be given a part to sustain, for then appeal is made to the mentality, and the scoffer finds to his dismay that he has nothing left at which to scoff. He has been railing at the style of a descriptive writer, and allowed the imagery of the early poet to lead him into error. Belief in miracles, it is almost useless to state, is waning. That some of the miracles excite a feeling akin to ridicule is equally true, but the consequences are not grave, and apprehension concerning them is useless. Divested of its fanciful wrappings, the miracle reveals itself as a fact, an incident, perhaps the beginning of an epoch. It takes on new dignity, and faith clashes no more with the teachings of science.

AN INDUSTRIAL RENAISSANCE IN JAPAN.

It is hard for a Westerner to conceive, almost impossible for him to appreciate, the change that has come over the spirit of Japanese institutions within the last thirty years. It can only be judged by its results, results that have crushed the power of China, made a new nation of the Koreans, and have altered all pre-existing maps of the East.

The change, however, though permanent, has not been radical; has not penetrated to the roots and life-springs of the nation; Japan emotionally remains the same; her art, literature, drama, all her ethical character is as it ever has been—as we hope it ever will be—thoroughly, essentially Japanese. The greatest physical revolutions cannot change a nation's art, this must of necessity be a matter of growth, of slow development, a thing bred into the bones of a whole race, changing only with the slow almost imperceptible changes in the race itself. We can see this in our own harsher civilization: our art, our drama, our literature during the last century have remained almost stationary when compared to the tremendous, breathless leaps of science.

It is in no wise different with the Japanese. In the matters of surgery, road-building, diplomacy, and war they are abreast of the foremost nations of the Occident; while their pottery, painting, poetry, and the like are still as far behind ours as they always have been, and we think will be for many years to come.

This curious anomaly of irregular—one might almost say abnormal—growth is, no doubt, due to the curious conditions of Japanese civilization. In the external manifestations of their life—such manifestations as are not ethical—the people are in a perpetual state of unrest, in unceasing movement, in changeless change. Their religion—at least such of it as they derive from Buddhism—is largely responsible for this. Buddhism teaches them that there is nothing permanent; that all things visible must needs soon pass away and come to nothing; that earthly life is but an episode in the great drama of creation; that nothing lasts; that all things change. This tendency against solidifying, this aversion to stability, leaves the people—at least upon their intellectual side—in a state of receptivity perfectly adapted to the assimilation of new ideas and methods. There is no conservatism among them, no clinging to the old things. In Japan there are few old things to cling to. Houses are built for a season's use; shoes are bought for a week's wear, and even certain temples must be destroyed once every quarter-century. It is the new, the untried, and the novel that interests and allures. This mobility is not limited to methods of thought only. It is a physical as well as psychological fact. The Japanese, especially of the lower classes, is continually on the move. If work fails him at Kyoto, he can travel—if needs be—to Kumamato in search of it, and can start almost on a minute's notice. His belongings are few, his wants fewer, and—most important of all, perhaps—he is free from all associations or traditions binding him to one particular spot, one district of the country, any one city. It needs no great argument to show how this temperament, and these faculties of easy change stand him in good stead, and how, possessing them, his lot can be made infinitely easier than that of his more sluggish brother of the Western World.

It is not that which a man posseses that is conducive to his happiness, but that which he can learn to do without. For the Japanese workman one garment and a modicum of rice suffice. But the laboring-man of America and Europe must have at least a have dozen articles of dress, a varied diet of meat and vegetables, a permanent home, bedding, shoes, etc. In the words of Lafcadio Hearn, "Japan may well be grateful to her two great religions, the creators and preservers of her moral power: to Shinto, which taught the individual to think of his emperor and of his country before thinking either of his own family or of himself; and to Buddhism, which trained him to master regret, to endure pain, and to accept as an eternal law the vanishing of things loved and the tyranny of things hated."

MANAGEMENT OF STREET RAILWAYS.

With Mr. Vining, Superintendent of the Market-street railway system, the writer has no personal acquaintance. One may hear a variety of reports concerning his mental characteristics and his attitude toward the public. His friends cheerfully testify to the fact that he is a quiet and unobtrusive gentleman; but, whatever he may be, he has come unfortunately into public view, and, in some manner, seemingly inexplicable, has engaged the hostility of the press, and has been made a target for the fellow who hurls noisy epithets against his employer. Just why this should be so is problematical, and is unfortunate, to boot. It cannot be said that the feeling of personal hostility toward him is due the fact that he was "imported from Omaha," as one public speaker recently declared; for Mr. Kruttschnitt is a stranger to California, but no one has ever heard so much as an unkind reference to him. Mr. Kruttschnitt is a scholarly man, a close student of railway affairs, and attends so closely to his business as to be almost a recluse; still one hears nothing but kindly words of his ability and of his manner. So far as Mr. Vining is concerned, we have yet to see the first complaint against him that would not, if closely scrutinized, vindicate his course; but it is not all-sufficient to be right. In dealing with the public, even though you have a knowledge of the rectitude of your course, it is not always wise to proceed toward its accomplishment, without paying some apparent deference to public opinion. The innovation of the transfer man, who stands at Third and Market Streets, has caused a world of adverse comment. It is not a new idea in the street-car business, but is a common thing in most of the large Eastern cities, and is apparently the only means of checking the abuse of transfer privileges. That the privilege is abused—and outrageously abused, for that matter—few will deny.

One of the most recent lines of attack made against Mr. Vining appeared in the Examiner, in which a great hubbub was raised about the increase in the number of damage suits filed against the Market Street Company during the eighteen months of Mr. Vining's superintendency. By means of a tabulated statement, these suits are compared in number and in importance with the suits and the amounts involved in actions for damages brought during the eighteen months preceding Mr. Vining's coming. Editorially, the Examiner said:

> The difference in the number of ante-Vining and post-Vining damage suits is too great to be a simple coincidence. There is only one possible way, as far as we can see, in which the manager can shift part of the responsibility for it. There has been an extensive invasion of the principal streets by trolley lines within the past eighteen months, and Mr Vining may say that the trolley is such an inherently dangerous device that it is to blame for all the increased mortality under his administration.

Of course, the Examiner's comparison is unfair in other respects than those which it tacitly admits in the above quotation. Unless memory be at fault, the Omnibus Cable Railway system (the mileage of which is about the same as that of the Market Street system) was consolidated with the Market Street just prior to the coming of Mr. Vining, and any comparison of damage suits, to have any weight or meaning, must be made between the present consolidated system and the former Market Street and Omnibus systems combined. Such a charge as the Examiner makes, however, is not convincing of anything, unless it be an open confession that Mr. Vining's critics are hard pushed for damaging facts upon which to base tangible complaints against him. No one supposes Mr. Vining deliberately lays traps to injure or kill passengers or wayfarers, or that he spends sleepless nights devising means of increasing damage suits.

It is regrettable that the demagog cannot let our street railways alone. San Francisco possesses a railway system that compels the admiration of every Eastern and European visitor. It is an enterprise that should awaken civic pride, rather than provoke open hostility. Undoubtedly we have one of the best equipped street railway lines in the world, carrying passengers for the smallest piece of money current in the West. When the Examiner and the other daily papers demand a reduced fare because passengers are carried for less money on some few lines in some few cities in the East, they lose sight of the fact that conditions there are altogether different from those prevailing here, and the only wonder is that fares are not lower in the East. One may buy in New York for one cent a newspaper beside which the Examiner, as newspapers go, is nothing, yet that journal charges five cents for its publication. If the residents of the Richmond or any other district could enhance the value of their property by compelling the newspapers to reduce prices, the "Improvement Clubs" would be found ready and willing to encourage an agitation to compel Mr. Hearst to make sacrifices; as they are now seeking to force the railway corporation to suffer a depreciation in the value of its property, so that the twenty-foot lots west of the cemeteries may enjoy a corresponding increase. A decrease in the price of our daily newspapers would be something of a public calamity, however, if circulation would be increased by such reduction.

Some one has said that selfishness is the controlling trait of mankind, and probably it is, for it is a most natural vice. This sentiment often finds open expression in the action of communities, and we are learning now how far interested men may go toward stripping away one man's property and property rights in the name of Public Welfare, that he may increase the value of his own property.

If you can bring yourself to realize the actual condition of affairs, presented by this demand for reduced fares, it will not be difficult to understand why the man of capital is decidedly shy in his local investments. The Richmond and Point Lobos Districts without a street railway would to-day be a dreary stretch of drifting sand dunes. With some enterprise, street railways were projected across this desolate waste, and the unpromising territory hitherto unavailable for residence purposes opened up to settlement. Men of moderate means, and men of small means, attracted by prevailing low prices went into the territory in considerable numbers, and erected small houses. The railway line made this settlement possible; its proper maintenance makes further growth certain. The distance from the center of the city and the necessary expenditures for horse-car fare were both factors taken into consideration in fixing the selling price of real estate in that section, and the purchasers and present owners reaped all the advantage thereof. Since the construction of the road the value of the property has more than doubled; trebled and quadrupled in many cases. The whole neighborhood reaped the vast benefit through the change, and families who hitherto had lived in flats and tenements had homes placed within their reach by the enterprise of others. Just now it has come the turn of the "lot owners" to show their enterprise. They are not slow about it, nor are they overmodest in their demands. They propose by joint action to compel their benefactor, the street car line, to reduce its fare fifty per cent. If, by noisy demonstrative and unanimous action of this neighborhood, the railway could be forced to give fifty dollars out of every hundred of its earnings, the twenty-five-foot-lot man out in Richmond would reap a distinct advantage. His property would increase in value. The corporation's loss would be his gain.

Apply to your own business the method of control proposed by these gentlemen, and you will dimly appreciate one of the exasperating and peace-destroying cares and burdens that go hand-in-hand with railroad ownership. These interested "lot-owners" held a meeting—a meeting to determine how much they would permit the railway company to charge for its services. The Chairman announced that the "club would advocate" two and one-half cents reduction, and, as Richmond is never "backward" where there is any "work in improvement" to be done, the Point Lobos Club will be found going ahead. The gentleman then proceeds to discuss in an easy, free-handed manner, the relative fairness of compelling a reduction of two and one-half cents as against three cents. He finally decided to his satisfaction that two and one-half cents would be about right, and another gentleman, belonging to the Richmond District Improvement Association, said—and he said it with a certainty that indicated he spoke by the card—that his Club "was in favor of two and one-half cents, but not three cents.' This announcement seemed to settle the matter, for no one had the temerity to breathe of "three cents" thereafter. Another member of the Southside Improvement Club declared that his locality would get all it asked for in the way of "improvement," because the residents fought for it. This belligerent attitude was warmly welcomed by the members of the other "Improvement" clubs and a general bellicose feeling pervaded the meeting. A Presidio Heights Improvement Club member advocated "a two and one-half cents reduction." He was certain, just as certain as his predecessors, that it would be a good thing for the corporation. Among these gentlemen, who very wisely and very gravely discussed the reduction of the fares to be charged on another man's property, it was generally conceded that in case of reduction the transfer privileges would be abolished by the railway and that two or three fares would be necessary to reach some points in the city. This, it was generally conceded, might work a hardship in some cases and bring the aggregate of street car fares for some unlucky fellows up to seven and one-half cents; but one of the "Improvers" present was equal to this emergency, and confidently declared that he believed this to be a matter which could be arranged with the Railroad Commission, particularly as the "Company had no right, in his mind, to withdraw the privileges it had once granted."

Can the reader as a banker, as a merchant, or as a man following any calling or profession apply this proceeding to his own business? Is it not an exasperating and outrageous movement, kept alive by selfishness and carried on under the miserable subterfuge of Public Welfare? In the East street car fares are uniformly five cents; there are but few—very few—exceptions. We grow sick and tired of such agitations. Of course, a cowardly daily press, with an eye single to the subscription list, encourages the "Improvers," and the cause of righteousness goes merrily along. Next our burglars and housebreakers will organize and dub themselves "Improvement Clubs."

THE PRACTISE OF SUBSTITUTION.

If there is any business in which one must be able to repose a certain confidence in the strict integrity of the proprietor, it is that of the druggist. A potent prescription from the best physician is worse than useless if it is compounded or placed in the hands of an incompetent druggist, for if the ingredients be impure, or if in quantity or quality it be lacking or different in any respect from what was contemplated by the man of medicine who wrote the prescription, then its power to effect the result contemplated is to that extent destroyed. It is a difficult thing to discover and convict a man of deceit, but it is safe to say that a druggist who will perpetrate one fraud will not hesitate to perpetrate another. The crime of "substitution" (morally it is a crime and it should be so legally) prevails to an extent far greater, and with effects more disastrous, than the common run of people imagine. It is a frequent trick among the cheaper class of druggists, if one inquires for a remedy having a reputation extending over years, for the man of pills and powders to attempt to palm off some of his wares as "just as good" or "better" than the one asked for. Even a community of fools would not regard with respect a man who allowed his druggist to substitute for his physician's prescription a mess which he had himself compounded and declared to be "just as good" or "better" than the prescription; and it is just as foolish and just as dangerous to accept from a local druggist, in lieu of some well-established and non-secret remedy, a substitute which he, often falsely, claims "was put up by myself, and I know it is pure." Scattered throughout the country are a number of small institutions known as "manufacturing pharmacies," which trade upon the credulity of the public and the cupidity of the druggist by putting up imitations of standard remedies generally with weak and diluted drugs. These preparations are distributed in different localities, and each bears the name and label of the local druggist, and appears upon its face to be home-made. There is a danger in such preparations, and it should be a fraud to manufacture or sell them.

"The Wave" recently contained an advertisement of a new remedy which contained the statement, "This remedy is not for sale at drug stores." Inquiry developed the fact that the proprietor of the medicine had refused to allow drug stores to handle his preparation because the moment he created a demand therefore by means of advertising, which he was engaged in to the extent of thousands of dollars, the druggist would reap all the advantage and palm off upon the customer some of his own wares which were "just as good" or "better." If one cares to test the strict integrity of his druggist he can find no better method than by trying him on the "substitute" proposition. It will be safe to say that if your druggist attempts to palm off on you some preparation of his own in lieu of that for which you ask, that he will be likely to be a party to a still greater fraud, and it will be well to select as a compounder of your prescriptions a man who will not resort to such cheap imposition. So widely has this practise grown that it has cut into the legitimate business to the extent, probably, of millions of dollars a year. It might be well for the wholesale manufacturers of such remedies to establish joint agencies for the handling of their goods, or they might refuse to sell to druggists who were discovered dealing in "substitutes." If the manufacturers could unite in the latter suggestion it would soon put an end to "substitution."

THE REPUBLICAN PRIMARIES.

The Republicans have just had two primaries, the Burns wing presiding over the first, and the Spreckels interest engineering the second. The Call pronounced the latter affair the "cleanest primary ever held in San Francisco," and announces that professional men who never appear at primaries participated at this, because they knew that a vote against the "inside" would not be thrown away. The Chronicle, on the other hand, tells us that the Spreckels "push" stuffed the ballot-boxes, excluded from the polls citizens who would not accept the Spreckels' slate, and says even the workers are by no means satisfied with the result. The Examiner ascribes the quiet of the primary to a conviction among the voters that all protest against the ticket was ineffective, inasmuch as inspectors and judges had to stand by the men whom the Spreckels interest had indorsed. There was opposition, of course, but the workers were made soon to realize that the enemy was entrenched, besides there was a Central Committee empowered to canvass results in Mr. Spreckels' own headquarters. To quote again from the Chronicle, we are told that in the 39th District 265 votes were cast at one polling-place, within half an hour after the booth opened, which is 8 tickets a minute. But then the Call assures us that prominent citizens in the Western Addition "formed lines at the polling-place and waited their turns to exercise at the fountain of political power the most important privilege of citizenship."

Conflicting statements of this character are somewhat embarrassing to the ordinary reader, who is rather at a loss, in view of disagreement between these organs of public opinion, to decide where he is at. Is it possible that Mr. Spreckels is ruling things with as high a hand as the Examiner and the Chronicle state? Or is it that he is merely demonstrating his "strong character, moral worth, and executive ability," to which the Call alludes so gracefully? "The Wave" is deeply interested in the cause of refrom politics, and devoted much of its space last year to the discussion of various measures whereby the primaries might be purified. Yet, we find it hard to reconcile the expressions of virtue which the Call makes with the fact that the vote on this particular occasion exceeded that which was recorded in San Francisco at the last Gubernatorial election for M. M. Estee. There are many strange things in politics, however. Maybe it is the enthusiasm which Mr. Spreckles's leadership evokes which brought out so large a vote; but even enthusiasm hardly explains the casting of eight votes per minute, as was the case in the Thirty-ninth District. This procedure, we are certain, does not enjoy his countenance, and it is a consolation to believe that the protest of Mr. E. J. Martin, who makes various accusations of fraud, will obtain a hearing and real justice. Mr. Martin declares in the Examiner:

"We made [illegible] Mr. Martin. "Not a single one was allowed. We [illegible] of the number of times certain men voted. Each time they repeated we objected, informing the judges that we were [illegible]. They only laughed at us. We [illegible] This was refused in every instance. I am satisfied that the judges cast votes by the handful and then scratched names off the register at random. At any rate, we have quite a list of citizens who could not vote, because their names have been scratched off. Others who voted at the last election were not allowed to vote because the judges declared that their names were not on the register. This we knew to be false."

Another Republican, Mr. R. P. Hall, declares:

"We were not able to accomplish anything, but we know how many votes, repeaters and all, have been cast and can so get at the extent to which the judges have stuffed the box. Captain Sutton of 323 Twenty-second Street and G. Johnson of 200 Twenty-third Street were not allowed to vote because they refused to tell the judges whether they voted for Estee or Budd. A man named Ryan from Bernal Heights voted seven times to my knowledge. Another repeater voted as 'Daniel M. Cline, 2720 Twentieth Street,' although that street ends at the 500 block. The next man, Sam Elliott, who has lived in the district twenty-three years, was not allowed to vote, the judges declaring that he was not registered. The repeaters sometimes had the grace to change hats or put on different overcoats. That was only once in a while."

We feel sure, however, that Mr. Spreckels's intention is to administer politics with that regard for morality and virtue which the Call ascribes to him. As this journal is presumed to be his own organ, it is qualified to speak accurately on the subject, so we look forward with great interest to the disposition Mr. Spreckels will make of these various protests.

In the meantime, the divergence of opinion among our three great organs of morning opinion is worthy the consideration of citizens and Democrats.

The San Pedro and Santa Monica controversy now stirring up the people of Los Angeles County is hardly understood north of Tehachapi. Up here it is supposed to be a fight between Mr. Huntington, who is said to own all the land about Santa Monica, and Mr. Some-one-else, who owns all the land at San Pedro. This is not so. Mr. Huntington is reported to have large interests adjacent to each place. There are three proposed harbors down on the Southern Coast—one at San Pedro, one near Point Firmin, and another near Santa Monica, known as Port Angeles. Owners of property adjacent to these several proposed ports are all anxious for government appropriations, to secure which they have organized a bitter and very noisy fight. This accounts for the war of words telegraphed to the daily press during the season of flower shows and fiestas. Of course, harbors are not located to serve speculators. Communities are to be benefited and the general public served. Los Angeles, as the metropolis of the South, has a far deeper interest in the proper selection of the Southern harbor of the future than have either the inhabitants of San Pedro, Port Angeles, or Port Firmin. The coastwise trade of Los Angeles proceeds mainly from the North. Passengers from San Francisco, leaving the steamer at Santa Monica, reach Los Angeles and their homes and hotels before the steamer by which they came has even reached San Pedro harbor. Here is a distinct saving of time which is important to Los Angeles. Northbound freight and passenger business has, of course, similar advantages. A large number of the merchants of Los Angeles, who, after all, are to have—or should—a controlling voice in this matter, have already expressed their views strongly in favor of the Port Angeles or Santa Monica harbor. The present heated controversy will probably end in no appropriation by the present Congress for either harbor. Two appropriations are now before that body—one for San Pedro, and the other for Santa Monica. Both will probably die abornin'. And the San Pedro man will learn that it is not wise to bite off your nose to spite your face.

William Waldorf Astor is not yet popular in England, nor has he obtained any serious foothold in London Society. The Countess of Cork, Lady Coventry, and a few similar hostesses, have opened their doors to him, Lady Cork even acting as his social sponsor. But the really great houses, such as those of the Duchesses of Buccleuch, Portland, and Westminster, of the Countess Cowper, etc., are closed to him because the great English nobles strongly resent the advent upon the scene of American multi-millionaires who are possessed of incomes as big as or bigger than their own, with no corresponding obligations. He has quarreled also with many prominent people by evincing oddities of manner and peculiarities which his great fortune cannot excuse.

There are three things that Eleanor Duse cannot abide—fish, Chicago, and the American reporter. Her business manager, on the occasion of her first visit to America, tried in vain to obtain her consent to be interviewed. She absolutely refused, and has adhered to her determination since that time. The face of the great actress does not conform to the popular ideas of beauty; in fact, it is positively plain. Its chief attraction lies in its power of expression, which can only be appreciated when Duse is speaking—especially when speaking the lines of her role.

BANDY CALLAGHAN'S GIRL.

BY FRANK NORRIS.

This story is about a certain street-car conductor named Bandy Callaghan. It all happened because of a Chinaman, who once rode on Bandy's car and in some way managed to cheat him out of five dollars. Bandy had to make good the amount at the "Old Man's" office, but he remembered that his Chinaman was marked with leprosy in a peculiar way, and so filled a piece of rubber hose with sand and hid it in the lamp-box against the possibility of meeting him again.

Some time after this Bandy got the receiver of his bell-punch plugged with punch-wads, and took it down to a gunsmith's on Kearny Street not far from the old Plaza to have it cleaned. As he could not call for it until he was off duty, about midnight, he arranged to have the gunsmith leave it at a neighboring saloon. When it was finished Bandy called for it there and started home, taking a short cut through Chinatown. According to his system of reckoning it was 12:27, for, if you will notice, a conductor always tells you the time with great exactness as to the minutes.

On the corner of Washington and Dupont, under a lamp-post, he caromed against a Chinese with traces of leprosy across his nose and eyes like a pair of spectacles. Bandy grabbed him at once by the slack of his blouse.

"Gi' me my five dollars," he said, breathing through his nose. "I knew I'd find you again some day."

The Chinaman wrenched back from him and his lip drew tight across his teeth.

"Wha's mäar 'you?" he snarled. "I no sabe you. Wha's you want, you?"

"I want my five dollars," answered Bandy, taking a fresh hold, "an' I want it quick."

"Wha's mäar 'you?" repeated the other angrily, "I no sabe you fi' dollar. Wha's mäar 'you?" and he called Bandy a bad name which is the first English expression that a Chinaman learns. Bandy had his arm crooked to strike, when the coolie slipped away from him like a lizard and fled up Dupont Street toward Jackson; Bandy reached after him, missed him, and then gave chase.

Now, it is not good to try to run down a Chinaman in Chinatown at night, and none but a detective who has made the quarter a study would ever attempt it. In the first place you are not likely to catch your man, and in the second you are very likely to get into trouble. Bandy, because he did not know the rules of the game in Chinatown and because he was very close to the thief and because he was bent upon getting back his five dollars, closed in upon the coolie's tracks, followed around the corner of Jackson Street, and as he dodged down a miserable alley a few doors above Dupont, turned in after him, scarcely three yards behind.

Bandy's man dived into a door that looked like the entrance to a tan-room and slammed it behind him, but Bandy's foot was already between the door and the jamb, he flung the door open again and continued the pursuit down the corridor that ended at the head of a long flight of narrow stairs leading down into inky obscurity. It seemed like wilful self-destruction to go on now, but five dollars are five dollars when you get them by hourly instalments of twenty-two cents, and besides Bandy was so close to the fleeing coolie that he thought to overtake him at every step.

More stairways and galleries, passageways so low that Bandy had to bow his head to proceed, so narrow that at times he was obliged to advance sideways. Then he paused, panting for breath in the fetid reek of the underground atmosphere. He had lost his coolie, and now was lost himself.

Then all in a moment he grew thoroughly frightened and desperate; he plunged back through the maze of passages that were like tunnels in a mine, with his arms outstretched and with the readiness to fight a death-fight with any one who opposed him. In the darkness he stumbled down a pair of steps and fell against a green-painted door, with an iron-latticed hole near its top. The door was unfastened, and yielded as he struck it. He pitched forward into a very small and dimly lighted room, but sprang up in an instant looking about, his teeth and fists shut tight.

The room was a little larger than an ocean-liner's stateroom, and like a stateroom was surrounded on three sides by tiers of bunks. Besides these, there were two mattresses on the floor, and on a very low teak-wood table in the middle of the room were an American student's lamp, with a green shade, and a tray full of pipes. The whole place was full of a pungent blue haze of smoke. There were three Chinamen asleep in as many of the bunks, and on one of the mattresses a fourth was "coiled," half stupefied and lazily smoking. Bandy had stumbled into an opium den in full blast.

The sleepers awoke and bundled themselves out upon the floor, and he on the mattress reached out for the lamp. Bandy kicked his hand away and drew the lamp toward him. They all crowded together in one corner, blinking and chattering; one of them cried out to him and said: "You no take-um lock-up; find-um boss, take-um boss, we no sabe, you go find boss, all same take-um boss."

Bandy was puzzled; they evidently thought that this was a raid, and that he was a policeman, but why? Ah! exactly, he knew now; his conductor's uniform with its blue cloth and brass buttons; he was thinking very fast and felt that he must act on every thought; he could not afford to hesitate, letting them have time to discover their mistake, he was sure that he was master of the situation and his fear and excitement began to subside.

"Here you," he said, addressing the one that spoke, "I want you, come outside into the street with me, go on first and I'll follow you." He had thought by this means to regain the street without letting them know that he was lost and was about to follow the coolie, who had gone out before him, when he stopped short with an exclamation.

His first thought had been that it was another Chinaman, too far gone to wake up with the others. His next, (induced by the sight of a quantity of black hair tumbled about upon the pillow) was that a Chinese woman had found her way to the den and lay there on the mattress drugged and inert. But now the figure stirred, breathed heavily, and threw a bare arm free of the blankets. Bandy shrank back with an oath as he saw that the arm was white.

The horror and cruelty of the thing for a moment turned him cold, and then all his excitement came over him again like a hot wave. He was persuaded the coolies were afraid of him. "Here's what I wanted," he cried; "come back here. This girl's got to go out with me."

They were silent for a moment and then they all rushed together, chattering angrily and stood between him and the door. Without knowing how it had been done, Bandy found that he had wrapped the girl in the blankets. Now he stood and faced them, with one arm supporting her as she leaned limply against him.

Bandy was a young man of limited education and highly colored imagination, apt to take things that happened to him as though they were the scenes of a drama in which he was at once the actor, the author, and the audience. Through all his hurry and excitement he found occasion to appreciate the drama of the present situation and felt heroic at once. It stood him in good stead. He was unwilling to back down now lest it should destroy the effect. With a quickness of eye that was born of the occasion he saw one of the coolies groping toward something on the ground near his feet. Looking down he saw that it was his nickel-plated bell-punch, fallen from his pocket during the moment he was upon the floor, at the same time he knew that the coolie had mistaken it for something else; he did not undeceive him but snatched it up and aimed it at them, shouting:

"It's a forty-eight and it's loaded to the muzzle, damn you all, stand out of the way." They fell back before him and he blundered out into the narrow passage carrying the girl with him.

Behind him he heard the sound of a shrill whistle, and shriller voices calling to each other up and down the tortuous stairways. He went on through the foul murk in a frenzy of excitement speaking all his thoughts aloud, as was his custom when aroused, ignorant of where he was going, and possessed of only one desire—to get above ground again and breathe the clear night air.

And then all his courage and resolution suddenly dwindled away and left him cold and shaking with fear. He knew that he was only a car conductor after all, and had neither the blind recklessness of the tough nor the reasoned obstinacy of the thoroughbred. With every minute of continued suspense he began to think less of the girl and more of himself. The idea of being set upon by Chinamen in that narrow tunnel, like a rat in its hole, filled him with terror, and he raised his voice in a quavering shout for help. He paused a moment and listened; a rising clamor in the gloom behind him prolonged the echo of his cry, while in front of him he heard the noise of feet descending a flight of invisible stairs. It seemed as though he were trapped. The strain of waiting there in the dark for the blow to fall was more than he was made to bear, so letting the girl slip from his grasp, he started forward with another shout and ran with outstretched arms against the blue-coated figure of a policeman upon the stairs in front of him.

At sight of the white face and at sound of the bass voice growling, "What was the matter down here this time," Bandy's nerves snapped like a tense harp string, and he burst into weak tears, partly of pure nervousness, partly of joy at his release, partly of shame at his own cowardice, and partly because he had not been able to sustain the heroic role he had assumed.

Five minutes later he was much calmer, and in company with the girl, who was still unconscious, was being driven to the precinct station house in the patrol wagon.

* * * * * * *

Bandy had a "girl" whose name was Miss McCleaverty, and who ran the soda water fountain in a candy store on Polk Street. Miss McCleaverty wore very blonde hair, and imitation aligator skin belts. She exhaled alternate odors of sachet and chocolate caramels, and she knew how to play "My Lady's Bower" and "The Liberty Bell March" on the piano. Bandy thought her radiantly beautiful and divinely gifted.

The next time that Bandy went to see Miss McCleaverty, he told her all about it and was puzzled at her lack of enthusiasm and interest in the matter. She did not seem to care much about the thrilling details, and spoke carelessly of the girl as "this woman," which made him wince. But he finally got her promise to go with him and see the girl at the "Home."

At the "Home" it was quite different, however. As soon as she saw the forlorn little creature, Miss McCleaverty warmed toward her in a way that filled Bandy's simple heart with joy. She sat with her arm around her a long time, got her to talk a little, and left her with the assurance that she would come and see her again as soon as she could.

By the time Bandy saw Miss McCleaverty again she had been out to the "Home" twice, and had found out more about the Girl. "I guess she's Mexican-Spanish," she said to Bandy, "'n it ain't altogether her fault that she's what she is; of course she won't tell me everything, but she's got people in San Diego; 'n there was a fellow—I don't know—'n they ran away together, 'n he didn't do right by her. He left her after awhile, 'n then, well, she met a woman, 'n you know she's awfully young 'n ain't onto herself a little bit, 'n the woman did worse by her than the fellow, 'n she just went all to pieces. But you just bet I'm going to stand right by her 'n get her back to her folks, all right, all right."

"You didn't seem to be stuck on her much at first," observed Bandy.

"Well, I know," assented Miss McCleaverty, vaguely. "But she ain't got a friend in the whole city, 'n she ain't a bit bad, just kinda weak 'n inexperienced, you know. She's just awfully sorry about everything, 'n I mean to help her get set straight again. I tell you what," she went on, "that Home ain't a very nice place for her, b'cause she ain't one of that kind. My aunt was in the store yesterday, 'n I told her all about it, 'n she felt just as I did. She's going to let her come to stay with her until we get word from her folks. She lives way out on Geary Street, you know; she's all alone, 'n it's kinda lonesome like, anyhow."

"Well, say, that's pretty nice," said Bandy, "and it's just awfully good of you. Say, did she ever say anything about me?"

"No," answered Miss McCleaverty. "I guess she's got too many other things to think about."

"She's mighty pretty, don't you think?"

Miss McCleaverty shifted her gum to the other side of her mouth. "I wouldn't call her pretty at all," she responded.

Some time after this Bandy awoke to the fact that he had been visiting at the house on Geary Street as often as he could, and that after one of these visits he spent most of his time in looking forward to the next one. There was little enough that he had in common with the Girl, and heaven knows what they talked about. He thought that he had liked Miss McCleaverty more than any one else, but now he began to see that he had never known what it really meant to care for some one.

"This must be what it is," he said, "when people fall in love."

He felt mortified, too, over the fact that he was unfaithful to Miss McCleaverty, who had been so kind to him.

"She ain't done anything," he observed, to himself, "but I just can't help it."

It came to be tacitly felt between himself and the Girl that Miss McCleaverty should know nothing of his visits, and this mutual understanding seemed in a way to draw them closer together. He began to perceive as well that the Girl was commencing to care for him, but this troubled him as much as it rejoiced him, for he felt that they were not fated for each other, and that no good could come of it all. Meanwhile Miss McCleaverty saw nothing, but continued to do all that she could for her. After a while she succeeded in getting her to tell her all about her parents and had written to them at San Diego; but Bandy could scarcely bear to look Miss McCleaverty in the face.

How the Girl had come into the opium den underneath the tan-shop in St. Louis Place Bandy never knew. It was more than likely she did not know herself, though he was sure she had not been there often. They never spoke of that night between themselves, and Bandy often wondered if she knew what part he had taken in the business.

The house, which was the Girl's temporary home, was far out on Geary Street, and close under Lone Mountain. Late one afternoon, when their acquaintance was three weeks old, Bandy went out there again as he had done so many times already. As he rang the bell, a woman in the adjoining house, who was watering some geraniums at her open window, called to him, saying:

"Mrs. Flint (this was Miss McCleaverty's aunt) told me as how I was to tell you if you called, that she had gone out and wouldn't be home till late this evening, but the young lady's at home; I guess you can walk right in."

The house was a small one and all on one floor, and Bandy shut the front door sharply behind him, so that the noise might announce his coming. He went into the little front sitting-room and moved about uncertainly, waiting till the Girl should come in. The house was so small that she could not help hearing him. He waited some few minutes, touching the keys of the cheap piano and whistling softly. Then, after a few moments' hesitation, he returned to the entry and called. There was no answer, and he turned back to the sitting-room, assured that she was not in the house. But the next moment he was persuaded of the improbability of this; she never went out under any circumstances, having an unreasonable dread of being seen abroad. Yet in the bare possibility of her having stirred out of doors for once, he sat down and waited for upwards of half an hour.

At the end of this time he jumped up impatiently; it was growing dark, and he was positive she would not have stayed out so long, even if she had gone out at all.

"Can't be," he muttered; "she must be at home." For a second time he went out into the hall and called loud and long, with only latent echoes for response. Her room was at the end of the hall and he could see her door from where he stood. He went up to it and knocked, and then, receiving no answer, tried the knob. The door was locked. "This is getting queerer and queerer," he said, but he was uneasy as he spoke the words. As he turned away perplexed and hesitating, the noise of running water caught his ear; it came from within the room, and was as the noise of water running from the faucet of a stationary wash-stand. Not knowing what to think, he took a couple of turns up and down the hallway, his hands thrust deep in his pockets and his eyebrows knotted in a puzzled frown. The noise of the trickling stream followed him back and forth. It was the only sound throughout the house. "It sounds leery," he said to himself.

Returning to the door, he pulled out his bunch of keys from his pocket and tried one of them in the lock, and drew back in astonishment. The key was on the inside.

"This is funny, too," he muttered, more and more uneasy. "There's no other way out of the room, and how could any one go off and leave that water running, and lock the door from the inside."

He started up suddenly and looked about him, bewildered and excited, drawing his breath quickly.

"Say, there's something wrong; I've got to get into that room."

He worried the key in the door loose with the butt of his pencil, and pushed it till it fell from the lock on the inside of the room. Before he tried again to fit one of his own keys to the lock, he bent down and peered through the keyhole. Then, as he did so, his heart jumped to his throat with a great bound, and stuck there quivering, and he sprang up, beating his hands together, crying out again and again. He had seen nothing in the room, but through the narrow vent of the keyhole was streaming a strangling odor of escaping gas.

For a moment in a frenzy of alarm and excitement he ran back in the front of the house, biting at the ends of his fingers and talking aloud to himself. A pair of disused Indian-clubs stood in one corner of the sitting-room. He caught up one of these and running back to the room splintered the door into long fragments in half a dozen blows.

Inside it was like breathing a vaporous brass, the poisoned air closed around him, and filled his lungs and breast and throat till it seemed as though he must suffocate before he could even reach the window on the other side of the room. It was partly open; he flung it higher still, and turned to the interior of the room. But though there was evidence that she had been there but recently, it was now empty.

He shut off the water and the escaping gas, and sat down on the window edge, bewildered, and gasping for air. Where could the girl have gone? What was the meaning of it all? He glanced around the room for an explanation. His eyes rested on a little table at the bed-side and on it he saw something that explained it all: a little silver pipe and a half-empty package of unboiled opium. That was it, then: unwittingly, she had contracted the dreadful habit, had struggled against it, no doubt, since her rescue, and had succumbed to it at last, had turned on the gas, perhaps accidentally, in the course of her stupor, perhaps with design in a moment of remorse and grief and conscious helplessness, and then drugged by the poisonous fumes and equally poisonous smoke had wandered away into the night. How? Through the window. It was not four feet above the level of the ground; and swinging himself out Bandy saw the print of her feet in the soil.

And where now had she gone? What might not happen to her in her helpless condition?

Lone Mountain is one of the most conspicuous landmarks in the city, because it rises very abruptly and very steeply from the surrounding streets and because there are no other hills or tall buildings near by to obscure it. Being thus steep and abrupt there are no houses upon it and no streets, nothing but goat-paths and scrubby brushes, all covered with the red dust of the streets which the trade-winds blow there. There is a great wooden cross upon the top. It was a pretty idea to place it there, because you may see the mountain from almost anywhere in the city, and the cross upon it stands there in its simple isolation, sometimes clear-cut and black against the sun going redly down through the Golden Gate, sometimes blurred and indistinct in the rains and in the fogs, or sometimes silvery with great black shadows in the moon-light; but always there, looking far out over the city, its great arms stretched wide as though in protection and benison.

The house stood at the very foot of the mountain, and Bandy had not taken half a dozen steps into the night—for it was quite dark by this time—before he felt the slope rise under his feet.

By a sudden unreasoned instinct he knew where the Girl had gone, and ran scrambling and panting up the side and paused on the summit.

Below him, the city shrank away and spread out like an unrolled scroll, a blue-gray mass, pierced with many chimney-stacks, that were like the pipes of a great organ, on the unseen keys of which were forever sounded all the notes in the gamut of human happiness and human misery, that united in a single minor chord and rolled upward day and night toward the great and moveless cross with its outstretched arms.

The Girl was lying in the shadow of the cross, her hands reaching toward it and spread out before her, and her face bowed upon the ground. She must have died where she had fallen.

Bandy saw her as she lay thus, far above the turmoil and dirt of the city's streets and in a better air—one that was purer and calmer. She seemed, as she lay, to be quieter and more content than ever before. Above her towered the great cross with its outstretched arms of protection and benison.

Bandy told this story to me some time afterward, when its impressiveness had worn off and he could bear to talk about it. When he had finished telling it, he extended his remarks in comment:

"I don't know," he said, reflectively, "I thought a good deal of that girl at the time, and I guess I made an awful fool of myself over her. And when she died, oh, you don't know—it hurt. I tell you it hurt bad. I thought that I just naturally never would get over it. But I did get over it you see. Oh yes, I got over it, but just the same there is always something—when I think of it, somehow it makes my throat ache. It's funny, ain't it?"

"But," said I, "where do you come in? What was there in it for you? What have you got left out of it?"

"Oh!" answered Bandy, "I got Miss McCleaverty."

SAN FRANCISCO, May 30, 1894.

ARBORICIDE.

LOUISE IMOGEN GUINEY.

A word of grief to me erewhile:
We have cut the oak down in our isle.

And I said: "Ye have bereaven
The song-thrush and the bee,
And the fisher-boy at sea
Of his sea-mark in the even;
And gourds of cooling shade, to lie
Within the sickle's sound;
And the old sheep-dog's saffron eye
Of sleep on duty's ground;
And poets of their tent
And quiet tenement.
Ah, impious! who so paid
Such fatherhood, and made
Of murmurous immortality a cargo and a trade."

For a hewn oak a century fair,
A wound in earth, and ache in air.

And I said: "No pillared height
With a summer dais over,
Where a dryad fled her lover
Through the long arcade of light;
Nor 'neath Arcturus rolleth more,
Since the loud leaves are gone,
Between the shorn cliff and the shore,
Pan's organ antiphon.
'Twas nameless envy fed
This blow at grandeur's head.
Some green reproach o'erdue,
Degenerate men! ye drew
That for his too plain heavenliness our Socrates ye slew."

—The Century.

THE SPRING ART EXHIBIT.

CALIFORNIA PAINTERS AT THEIR BEST AND WORST.

There are a surprisingly large number of good pictures at the Spring Art Exhibit at the Hopkins' Institute this month. Between the exhibit of to-day and those of say a half a dozen years ago, there is a great gulf fixed. The older artists are just as strong as ever, and there are a lot of new men who are doing really excellent work.

One of the best portraits in the exhibit, and the one that will probably attract a great deal of attention, is Peixotto's portrait of Horace Platt, painted for the Bohemian Club. It is a piece of sober, conscientious work, devoid of any cheap and sensational striving after effect—an admirable likeness, well drawn, well posed, well colored. The other portrait by the same artist is a capital full length study in dull yellows, while a third clever bit of work, in an entirely different color note, is a Dutch landscape in subdued grays and browns. It is a little thing, but done in a masterly way.

Mr. Stanton shows an admirable picture over the title, "The Evening of Life." An old peasant woman seated near a cross, knitting, her herd of sheep grazing near at hand. The time of day is late evening. The whole tone of the picture is in half shadow except where the reflection of the afterglow touches the top of the cross and the backs of one or two of the sheep. The main herd of the sheep, handled as one mass of confused shade, is one of the cleverest effects I have seen in some time. The picture is full of a fine quiet sentiment not overdone. Its style, and especially its coloring, are French in the extreme.

Keith is as powerful as ever, particularly in the canvas, "April Showers," a wild, fresh sweep of wind and rain and watery sunlight, suggestive of Turner. It seems to have been painted almost at one sitting, with huge brushes and large palette knives. It is breezy, fresh, exhilarating. Mr. Keith has two very distinct styles of treatment: one, as in the case of "April Showers," that suggests Turner, and the other in the school of Daubigny. The picture that hangs immediately opposite "April Showers," framed in black and lacking a title, is in the latter style, full of strong contrasts of black and green, a little spot of blue sky showing down a vista between the trees, serving as a focus to the color scheme.

Mr. Latimer shows evidence of the influence of Keith in a charming little water color entitled (unfortunately) "Dawn." I say unfortunately, since the early morning effect does not seem to be prominent enough to justify such a title.

Mr. Yelland's "Departing Day" strikes the observer as a less successful effort. The hills in the distance are almost too purple for the bright greens in the foreground. The picture is so composed that there is little or no middle distance where a gradation of color might have been effected.

Mr. Matthews' "Pandora" is a striking composition. Pandora herself in strong values in the midst of the picture, kneeling before the box, while all around are posed certain indistinct shapes and weird, uncertain figures seen in a half light. Besides "Pandora" Mr. Matthews has a large canvas in competition for the Phelan prize. The composition strikes you as a bit unbalanced, but the color is admirable and the scene full of spirit. I should pick this canvas as the winner, Mr. Keith's picture being little more than a fine landscape, while the other entries for the competition are very inferior.

One of the best landscapes on the walls is apt to be overlooked on account of its diminutive size. This is a mere sketch entitled "Landscape Number Two," by Pissis, an effect of cold greens and grays relieved by two spots of red color in the costumes of a couple of figures in the foreground. This, too, is French in its style: the French style of the early part of the century.

Ed. de Saisset's two contributions are well hung and are sure to be noticed. Of the two I vastly prefer the portrait, which is a strong bit of color and handling. The other, "A Study of a Back," pleases me less. The flesh tones are admirable and the general color good; but the drawing seems to be out, especially the line of the back from the shoulder down.

There is a mention-honorable by Jules Pages, an interior in a factory of Montmartre, that is conspicuously hung and is a strong, masterful effort. The color is rich and the handling broad and sketchy. The drawing of the single figure is exceptionally good.

It is almost unfair to the local artists that Verestchagin's enormous canvas representing the execution of the Sepoys should be hung in the same exhibition. Of course, this picture is well-known in San Francisco and needs no notice here, but one returns to it again and again with an interest that never flags and an admiration that never loses its freshness. Here is one of the great world artists, the master himself, and of necessity the other little canvases that surround it must suffer and shrink and dwindle in comparison.

You go away from this picture wondering how any one who can paint at all could be content to sit down and paint landscapes or portraits or marines, even when excellently well done, while such tremendous subjects as these can be treated through the same medium of colored earths and linseed oil.

The difficulty of the Italian position will be appreciated by a glance at the map. Adowa, where the defeat of the first of March occurred, is southwest of Massowah. It constitutes the southern apex of a triangle, of which a line drawn from Massowah westward to Kassala forms the base. The garrison at Kassala was too far distant to support the Italian army confronting Menelek north of Adowa; and it was equally impossible to send troops to its relief. The dervishes moving south and east from Kassala, and co operating with the Abyssinians moving north from Adown, would be able completely to envelop the Italian army. In this desperate situation, Italy had no choice save to abandon the struggle or undergo a worse disaster than that at Adowa.

The question "Are Unitarianism and Judaism Identical?" has recently been discussed by Rabbi M. H. Harris and by the American Hebrew. The answer is in the negative.

A KING OF FORGERS.

THE STORY OF A CRIMINAL WHO STEALS MILLIONS WITH IMPUNITY.

As the romances of life transcend the imaginings of fiction, so is the veritable "Jim the Penman" greater than his dramatic prototype. Whether he be Jim, Jessamy, or John hardly concerns this story, for his identity is as mysterious as his influence is potent.

Within the past ten years there have been perpetrated on the banks of the United States and England forgeries to the amount of about a million and a half dollars. So cleverly have these crimes been executed, that, in most instances, the thieves escaped detection. Where the police were clever enough to capture the individual who, like Dean or McCloskey, had made off with the money, they found their man but the tool of a higher power—not the counterfeiter himself, merely his agent, his emissary. There exists now the record of a long series of these forgeries, identical in one particular, that they are made on what is called "safety paper." In every instance the precautions of the financial profession have been eluded; the impossible, as in the case of the Nevada Bank draft, apparently achieved. Examining the separate events in their efforts to diagnose the criminal, the theory has been evolved that behind them all is a single individual. There is much evidence to support the assumption in the manner of procedure which the perpetrators have generally followed. A well-defined plan of operation has been pursued, as in Dean's case; the record shows no sign of haphazard expedient or hasty subterfuge. Behind every move is the plan, and though agent or details fail, the perpetrator is not revealed. Indeed, it is questionable if the emissary knows or is known to his principal.

The scheme of action in forgery comprehends three men who in the parlance of their profession are known as the "scratch," the "middle-man," and the "layer-down." The scratch prepares the document—that is, forges the signature or makes the draft which the layer-down has procured. But both draft and information are communicated through a third party, the middle-man. The spoils are divided on the basis that forty per cent belongs to the first while the sixty per cent is divided between the layer-down and the middle-man; the latter, besides being the medium of communication, supplies the "roll," which, in the vernacular, means the three or four thousand dollars which the layer-down places to his credit in the bank marked for spoilation. Of course the risk of detection is altogether borne by the layer-down, which was Dean's role in the late crime, for he alone establishes an identity. He becomes known to a number of people and to be secure from capture must go far afield. Of course when arrested he may inform on his accomplice, but in most instances the police have not persuaded their captive into compromising his friends, who, while in jail, supply him with luxuries and take care of his future on release. Twice have middle-men been arrested but all efforts to wring the great secret out proved unsuccessful. They have told nothing.

The specific instance of Dean's brilliant performance enables one to form the impression of the gang's arrangements. Dean established an office in the Chronicle building and made a deposit in the Nevada Bank. Then he laid his plan of operation by going to Chico, where he entered into business relations with the bank. Procuring a draft in exchange for currency, he passed it on to his middle-man who turned the paper over to the "scratch." It proved unavailable, for across its face was stamped the legend, "under one hundred dollars" in red ink. So the layer-down was dispatched then to Woodland; by some occult means he acquired the information about the account of that bank with the Crocker concern, and in accordance therewith he acted; his next draft was prepared on safety paper, the amount properly punched on top. Just how long the scratch required to convert this harmless document into an order for $22,000 I don't remember, but considering the importance and delicacy of the manipulation it could hardly have been executed in a day. When deposited at the Nevada Bank and credited to Dean's account there was nothing to distinguish it from regular paper and that is how the fraud was so easily accomplished. Though this same operator never works on any other than this chemically prepared, water-marked paper, it is a fiction among bankers that its surface cannot be changed without detection. Indeed there is a standing reward of $1000 offered for whosoever shall prove the contrary.

The mysterious forger looms up then as a personality unique among criminals. Apparently secured from detection by the complications of his own schemes, he preys upon bankers and financiers, drawing princely revenues from their coffers. Who can guess what he may pose as—which honored guest at club or hotel is this prince of "scratches." Think of the vast resources and immense ability, of the mere mechanical knowledge this man must exercise in his nefarious profession. The altering of water-marks, the substitution of figures, the manipulation of the surface require that he be, first an expert chemist, then a practised steel engraver; he must know as much about paper as a manufacturer; in order to have filled up the punch holes and fitted into their interstices the substitute, demands a dexterity of touch and an inventive talent that might have made him an Edison. Consider also the type of man who for ten years past has practised his frauds through the agency of scores of accomplices and yet has never had his confidence abused. He has selected accessories with so much judgment, with such rare discrimination that they have faced imprisonment rather than reveal his identity. Oh, for a Sherlock Holmes to discover so adroit a villain, though one may fancy even the greatest detectives of fiction helpless before such a talent. There is but one hope of this man's capture; it hangs on the chances of a misstep. Doubtless he will keep up his frauds until some miscalculation exposes him in the act of their manipulation. He may be the victim of some prying eye, or his judgment of men may err but for once. Then will the king fall for all his millions. Reflections on the personality of the man are of but little avail, for he is safe as long as his tools are true. It is interesting to remember, however, that we must have had him among us here in San Francisco during Dean's stay; in some room or home he prepared the draft by which the bank was looted. Remember he could hardly have accomplished his manipulation of ink and paper without instruments, a press of some kind, chemicals undoubtedly. Then how, where, when was it done? But there are scores of such questions, unanswerable, apparently.

The manner of Dean's escape and capture must exhibit to his great chief that the plan of operations he has thus far favored must be changed. Details of the scheme whereby the fraud was accomplished were wired to banks throughout the United States, and the forger was deceived into security by the suspicion which the police so loudly announced that he had fled to China. Of course, they knew he had gone East. Private descriptions of his appearance were furnished every detective in the country, and the nets were drawn for the culprit to show his head. So when Mr. Dean attempted the same procedure in Minneapolis so soon after his success in San Francisco, the program was recognized at once and the rascal arrested. Subsequent proceedings are of public knowledge, and undoubtedly Dean will pay for his temerity by a long term in the penitentiary.

ETC., JR.

"IN SEARCH OF QUIET."

AND SEVERAL OTHER NEW BOOKS.

"And to think that I left that for the last, just because I didn't happen to fancy the title; or to see through it, rather." And the man of letters closed the book with respectful fingers.

"Walter Frith's In Search of Quiet? I told you it was lovely," said his wife.

"It is more than that," answered the man of letters. "Someway, I took it into my head that it was probably about a broken-down clergyman, with thoughts for sermons, and parish visits, and a call to Saint Lucre's at the end. Quiet, you know; doesn't it sort of suggest all that?"

"Nonsense," said his wife. "I think the name just suits it."

"So it does, after you have read the book," he answered. "Still, it was a rash one to offer this restless generation."

"I think half the charm lies in the author's personality," she said. "He is so dear and kindly and good, without being in the least priggish. I liked him all the better for doing Tommy's Latin verses for him, and putting in a mistake so that 'Dicky' wouldn't 'twig.'"

"Once or twice I thought he was going to fall in love with Fanny," said the man of letters. "He didn't though, and I'm glad of it."

"Don't you think there might have been some previous love affair," she said. "A young man doesn't give up London and Society for a little country village merely in search of quiet. Writing the law book was only a pretext."

"Oh, I don't think so. There's nothing bitter or blighted about him," answered the man of letters. "His cynicism is only a humorous way of telling the truth; and he knows a lot about that. It is so good, what he says about the young author who nearly spoils Fanny's life:

"'Banquier is the modern literary aspirant, and for him your simple, manly, British flirting isn't enough. Jaded as an actor, he demands passion, tears, remorse. He desires to take the trusting female heart, and give it such a squeeze, such a wrench, that the poor soul can't breathe, and is ever after subject to fainting fits. In a word, I mistrust the modern literary affections. Ever since Goethe set the fashion, these little fellows, his spawn, think of nothing but their miscalled development, at whatever cost. . . . Why, the Banquiers of this world—and how many of them there are!—look on life as merely one large field for copy, literary material. Give us this day our daily copy! is almost the only prayer they are capable of.'"

"Banquier was a selfish beast," she said.

"Well, it seemed to me that Fanny was very easy game," he answered. "A man has always a right to go as far as a girl will let him, and she seems to have raised no barriers."

"Public opinion may give him that right, but no respectable authority does," she answered, hotly. "It is equivalent to saying that if a man leaves his door open, any passer by has a right to go in and walk off with his furniture. Fanny didn't know much, but the right sort of a man would have defended her from herself as well as from him."

"One in a thousand would," he said dubiously. "The 'I' who writes the story, for instance. But the world is as it is, not as it ought to be. It doesn't do to have too many illusions about the men in it. Don't you know what he says about the brave soldier, who had his V. C. painted on all his luggage, 'even on his hat box'? Your ideal brave soldier never would have done that. He says here what an essay might be written on:

"'The weaknesses and trivialities of great and noble minds. Just think of the childish bragging of Wolfe; the restless, girlish vanity of Nelson; the posing and underbred self-consciousness of Byron. I sometimes think great men are something like great cities—they are apt to have terrible slums.'"

"Yes, it is all true," she admitted, "but I hate to acknowledge it. I should like to keep a hero or two intact."

"There are some splendid little touches in this," he went on, turning over the leaves. "Here where he speaks of the name Sophia—'Sophia! There's a wall-flowery, old-fashioned sort of Jane-Austen-Cranford name for you!' And he talks about an old house—'left absolutely high and dry above the picturesque damp of estheticism.' Isn't that good? Esthetic always suggests green mould to me, though I never realized it before."

"I liked his description of a woman as having a gentle, serious, stained-glass expression," she said. "It doesn't seem like a first book, yet there is no 'author of' on the title page."

"And some writers whose title pages are half filled with the things they're author of never seem anything but inexperienced and amateurish," the man of letters said. "Robert Barr has written several successful books, yet this last, A Woman Intervenes, suggests all through the literary amateur. He doesn't handle his materials in a professional manner."

"That is an original idea, sending a woman reporter to work a secret out of a man, and having her fall in love with him," she said. "Jennie's attitude toward her newspaper work is very good."

"In spite of her prettiness, I don't see how she and Wentworth ever fell in love with one another after those first conversations of theirs," he said. "Here's a specimen: the Englishman is glad to see her, for he felt 'just a trifle lonely.'

"'Just a trifle! Well, that is flattery. How nicely you English do turn a compliment. Just a trifle!'

"'I believe, as a race, we do not venture much into compliment making at all. We leave that for the polite foreigner. He would say what I tried to say a great deal better than I did, of course, but he would not mean half so much.'

"'Oh, that's very nice, Mr. Wentworth. No foreigner could have put it nearly so well. Now, what about going on deck?'"

"'Anywhere, if you will let me accompany you.'

"'I shall be most delighted to have you. I won't say merely a trifle delighted.'

"'Ah! Havèn't you forgiven that remark yet?'

"'There is nothing to forgive, and it is quite too delicious to forget. I shall never forget it.'

"'I believe you are very cruel at heart, Miss Brewster.'"

"I may not understand the gentle art of talking with a girl, but if I'd been in any way to blame for a conversation like that, I'd have kicked myself overboard and spoiled the story."

"It's horribly inane," she admitted. "I never could quite see how Jennie always accomplished her ends so quickly."

"I suppose she used her femininity to good purpose," he said. "Of course we wouldn't feel the force of that. By the way, she isn't the woman who intervenes, is she?"

"No, that is Edith, who saves the mine with her money," she answered. "That was one thing I didn't like, dividing the heroineship between the two. Wouldn't you know a man had created them? Imagine picturing a girl as a successful reporter of unlimited audacity, and letting her keep the power to blush! It can't be done."

"The character drawing isn't masterly, but the book has plenty of action and go, and it carries you along," he said. "I had cold chills all over me when it struck quarter of twelve, and the mine would be lost if the money didn't come before noon."

"But of course it came. You knew it would," she said. "That thirteen minutes, twelve minutes, eleven minutes' business had been used so often. Any way, I never could like a book that said a girl was 'natty,' in a tone of scorn."

The man of letters laughed.

"That is a broad basis of criticism," he said. "How did you like The Broom-Squire?"

"S. Baring-Gould? Well, it isn't a book to like, you know," she said, slowly. "It is strong and interesting, but it ought to be printed with black borders; it's all gloom and misery and wandering about at night with a poor little dying baby."

"Did it harrow you?"

"No, because it happened a hundred years ago, and suffering never seems to matter so much when you know that the sufferers have all been dead and buried for years. It hasn't the same human interest, especially when it is an utterly different class of life."

"It's low life, isn't it?"

"Yes. I don't see how any one could be so thoroughly vile and malignant as the Broom-Squire. Mehetabel is a fine woman, but she hasn't a very distinct personality."

"Character is shown in the great moments, personality in the little," said the man of letters.

"And all her moments are great ones," said his wife. "She is always shown under stress of some strong feeling. If you ever saw her in a happy mood, or just talking to another girl about nothing in particular, you would get a much more vivid impression of what she was like. You'd see her little self, by which she was known among the neighbors, as well as her unhappy, loving big self. At all events, it is a genuine book, very much in earnest, and that is a comfort when we are being bombarded with miserable little sham novels by people like John Strange Winter. Bootle's Baby was a good story when it came out, whatever it is now, and just because it succeeded, we have to bear yearly inflictions of trash like this I Married a Wife."

"If Shakespeare had lived and read novels in this age, he'd never have asked what's in a name," said the man of letters.

"Not if he understood the publishing business," his wife added. "I wish John Strange Winter's men wouldn't always address each other as 'old man' and 'lucky chap.' She seems to think that is as much an attribute of manhood as a mustache. The stage pathos about the children of the poor and the mock charity talk made me furious."

"There is no real life in it, no story, and no humor," he said. "Those are the only three things I know that will carry a poor book."

"It probably goes on its brass buttons," she said. "That officer between two swords on the cover will probably take in any number of people. I do despise cheap work like that, run off by the yard, with the ten per cent on the retail price as its only excuse for existing."

"Oh, it isn't worth talking about," said the man of letters.

J. W. T.

THINGS AND PEOPLE

SO AN EXPERT on insanity has had the boldness to deny the existence of love at first sight. What would Dr. Allen Fitch say to the experience of Gavin D. High who, by last accounts, is manager of the Oakland Times. Some years ago, High, who was then reporting on Mr. Bunker's Report, conceived the desire for travel, and was employed by General Passenger Agent Goodman as the Advance Agent of "California on Wheels"—the curious carload of fruits, flowers, and wines which the Southern Pacific sent East under the superintendence of the late E. McD. Johnstone. It journeyed North and South, to big towns and little towns, and Gavin preceded it, proclaiming its wonders and arousing interest in its approach. He arrived late one afternoon in a little village near Wheeling, in Virginia, and headed direct for the office of the local paper, asking briskly for the editor. A pretty young girl sat at a desk—a slender, graceful maiden of sixteen, or so—who looked up as the visitor entered, and replied: "He is not here, sir, but if you must see him, I'll take you to our home." She proceeded to explain that the editor was her father, and that she assisted him in his journalistic labors. So High and his charming young friend set out after the absent parent, talking gaily as they walked, and at once became friends. It was such a bright, gay, and intelligent individuality she revealed that High vowed on parting that he would return again when his labors were over. The chance was denied him, but her memory lingered as the crowning impression of his journey. The passing of two years deepened rather than erased the recollection of her individuality, so, concluding he had really met his fate, he returned to Virginia, found his editress a young lady, but brighter and prettier than before. He declared the condition of his heart, found the original impression had been mutual, and in due course they were married. There is a romance for you, which discredits denials of love at first sight.

* * *

OF course, Sheriff Whelan is ignorant of the fact that the deputies of his office are being assessed to obtain funds for his re-election. That, at least, is the ostensible object of the subscription which his head deputy is creating. Surely the towering political ambition that Mr. Whelan nourished so long has been gratified by the distinguished services he has been enabled to render the city as Sheriff. It seems strange he should desire to succeed himself, and, in view of existing political conditions, I am inclined to believe him the victim of his subordinate's zeal. The Sheriff is too old a bird not to recognize the advantage of this opportunity for retirement with all his honors thick upon him. He really ought to make an example of some one at once, and put an end to this campaign preparation which is quite without object.

* * *

THE new starting contrivance at the race track stands some fourteen feet in height, and with its arrangement of posts and india-rubber bands bears a distant resemblance to a magnified hurdle. Among the visitors to the track on a recent steeplechase day was a British Columbia Englishman, who, having had a proper fill of the California wonders, was ready to accept all he heard and saw in blissful good faith. So he said, as he gazed up at the starter:

"My, but that's a high hurdle—is it the last jump?"

* * *

ACROSS the Bay one hears more of the Female Suffrage question than its opponents appreciate. The ladies are urging their campaign on social lines—husbands and brothers are persuaded to entertainments and there the arguments in favor of the great extension are ventilated under appropriate feminine auspices. Indeed, Society has taken up the fad with a vim that may be labeled enthusiasm, and converts among sweethearts and husbands are being made in profusion. However, it is well for the victors to remember that verbal adhesion to the principle is far removed from voting for the amendment. Agreement is much easier than discussion and no one forgets the ballot is secret. Thus far, but one argument seems to carry weight. It is that section of the Code which excepts from the franchise, Indians, idiots, and women. That connection is an insult which sets many a man on the side of Miss Anthony.

* * *

Victor Metcalf, the Oakland lawyer whom the suffragists claim as their latest convert, tells of witnessing a law contest in Cheney, Washington, where the fair sex is amenable to jury duty. One of the twelve peers was a woman, and in due course, after the usual speeches, the case was turned over to the jury. At six o'clock the same evening the foreman notified the Judge that no agreement had been reached.

"Lock 'em up for the night," ordered the jurist.

"But, your honor!" interrupted the lady juror. "Your honor, I must go home. I have a baby, and my husband is even now awaiting dinner for me."

"Can't be helped, Madam—the order of this Court is that the jury be locked up all night."

"But I must see my baby, I must! I must!" And this victim of the franchise burst into tears.

Finally the Sheriff compromised by sending a deputy after the infant, whose arrival soothed the mother's grief.

* * *

Miss Anthony tells of a Dakota jury on which three women served. After a protracted discussion, its members failed to agree and the usual order was made. There were protests, of course, and for a time the situation was embarrassing, but finally the solution came in the shape of a suggestion that the sexes be locked up in separate chambers. Strange to say, by morning the trio of females had become harmonious, while the men were no nearer an agreement than before.

* * *

THERE ARE new developments in mining continually offering themselves for record. Important among the latest enterprises is the deal which secures to Lucky Baldwin aud Marcus Daly, Jr., some fifty-one claims in an auriferous section of Kern County. The prospects are so promising that Daly père threatens to leave the Anaconda for a month or more to revisit California. He would undertake then the operation of this development which is to be begun at once on an extensive scale. Mr. Stanton, one of the proprietors of the Baldwin Hotel, has an interest in the deal, which is of proportions sufficient to be of great interest to the State. A second project is that which sends Prince Poniatowski to Europe—the California Exploration Company, of which Chas. E. Green is president. This corporation has possessed itself of a belt of claims on the mother lode in Calaveras County, and proposes developing these properties by means of an immense electric plant which shall supply the environment with cheap power. A railway to San Andreas is part of the project, the capital for which is to come from London and Paris.

* * *

AN interesting mining story relates the latest phase of the fortunes of the Chapman family. No great stretch of the mind is required to recall the days when W. D. Chapman figured as the greatest of California landholders, his vast acreage exceeding then the domain of Miller & Lux. In the height of fame and fortune, young Grant married his daughter, and the nuptials figure among the glowing events of days gone by. His downfall, like that of Isaac Friedlander, was precipitated by the first great wheat deal, and since then he has been busy protecting the remnant of his estate against lawsuits. The other Chapmans steadily invested their accumulations in mines, and among the properties they developed is the Taylor mine in El Dorado, which for many a year past has been a steady producer. Recently they became owners of the Zancroft, in Placer County, and their last month's "clean-up" yielded some thirty thousand dollars' worth of gold. A ten-stamp mill sufficed the requirements of this property when it came into their possession, but thirty stamps now deal with the extracted ore. This is but one of the many mines which has begun to yield a plenteous tribute of the precious metal to the coffers of the State and is further evidence of the renaissance of mining in California.

* * *

MOST unfortunately chosen was the night of the Democratic Committee meeting. Set for the same date as the prize fight, the simultaneous occurrence of two important events militated against the success of both. There is Eddie Greany, for instance, to whom in the absence of Sam Rainey, has been entrusted the charge of Superintendent Daggett's manifold ambitions, he was embarrassed by having to second Joe Choynski. Billy Jordan, Committeeman from the 45th, the traditional master of ceremonies, was compelled to give eclat to the fistic event. However, it shall not be said that the tendency of the Democracy in the direction of prize fights is by any means a dishonorable characteristic. Apropos thereof there was a story told of Colonel O'Beirne, who arose on an occasion to a point of protest at a political club meeting. A National holiday was about to fall on a Friday and the club proposed celebrating it with a barbecue.

"Is it a barbecue on Friday ye are talking about, gintlemen?" asked the Colonel in tones resonant with sorrow and indignation. "'Tis the heft of the Dimocratic party that ates no mate of a Friday, so why d'ye be talking of a barbecue? A fishing excursion is more in order."

They fished.

* * *

VARIOUS are the ways and many the methods of acquiring riches. With interest I learn of the proceeding of certain wealthy men, who, believing the decline of country properties but a temporary and transient feature of the depression, have hit on a novel way of acquiring lands at half its assessed valuation. The California Savings and Loan Society is in process of liquidation, but the progress it makes in the present condition of the market is wearisome in the extreme. Many depositors are glad to accept in cash half the amounts their pass-books call for, and this inclination is being taken advantage of by speculators, John O. Reis and Ferd Reis, among others, who are quietly engaged in buying up these deposits, accepting in lieu of coin parcels of property belonging to the institution. As the bank's loans were based on assessed valuations, which are at least twenty-five per cent below real values, and as its mortgages were reasonably conservative, it may be seen what bargains these dealers are acquiring.

* * *

THE illustrators are all laughing over the manner in which a certain Examiner artist retaliated on the editor, who attempted to discipline him. For some weeks past this young man has irritated his superiors by frequent indulgence in strong liquor. In consequence his work has been scamped, and undue responsibilities thrown on his brethren. So he was suspended from the salary list and was told he should be paid only what he earned. It happens, however, that the offender has real talent and a remarkable dexterity behind his eccentricities, and, nettled by the reproof, set to work with a vengeance. Over the result the editor is repining, for the artist's bill this week was something like $105, whereas his regular salary is considerably less than half that figure.

* * *

THE Mormon Choir explains more than it imagines. It interprets the charm which San Francisco has exercised over so many eminent Utahans; it satisfies one's curiosity as to why the Elders went so far afield in their search after recruits; it sets at rest, also, all doubts as to the discretion of granting Mormon women the franchise. Surely no one after this will doubt the sense and solidity of Salt Lake femininity. And when the ladies lift up their voices together the atmosphere is laden with sweet sounds which, I am sure, express the harmony and amiability of the individual songstresses.

* * *

OVER the performance of Orestes, on Saturday, opinions differ. The talent seem to consider the son of Ormonde a disappointment, but Mr. McDonough accepts the situation with that equanimity which is born of a more agreeable conviction. The jockey, it seems, had orders to rush the colt ahead at the start and keep him in advance of the bunch to the finish, but he got the worst of the send-off, and it was taking too much of a chance to push so valuable a steed through to the front. So the alternative orders prescribed a very easy gait, and that is why Orestes finished in the rear. The performance must not be taken as any index of his powers. It cannot be said, however, that the jockey showed any particular skill in handling his mount.

* * *

Apropos of racing, great are the preparations for the California Jockey Club's new course across in Oakland. The most eminent of track engineers has been engaged to lay out the grounds. A handsome clubhouse is planned and arrangements already entered into with the railroad company for special trains and through tickets to the course. It is estimated that the Oakland track has, in the matter of proximity, considerably the best of its Ingleside rival, inasmuch as fast boats and express trains will land one at the new resort within twenty-five minutes of Market Street, whereas fifty-five minutes are consumed traveling to the Pacific Coast Club's quarters.

THE WITNESS.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

THE NEW BOOKS.

A NOVEL THAT IS WORTH READING AND ANOTHER THAT IS NOT.

Netta Syrett has, strange to say, achieved the rare thing. She has written a good novel. Nobody's Fault is not brilliant, doesn't startle you and hold you breathless. It is not a work of genius by any means, and there are queer little sensational lapses—just the matter of a sentence or two—but it does arouse your interest, and it does succeed in holding it. It is the story of one Bridget Ruan a publican's daughter. "She stands," says the author, speaking through one of her characters, "between two hostile classes—by education and nature she belongs to one, by birth and social position to the other, she has strong sympathies with both, but belongs wholly to neither. Her parents have denied themselves to give her a splendid education . . . When she returns to them there is a great gulf fixed. Her tastes, sympathies, and ideals are not theirs, never can be theirs. It is the saddest, most hopeless thing in life, 'nobody's fault.'"

Finally Miss Ruan rises in the world, partly through her talents as a novelist, and marries the wrong man, only to find it out when the right man, Carey, returns from "The Mysterious East." Then there comes the inevitable separation, and Bridget only saves herself from a flight with Carey by what impresses the reader as a somewhat overstrained, morbid scruple of conscience as regards her mother.

There are some rather good pieces of realism in the book, notably Bridget's homecoming and the Jenkins's party, the scenes in the boarding-house during Bridget's school-teaching days, and the interview with Miss Miles. The dialogue is really very good, Miss Syrett having the rare and excellent faculty of telling her story through the conversations of its characters.

It is evident that the author has striven to be compact, concise, and brief (one can read the book in three hours.) This compactness of form would be admirable were the story of a less serious character, or more replete with action. As it is, you miss the background, the setting for the plot, and Miss Syrett shifts her scenes with an easy facility that is almost trivial. If the movement were slower, even if it were more ponderous, the author would have had time to prepare her effects, and would have conveyed a stronger more lasting impression. It is the rarest thing in the world to find a novel that would be improved by being lengthened. I am sure that Nobody's Fault, however, is such an one. But the book is good reading from cover to cover, and its short-comings are, after all, mere blemishes, not vital failures.

[Roberts Bros., publishers, Boston.]

Good plain homespun realism devoid of any musty romantic or supernatural machinery is nine times out of ten the most effective method of treatment in a story. After all, truth is stronger than fiction and fiction itself is strong only in so far as it seems to be like truth.

At first sight it would seem much more wonderful to "account for" Jeanne d'Arc by believing her to be some divinely sent manifestation, a miracle, a god from the machine. But upon reflection it will easily appear that it is much more wonderful that she should have done what she did in her true character of a simple little peasant girl of seventeen. One can almost say she was marvelous because she was not marvelous at all.

Mr. Lowell has written an admirable history of this wonderful little girl upon such lines as these; a plain straightforward story of what she did. The reader forms his own opinion, Mr. Lowell does not try to thrust upon him any opinion or theories of his own. We have become so used to the exclamatory romantic style in dealing with Jeanne that it is not until the realistic authors call us back again to the plain unadorned facts that we begin to appreciate them. Schiller, for instance, has placed his Joanna upon so high a pedestal that we no longer see her. Mr. Lowell, on the other hand, tells us she was fond of dress, liked to have shad for breakfast, and that she nicknamed the English "Les god-dams."

[Joan of Arc, by Francis C. Lowell. Houghton, Mifiin& Co., publishers.]

The House by Eugene Field is a little book of interesting sketches that make easy reading for a half hour or so, but it is not especially clever.

The House is not a novel, and it is not a collection of short stories; at the same time it deals with fictitious characters (except in the case of Gamlin Harland) and fictitious situations, centering about the building of a fictitious House.

The twenty odd sketches are written in a style much like that of Dickens in the "Boz" sk.tches. The subjects are lightly treated, in a humorous manner for the most part. At times the humor is almost farcical as in the sketch entitled, "Neighb r Robbins' Platypus," and at times it suggests the inimitable Twain, notably where Mr. Baker nails himself into the play-house he is trying to build for the children or where he paints himself slowly into a corner in his attempt to paint the floor of the same play-house.

The style of the book is not literary, say what you will; Mr. Field frequently allowing himself to descend to that doubtfully humorous manner which employs three-syllabled Latinized words to describe some scene or episode of trifling importance. Here is a case in point: The author intends to say that a big dog played about his back yard. Instead of saying it in good homespun Anglo-Saxon, Mr. Field chooses to inform us that "The amiable leviathan galivanted about the premises with elephantine exuberance." Of course this may be humor—from a certain standpoint grade of taste; it is not literature any more than Mr. Field's use of the word "jeoparding" for jeopardizing.

Yet there is a certain flavor of originality about the little sketches that, perhaps, more than counter-balances these few shortcomings. The character of Mr. Baker, the absent-minded, impractical, credulous astronomer, is amusing and is well-sustained. There are some capital touches here and there: Mr. Baker planting his potato-patch in the form of the Great Dipper, his awe at the sight of an expert lather at work, and the experience of himself and wife with the watchman told in "Alice's Night-Watchman," probably the best of all the little sketches.

[The House by Eugene Field. New York. Chas. Scribner's Sons.]

Extraordinary as it may seem, Diana's Hunting, by Robert Buchanan, is to no evil purposes though Frank Housham's fate trembles in the balance. He, by the way, is the successful dramatist and Miss Meredith, is the charming actress who created the heroine of his first successful piece. You can imagine her a most adorable person—radiantly beautiful, young, tall, firm, with perfect arms, passionate eyes, and a Grecian nose. Nor is she dependent for fascination on physical loveliness alone. Her wit is bright and she has real histrionic talent. Besides, Frank is married to a commonplace loving little wife, who knows nothing of art and less of literature, and is unable to appreciate his talent which Miss Meredith adores. However, a special providence in the person of a brusque and unconventional critic named Short intervenes to save this guilty twain from one another's arms. It requires something of a catastrophe, for they are on the verge of elopement, but Mrs. Short dies at the psychological moment; Horsham grieved at the sorrow of his friend confides the bereavement to Diana who fails to sympathize. Her charm fades—the thought of his wife's love comes home to him and virtue reigns supreme. The tale, though sketchy in treatment and hasty in its modeling, makes diverting and entertaining reading. Diana and Short are both realized with versimilitude though the outlines of the critic are vague, and the love he bears his disreputable wife without proper motive.

[The Frederic Stokes Company, publishers.] ORACLE, K. B.

California of the South is the somewhat involved title of a guide book by Walter Lindley and J. P. Widney. It is complete, systematic, and should make clear and easy reading for the tourist in the southern part of the State. Sentences such as this strike one as rather queer in a guide book, however: "Attention has been attracted to this island lately by the report of a tragical murder of a Chinaman by Alexander More, the owner of the island." The illustrations are above the average and are reproduced for the most part by engravings on wood.

[California of the South, by Walter Lindley, M. D., and J. P. Widney, A. M. M. D., LL. D. New York: D. Appleton & Co.]

Frank B. Millard has collected the western stories he contributed to various periodicals and Tait & Co. announce them just off their press. The title of the volume is A Pretty Bandit, and it will be available at all the bookdealers next week. I commend these yarns to the attention of those readers who like virile plots and exciting incidents.

Adam Johnstone's Son, the new novel by Mr. F. Marion Crawford, will be published during April. It will be illustrated by an artist who went specially to Amalfi in order to be able to catch the local color of the scenes in which the story is laid.

BOOKS RECEIVED.

"I Married a Wife," by John Strange Winter. Fred'k. A. Stokes Co., publishers.

"The Broom Squire," by S. Baring Gould. F. A. Stokes Co., publishers.

"A Woman Intervenes," by Robert Baer. Fred'k. A. Stokes Co., publishers. For sale by Wm. Doxey.

"In Search of Quiet," by Walter Frith. Harper & Brothers, publishers.

THE THEATERS.

A SUGGESTION OR TWO FOR "BEAU BRUMMEL," TOGETHER WITH REMARKS ON "BLUE BEARD."

Wit can do much and Richard Mansfield more, but underneath the delightful intellectual tickling produced by the lines of the play, and in spite of the keen pleasure which this artist gives us by his firm yet delicate handling of the part, I fancy that "Beau Brummel" is a trifle irritating to the average male American. Not irritating enough for him to be exactly conscious of it, but just enough to make him callous to the sufferings of the poor old carpet-knight, and feel "it serves the old chap right for his infernal foppishness."

As the playwright is always hankering for howls and tears from the audience, this antipathetic frame of mind is, from his point of view, a fatal one in which to receive the last act of "Beau Brummel," particularly as even the most sympathetic of males could not, I think, be affected to tears by the picture of two men (one of them young) starving to death in a garret without apparently lifting their hands to make a living. Certainly most Americans would not, for they are all born to "hustle," and are mostly but one or two generations removed from men who, forced to be hewers of wood and drawers of water, would have had a fine, healthy scorn for Beau Brummel's false pride, and—alas!—for his twelve shirts a week, too.

As for the American women's feelings, I'm willing to confess that one of them wept over the last part of this play the first time she saw it, and yearned to spank the two blind lovesick moles who were so absorbed in themselves that they were deceived by the poor old man's piteous pretense and left him, their best friend, in the most obvious, the most heart-rending poverty. Monday night, however, though she still had an ardent desire to crack the young pair's empty pates together and still delighted in Mansfield's finished, admirable work, the scene failed to touch her properly and she quarreled with the playwright. If he really had an honest desire to make everybody miserable over the death scene he ought to have worked up to it differently. First, he should have intimated discreetly but pointedly that the fine-ladyisms, the superb conceit, and the magnificent attitude of this famous fop toward mankind, was a pose assumed mainly because he gauged accurately the world in which he lived and was aware of the prestige to be won by such an attitude. Next, Mortimer, (the faithful valet) ought never to have been permitted to remain whole; he should have lost his legs or his eyes or something in his master's service, and thereby forced the fastidious Beau to support him—say by his giving dancing lessons to his landlady's daughter, yea, even to the landlady herself, and to others of her kind, for "a pittance." Preluded in some such masterly manner, the death scene wouldn't leave a dry eye in the house. Still there are certain disadvantages attending wet eyes, so, perhaps, "Beau Brummel" is just as well the way it is.

It seems almost a lifetime since San Francisco has had at one time two such good things as Mansfield and "Puddn'head," and never, I'm sure, have we had a greater contrast than the plays of "Beau Brummel" and "Puddn'head Wilson." The one so witty and anemic, so far away and unreal, the other so vibrant with strong emotion, so full of America's young blood, and of human hopes and fears. Yes, we've fared well, so well that I strongly suspect both the Baldwin and the Columbia to have some particularly choice idiocy in store for us—it wouldn't do for us to be spoilt, you know, by two good companies coming in succession. We might get so we'd refuse to go unless they furnish something to keep us awake.

"Blue Beard" is in its second week at the Tivoli, and has really earned a good word. The costumes are charming, the jokes quite endurable, and I can conscientiously announce that there is a marked improvement in legs. I won't talk about the faces.

They have annexed two specialties from the Orpheum, Gilbert and Goldie (quite good, though too noisy and blatant), and a little Mille somebody or other with a chic, pretty, little black head, who dances a stiff—oh! such a stiff—little dance, in a stiff pair of corsets, and an even stiffer smile. Until she takes them both off, I implore her in the name of charity to avoid anything with even the faintest resemblance to a Spanish dance, for the contrast between the music and her motions is enough to make one's ears and eyes fall out. Ferris and dear, funny, little Carrie Roma were in fine feather, and the medley of negro songs jolly enough to warm the heart of anything but an iceberg or a musician.

"The managers of the Columbia Theater School of Dramatic Art have reason to feel proud of the splendid results of their efforts since its opening in August of last year. Up to date they have graduated about twenty-five students, each of whom is qualified to play responsible parts, and nearly all of them leading parts." This clipping from the Bulletin was given a conspicuous place on the program of last week's exhibition. The powers that be evidently regard the turning loose on the community of twenty-five stage-struck mortals with only nine months' training as a meritorious act; to a mere outsider it looks rather like a crime. If not a crime 'tis very wonderful—think of it! To be able to convert raw material into actors "capable of playing leading parts" in nine months! Mr. Instructor, I salute you. You are a double-barreled prodigy, and when I decide to lend my brilliancy to the stage none but you shall have a hand in my education.

I suppose the pupils who exhibited last Thursday have been in training only long enough to learn their lines (some of them evidently not so long) for, though several did very well, they should all be separated from "leading parts" by eons of time. Most of them showed an interest in the audience all out of proportion to its size and enthusiasm, and seemed to strive for little else than to get their lines out with all possible dispatch, while one or two of the more promising ones were as nervous as a cat in its ninth life, so nervous that it was impossible to judge of their ability. Taken as a whole, Miss Ella Deane as Mrs. Cavendish in "Hearts" made the best impression; barring a certain irritating primness of delivery, she promised well. If she has ever heard Jennie Kennark of the Frawley Company she has heard her own defect vivified and confirmed, and should take warning in time. PEG WOFFINGTON.

Husband—I am so sleepy I can hardly keep my eyes open and I have so much to write yet.

Wife—Just wait till I show you my dressmaker's bill; I bet you'll open your eyes.—Texas Siftings.

"How much for a photograf?" he queried as he entered the room at the head of the stairs.

"My dear sir, you have made a mistake," replied the occupant of the office. "This is a dental office, while the photographer is next door."

"Oh, you pull teeth?"

"Yes, sir."

"How much?"

"Fifty cents apiece."

"Well go ahead and yank out one or two. It's about the same to me."—Detroit Free Press.

100 Visiting Cards Engraved in the Latest Style for $1.00, at Dodge's New Store, 112 Post St.

Our new store is our only one—112 Post St., next White House

DRAMATIC NOTES.

COMING EVENTS IN THE THEATER WORLD.

Roland Reed, the favorite comedian, will be the attraction at the California next Monday night, appearing in "The Politician." Mr. Reed's leading lady is Miss Isadore Rush.

Monday evening of next week Mr Mansfield will present "The Story of Rodion," a dramatization of Dostoyevski's great novel of "Crime and Punishment." This is the first time this play has been given in San Francisco. Mr. Mansfield's interpretation of Rodion is said to be the most powerful achievement of his whole career. The play will be repeated on Tuesday night. "Prince Karl" will be the bill on Wednesday Thursday, and Friday nights and at the Saturday matinee. "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde" is billed for Saturday evening.

Richard Mansfield has signed a contract with Daniel Frohman to play under his management for four years. One New York paper has it that Frohman will pay Mansfield $100,000 for his services. When asked if this was an exaggeration, Mr. Frohman replied:

"Exaggeration! Not at all! I shall pay him even more. When I managed Madame Modjeska, I paid her $2000 a week for thirty-five weeks, or $70,000 for the season. I tell you, as a positive fact, that Mr. Mansfield will receive a larger salary than any American actor has ever been paid."

On Monday night at the Columbia Theater Ezra Kendall will present the comedy "A Pair of Kids." In the cast is Miss Edith Kingsley who will appear in her own catchy ballad, "Swinging in the Sky."

Rivarde, Lachaume, and W. H. Keith come direct from New York to this city where they open at the Columbia Theater, on Monday, April 27th. Ysaye had much to say about Rivarde when he was in this country last year, always claiming that he was one of the greatest players living, positively the greatest of the younger men.

"Blue Beard" will be given at the Tivoli Opera House next Monday evening. The ballet will be redressed and remodeled, and the whole show will be changed and augmented in every respect.

The old favorite, "Michael Strogoff," has been played to crowded houses during the past week. For next week "Special Delivery," the only postoffice play, is billed. The main feature is the specialties.

Pearl Ladd, a miss of twelve, will give her first piano recital at the Y. M. C. A. Auditorium, Wednesday evening, April 29th. She has been studying for some years under Otto Bendix, and her interpretation of Beethoven, Chopin, Mozart, Mendelssohn, and the other masters is said to be very clever.

Great interest is taken in the approaching professional debut of Mrs. Auzerais Hoyte, at Grover's Alcazar, next Monday evening. The lady is well known on the amateur stage and in Society circles, and her many friends predict a most brilliant career for her. In the curtain-raiser, "The Setting of the Sun," she has been seen at private theatricals; so her real debut will be as Mrs. Featherly in "Everybody's Friend." She will wear some most elaborate dresses, imported from Paris, and, all in all, the performance promises to be unusually good. Hereward Hoyte has been especially engaged, and Leonard Grover, Jr., will give his favorite impersonation of Major de Boots. Popular prices will prevail.

THE MORMON CHOIR.

The Mormon Tabernacle Choir is a surprisingly good body of singers, under the direction of a capable leader, Mr. E. Stephens. Great attention is paid to detail, and the volume of tone in forte passages is eminently satisfying. The disappointing feature is the program itself. "Annie Laurie" as a solo, "Robin Adair" as a duet—especially with the tenor singing a third above the melody throughout, minstrel fashion—and the silly "Prison Scene" from Il Trovatore, are absurd on such a program. Neither are the compositions of Mr. Stephens particularly effective. The soloists of the organization, with one exception, are in no wise up to the high standard of the chorus. The one exception is the boy alto, Master Charlie Pike. This lad has a superb voice, and is musical to his finger tips. His phrasing and enunciation are all that could be desired, and his intonation is absolutely true.

Anything more beautiful than his singing of Handel's "Angels Ever Bright and Fair" would be difficult to imagine. Master Pike is preeminently the star of the Mormon Choir. Mr. Willard Weihe is a good violinist, with an agreeable tone and a fair technic; but the "Airs Hongrois" of Ernst are not for him. He is far better in compositions of a less exacting nature.

With a good, solid program of the choral writings of the great masters, the Mormon Tabernacle Choir would be most welcome.

P. C. A.

CHIMMIE FADDEN AGAIN.

MR. TOWNSEND'S HERO AS A COMMENTATOR ON POLITICS.

The Raines Bill is the new excise law passed by the New York Legislature, by which the license fees and bonds required of liquor dealers are materially increased. Its operation must force many of the saloons out of existence. It is said to be a scheme of Boss Platt to force the liquor dealers to obtain bonds from the Fidelity Deposit Company of Maryland, of which his son is agent. Apropos the Bill, Chimmie Fadden is heard from in the New York Sun:

"Say, dat bill Raines must be a farmer, a dead farmer, sure! Did you hear what he done? Lemme tell you. Up to Albany, where dey makes de laws for de lawyers, where Mr. Burton uster belong, dis Bill Raines he broke into de game, and he puts up a front cat de folks what lives in de city don't know enough to eat spheghetti widout a fork, and has t' have a keeper. See? Well, when he makes dat front all de odder farmers dey yells t' beat 'ell, and says dat Raines is de mug t' learn de city folks what t' do, and mostly what t' do about booze. So Raines he makes a Constitution and By-laws what says you gets arrested if you has a tir-t on you after one o'clock in de morning, and you goes t' jail if you feels like trowing a mixed ale in your face on Sunday, what Mr. Paul says is the dryest day in de year. On odder days you has t' cough up a plunk a minute, or die of tirst.

"Sure, dat's what Mr. Paul says. He says dat de poor man will have to get busy and buy beer by de keg and whiskey by de jug, and take de stuff home wid him, same as de rich man, or else he'll have a troat on him like de inside of a peanut shell, and vote de Democratic ticket every time he wants a drink and can't get it.

"Den, when Mr. Paul was talking like dose ways, Miss Fanny she says, 'If Mr. Raines puts de poor man in de game de same as de rich man, does he give de poor man de boodle t' make good wid?'

"Mr. Paul he taut awhile, and den he says dat Mr. Raines must have forgot something, 'cause when he puts de poor man in de game wid de rich man, he didn't give him no stack of blue chips to play de game wid. See?

"When I learned all about de law from Mr. Paul I went down to a meeting of de Roseleaf Social, Outing, and Life-Saving Club, what I am de Vice of, and I gives de gang de straight tip; I copped 'em right, and dey was crazy. When I toled em dat dey would have t' dig up eight hun—make good wid eight hundred cases, plunks—or else go dry, dey fell in a fit, and hollered murder in langwudge it was good t' listen to.

"Dey wouldn't stand up t' de dough dish a little bit, but wanted to go right out and slug de head off dat Bill Raines. I told 'em Raines was a farmer what didn't know the diff'rence between Cherry Hill and Monkey Hill, and den I taut dey'd all die of kicking.

"But dat wasn't what I was going t' tell you, only I hears so much about it dat I has t' spiel a speech on de question or bust. His Whiskers is worse dan me. De dough dish is prison to him, and he can't stand up to it no more dan little Miss Fannie can stand on her head. Mr. Paul offered t' bet Mr. Burton a case of small bots dat his Whiskers would wear a mask next 'lection day and vote de Democrat ticket, all along of Bill Raines, but Mr. Burton wouldn't take de bet, cause he said it wouldn't do him no good t' win, for Mr. Paul would collar de small bots, no matter which one win the bet.

"But let it go at dat. What I was going t' tell you about was dat bull pup. Was I telling you about dat bull pup? Yes. Den you know we got him. He belongs t' little Miss Fannie, and de pup is dead stuck on her, dough de kid don't do a ting t' de pup but pinch its ears, gouge its eyes, and shake hands wid its tail.

"Say, dere's some kind of a jolly about dat pup, sure; and I can't tumble to it, neider can de Ducness. I tink, dough, she makes a bluff at tumbling.

"When I got de pup for Mr. Paul he pipes it off careful like he looks at a cigar before he lights it, and he says to me: 'It's nearly homely enough,' he says. 'It's almost as homely as de odder one.' Den I says, 'What odder one?' and he says, solemn-like, 'De odder one I was tinking of, Chames,' and I tumbles t' myself, and didn't make no more breaks about it den, but I ast de Duchess. She gives me a long song and dance what de most of it I couldn t cop right, but it was about anodder bull pup what de Duchess had heerd de old servants say dat Miss Fannie had give t' Mr. Paul when he was her steady; when dey was bote kids. See?

"P'chee, it was too much for my nut, so I just goes out to de stable t' see dat de pup has a good cleaning before Mr. Paul comes over t' give it t' Miss Fannie.

"Well, when he comes over from his house, and all de folks was sitting togedder in de hall, where dere's a fireplace big as a tenement room, Mr. Paul tells me t' bring in de pup, and I bring him.

"When she seen it, Miss Fannie, she kinder turns red, what dey calls blushing, and his Whiskers he laughs t' beat 'ell, but Mr. Burton he only coughs and looks as knocked out as if he had to keep a date in Brooklyn.

"'Miss Fannie,' says Mr. Paul, taking de pup by de slack of its neck, he says, 'I've been near twenty years trying t' find a pup what's as ugly a looker as de odder one, but I tink dis one will do.'

"Miss Fannie she took de pup, and she says, 'Yes, it is beautifully ugly,' she says, 'and reminds me of de odder one.' and den she kinder laughs and gives de pup t' little Miss Fannie, what put her fingers in de pup's eyes, like it was a doll, when de pup only wags his tail like he had collared a tenderloin steak.

"Den nobody didn't say notting for a long time, until Mr. Burton he says, 'Paul has a long mem'ry, Fannie. We must reward him for it. What shall we do?'

"At dis his Whiskers laughed like he'd toled a joke himself, and he says says he, 'De race Mr. Paul entered for is over, and you has won de cup, Burton,' he says, and near fell off his chair laughing, dough I didn't know what t'ell for. Mr. Paul he seemed t' tumble, and he says, serious as a Judge in de Tombs, says he, 'No, I can't get de cup unless Mr. Burton dies, and de race is sailed over again; so I guess I don't come in for no reward except—dis is his very langwudge—'except de consciousness of me own virtues.'

"Miss Fannie was getting blushinger and blushinger, till her cheeks was as red as de logs burning in de fireplace, and I was tinking wedder I oughten t' slug somebody for giving her a jolly, but Mr. Paul he says, 'De only substitute for de cup I can tink of at dis time is a small bottle, if Chames may get me one,' and Miss Fannie gives me de nod t' chase, and I chases.

"Well, dat game boddered me nut till I taut I'd go crazy, and I guess I would went, only de Duchess sprung a sprize party on me dat night what jolted me right again. I seen Mr. Paul when he went home and he slipped me a fiver for me trouble in getting de pup. 'I has had five dollars wort of fun out er Mr. Burton already,' he says t' me

"Luck wasn't coming me way just den, for de Duchess she copped Mr. Paul giving me de boodle, and she says t' me, 'Chames,' says she, 'would you like t' know de jolly about dat bull pup?' says she

"'Sure, I would,' I says, 'sure, or me nut will go crooked.'

"'Den,' says de Duchess, 'den you give me de fiver Mr. Paul gives you, and I'll tell you,' she says. I had t' cough up, and when de Duchess had sunk de boodle in her stocking she says, 'I taut I would tell you, but I guess I'd better not, for you being such a normal person [illegible] wouldn't tumble, even if I did give you de straight tip. Good night, James,' she says. 'See?

"Say, what t'ell! De Duchess buncoes me outter me boodle and den gives me de double cross. I don't see no heart game in dis. I must be a farmer—a dead farmer.

EDWARD W. TOWNSEND.

POEMS BY W. B. YEATS.

THE SHADOWY HORSES.

I hear the shadowy horses, their long manes a-shake,
Their hoofs heavy with tumult, their eyes glimmering white;
The North unrolls above them clinging, creeping night,
The East tells all her secret joy before day-break,
The West weeps in pale dew, and sighs, passing away,
The South could cover them with roses of crimson fire,
O vanity of sleep, hope, dream, endless desire;
The horses of disaster plunge in the desolate clay.
Beloved, let your eyes half close, and your heart beat
Over my heart, and your hair fall upon my breast
Drowning Love's lonely hour in deep twilight of rest;
And hide their tossing manes and their tumultuous feet.

THE TRAVAIL OF PASSION.

When the flaming, lute-thronged, angelic door is wide,
When an immortal passion breathes in mortal clay,
Our heart endure the plaited thorn, the crowded way,
The knotted scourge, the nail-pierced hands, the wounded side,
The hissop-heavy sponge, the flowers by Kidron stream:
We will bend down, and loosen our hair over you
That it may drop faint perfume and be heavy with dew,
Lilies of death-pale hope, roses of passionate dream.

THE WIND'S LAUGH.

The wind blows out of the gates of the day,
The wind blows over the lonely of heart,
And the lonely of heart is withered away,
While the fairies dance in a place apart,
Shaking their milk-white feet in a ring,
Tossing their milk-white arms in the air;
For they hear the wind laugh, and murmur and sing
Of a land where even the old are fair,
And even the wise are merry of tongue;
But I heard a reed of Coolaney say,
"When the wind has laughed and murmured and sung,
The lonely of heart must wither away."

Along the dreary pathway of this cloud-environed life of ours there is no joy so pure, no triumph so complete, no success so fraught with rapture, as that of the female artiste who hangs on the flying trapeze by her ehilblain and kisses her hand to the perspiring throng.

At Bayreuth the Nibelungen ring will be performed five times next summer, between July 19th and August 19th, each set of performances beginning on Sunday and ending on Wednesday.

Miss I. E. Connor, who was for many years with Madame E. Caswell, has a store at 36 Geary Street. The store is the perfection of beauty, and prettier hats cannot be seen outside of New York.

There are some important changes in the fashions this season, not only in the cut, but in materials. For instance, the most conspicuous novelty is a fly-front finish for cutaway frocks and for sack coats and vests. It is also considered good form to have square shoulders, which squareness is helped out, of course, by judicious padding. In the matter of overcoats, the styles known as the Chesterfield and the Covert have special favor, the former something like thirty-nine inches in length, the latter not exceeding thirty-five inches. Frock coats are made of the darkest materials for afternoon wear, with striped trousers. As for sack suits the double-breasted style is rather out of date, and the popular type is the three-button cutaway of cheviot or Scotch suitings. In the matter of colorings, browns seem to be most popular and among the latest shades is a Rembrandt brown of great beauty. Silver grays and Oxford checks are also coming in new styles and are particularly favored. It is interesting to know that American woolens this season are far superior to those of any previous year, and are even of better value and more attractive than foreign fabrics. We noticed some fine materials in the tailoring establishment of J. Ulrich, third floor, Crocker Building.

FINEST ON THE MARKET

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS

EEL RIVER CREAMERY

SEE THAT THIS STAMP IS ON EACH END OF SQUARE

A FINE GRADE DELICIOUS FLAVORED BUTTER

If you appreciate a DELICACY
Ask your Dealer for the BRAND

Racing! Racing! Racing!

California Jockey Club

WINTER MEETING
BEGINNING THURSDAY, MARCH 16TH
BAY DISTRICT TRACK

Racing Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday—Rain or Shine. Five or more races each day. Races start at 2 P.M. sharp. McAllister and Geary street cars pass the gate.
R. B. Milroy, Secretary. Thos. H. Williams, Jr., Pres.

BALDWIN THEATRE (AL HAYMAN AND CO. INCORP'D PROPS.)

Monday Next—Second week of RICHARD MANSFIELD and his New York Garrick Theatre Stock Company
Monday and Tuesday, The Story of Rodion, the Student
Wednesday, Thursday, Friday Evenings, and Saturday Matinee..... Prince Karl Saturday Evening..... Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde

Monday, April 27th—Last week—Parisian Romance, etc.

CALIFORNIA THEATRE (AL HAYMAN & CO. INCORP'D PROPS.)

Monday, April 20th
ROLAND REED and his Company, under the direction of E. B. Jack
The satirical comedy by Daniel D. Lloyd and Sydney Rosenfeld
THE POLITICIAN
Or, The Woman's Plank
The original 20th century woman—Miss Isadore Rush

Columbia Theatre.

PRICE LANDER, GOTTLOB & CO. LESSEES AND MANAGERS

—The Funniest of Eccentric Comedians—
EZRA KENDALL In his great laughing craze
A - PAIR - OF - KIDS
Supported by a splendid company of players
600 laughs, by actual count
April 27th—THE GREAT RIVARDE

ORPHEUM

O'Farrell Street, between Stockton and Powell
Week of Monday, April 20th
Hopkins' Trans-Oceanic Star Specialty Co.
The most complete traveling vaudevilic organization in the world
THE ROSSOW BROS., the famous lilliputian athletes and comedians.
NAMEDO BROS., grotesque acrobats.
APOLLO FULGORA TOM MACK
HORACE BENNERS THE EVANS
SHARP & FLAT FORD & FRANCIS
CLAYTON, JENKINS & JASPER

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE

Handsomest Family Theatre in the World
WALTER MOROSCO, - Sole Lessee and Manager
Last Performances of Michael Strogoff
MONDAY, APRIL 20th
—The Great Post Office Play—
SPECIAL DELIVERY

TIVOLI OPERA HOUSE

MRS. ERNESTINE KRELING, Proprietor and Manager
A RIP ROARING SUCCESS
Second Edition of the brilliant spectacular Extravaganza
BLUE BEARD
NEW Songs, Ballets and Specialties
The "Cheval-et" Medley of Coster Songs
"Rays of Light"
An Arabian Knight's Dream of Loveliness
POPULAR PRICES - 25 and 50 Cents

GROVER'S ALCAZAR

Monday Evening, April 20th
Matinees—Wednesday, Saturday and Sunday
First appearance on the professional stage of
MRS AUZERAIS HOYTE
Supported by Hereward Hoyte and a competent company, in a careful production of
EVERYBODY'S FRIEND
Preceded by the charming curtain raiser
THE SETTING OF THE SUN
Evening Prices.....10, 15, 25, 35 and 50 cents
Matinee Prices.....10, 15 and 25 cents

SPLASHES.

MRS. HAGER ELUDED the best efforts of the press. I am told there was not a single reporter present, and, although the dailies indulged in the proper allowance of headlines and the usual array of pictures, both were founded on imagination or gathered from surmise. It is true the big photograph of the participants stood in the doorway, but it was protected from artistic encroachments by a bodyguard of two Society men and a policeman. Every newspaper had an illustrator there, and every device was employed to get a peep at the picture; but for once journalistic enterprise got a setback. Of the performance there are as many opinions as there were spectators. In some quarters it is pronounced an eminently artistic success; in others, the verdict is qualified by individual condemnations. No one denies, however, that "A Modern Ananias" is a poor play, and its solitary virtue, novelty, by no means excuses its inanity and structural weakness. Frank Mathieu and Miss Houghton gave satisfactory renderings of the leading roles, but the honors of the evening seem to have been divided between Mr. Peixotto, Miss Rose Hooper, and Mr. Frank Owen. In the second act Miss Goodall wore a stunning gown of white tulle over white silk, and sang a pretty song very charmingly. Mr. Rosborough, who wore a costume that looked as though it had come from "Ranch 10," was fairly bright and clever, and of course the audience was duly appreciative. It applauded frequently and generously, and quite often in the right place. This generosity might have been due to the fact that the temperature of the hall was only a few degrees above zero, and approval was exercise and restored circulation.

* * *

However, the audience was very gorgeous. Evening dress was en regle, and, in defiance of the atmosphere, I noticed quite a number of décolléte gowns; though, as the evening wore on, there was an irresistible demand for cloaks. Miss Emilie Hager was very beautifully gowned in pale blue satin and lace, and wore her hair pompadour. Mrs. Rosenstock, Baroness Von Schroeder, and several other prominent ladies wore noticeably handsome gowns. Among the younger girls, Miss McKenna looked very charming in white, Miss Carrie Taylor was in pink, and Miss Julia Crocker, who has just returned from the East and is looking very well, wore pale blue. Of the tableaux which preceded the performance, the success was that of Miss Thomas in "The Summer Moon." She really looked lovely. Miss Alice Hager as "La Tosca" wore a stunning gown, and a magnificent hat with wildly flying pink plumes, and a bouquet of American Beauty roses.

* * *

Miss Lucas, Mrs. Hager's niece, who was the guest of Honor at the entertainment the other evening, is a decidedly bright, pretty, and piquant maiden, whose dark eyes and tiptilted nose are full of life, and suggestive of a love of gaiety. She is to be with us as long as she chooses to remain, and her influence, I am inclined to think, will be sufficiently strong to persuade Mrs. Hager to renounce the determination she so loudly expressed, of retiring as a hostess. It would be incompatible with her disposition not to assist generously toward the enjoyment of her guest.

* * *

THE TEVISES are scattering for the summer; Mrs. Lloyd Tevis and Miss Breckenridge who is fast developing into a débutante, are with Mrs. Will Tevis, at Bakersfield. Mr. and Mrs. Fred Sharon, I hear, are now in Egypt, and show no tendency nor desire to return to San Francisco for the time being. Mrs. Moses Hopkins, too, is in Egypt. Mrs. Blanding has recovered from her recent illness, and is visible again to her many friends. The Monroe Salisburys are stopping at the Palace during the absence of Mrs. Salisbury. They have vacated their home on California Street, and propose spending the summer in Placer County. Next winter Mrs. Salisbury intends taking a larger house, as her daughters will then make their début. W. F. Goad and his daughters are at Paso Robles. Mrs. James Otis has gone to Stockton to be near her son.

* * *

Mr. and Mrs. Winthrop Lester and Miss Hobart have returned to San Francisco and preparations for the wedding of Mr. Hobart and Miss Williams are now well under way. It has already been decided that the entire family shall occupy the Hobart mansion on Van Ness Avenue—an arrangement which would hardly appeal to the taste of most young married people. It is said that in the blissful condition in question the best results are attained by life alone—that is, until temperamental angles are worn off. Miss Williams is described as so sweet and so charming that the limitations of experience do not apply in her case.

* * *

Sausalito continues to look up. I am told Mrs. Osgood Hooker is kept busy answering letters from her friends who are anxious she should find them villas for the season. The supply of house-room across the Bay this season is considerably below the demand, and her efforts have met with but little success. By the way, I am told James B. Coleman has taken the Gregory cottage for the summer.

* * *

SOCIETY was well represented on Saturday afternoon of last week at the reception which Mrs. William Willis gave by way of celebrating the return of the season and the début of her niece, Miss Scott. Miss Scott, a pretty blonde, looked charming in white silk trimmed with daisies. Mrs. Willis herself wore a striking and beautiful toilet of superb violet brocade satin and duchesse lace, made with a plastron of heavily jeweled white satin. She wore diamond ornaments. The interior decoration of the drawing-room of the beautiful Willis house on the corner of Gough and California Streets was made under the supervision of Miss Mary Bates and was all that the most exacting taste could demand. The reception-rooms were bowers of roses, La France, Lady Banshire, and Beauty of Hazenwood. In the hall was a tropical profusion of fan palms, cork elm, and snowballs, from beneath which Noah Brandt's orchestra discoursed delightful music. During the afternoon Ludwig served delicious refreshments, and the four hundred guests had a thoroughly enjoyable time. The already popular débutante is to be congratulated upon so charming an entrée into the social world.

* * *

There was a jolly little gathering at Miss Walls's studio Saturday night, where Bangs's "Proposal Under Difficulties" was rendered by Miss Glasscock, Frank King, and Lloyd Baldwin. The whole upper floor of the building on Sacramento Street was devoted to players and audience; and, between the tapestries of Joullin, Donald Graham, and artistic paraphernalia in general, the decorative effect was quite brilliant. A pretty stage was arranged, and the little play was capitally given. Miss Glasscock and Mr. Frank King distinguished themselves especially. Subsequently, there was music by Miss Wall and Mrs. Bain, followed by refreshments.

* * *

The Colonial Daughters held their last meeting for the season at Mrs. Dr. Henry Gibbons's on Tuesday, April 7th. Mrs. Gibbons read an able paper by Sheldon G. Kelogg on Abigail Adams, a colonial dame, wife of John Adams, the revolutionary patriot and second President of the United States. A delicious "sack posset," made from a recipe in the Exact Cook Book, compiled in 1672 by Hannah Wolley, and in the possession of Mrs. Gibbons, was served.

* * *

Thursday of this week the Misses Dunn gave a very charming tea to Miss Young and Miss Alice Voorman. The former of these young ladies is engaged, I understand, to Churchill Williams of Philadelphia, and Miss Voorman to Heber Tilden of this city. Nowadays, it is hard to distinguish between teas, but this one figures as a "pink and white"—which is as good a distinction as one might ask. However, it was a very charming affair, and the Misses Dunn made hospitable and exceedingly pretty hostesses. Indeed, they are very handsome girls, and there is much regret expressed over the tidings of their excursion to Europe.

* * *

If some one will loan a mansion to the "Fortnightly," there may yet be another entertainment. The treasury contains money enough, and there is sufficient talent ready and willing to appear; but no one seems to want to figure as hostess—hence, the deadlock.

* * *

The Queens of the Flower Festivals do not meet with the approval of the better class of San Franciscans. Indeed, I am told that certain ladies who have claims in the direction of social leadership claim it is bourgeois to attend the Flower Festival. The assumption seems to be that at these affairs there is necessarily a multitude, and where there is a multitude there is a mixture. One may be forgiven for criticising so unpatriotic an attitude. It is by gatherings and festivals that a community proclaims itself. Heavens, but would the fatuous idiots who so announce themselves declare the Flower Festival at Nice bourgeois, I wonder?

* * *

AN interesting engagement is that of Miss Virginia Carter Thompson, a daughter of R. A. Thompson, ex-Appraiser, who is now proprietor of the Santa Rosa Democrat, and Mr. Alan Dean Whittaker, a Philadelphia man, who is connected with the U. S. Gas Company and is out here installing improved plants in the various companies of the Coast. He is a graduate of the University of Pennsylvania, and a rising man in his profession. Miss Thompson is a decidedly pretty and bright girl. They are to be married in the Fall, and will go to live in Pennsylvania.

* * *

I learn that the engagement existing between Miss Head and Mr. A. J. Mountney Jephson has been terminated. No reasons are given; though it is said he conducted himself with less consideration than his fiancée thought herself entitled to. He has recently been appointed a Queen's messenger, a role which sounds more impressive than it is. Considering the almost invariable failure of these international marriages it seems to me the young lady is decidedly to be congratulated, for she is, without question, one of the most charming, refined, and accomplished girls in our society.

* * *

Mr. Ewell and Miss Jane Masten were married at half-past eight Thursday evening of this week. Miss Masten is a daughter of N. K. Masten of this city; Doctor Foute performed the ceremony, Robert Campbell was best man, and Miss Alice Masten, the sister of the bride, acted as maid of honor. The bride's gown was of white organdie, made with high neck, long sleeves, and a skirt of the ordinary walking length. I believe that Miss Masten is one of the first, if not the first, to inaugurate the fashion of appearing in a bridal gown minus the decoration of a train, heretofore considered essential. Miss Alice Masten, however, was more en regle, for her gown was made décolleté and was finished with a trailing length of skirt. The bride and groom leave immediately for Mill Valley, where I believe they are to spend their honeymoon.

* * *

The death of James Nash Brown has evoked many expressions of regret, though it must be said his demise was not unexpected. Still he had so long defied the prognostications of his doctors that his many friend thought to have him with them for several years to come. His marriage to Miss Scott, daughter of Irving M. Scott, was one of the social events of last season, and was decidedly a love match. They had been engaged several years, but their union was delayed by the delicacy of the groom's health. The happy pair had just moved into their pretty new home on the corner of Pierce and Jackson Streets, which had been furnished according to the artistic perceptions of the bride. It is certainly one of the quaintest and most interesting interiors in the city. Among the features is an immense old mahogany sideboard, together with some very rare porcelain and many beautiful pieces of antique furniture which Mr. Scott, who has an eye for such things, had picked up from time to time and had presented to his daughter at her wedding.

* * *

THE BOHEMIAN CLUB election was a very unexciting affair, which landed the regular ticket candidates quietly in office. At the eleventh hour, or it may have been a little later, the opposition, if such it could be dubbed by a vehement tug on the imagination, hoisted its colors reversely and with a quasi-humorous pronunciamento withdrew from the contest announcing its willingness to be "treated" by the regular candidates for its magnanimous action. No life was ever infused into the opposition and the only evidence that it was intended as a "joke" is the pronunciamento aforesaid. Had there been a vigorous contest it would have done much good even though the regular ticket had worn out. These contests rarely harm and all but invariably stimulate interest in the affairs of the institution.

* * *

The annual statement of the Bohemian Club is a very satisfactory one. Upward of $10,000 has been expended in the alterations, additions, and occasional beautification of the inward of the building and the Simeon Wenban plaster has been all but renewed. The price of release from the contract to take the building on the northwest corner of Sutter and Mason Streets was $24,000 and the Club gave two notes of $12,000 each. The first was taken up before it was due, and payments have been made on the second which guarantee it a similarly fortunate fate. The retiring Board of Directors gave suave Horace a little souvenir of their pleasant association with him in the shape of a cut-glass inkstand with a silver top. On the bulbous lid the club owl and legend "weaving spiders come not here," was engraved and underneath it "From the Directors to the President," and the date; altogether a neat souvenir.

* * *

Tom Williams of the Examiner has addressed a letter to the Bohemian Club in which he asks the members for advice. He states that Samuel Clemens, who everybody knows as "Mark Twain," wants to visit this Coast. The wit would like to do so as a matter of pleasure solely, but if he do so at all it must be on a business basis, as he is in a condition closely approximating that best described as "strapped." If he can get sufficient "encouragement," Mark will come West and give a series of lectures. The letter has not yet been answered.

Swain's, at 213 Sutter Street, is the only place in the city at which one can find first-class pies, cakes, and confectionery.

Chew Adams' Pepsin Tutti-Frutti. It is sovereign for Indigestion and agreeable to the taste.

Kelly's Corn Cure never fails. 25 cents. 102 Eddy Street.

* * *

So Ed Greenway has been appointed agent for Mumm's! Mumm is to be congratulated, inasmuch as the best man for the place has certainly been selected. Apropos of wines, I am told that the production for the past three or four years in France has been large, and that in the cellars of the champagne dealers there is a larger quantity of wine than has ever been collected before. Still, there is no suggestion of a decrease in price, for we in America are not discriminating drinkers, and, outside certain of the clubs, one brand and one vintage is as acceptable as another. In England, however, the vintage question is of considerable importance, and stocks are classified according to years. It seems '87 is one of the very good years, and its product is mentioned as particularly valuable in the London market. I am told most of the poor vintages are unloaded on the American market, and it is interesting for those who desire to discriminate to know that the cork is, or should be, stamped with the year of its birth. If no mark is there, depend on it something is wrong.

* * *

Cooking-schools are certainly deserving of encouragement, and I commend the tableaux to be given at Golden Gate Hall to all who are interested in the future of the race. Miss Mollie Hutchison has charge of the affair, and she has arranged a series of artistic pictures in which a dozen pretty girls, and an equal number of good-looking young men are to figure. As usual, Gibson's groups are prominent, but, in addition, we shall have Grecian, picnic, and Japanese scenes.

* * *

Mrs. George Crocker, I am told, is becoming quite a personality in New York Society. She has made tremendous strides toward the innermost circle, and is said to have got there quicker than any western woman who ever came to Gotham. Her success is ascribed to the possession of tact and amiability, backed, of course, by the great wealth of her husband.

* * *

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest C. Le Montagne are now visiting in Boston, where Mr. Le Montagne has been selected to decide the saddle-horse and hunter's classes in the forthcoming Horse Show. He has long been considered one of the best judges of these classes in the country, but business affairs for the last few years have prevented his taking an active interest in equine festivals. I am told he is also to judge the same classes at the Brookline Horse Show, and, in all probability, will perform a similar function at the steeplechasing of the Brookline Country Club.

* * *

Already the exodus to Burlingame, San Mateo, and Menlo has begun. Major and Mrs. Rathbone have given up their town house, and are installed at Menlo for the summer, G. L. Rathbone accompanying them. The Ed. Ayers leave town next week, and other members of the Ayer and Atherton families will follow soon. Major Hooper, I hear, has taken the Williams cottage at Burlingame for the summer.

* * *

A big baseball game is in the wind—for charity of course; or rather, for the Mercantile Library. Though, under ordinary rules, one should not speak of a library as among the eleemosynary institutions. It is to occur next Saturday, at Central Park; with the University of California on one side, and the University Club on the other. Van Stowe manages the latter team, and Miller, of Berkeley, is at the head of their opponents. The Club team is as follows: Alfred Cohen (Captain), Wm. Magee, Thos. Magee, Jr., Arthur Allen, Geo. Greenwood, Joe Tobin, Lawrie Adams, Fred Howard, Everett Bee, Ed Ayer, Harry Knowles, and Milton Latham. The University team will be drawn from the following: Johnston (Captain), Wheeler, Worden, Hennessy, McLaren, Elston, Procter, Gooding, Dean, Hoag, Kaarsberg, Dean, Blasingame, Rawlings, Krug.

* * *

A theater-party which comprises sixty-eight guests is an affair to comment upon. These are about the dimensions of the Leon Sloss entertainment of Tuesday night. The party was scattered all through the orchestra of the Baldwin in little groups, and, later on, they all adjourned to the Sloss mansion on Van Ness Avenue, where an elaborate supper was served. This is one of the very handsomely furnished houses of the town. The interior was arranged by a well-known decorative firm, whose results are always notable for good taste; and the effect was enhanced by a rich profusion of beautiful flowers.

* * *

The Friday Night Bowling Club talks of an entertainment in return for the big dinner which the male members gave at the Cliff House. That seems to have escaped record, but it was really a brilliant affair, for a capital menu was served, and the auspices were thoroughly enjoyable. The coming event, however, is the Schweitzer-Hirsch wedding, for which the Concordia has been secured. Considering the dimensions of the bride's family, it is necessary to obtain as much room as possible, and the big ballroom of the club offers available facilities in this direction.

* * *

The engagement of real moment is that just announced between Miss Alice Gerstle and Mr. J. B. Levison of the "Fireman's Fund." Louis Gerstle, father of the prospective bride, is President of the Alaska Commercial Co., and one of the very rich men of the State. Mr. Levison is Marine Secretary of the sole survivor among the California Companies. He figures as one of the brightest men in his line, and, at underwriting undoubtedly has a future. He is a member of the Bohemian and Verein Clubs, and is a clever amateur flautist. Miss Gerstle is a charming girl, whose tact and amiability of manner have won her many friends. The affair is very decidedly a love match.

* * *

The interesting story of the marriage of Princess Kaiulani, which most of the dailies have announced, is denied by the royal damsel, who says she would not jeopardize her rights to the Hawaiian throne by wedding a foreigner. Her Majesty, Lilioukalani, it seems, has a château in northern Italy, and resides there in state. One can not but think how much more appropriate would it have been had this eminent lady made Burlingame her headquarters instead of retiring to the old world for solace!

* * *

MATRIMONY claims another Oakland maiden this week, and, as usual, it is a stranger who is to be congratulated. Miss Lida Thompson, a very pretty girl, whose home is on one of the peaks of Prospect Heights, is engaged to Mr. Dudley of Stockton. Miss Thompson is a graduate of Mills Seminary, but, having spent the last year or so in Europe, finishing her education, she is hardly as well known to the young people as the other members of her set. An engagement that interests East Oaklanders considerably is that of Miss Mamie Pope and Mr. Rossiter of San Diego. Their marriage is set for the 23d, and, in the meantime, the prospective bride is undergoing a course of entertainment. Miss Pope is musical, bright, and a very sweet girl; plays the violin charmingly, and is a great favorite in her set. The marriage is to be celebrated in the Pope mansion, which is one of the swell houses of which the "Borax" Smith place is the center. In honor of the affair, Miss Lucy May has issued invitations for a card-party, while Miss Blix Smith had a reception for the bride this week.

* * *

East Oakland is to lose the Crouches for the summer. Miss Crouch had a card-party in honor of her sister and brother-in-law' Mr. and Mrs. Tainter, who left this week for their home. It was quite an affair, and among the features was an excellent champagne punch. Miss Crouch goes East about May 1st.

* * *

The Garber tea was by no means the only affair on Saturday afternoon last. Besides it, there were receptions at Mrs. Borland's and at the Tuft's. The Belle Rose is indeed a charming place for a garden party, and the flowers, of which Mrs. Garber is so proud, were in the height of their Spring beauty. The Berkeley set of maidens assisted the family to receive their guests.

* * *

I am told the Brown tea, on Wednesday last, is universally pronounced the prettiest reception of the year. The decorations were quite out of the ordinary—the hall in lilies and snowballs, the drawing-room in La France and Duchesse roses, and the dining-room in yellow. The effect was very swell, and showed off the gowns admirably. Miss Floy Brown wore a pink silk Louis Quinze dress, beautifully made, and her sister, Mrs. Evarts, was in pale blue. The Jackson-street set assisted in its best bibs and tuckers, and every one went away enthusiastic.

* * *

Over in Berkeley "The Argonauts" has come in for considerable criticism. The play was written by Mr. Raymond Russ, one of the members of the D. K. E Fraternity. While rather amateurish in places—noticeably in the length of the first act—it was entertaining and witty, and shows considerable promise for a first attempt. Especially good was the telephone scene in the last act.

* * *

The cotillion given by the Junior and Senior classes of the State University in the Harmon Gymnasium last Friday was a very enjoyable affair from first to last. The versatile "Brick" Morse, of athletic fame, acted as leader in some figures that were not overintricate. The dancing was kept up till past midnight, but the entertainment was not relieved by refreshments, much to the disappointment of the maidens who prefer their Terpsichorean enjoyment to have some support. The guests were of the younger set, mainly drawn from the ranks of the "Little Ducks," among whom are some exceedingly pretty and vivacious damsels. From among them will be drawn the crop of winter débutantes. The Berkeley set was present in full force, of course, together with a handful of the girls of older growth from Oakland. Most of the fraternities turned over their club houses to their lady guests for the night. THE GOSSIP.

Adams's Tutti-Frutti Chewing Gum for Indigestion.

Reduce your obesity by taking Brooks's Phytolacca. Pleasant to take. Makes walking a pleasure. No diet necessary. Trial size 50 cents. Try it. Get it at 119 Powell Street. Mailed free on receipt of price.

The oldest shipping house at Port St. Mary's, Spain, is the well-known one of Duff, Gordon & Co., shippers of the Duff, Gordon, & Co., sherries.

Deutz and Geldermann's "Gold Lack" is, without doubt, the finest dry champagne imported. No connoisseur should fail to try it.

Mr. Strozynski, who for many years has had a beautiful store at Leavenworth and Ellis Streets has decided to come down town so that his store will be more convenient for his patrons. Mr. Strozynski has leased the new store at 24 Geary Street, and is having it fitted as only he can do it. The new store is most centrally located, and many of his old patrons who have found his present store a little out of the way, may, after May 1st, go to the leading hairdresser without any inconvenience.

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist, 806 Market St

Good Appetite

Is restored and the disordered Stomach and Liver invigorated by taking a small wineglassful, before meals, of the celebrated . . . . . .

Peruvian Bitters

Wedding Invitations are properly engraved and in correct form, at ROBERTSON'S

Napa Soda Springs California's Famous Mountain Spa!

HAVE YOU BEEN THERE LATELY?

Napa Valley. Climate unsurpassed. Views magnificent. Table supplied from orchard and ocean, field and farm. Hot and cold Napa Soda water baths. Telephone and Postoffice. Burros to ride. Bowling alleys, tennis, croquet swings and hammocks. New improvements every year. Gas and running water in every room. Relief for asthmatics. WARM WATER SWIMMING TANK. An ideal summer resort. Children's paradise, mothers' delight, husbands' rest. Address ANDREW JACKSON, Napa Soda Springs, P. O.

Blithedale

The nearest Summer Resort to San Francisco, and the most charming, is within five minute's drive from Mill Valley Station. Wooded hills shelter it from the wind and fog. Rose paths and beds of fragrant clover surround the houses, and all around are the redwoods—300 acres of woods. The cottages have porcelain bath tubs and electric lights and perfect sewerage. The never failing brook runs through the place. Table excellent—cream every day. Terms moderate. For particulars, address MRS. FARRAR, who will be at Blithedale after April 15th.

The place will open on May 1st.

TAVERN OF CASTLE CRAG

QUEEN OF ALL MOUNTAIN RESORTS

The Tavern of Castle Crag, the most beautiful, attractive and accessible of all mountain resorts, will open for the reception of guests, June 1, and will close October 1, 1896.

GEORGE SCHONEWALD, Manager
ROOM 59, UNION TRUST BUILDING
SAN FRANCISCO

BYRON

Rheumatism, Sciatica, Neuralgia, Chronic Malaria, Liver and Kidney Troubles, Bladder Troubles, Dyspepsia, Eczema, Gout, Obesity, Alcoholism in all its forms—can be positively cured at Byron Hot Springs.

CURES

SEA BEACH HOTEL, SANTA CRUZ, CAL.

The Ideal Summer Resort should offer gaiety for the gay, rest for the weary, a beautiful country for the nature lover, a pleasant home and genial climate for all. These and many other attractions may be found at the Sea Beach Hotel, within easy reach of San Francisco. For additional information, address—

JOHN R. CHACE, Proprietor.

Gladness Comes

With a better understanding of the transient nature of the many physical ills which vanish before proper efforts—gentle efforts—pleasant efforts—rightly directed. There is comfort in the knowledge that so many forms of sickness are not due to any actual disease, but simply to a constipated condition of the system, which the pleasant family laxative, Syrup of Figs, promptly removes. That is why it is the only remedy with millions of families, and is everywhere esteemed so highly by all who value good health. Its beneficial effects are due to the fact, that it is the one remedy which promotes internal cleanliness, without debilitating the organs on which it acts. It is therefore all important, in order to get its beneficial effects, to note when you purchase, that you have the genuine article, which is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only, and sold by all reputable druggists.

If in the enjoyment of good health, and the system is regular, then laxatives or other remedies are not needed. If afflicted with any actual disease, one may be commended to the most skillful physicians, but if in need of a laxative, then one should have the best, and with the well-informed everywhere, Syrup of Figs stands highest and is most largely used and gives most general satisfaction.

PERRIER-JOUET CHAMPAGNE EXTRA DRY "SPECIAL"

Also specially selected stock of Clarets and White Wines on hand.

W. B. CHAPMAN, Sole Agent Pacific Coast
123 California Street

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco
33 Post Street, below Kearny, Mechanics' Institute Building
Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000
JAS. D. PHELAN, Pres. GEO. A. STORY, Cashier
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.
DIRECTORS—Jas. D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. P. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.
Interest paid on term and ordinary deposits.
Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.
When opening accounts, send signature.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE
OF LONDON
Incorporated by Royal Charter A. D. 1726
Capital Paid Up, $3,476,100 Assets, $21,584,113
Surplus to Policy Holders, $8,983,251
ROBERT DICKSON, Manager
NATHAN & KINGSTON, San Francisco Agents
501 MONTGOMERY ST.

Sun Insurance Office OF LONDON
Founded A.D. 1710 Cash Assets $10,270,535
Oldest Purely Fire Insurance Office in the World
The Lion Fire Ins. Co. Ltd., OF LONDON
Established A.D. 1879 Cash Assets, $1,108,095
The Imperial Ins. Co. Ltd., OF LONDON
Instituted A.D. 1803 Cash Assets, $9,832,920
40 Years in Business on the Pacific Coast
Manager for the Pacific Coast, WM. J. LANDERS
205 and 207 Sansome Street, near Pine

Aachen and Munich Fire Insurance Co.
Of Aix La Chapelle, Germany. Established 1805
Capital, $2,250,000.00
Total Assets, $6,854,653.65
United States Department
204 SANSOME STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

COMET OOLONG
The oldest and most reliable brand of Tea on the market. Sold only in ⅓ pound papers at 20 cents per paper.
All grocers keep it.

RIPPLES.

CAMPING.

Camping, even without its many attributes, is considered by many weak-minded people as one of the most delightful sports. This goes to show that even in this enlightened age the barbarian spirit still dominates in the breasts of the majority.

What sport one can find in discarding his city raiment and donning that of the country yahoo for the purpose of getting as far away from civilization as may be possible, and sleeping out of doors or in a stuffy little tent rather than on a nice spring mattress in his city home, is more than I can understand. If these people were compelled to sleep in a tent or out of doors, they would be the last ones to do it gracefully. However, if you want to go camping, why go; but take my advice and the following described along with you, if you would get some enjoyment out of the trip:

First of all you must take a good, strong, portable house, capable of holding your entire party, as many bedsteads and spring mattresses as may be necessary, cook stove, and utensils, and enough fodder to last you a month longer than you propose to stay. Be sure to take plenty of beans and bacon with you so you may indulge in the same at least three times a day. You will then know how to appreciate city life when you return. Be sure to take a piano along, and as much of the parlor furniture and bric-a-brac from your city residence as can be spared. Do not forget to take a first-class cook, also a couple of upstair girls along.

In selecting your party to go camping, never select those whom you think are the nicest fellows in your set. Always select the opposite. The nicest fellows in the city always turn out to be anything but the same sweet-scented fellows in camp; and those you think the least of in the city are usually crack-a-jacks in camp-life. There is no place in the world where a man can better improve himself in the study of human nature than in camp life. A man invariably shows his calibre while camping, and, the the beauty of it is, he doesn't know it.

Were I about to go into business with a man whom I had known and been with day and night for thirty years or more, I would not close the bargain until I had taken him camping for a couple of days. Two days would tell me correctly what he was, no matter what might have been my previous opinion.

To be on the safe side, it is always well when pitching camp to select a place as close to some farmhouse as the farmer may permit, as you will undoubtedly want to borrow some salt or something of that kind, which you will invariably forget to bring with you. Then, again, it is a good idea to have a good strong roof nearby where one may seek shelter in case of a rain storm.

If the party consists of men only, make no mistake but take a first-class cook along. Of course you know how to cook as well as any professional, or at least you think you do, but on account of past experiences you ain't going to cook, for no one in camp is found more fault with than the cook. The other fellow thinks the same way, and the probability is he does know how to boil water without burning out the bottom of the kettle. The other fellow maybe never had any experience in a camp before, and will, undoubtedly, insist upon being appointed cook. Not to comply with his request will cause ill feelings. It will be the same if you favor him in the way desired; therefore it is well to be provided with a professional cook before starting.

I went camping once myself with a first-class crowd of men. The cook was not hired but he was a crack-a-jack with a saucepan. If there were a person in the world that could cook anything in a saucepan that our cook couldn't I would like to know what it is. I've seen him cook tea, bread, pie, beans and anything else that you could think of in a saucepan. He didn't do it because he didn't have the other utensils, but because it saved labor, which seemed to me to be very unsportmanlike.

One evening the cook's brother paralyzed me by remarking, "By Jove! George makes pretty good biscuits, doesn't he?" "Where are the biscuits?" inquired I. "Why, you are eating one now." "What!" I yelled, "are those biscuits? I thought they were dumplings."

The cook never felt as friendly toward me after that. Even the balance of the boys stated that I didn't know what was good. Maybe I don't, but I know what's bad, and if the wife of any in the party had placed before her master such food as was offered us, she would have gotten a piece of that of which all the members of our camping-party lacked the most. The man who camps is a chump.

A FEARFUL SENTENCE.

Judge—Prisoner, you have been found guilty of murder in the first degree. Have you anything to say before sentence is pronounced against you?

Prisoner—Nothing, your Honor.

Judge—Then the sentence of this court is that you be condemned to sleep in a folding bed until you are dead, dead, dead; and may the Lord have mercy upon your soul.

THE LATEST.

"Here comes that Miss Flighty with her loud skirt. The hateful thing!"

"I don't see anything loud about her skirt."

"Heavens! Can't you hear that rustle?"

"Christmas! I would give ten dollars extra for a rustle in a skirt like that."

MOSTLY OFF.

Blossom—Do you ride your bike much?

Bloomer—Oh, yes, off and on.

NOT HIGH ENOUGH.

Porter—The only berth I can give you, Mum, is lower ten.

Mrs. Shoddy—No lower ten for me; give me the upper ten or nothing.

SOMETIMES.

Little Freddie—Do figures ever lie, Papa?

Papa (ex-Editor of a defunct daily)—Only when placed at the head of an editorial column, my son.

THROWN OUT.

She—Did pa kick very hard against our nuptials?

He—Blessed if I know; but he kicked awfully hard against my trousers.

DESERVING.

First Burglar—What did you get for that plate you stole last year from the house on the Avenue?

Second Burglar—Six months.

AT THE JEWELERS, CLOCK AND WATCH MAKERS'.

"Is the proprietor in?"

"Not at present, sir; but he'll be back in a few minutes. He just stepped down the street to get the correct time."

OH! WOMAN.

Mr. Youngwed—I met Miss Devon to-day.

Mrs. Youngwed—What kind of a person is she?

Mr. Youngwed—She is very womanly, indeed.

Mrs. Youngwed—She must be awfully homely, then.

IN FRISCO.

"Have you seen 'Puddn'head Wilson'?"

"No; but I've seen Puddin'head Sutro."

THE PANACEA.

Blossom (on his way to the office)—By Jove! I'm feeling fine this morning; guess I'll go in here and take a little whisky.

Blossom (the next morning)—Hang it! I don't feel very well this morning; think I'll go into Billy's and get a little whisky.

THE BRUTE.

Wife (admiringly)—Oh, George, just look at my new bonnet! Is it not a dream?

Husband (observing the bill)—I would to Heaven it were, dear. I would to Heaven it were.

NOT ON YOUR LIFE.

She—I dislike handsome men; they are so conceited.

He—I'm sure I am not conceited.

OF COURSE.

Husband (a would-be humorist)—It's strange I don't hear anything from that instalment of jokes I sent Squibbs. If they have no use for 'em they should have been returned three weeks ago.

Wife—Probably the editor is having an X-ray thrown on them for the purpose of ascertaining if they contain anything that is funny.

LOOKING FORWARD.

Bishop Floss—I cannot understand why you selected for a second husband such a scamp as Bliss, when your first husband was such a religious man.

She—You don't suppose that I have any desire to meet two husbands in the hereafter, do you? BRUNO.

I wrote, one day, some tender lines
I thought would live;
They bore the same inspired ring
That poets give.
Alas! I wrote these soulful lines
Upon my cuff;
My laundress thought that they had lived
Quite long enough.
—Yonker's Statesman.

Beecham's pills are for biliousness, bilious headache, dyspepsia, heartburn, torpid liver, dizziness, sick headache, bad taste in the mouth, coated tongue, loss of appetite, sallow skin, etc., when caused by constipation; and constipation is the most frequent cause of all of them.

Go by the book. Pills 10¢ and 25¢ a box. Book free at your druggist's or write B. F. Allen Co., 365 Canal Street, New York.

Annual sales more than 6,000,000 boxes.

J. F. Cutter
EXTRA
Old Bourbon
has been a staple family and medicinal whiskey for a quarter-century
E. MARTIN
—AND—
CO.
411 MARKET ST.
SAN FRANCISCO

FOR GRIPPE IT'S A DANDY
VINA BRANDY
AND
It's Pure! That's Sure!
VINA DISTILLERY CO.
819 Market St., S. F.

GEORGE E. HALL
Agent and Importer of Foreign Wines
MUTUAL LIFE BUILDING,
222 Sansome Street

GEO. GOODMAN
Patentee and Manufacturer of—Artificial Stone
Schillinger's Patent In all its branches
SIDE WALK and GARDEN WALK A Specialty
Office, 307 MONTGOMERY ST. Nevada Block, SAN FRANCISCO

Established 1856
Benj. Curtaz & Son
Pacific Coast Agents
16-18-20 O'Farrell St.

Scott's Emulsion

looks like cream; flows like cream; tastes almost like cream. It feeds your strength as cream would feed it if you could assimilate it. You can assimilate Scott's Emulsion

THE WHITE FLYER IS THE MOUNT FOR '96

BARNES BICYCLES

HOOKER & CO.
16-18 Drumm St.
RETAIL STORE:
1640 Market St.
San Francisco, Cal.

THE WHITE RIMMED HUMMER IS THE COMER

A CARLOAD OF '96

PIERCE CYCLES TRIED AND TRUE

JUST RECEIVED

Many Superior Improvements. Ask to see the

Pierce Crank Hanger

Holbrook, Merrill & Stetson
Pacific Coast Agents
MARKET and BEALE STREETS
SAN FRANCISCO

Ask for Catalogue

A HOME PRODUCT

AXLE-EASE

THE VERY BEST
AXLE GREASE

Made by—
AMERICAN OIL CO.
SAN FRANCISCO

A. D. CHESHIRE, Pres. and Manager
W. O. MACDOUGALL, Secretary

CALIFORNIA UNDERTAKING CO.
Fine Funeral Furnishers
Telephone, Main 971 — 123 STOCKTON ST., Cor. Geary
Finest Funeral Parlors in the city
Embalming a specialty — Open day and night

THE WHEEL.

COMMENT AND CRITICISM ON RECENT EVENTS IN THE CYCLING WORLD.

The Relay has been lost and won. Nine clubs have lost the race, and the other has won it. Thus much was to have been expected. Thus much could have been safely prophesied as soon as the number of the entries was known. But beyond that, prophecy was hazardous, as I said last week, and the event has proved the truth of that assertion, for the Relay was full of surprises at almost every point of the course except the finish, and there the expected happened.

A race of this sort is like a great battle. It is a composite struggle made up of incidents almost innumerable; of these, no one person can see more than a few, and the participants themselves must learn how the race or the battle was won or lost from others. Information as to how this particular race was lost is not at all hard to obtain, and there are just nine different versions of it. How the race was won the winners of it tell to the readers of this page.

From personal observation, I feel that I can add little to the history of the Relay of '96. The sight of Fritz Hansen with the blood wetting his sleeve as he plugged pluckily up the Six Mile Hill, after his fall at the very outset, is the most vivid thing in my memory. Surely his work in finishing that first relay in thirty minutes flat under such circumstances was one of the most creditable performances of the day.

Without a doubt, the race, taken as a whole, far exceeded in interest any previous contest of the kind. The general good quality of the riders, the almost equal strength of five of the teams, the day, with its opportunities for skilful riding with and against a gale—all these things contributed to its success. The accidents were few, but two of them unfortunate in the extreme. An ordinary accident on the road, such as a puncture, or a fall resulting in a smashed wheel, the running over a dog or a child, the loss of a nut or a toe clip, are fair incidents of a road race, and the skill of a rider in avoiding happenings of this kind is a legitimate factor of his success. But a collision between two contestants in the race is an accident not in the same class. The unfortunate occurrence which resulted in throwing Squires and Foster out of the race was entirely foreign to road riding proper, and is thoroughly regrettable from every point of view.

Well, the end of it all is that the Bay City's won out, and for the second time. The whole world acknowledged the victory; even the ferry boat that carried home a goodly portion of the returning crowd had the words "Bay City" blazoned across her pilot house in letters of old gold, and the sun sank down behind the Oakland marshes through a sky of crimson and gold.

All honor to the victorious riders! But now for a serious word or two with those who made their victory possible, those who mapped out the plan of the contest and chose and placed the men. I am speaking to you, Mr. Sheldon, to Mr. Kerrigan and Mr. Waters, and those of your club who have the deciding of these things. You have won out the Relay for your club. But can you say fairly and honestly that it was done with strict adherence to spirit of the rules of the Road Racing Committee? You are well aware that a man who is not an amateur should not have ridden in this contest. Does the mere fact that a rider has not yet been declared a professional by the Racing Board make him any the less so? Let me ask you, gentlemen, if you can say in all candor that none of the men who assisted in your victory were professionals. Of course, the race is over now. Nothing can change the result. But in the interest of true sportsmanship, would you not feel better, feel honester, if some three of your riders were not so near the verge of the professional class that they will be so declared the first time they appear on the track? This is not a post-mortem, but a suggestion for '97, and there goes with it the hope, more, the faith even, that you will act upon it.

Coming home from the race there was such a jam of wheels that many riders were unable to secure places for themselves and their machines on the local trains, and this in spite of the fact that extra baggage-cars had been provided on all the trains. The method of handling bicycles which is employed by the railroad company at present is absolutely no method, and the confusion and uncertainty about the matter led me to have a talk with Mr. T. H. Goodman, the General Passenger Agent of the Southern Pacific Company, on the subject.

"It's quite a chore," he said, "carrying these wheels on trains, and the Company ought to get some pay for it. Since the first of the year we have been charging for the transportation of wheels to points fifty miles from San Francisco. To nearer points they are carried free."

It seems that the Transcontinental Passenger Association and the Western Passenger Association have issued circulars requiring their members to charge for the carriage of bicycles as excess baggage. The train-men, I learned, have no authority to take the wheels unless they are checked, but they are very lax in observing the rule. Whether or not the Company could be compelled to check the wheels as baggage is still a question. It has been settled, however, in New York by the passage of the Armstrong Bill which declares the wheel to be baggage.

I asked Mr. Goodman if the Company had considered the question of furnishing cars provided with bicycle racks or any special contrivance for the carriage of wheels, and learned that, in his opinion, nothing would be done in that line till some of the other railroad companies had tried the experiment.

The wheel is a very bulky and delicate piece of machinery and the problem of its transportation has already become a serious one in railroading. The time required to properly load and unload any considerable number of wheels is the main cause of the difficulty. If checks were required and the Company had to put all the wheels on board the cars and take them off, it would require three or four men at times at some stations to do this work. On one New York railroad the plan adopted is this: Each wheel has a tag attached to it and a coupon bearing the same number is given to the owner who is required to take his wheel to the door of the baggage car and be on hand to receive it there on arriving at his destination.

That something will have to be done in the matter toward systematizing the carriage of bicycles on the trains about this city is evident enough to any one whose machine has been through the present tangle.

C. MICHENER.

HOW WE WON THE RELAY.

F. H. KERRIGAN.

A most important portion of the annual Relay Race never comes to the attention of the public. On the day of the event they watch the riders and note the times of starts and finishes, are pleased at the clever work of some, are disappointed in others. But, I suppose, not one in ten of the people who stood watching the bulletins as they came in while the race was in progress ever considered that this was merely the final day of an effort that had begun months before. The record of that final day is pretty complete. Some of us could add a touch or two here and there, perhaps, but the main facts of it are already known to all who read. I shall therefore speak mainly of the period that preceded the day of the actual race, the period of preparation and training, and shall try to suggest some of the reasons for the success of the Bay City's team. I do this in the interest of the sport in general, because it seems to me that if the methods we adopted were employed to the same degree by the other clubs, while the Bay City's chances of success would be dimished, yet elements would be added to the contest that would improve it greatly.

First of all I want to put into the record a little incident which shows that, on our part at least, the rivalry between the clubs is a generous one. There is a feeling in the air after every success of the Bay City Wheelmen that that club is ready to take advantage of any opportunity, to employ any means or trick, to bring about the result its members desire. But this is not the case. When Hardy Downing, the crack rider of the Garden City's, was in the middle of his relay, his tire flattened. His trailer was nowhere to be seen and he was practically helpless, and his club consequently out of the race. Just then Freeman, a Bay City trailer, came up and gave Downing his wheel, and this, too, knowing that it was the Garden City's his club had most to fear. The talk of a protest on their part now on some technical ground is indeed jarring in the face of this little incident.

Our preparations for the Relay began really just a year before the day of the race. From that time till the morning of the struggle, no stone was left unturned to make our success as sure as it could be made. When the time came for actual training to begin, every member of the Club was made to feel that he could add something to its chances, that there was something he could do; and whatever it was—the writing of a letter, the running of an errand, rubbing down the men—it was done gladly and heartily, and with the feeling that every member in the Club had a share in the final failure or success. The fraternal feeling was cultivated and encouraged to the utmost. Every one was ready to train who could be of any possible use, although they knew that not one-half of them would be selected to ride.

The picking of the riders was a difficult matter. There were some twenty-five members of the Club who could have ridden a creditable ten miles on the day of the race, and to select the ten who would do the best was far from easy. In many cases there were records of recent individual performances which were of great assistance, but frequent and thorough try-outs were the sure aid. These try-outs were almost all private. No crowd was gathered to interfere with the riders; no opportunity was given any one outside of the Club to learn anything of their condition. The entries were kept absolutely secret, and the final team was a surprise. When the members of the team had once been determined on, there was necessarily more or less disappointment on the part of those who were not selected. But to show the character of the feeling, let me instance the case of a man who had trained hard and faithfully for two years for a position on the team without success, and then consented to act as trailer for the man who was selected in his stead.

When the team was picked, each man was sent to his course. With him went his best friend in the Club, and the two lived on the relay he was to ride for several days. The value of this part of the preparation cannot be overestimated. On the day of the race, none of the team lacked any assistance that could possibly be furnished. Every member was ready to forego the pleasure of seeing the start or finish if he could be of any use at any other point in the course. And so, through self-sacrifice and hard work, careful judgment, and the hearty assistance of every one of their clubmates and not through luck, the Bay City Wheelmen's riders, for a second time, carried the packet first over the tape.

DEERE IMPLEMENT COMPANY. SAN FRANCISCO

SEND FOR -1896- CATALOGUES

"NATIONAL" "MARCH" AND "DEERE" BICYCLES

DEERE IMPLEMENT CO. 305 & 307 MARKET ST.
330 POST ST. SAN FRANCISCO

-1895- WHEELS CHEAP

SPRING OPENING

MISS I. E. CONNER
Late of E. E. Caswell
FINE FRENCH MILLINERY
36 GEARY STREET

MENNEN'S BORATED TALCUM

TOILET POWDER

Approved by Highest Medical Authorities as a Perfect Sanitary Toilet Preparation
For infants and adults
Delightful after shaving
Positively relieves Prickley Heat, Nettle Rash, Chafed Skin, Sunburn, etc. Removes Blotches, Pimples; makes the skin smooth and healthy.
Take No Substitutes. Sold by druggists or mailed for 25 cts.
SAMPLE MAILED (Name this paper) FREE
GERHARD MENNEN CO., Newark, N. J.

—SPRING SEASON, 1896

GRAND OPENING
..OF..
FRENCH PATTERN BONNETS
AND—HIGH ART NOVELTIES

MARIA J. STACOM
531 Sutter Street - San Francisco

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT, IN AND FOR THE City and County of San Francisco, State of California, Department No. 9—Probate. In the matter of the estate and Guardianship of Emma Phyllis Clarke, a Minor. Order to show cause on application for Guardian for Order of Sale of Real Estate. It appearing to this Court from the petition this day presented and filed by Gustave H. Umbsen, the Guardian of the estate of Emma Phyllis Clarke, a minor, praying for an order of sale of certain real estate belonging to his said ward, that it will be beneficial to said minor, and expedient and advisable that such real estate should be sold.

It is hereby ordered, That the next of kin of the said ward, and all persons interested in the said estate, appear before this Court on Monday, the fourth day of May, A. D. 1896, at 10 o'clock A. M., at the courtroom of this Court, at the New City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, then and there to show cause why an order should not be granted for the sale of such estate.

And it is further ordered, That a copy of this order be published at least once a week for three successive weeks before the said day of hearing in THE WAVE, a newspaper printed and published in said City and County of San Francisco.

Dated April 3d, A. D. 1896.

J. V. COFFEY,
Judge of the Superior Court.

F. D. MADISON, Attorney for Guardian.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT, IN AND FOR THE City and County of San Francisco, State of California, Department No. 10—Probate. In the matter of the estate of Mary T. Thompson, deceased. Order to show cause why Order of Sale of Real Estate should not be made. A. J. Thompson, the Administrator of the estate of Mary T. Thompson, deceased, having filed his petition herein, duly verified, praying for an order of sale of all of the real estate of said decedent, for the purposes therein set forth.

It is therefore ordered by the said Court, that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased, appear before the said Superior Court, on Tuesday, the 12th day of May, 1896, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at the courtroom of Department No. 10—Probate—of said Superior Court, at the New City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said Administrator to sell all or so much of the real estate of the said deceased as shall be necessary, at public auction. And that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for four successive weeks, in THE WAVE, a newspaper printed and published in said city and county.

Dated April 9th, A. D. 1896.

CHARLES W. SLACK,
Judge of the Superior Court.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE.

BULLION MINING COMPANY.—LOCATION OF principal place of business, San Francisco, California: location of works, Virginia Mining District, Storey County, Nevada.

Notice is hereby given that at a meeting of the Board of Directors, held on the eighteenth day of March, 1896, an assessment (No. 47) of ten cents (10c) per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, room 11, No. 331 Pine Street, San Francisco California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on the twenty-second day of April, 1896, will be delinquent and advertised for sale at public auction, and unless payment is made before, will be sold on THURSDAY, the fourteenth day of May, 1896, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale. By order of the Board of Directors.

R. R. GRAYSON, Secretary.

Office—Room 11, No. 331 Pine Street, San Francisco, California.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

GOULD & CURRY SILVER MINING COMPANY

Assessment ..... No. 78
Amount per Share..... .....15 cents
Levied.....March 25, 1896
Delinquent in office.....April 28, 1896
Day of sale of Delinquent Stock .....May 20, 1896

ALFRED K. DURBROW, Secretary

Office—Room 69, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

NEW YORK HAIR DRESSING STORE
MME. E. KESSING, Proprietress
Artistic Hair Dressing and Shampooing. A new preventive for the hair falling out. Superfluous hair removed. 1704 Market Street, San Francisco

FASHIONS AND FRIVOLS.

There is no longer any necessity to worry about the fitness of things. Anything that is pretty is fit. Never before has fashion opened up so many possibilities for those of slender means. Neither has she ever before had so many brilliant devices to ensnare the bulging purse of the rich.

Nothing is any longer incongruous. You may outline your cuffs with tiny ruffles of Mechlin, your collar may be of some rich bit of Dresden ribbon, the yoke of your bodice of grass linen or batiste and you may outline the whole with a band of sable.

Satin, velvet, costly lace, inexpensive ribbon and dainty cotton fabrics may all be utilized in building up a fetching and modish gown. Blessed are those who have a well-stocked rag bag for they may have a gown that will outrival My Lady's straight from Paquin.

If you don't believe me, let the description of Miss de Wolfe's Easter gown designed and made by that famous authority convince you. And it is just as well to bear in mind that Miss de Wolfe is considered quite the best-dressed woman in New York.

It is a stunning affair of smooth black cloth, with a plain, full skirt. The waist has a yoke of finely tucked cream-white batiste, with a deep border of exquisite Sicilian embroidery in dull blue and ecru.

The bodice, which is brought down from the yoke in pretty folds, is of black satin. The long wrinkled sleeves are also edged with the embroidery and with a tiny band of sable. Sable is also used as an outline for the yoke. The high collar is of the embroidery.

With this dainty spring gown there is worn the most light and airy of hats. It is wide-brimmed and is of black tulle. Heavy black aigrettes stand up at the side and a wide band of gold embroidery holds the soft crown in black. The tulle brim is embroidered in gold and there is a large knob of the embroidery at the back.

Another tendency of the season is the revivals of old styles, and with this backward turn of fashion comes once again brilliant, gaudy stockings. Gorgeous stripes and striking plaids in hosiery are already upon us, but nary a sight yet of grandmamma's old stand by—and all the saints be praised for it!—the white stocking. Among the new stockings already in favor there are black stockings with fine iridescent colored stripes and stockings with flower-scattered insteps, as well as silk and lisle hose in all the latest, most pronounced shades For evening wear there are stockings with lace insertions, and sometimes the design of the lace is outlined with tiny pearls. When insertions are not used, the lace adorns the stocking in Vandyke points.

A distinguishing mark of this season is the number of flowers that are to be used. Hats are loaded down with flowers. There is the floral collar, and a pretty conceit is an evening gown with the decolletage outlined with blossoms.

And the flowers themselves are worthy the admiration they are receiving. So natural are they that one is sure of their fragrance. Yet they are artificial, after all. But the art of manufacturing them has almost reached perfection. Once an artificial flower consisted of lawn petals crudely dyed in various colors. Now velvet, silk and chiffon are used to mold the blossoms, and with such success that to tell them from the natural flower is almost impossible.

Of course, there are favorites among the artificial flowers, just as there are in the natural blossoms. This spring the primula is the flower of fashion. It is a simple flower on the geranium order, and comes in all the shades of pink, pale yellow, magenta, and purple. To the uninitiated it has much the appearance of a primrose. As a trimming it is most effective.

The orchid divides honors with the primula in fashionable favor. It is exquisitely shaded, made of velvet, silk, and chiffon, and many varieties are seen. These new orchids may be bought separately or in wreaths. Those most in favor are in the violet and mauve shades.

The poppy is another popular flower. There are big shaggy poppies as well as small ones, with the petals grouped close together, and in more colors than the natural poppy ever dreamed of.

Poppies in the Parma violet shades are the latest novelty. Green poppies are also new and a combination considered quite correct consists of grouping green and purple poppies together. For evening wear the poppies are made entirely of chiffon and are exquisite in color and effectively soft and graceful.

This is a silk season and nothing is more in keeping with the order of things than the stiff glacé silk should be besprinkled with flowers.

The importation of summer silks and satins from the great French manufacturers shows the prominence of Marie Antoinette designs. There are many bright chené flowers printed on white and pale-hued satins and taffetas. These mark that gay but short period of the Little Trianon when an affected simplicity and all manner of flower-garlanded shepherdess fashions were in vogue. Pale lavender, rose, ciel blue, and straw-colored satins are shown, printed with long-stemmed lilies, sprays of button roses, or other blossoms. The flower-printed satins are often brocaded in fine patterns of fern leaves, grass clusters, or baten sprays in the tint of the ground, and the flowers are then printed a la chené over this ground.

Ombre or shaded effects, which are usually introduced with chené-printed flowers, are a noticeable part of the season's coloring. Great roses or other blossoms printed in many varying tones of the same color are shown on taffeta grounds of harmonizing hues.

Some of the most effective silks have white grounds and are figured with huge tulips and other flowers in delft-blue coloring. A great many of the silks are characterized by the use of ceramic patterns and coloring. The loveliest palm-leaf patterns in such coloring as are seen on old Persian tiles are shown on ivory-tinted satin and taffetas.

Some of the new fashions are hideous examples of the evil of trying to be two things at once, and this is particularly noticeable in the matter of sleeves. There has been a sort of sleeve panic among the promulgators of fashion.

As if it were not bad enough to have Mrs. McKee and Russell Harrison stay away from the Dimmick-Harrison wedding, the Post had to go and add to the poor bride's troubles. Everybody knows that the wedding gown is almost a compensation for the groom's staying away. And when you have a love of a gown and have it said in cold hard print that your sleeves—and they are such an important question just now—"continue to the bottom of the Henry IV. coat," and that your skirt has "a jabot of jace in apron effect upon the vest front,"—well, it is simply awful, but I wouldn't worry.

BABETTE.

"BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES," give relief in all Bronchial Affections. A simple and safe remedy. Avoid imitations.

Madam de Soto makes a specialty of making ladies' underwear and children's garments. The best of materials are used, the prices are moderate, and no one should think of buying any of these articles without seeing Madam de Soto, at 414 Geary St., and inquiring as to her price for making.

Poets sing of "woman's crowning glory." To perpetuate a beautiful head of hair, to prevent it from falling out, to incite it to a renewed healthy growth, is the assurance that goes with every bottle of Quinonia. Should your dealer not have it, get it at Lederer's, 111 Stockton Street; thirty-five cents a bottle.

When you are selecting a wedding present, go to S. & G. Gump's, 113 Geary Street. They have a magnificent variety to choose from.

El Campo, the popular Bay resort, now open every Sunday during the season. Music, dancing, bowling, boating, fishing, and other amusements. Refreshments at city prices. Fare, round trip, 25c; children 15c; including admission to the grounds. The steamer "Ukiah" will leave Tiburon ferry 10:30 A. M., 12:10 P. M., 2 and 4 P. M. Returning, leave El Campo 11:15 A. M., 1, 3, and 5 P. M.

CLEANLINESS THE WATCHWORD.

In no other city in the world, probably, does there exist an institution parallel or similar to the Lurline Baths. It is simply unequaled anywhere. Aside from the novelty of the fact that one may enjoy a plunge in the water of the ocean, in the heart of a great city; aside from this fact, I say, the institution is most elegantly and completely equipped. There is a gymnasium and all the other accessories needed to build up the constitution, and to reduce surplus fat, to the accumulation of which the inhabitant of this climate is most dangerously prone. Cleanliness is the watchword of this institution. The tubs and tanks and everything about are kept scrupulously white, the water pumped fresh from the ocean every day, and one may enjoy it in any shade or degree of temperature. Rates, 30 cents single ticket, four for $1.00; and for the plunge, fifty tickets $10.00.

MRS. EDITH E. McLEAN
PHYSICIAN FOR THE HAIR
Has a Canadian Vegetable Tonic for the Hair that will make it grow when all else fails. Dandruff removed. Terms moderate. High-class references.
Office Hours 10 to 12 and 1 to 6.
Rooms 45, 58 and 60
ST. ANN'S BUILDING
SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

LA GRANDE LAUNDRY CO. Telephone, Bush 12
Principal office—23 Powell St., Branch, 11 Taylor St., Laundry, Twelfth St., San Francisco, Cal.
All ordinary mending, sewing on buttons, etc., free of charge. Orders left at office will receive prompt attention. Work called for and delivered to any part of the city, free of charge.

Is this what ails you?

Have you a feeling of weight in the Stomach—Bloating after eating—Belching of Wind—Vomiting of Food—Waterbrash—Heartburn—Bad Taste in the Mouth in the Morning—Palpitation of the Heart, due to Distension of Stomach—Cankered Mouth—Gas in the Bowels—Loss of Flesh—Fickle Appetite—Depressed, Irritable Condition of the Mind—Dizziness—Headache—Constipation or Diarrhœa? Then you have in one of its many forms. The one positive cure for this distressing complaint is

DYSPEPSIA

Acker's Dyspepsia Tablets

by mail, prepaid, on receipt of 25 cents.

CHARLES RAMSEY, Hotel Imperial, New York, says: "I suffered horribly from dyspepsia, but Acker's Tablets, taken after many pills, have cured me."

Acker Medicine Co., 16-18 Chambers St., N. Y.

CHARLES S. WHEELER ERNST H. LUDWIG
Ernst H. Ludwig & Co.
THE MODEL AMERICAN CATERERS

Supply Wedding Breakfasts, Luncheons, Dinners, Matinee Teas and Receptions on shortest notice. Also Terrapin Entrees Luncheons and Dinners. Ice Cream, Cake, &c.

Telephone 2388 1206 SUTTER STREET

NOBBIEST STYLES NEATEST FIT
BEST MATERIALS

HARLOE
'FRISCO'S FAVORITE HATTER
237 KEARNY ST.
Phone, Red 361

ITO, SOTOMI & CO.
JAPANESE GOODS
ART POTTERY,
CURIOS AND RUGS A SPECIALTY
116 Sutter St. Bet. Kearny and Montgomery San Francisco, Cal

Hotel Del Monte

America's Famous Summer and Winter Resort

The Most Elegant Seaside Establishment in the World

"Where a leaf never dies in the still blooming bowers,
And the bee banquets on thro' a whole year of flowers"

G. H. ARNOLD,
—MANAGER—

Monterey, Cal.

Flower Festivals
Fiestas
Rose Carnivals

. . . and the like, will be the delight of California for the next two or three months.

Santa Barbara Flower Festival, the fame of which is world-wide, and the glory of which, like that of Solomon, is not half told, opens April 15. Queen Flora will reign 3 days an arbitrary and absolute despot.

La Fiesta de Los Angeles, now fixed in the chronology of California feasts, and not less illustrious than its older prototypes, commences April 22, and the riot of fun will spread over 4 days.

The Carnival of Roses, to take place in San Jose, May 6th to 9th, inclusive, though a more recent candidate for favors of the fun-loving world, yet because of the limitless possibilities of the Garden City for anything that is made of roses, is quite as full of promise.

REDUCED RATES

will be made by the SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY for all these brilliant events. Arrange your programmes accordingly, and call on agents for particulars.

COOLGARDIE GOLD FIELDS
(FREMANTLE) AUSTRALIA

ONLY SIX DAYS TO HONOLULU — S.S. AUSTRALIA

First-Class.....$220
Steerage 110

Lowest rates to CAPE TOWN

S.S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, April 28, 1896, at 10 A. M.

S.S. "Mariposa," via Honolulu and Auckland, Thursday, April 30, 1896, at 2 P. M.

Ticket Office—114 Montgomery St.
Freight Office—327 Market St.

J. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO.,
General Agents

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.

Dispatch Steamers leave San Francisco for ports in Alaska.

For British Columbia and Puget Sound ports, Feb. 19, and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Wednesdays, 9 A. M.

For Newport, Los Angeles and all way ports, every fourth and fifth day, 8 A. M.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Hartford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles (Santa Monica), Redondo (Los Angeles) and Newport, every fourth and fifth day at 11 A. M.

For ports in Mexico, 25th of each month.

Ticket Office, Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.,
GENERAL AGENTS,
10 MARKET ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

THE LICK HOUSE

Occupies the block bounded by Montgomery, Post and Sutter Streets

IT IS——
——scrupulously clean;
——accessible to all street car lines and places of amusement;
——conveniently situated for business men;
——a quiet, model place for a family to spend the winter;
——moderate in price, yet first-class in every particular.

AMERICAN OR EUROPEAN PLAN

K. B. SOULÉ, Manager

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention

A QUIET HOME
CENTRALLY LOCATED

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL
SAN FRANCISCO

WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

Pacific Towel Co.

Telephone 1780 — No. 9 Lick Place, San Francisco

GEO. K. MOORE, Proprietor

The Club Hotel
5 Bund, Yokohama

Hotel Metropole
1 Tsukiji, Tokyo

First-class Hotels, centrally situated, well furnished. ENTIRE FOREIGN MANAGEMENT. Experienced English Matron in attendance. Excellent table under the superintendence of qualified foreign Chef.

The Hotel steam-launch attends steamers arriving and departing. Passengers are met at the Railway Station. Visitors have the option of messing either in Tokyo or Yokohama, without extra charge—The only Hotels offering such an advantage. Certified Guides are in attendance at both Hotels. European Hair-Dresser on the premises.

THE CLUB HOTEL COMPANY, Limited, Proprietors

E. C. SIOEN, Manager
YOKOHAMA

E. DEWETTE, Manager
TOKYO

THE GRILL ROOM SERVICE
—OF THE—

PALACE HOTEL

Has been extended to what was formerly the City Restaurant. This immense room, which has a direct entrance from Market Street is known as - - - -

"THE LADIES' GRILL ROOM"

NEW DEPARTURE—CHARACTERIZED BY PROMPT SERVICE—MODERATE CHARGES

$6.50 PER TON DELIVERED

COOS BAY COAL

SOOTLESS
SMOKELESS

ORDER YOUR CARRIAGES AND COUPES OF THE

PACIFIC CARRIAGE CO.

At Baldwin Hotel
200 Sutter Street, corner Kearny
48 Eighth Street, or
St. Nicholas Hotel, Market and Ninth Streets

Steamer and Train Service a specialty 'Phone 1950

THE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU

510 MONTGOMERY ST., S. F.,

Reads all papers on the Pacific Coast, and supplies clippings on all topics, business and personal.

CRESTA BLANCA WINES

AWARDED
THREE HIGHEST AWARDS
AT

THE ATLANTA EXPOSITION

OF SIX MEDALS
AWARDED TO CALIFORNIA

Cresta Blanca Wines

OBTAINED THREE

WETMORE-BOWEN CO.

140 Montgomery Street
Under Occidental Hotel

Horses Pastured

$1.50 PER MONTH

GOOD FEED AND CARE.

Send for circular.

F. A. HYDE, 630 Commercial St.

HIRSCH-KAHN & Co.
MANUFACTURING OPTICIANS
IMPORTERS OF OPTICAL GOODS
PHOTOGRAPHIC APPARATUS & SUPPLIES ETC.
333 KEARNY STREET
SAN FRANCISCO CAL.

BAJA CALIFORNIA

DAMIANA BITTERS

"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular.)

NABER, ALFS & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

Ask your Blacksmith to shoe your horse with

PHŒNIX HORSE SHOES

GIVE THEM A TRIAL

DR. THOMAS L. HILL
DENTIST
Office, Odd Fellows' Building,
S. W. Cor. Seventh and Market Streets
Office Hours, 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.
Consultation Hours, 4 to 5

ABRAMSON-HEUNISCH CO. (Incorporated)
IMPORTERS AND JOBBERS OF
Brewers' and Bottlers' Supplies, Corks, Druggists' Glassware, Etc.
26-28 Main St. San Francisco

REMOVAL

Rountrees English Chocolate, Kohlers Swiss Chocolates, and all brands of Foreign and Eastern Confectionery, imported by . . . .

W. L. GREENBAUM,

of 205 SUTTER ST., will, after December 1st, be found in large and commodious quarters at

128 POST ST., Bohemian Club Bldg.

TALES OF THE DAY.

One evening in the earlier days of his fame Paderewski was playing at a musicale in one of the salons of Paris. The selection was Handel's "Largo." On the other side of the piano and directly in his line of vision sat a certain large lady fanning herself rapidly with an enormous fan of red plumes. Paderewski found he could not keep his eyes away from this moving spot of color, while its rapid trivial motion got into his brain, and jarred with the movement of the piece he was playing. At last the situation became too strained for the great pianist's delicate nerves. He ceased abruptly, and leaning over toward the lady, exclaimed, "How do you suppose I can play this 'Largo' in one kind of tempo while you are swinging that fan in another."

At some private theatricals recently given at the Court of Prussia the Crown Princess Frederica Augusta of Saxony was cast for the part of a maid servant, and in one scene rather realistically depicted the girl as polishing her master's boots. It was done almost too well. The King was not pleased, and is said to have remarked, "It is all very well of course here among ourselves, but a royal princess should not be able to imitate the manners of a serving-maid so easily."

Never has there been a more kindly genius than Professor Le Conte of the State University, and rarely a greater scientist. Some time ago one of the Juniors in College who had not forgotten how to be a Freshman showed to "Professor Joe" a curious beetle, which he (the Junior) had manufactured by ingeniously putting together the various portions of a variety of insects, and asked, "What kind of a bug do you call this, 'Professor Joe'?" "That," answered the Professor with his magnetic smile, "that I should call a hum-bug."

Captain Kronje, who commanded the Boers at Krugersdorp, may be a good fighter, but he knows more about bicycles now-a-days than he used to. A few years ago, while crossing a certain district in the Transvaal, he came across the "spoor" or track of a cyclist, following it for a long distance, curious to see the man "who could trundle a wheelbarrow so far without a rest." He finally came to the conclusion that his man was a fugitive from justice, and reported the matter to the nearest landdrost. A posse was organized and repaired to the spot. The trail was examined carefully, and the party were about to begin the pursuit when Kronje suddenly exclaimed: "If it was a wheelbarrow, where is the spoor of the man who wheeled it? Yes, see, here is the track of the wheel, but no footprint of a man. Boys, this is enough for me; ride for your lives—it's a ghost!" To this day the Boers consider that road as haunted.

Speaking of South African affairs puts us in mind of a rather good story on Cecil Rhodes, the multi-millionaire and ex-Premier of the Colony. On his return journey to England recently, Mr. Rhodes was detained by the break down of his steamer, the "Moor," which was obliged to put in to Dekkar, on the Senegal coast. Mr. Rhodes went ashore with a boat load of passengers, and while strolling through the one street of the town was offered a beautiful rug—or it might have been a bed quilt—made of bird skins by a native who asked twelve shillings in return. Mr. Rhodes was delighted with the skins, but was unwilling to pay more than ten shillings. For fully ten minutes he chaffered and haggled over the matter, and finally went his way without making the purchase. He was many times a millionaire, and controlled the output of the De Beers diamond mine, but would not pay two shillings more than what he thought the rug to be worth.

Donizetti, the Italian composer, was very consequential of manner, due to the adulation he had received from his countrymen. Once, while playing before the Czar of Russia, he was disturbed by the Emperor conversing with a member of his suite. Thereupon, Donizetti stopped playing abruptly and left the piano. Presently the Emperor approached him, and said: "Why did you cease playing?" "Because, Sire," answered the Italian, "when the Czar speaks, all the rest of the world should be silent!" There was nothing to be said in rejoinder to this Machiavellian response, and the Emperor had to accept his rebuke.

Nasrullah Khan, the Afghan Prince, who recently visited England, was the guest of honor at a merchants' banquet in London. After the dessert the guests crowded round to ask questions about Afghanistan. Was he accustomed to the use of forks and napkins? Were the Afghans Moors or negroes? How many wives were they allowed? "In short," one anxious old man demanded, "are your people now in a barbarous or savage condition?" The Asiatic listened tranquilly. Then he said, calmly, "My people have learned the first lesson of civilization. They hold a guest sacred." He rose, bowed low, and took his leave.

FREE EDUCATION AND PROFESSIONAL TRAINING

"THE WAVE'S" LIBERAL SUBSCRIPTION OFFER.

The proprietors of THE WAVE have made arrangements with the most prominent schools and colleges throughout the State, and are now prepared to offer scholarships and courses in the leading educational institutions free of charge, for all who will obtain subscribers to this popular weekly.

UNIVERSITY COURSES.

A single year's course at the University of California, or at the Leland Stanford Junior Unversity, for 185 annual subscribers. This offer includes room and board, and all other necessary expenses attached to the course. For 750 subscribers we offer a four years' course.

MEDICAL COURSES.

One year at the Cooper Medical College will be given for 125 subscribers. This includes books and incidental expenses attached to the course.

A single term at the Medical Department of the University of California for 100 subscribers.

For 500 annual subscribers we offer the full four years' course at the Cooper Medical College. This offer includes all incidental costs and fees, except board and lodging.

We offer the four years' course at the Medical Department of the University of California, for 400 subscribers.

The two year's course at the State Normal School at San Jose, for 600 subscribers. This offer includes board, lodging, and books. A single year for 160 subscribers.

The course at Hastings Law College for 250 annual subscribers. This includes books and other expenses attached to the College, for a period of three years, and the privilege of studying in a first-class law office.

A three years' course at the Mark Hopkins Institute of Art for 250 annual subscribers. A year's course for 85 subscribers.

A course in any department of Van der Nailen's School of Electricity and Engineering (except Department of Assaying) will be given for 125 annual subscribers. A course in the Department of Assaying) for 20 annual subscribers.

A six months' course in either the Business Department, or the Department of Stenography and Typewriting of Heald's Business College, for 50 annual subscribers.

A nine months' course in the Columbia School of Dramatic Art for 75 annual subscribers.

A three months' course at the Meisterschaft School of Languages for 40 annual subscribers.

The course at the California School of Elocution and Oratory for 35 annual subscribers.

Tuition in music, vocal or instrumental, from Francis Stuart, S. G. Fleishmann, J. H. Dohrmann, Sigmund Beel, Nathan Landsberger, Lesley Martin, or H. J. Stewart. A course of twenty lessons from any of these gentlemen for fifty annual subscribers. For 100 annual subscribers a course of twenty lessons each in piano, singing, harmony, or any other branch of music.

—A—
SAFE GUIDE

No man knows all there is to know about advertising. The subject is too profound, too complex, too perplexing, for any single person, or for any dozen persons, for that matter. The path to success in advertising is full of dangerous places. All business men would do well to engage a safe guide to conduct them past the danger spots—to tell them what to do and what to avoid doing.

PRINTERS' INK

Is a weekly journal for advertisers, published at 10 Spruce St., New York. It is a magazine of ideas, of suggestions, of advice. Advertisers the world over read it and write for it. It is the advertising authority of America—probably of the globe. Business men will find it a safe guide. To secure its services as guide costs $2 a year. A sample copy costs nothing.

J. R. SMITH & CO.

230 BUSH STREET
And Room 7, Rotunda, Mills Building

W. HALL, Successor

MERCHANT-TAILORS

Will make garments to order
—At Great Reduction for Cash—

J. R. SMITH - - Manager

BICYCLE and GOLF SUITS

H. S. BRIDGE & CO.

Merchant Tailors

Many Novelties in Imported Wear. Shirts to Order a Specialty.

622 Market Street, San Francisco
(Up-stairs, opposite Palace Hotel)

BEST SUITS ON EARTH

26 MONTGOMERY STREET

TO ORDER $15.00 AND UPWARDS

J. W. HAWES, Formerly Crocker Bldg.

COTTON SAIL DUCKS

22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard

ALSO

Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks
From 30 to 120 inches wide
Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks

Manufactured by Mount Vernon Company Baltimore

Murphy, Grant & Co. Pacific Coast Sole Agents

BONESTELL & CO.

Dealers in PAPER

Fine Coated Papers a Specialty

401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

THE WAVE CLUBBING LIST

FOR 1896

By special arrangement with the Publishers, THE WAVE is prepared to offer the following list

SUBSCRIPTIONS MUST BE PAID IN ADVANCE

THE WAVE and CENTURY	$6 00
" " ARENA	5 00
" " LITTELL'S LIVING AGE	7 75
" " ART AMATEUR	5 75
" " LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE	4 50
" " MUNSEY'S	3 50
" " ATLANTIC MONTHLY	5 75
" " YOUTH'S COMPANION	3 75
" " NEW ENGLAND MAGAZINE	5 00
" " HARPER'S MAGAZINE	5 50
" " HARPER'S WEEKLY	5 70
" " HARPER'S BAZAAR	5 70
" " HARPER'S ROUND TABLE	4 00
" " SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE	5 00
" " REVIEW OF REVIEWS	4 50
" " ST. NICHOLAS	5 00
" " OVERLAND	4 75
" " COSMOPOLITAN	3 50
" " FRANK LESLIE'S MAGAZINE	4 90
" " PUCK	6 50
" " JUDGE	6 50
" " LIFE	7 00
" " LIFE'S COMEDY	3 50
" " LESLIE'S WEEKLY	5 70
" " DEMOREST MAGAZINE	4 00
" " SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN	5 00
" " SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN SUPPLEM'T	6 50
" " N. Y. DAILY SUN	8 00
" " " SUNDAY "	4 50
" " CASSELL MAGAZINE	3 75
" " ARGOSY	3 50
" " PUBLIC OPINION	4 50
" " SUNDAY WORLD	4 75
" " CRITIC	5 50
" " FORUM	5 00
" " NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW	6 50
" " TABLE TALK	3 25
" " NINETEENTH CENTURY	6 25
" " CONTEMPORARY REVIEW	6 25
" " FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW	6 25
" " BLACKWOODS MAGAZINE	6 25
" " TRUTH	6 25
" " DELINEATOR	3 50
" " VOGUE	5 50
" " TOWN TOPICS	7 50
" " DAILY JOURNAL	5 00
" " SUNDAY JOURNAL	3 75
" " ILLUS. AMERICAN	5 75

CALIFORNIA STATE LIBRARY

This Paper not to be taken from the Library.

THE WAVE

VOL. XV. No. 17. SAN FRANCISCO, APRIL 25, 1896. PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE WAVE

Is published every Saturday, at the Crocker Building, corner Market and Post Streets, San Francisco.

SUBSCRIPTION, $3 per year, $1.50 six months, $.75 three months. Foreign subscriptions (countries in postal union) $5 per year. Sample copies free on application. The trade is supplied by the San Francisco News Co., 210 Post Street; East of the Rocky Mountains by the American News Co., New York.

THE WAVE is kept on file and is for sale at Brentano's, 17 Avenue de l' Opera, Paris, France; 31 Union Square, New York City; 1015 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.; and 206 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

ADVERTISING rates and all other matters pertaining to the business of the paper, address Rooms 220-221-222 Crocker Building. Eastern Agent, E. Katz, 230-235 Temple Court, New York.

HARRISON M. PARKER, BUSINESS MANAGER.

Entered at San Francisco Post-office as second-class matter

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY.

SAN FRANCISCO, APRIL 25, 1896.

CONTENTS.

EDITORIALS—
La Fiesta. ... 1
Doctor Brown. ... 1
Some of the Answers. ... 1
The Law, Written and Unwritten ... 2
The Small Dealers' Foe ... 2
Mr. Spreckels and Pure Politics ... 2
Blackmail Titles ... 3
The Opening Campaign ... 3
A DEGENERATE METHODIST—A Review of Harold Frederic's New Book—By Etc., Jr. ... 4
A SALVATION BOOM IN MATABELELAND—By Frank Norris 5
CLARA POTTER, BICYCLIST—Her Views on Dramatic Tendencies and the Stage as a Profession—By A. B. W. ... 6
A DRAMATIC NEW WOMAN—Miss Isadore Rush Connects Tailor-made Gowns and Feminine Advancement—An Interview by E. D. H ... 5
WESTERN TYPES—The College Man—By Marmaduke Masters ... 6
THINGS AND PEOPLE—By The Witness ... 7
A DELAYED MASTERPIECE By F. N. ... 8
THE NEW BOOKS—By Oracle K. B. ... 8
THE THEATERS—By Peg Woffington ... 9
THE WEEK IN SOCIETY—By The Gossip ... 10, 11
RIPPLES—Presumably Humorous—By Bruno ... 12
THE WHEEL—By C. Michener ... 13
IS THE BICYCLE BAGGAGE?—By Chas. Albert Adams ... 13
MISCELLANEOUS.
Book Notes ... 8
Fashions and Frivols—By Babette ... 14
Dramatic Notes ... 9
Tales of the Day ... 16

Recently several cases have been brought to the attention of THE WAVE in which young men, anxious to secure an education, had undertaken to work their way through the University. The spirit that hungers for knowledge is not met with as frequently as one might wish, but the example of the youth in question has led the proprietors of THE WAVE to devise some means by which such persons, either male or female, might secure the education which they sought. On page 16 of this issue may be found an offer of scholarships at either of the two Universities, offers of the facilities of reputable business colleges, medical colleges, schools of electrical, mining, mechanical and civil engineering and architecture, schools of dramatic art, and scholarships at the Meisterschaft School of Languages and schools of elocution and oratory. In addition to these, THE WAVE has been enabled to make arrangements with Nathan Landsberger, S. M. Fleishman, H. J. Stewart, Sigmund Beel, J. H. Dohrman, and Lesley Martin, for courses in vocal and instrumental music, including piano, organ, harmony, and vocal art. This offer is something of a novelty in California, and is not lacking in generous features.

LA FIESTA.

California was first a rancho, then a gold mine, later a vineyard, and now a flower garden. Before the mining days the hills and valleys were only valuable as the great cattle-ranges of proud senors. Along the Coast from San Diego to the Mission Dolores picturesque settlements were scattered, all clustering about the quaint churches of the Mexican padres. Over the hills roamed the cattle of the great ranchero who sold their hides to the yearly ship that dropped into the nearest harbor. To raise these cattle and sell them was the one business of this great State. The life was idle, easy, happy, and simple, developing a people sensuous and thriftless. It is not in a Latin race, and possibly not in any other, to live in a climate so genial as that of California, where nature is so prodigal and remains robust and aggressive. Here was a life of graceful indolence, picturesque and poetical, such as the pioneer could not appreciate when he came with anxious eye and hand eager to wash the gold out of the mountains into his pockets. The fandango became a drunken miner's revel; the arbor of vines was turned into a toolshop, the comfortable adobe into a storeroom, and the garden and vineyard made way for the potato patch and the hotel.

The pioneer never has been known to regard the picturesque as matter of real value. The founders of towns always locate them by the side of the stream or on some flat, and a generation has to pass before people see that the land of real value for residence sites is on the hills near by. So the Californian of '49 sacrificed all to the making of money, asking no satisfaction from Nature save the dust she held in her lap. Then, gradually, men began to give up their nomadic life and turn to the making of cities, the growing of grain, and the planting of vines. The church was built alongside the saloon, and the schoolhouse became an important building. Thus came civilization—from the mission to the mine, from the mine to the farm, from the farm to the brick block in the city.

And now we go back to the days before the pioneer—the days of flowers, of festival, of fandango. We have discovered that there was something in the old Mexican days that we can make a part of our own life, a thing we should not allow to die, a feature distinctively Californian peculiarly our own and impossible of any but the feeblest imitation elsewhere. The joy and gaiety and grace and color of the days of old have their renaissance in the fiestas of to-day.

California is destined to breed a people of the highest artistic quality. We have already become of more than national note for the number of artists we produce—singers, painters, actors, and poets. Never before has the experiment been tried of placing the Anglo-Saxon in a Mediterranean country. It may be that the genius of our race will adapt itself so perfectly as to develop here a civilization half northern and half southern, in which the energy of the Saxon will bring to its ripest fruition the fire and passion of the poetic Southron.

But being not yet lost to the commercial, we may yet consider the rich resource we enjoy in our climate. Not all our grapes and mines can be made to yield so large a fortune as our climate. There are enough people in this world anxious to live at least part of their lives in comfort, with the sun at their backs and flowers before them, to add twenty million dollars yearly to our income. We have not yet begun to know what a winter resort this may be. With the Sierras and the ocean, the Yosemite and the orange groves, the redwoods and Del Monte, there is no land under the sun that can be our rival either in the grand, the beautiful, or the picturesque. New Hampshire alone plucks from the stranger each year the sum of eight million dollars, over one-half of the total gold output of California. There is a figure for Californians to think upon.

The fiesta will advertise us, bring people, some to stay and others to come again. It will make known to others the geniality of our climate, the richness of our soil, and the beauty of our women. It will teach us to appreciate the beauties of our State and the privilege we enjoy in living in a place of picturesque ancestry and of a vast artistic future—and this will not be least of the blessings brought by the battle of the flowers.

DOCTOR BROWN.

Doctor Brown has succeeded in so conducting his own affairs as to get himself practically convicted of the serious charges from which he was attempting to escape. Just what jurisdiction the Bay Convention of the Congregational Church may have in the matter is obscure to the outer world. The accused pastor appeared before the ecclesiastical council, which sat for nearly a month and heard testimony, and finally recorded its verdict practically acquitting him of the serious charges preferred against him. Now, we have the Bay Conference which hears no testimony and which apparently has no facts before it, calmly reversing the judgment of the tribunal which did hear testimony and had possession of all the facts. Doctor Brown is certainly an unfortunate manager, and, as we said last January, stands sadly in need of a material adviser.

There is an old saying that, a man who has himself for a lawyer has a fool for a client, which is probably applicable in the case in hand. Many of the gentlemen who sat in judgment at the Bay Conference, also sat as judges and participated in the verdict of acquittal—for it was acquittal practically—before the ecclesiastical council; yet some of these were among the harshest critics at the last hearing. This change of heart can only be accounted for upon the supposition that Doctor Brown's conduct, since the rendering of the first verdict, has been such as to produce a feeling of hostility in the breasts of certain of his brethren. The Doctor sharply criticized the first verdict, and gave voice to some very indiscreet statements. The last verdict has all the appearance of being a reprisal upon him for these oral indiscretions. If ever a man has encompassed his own undoing, it has been Doctor Brown. Had he but held his tongue, his position to-day might have been very different. It cannot be said the Bay Conference has helped matters any by renewing the scandal, or that it has helped the church by suspending Doctor Brown and placing him under suspicion. So far as the public were concerned, they were willing to let the matter drop. Scandal in connection with churchly affairs is not a thing to be exploited; it is not a thing for the daily newspapers or for the idle and slanderous tongue. Exploiting such things arms the scoffer, and places in his mouth weapons to weaken the influence of the church. The verdict of the Bay Conference adds nothing of weight to the charges against the defendant. It is simply a record of the sentiment of men who confessedly had not summoned before them a single witness or elicited a single fact to substantiate or justify the verdict recorded by them. While Doctor Brown may be guilty on every count, it does not seem fair, after having been acquitted by the ecclesiastical council, convened for the purpose of giving him a hearing and with all the testimony before it, that judgment should be reversed without a hearing of any kind whatever. How, or where, the church expects to profit by this action is obscure. It simply serves to mix matters more, and, perhaps, records some animosities, perhaps some rebuke for the ill-chosen and unwise words which fell from his lips directly after the original verdict.

SOME OF THE ANSWERS.

To dispel ignorance is none the less a duty because ignorance to some natures assumes all the qualities of bliss. To enlighten the Voice of Labor has been a thankless task. That paper had no desire to be enlightened. Lack of knowledge was its happiness. A little plain reasoning has shattered the joy that hedged it about. Facts and logic are against it. The Voice of Labor descends from the plane of dignity when it snarls out a protest that might have been stronger if more civil. Let this small circumstance be overlooked, and the paper be treated with a courtesy it has not earned. It propounds several queries, and awaits reply. It has no need to wait.

"The Wave" has never contended that Trades Unions specifically advocate the doctrine of murder, so this point could with justice be entirely overlooked. The contention was that, in a general way, murder often springs from the teachings of the Unions, and that cases illustrative of this, from the days of the Molly Maguires to the year 1896, A. D., when striking lathers slay a toiler who refused to join their idle and turbulent ranks, have been so numerous that, concerning the incontrovertible and patent fairness of the position, no question can arise. The Voice of Labor is equally weak in its continued attempt to establish a parallel between the offer of the military company to which the murderer Durrant belonged to provide an attorney for the prisoner, and that of the offer of fellow-strikers to provide an attorney for the man who in their presence gave the fatal blow to Mars. Durrant was charged with a crime so horrible, and his record so far as known was so clear, that it was difficult to grasp at first the possibility that he might be guilty. His friends simply rejected the suggestion; their senses refused to accept it. Yet they saw the toils closing around him and they believed that an innocent victim was being dragged toward the gallows. Their impulse to assist him was natural and generous. They had not witnessed the deed. Their harangues had not incited it. About the guilt of the man who led the attack on Mars there was never doubt. He was observed, and he was one of a group whose sympathies seemed to be in harmony with his, whose language and actions were violent, who entertained the opinion that Mars had no right to work, who interposed no hand when Mars was being beaten to death. "But why trifle by instancing parallels?" asks the Voice of Labor. If the one cited is a sample of the lot, why, indeed?

Objection is also advanced to the allegation that men make "fat" livings by stirring up strife between capital and labor. At least they make livings. As to the fatness thereof there may be question, but they have no right to make any living by such methods. Let them work. They will find the experience novel, and, if not so profitable as their present callings, at least respectable; at least not tending toward riot; at least finding no climax in assassination. The Voice of Labor also calls for a description of the pitiful condition of the "wage slave," deprived of the protection of the Union. In the first place the term "wage slave" is a bad and servile one, and in a country where the vast majority of men earn wages, little short of insulting. What is this protection? The men recently on strike had it, and some of them, in consequence, suffered for lack of money that in the absence of protection they would gladly have toiled for. Every great strike, entailing loss, deprivation, and crime, is inaugurated in token of the existence of this boon known as protection. The "wage slave" if deprived of it would be permitted to work without fear that somebody, bent upon driving him into the pale of protection, might come along and kill him. He would be more nearly free than he can ever be while the tyranny of the walking delegate is permitted to make of a Union his conscienceless and relentless master. So long as by "labor" is to be understood only such as gather in clans, and through arbitrary law or the bludgeon attempt the regulation of human affairs, the "wage slave" must continue to merit his title. He is a slave to the caprice of fellows who lack intelligence and character. If a man be a slave to his employer at least he may earn bread. If he be a slave to the walking delegate what does he earn? Protection. There is just an inkling of truth in the claim. Mars did not have this precious protection, and him they slew.

Having progressed thus far in its questioning, the Voice of Labor forsakes the pretense of lucidity and urges "The Wave" to name a law, a religion, a press, or a public sentiment, "that does not place money above manhood and recognize as legal and right the degradation of the latter in the former's interest." Then it pauses for reply, knowing that to make answer would be to accept an absurd proposition as advanced in sober earnest. "The Wave" is ready to respond to the interrogatory of sense, but invited to demonstrate that the moon is not made of green cheese, declines to see the necessity for debate. Some statutes are bad, some creeds faulty, some journals corrupt, here and there public sentiment poisoned. But these lamentable weaknesses do not lend a color of coherency to the wild and foolish assertion implied by the challenge. Perhaps the Voice grows jocular. Cap and bells become it ill. It deals with life's serious phases.

The organ of organized labor builds upon one false premise always. It assumes that any attack against the overt act of a union is designed as an attack against the toilers of this Nation. Not so. That organized labor has an honest and honorable part to play in the adjustment of economic conditions, there can be no doubt. That it has already accomplished much that is commendable, nobody will attempt to deny. But it should learn the lesson of experience, and not be misled, or, having made a mistake, seek not to repeat it, nor to conceal the truth; but to make amends and err no more.

MR. SPRECKELS AND PURE POLITICS.

The question arises whether or not it is possible to do politics in San Francisco and do it decently. Certainly, if any political leader ever had but slight excuse for indulging in "rough politics," it is John D. Spreckels. He seems to have a clear field, and an opportunity to do something for decency, an opportunity, which, sad to state, he seems to have neglected, and to have allowed his representatives to take on the manners of his most degraded predecessors. Protests have been filed by reputable citizens, charging ballot-box stuffing, impersonation of citizens, repeating, and general corruption in the Thirty-third and Thirty-seventh Districts, at what was known as the Spreckels' Primary. In the Thirty-third District serious offences against political purity and decency were filed by several citizens. The affidavit of one, R. P. Hale, reads as follows:

I, R. P. Hale, a duly qualified elector of the City and County of San Francisco, do hereby affirm that at the instance of the Republican Executive Club of the Thirty-third Assembly District, and of which I am a member, I acted as challenger at polling place No. 1 in said Thirty-third Assembly District, and that during the progress of the election I was a witness to many acts which would defeat a fair election and an honest count.

First—I presented the admission card issued by your Chairman, J. M. Chretien, at polling place No. 1, and was refused admittance into the polling place by those in charge; the person who refused was Frank Pendergast, an inspector.

Second—Charles Sutton of 813 Shotwell Street was challenged on the ground that he had not voted for Estee, and was refused the right to swear in his vote.

Third—George Johnson of 2627 Folsom was refused the right to vote on the same ground and in the same manner.

Fourth—Con Ryan, a repeater, voted many times, and some of the names he voted under and was challenged for voting were Charles F. McDermott and Alonzo McDermott of 2509 Folsom Street, George Hamskell of 329 Twenty-fifth Street, and James T. Bailey, 1324 Florida Street.

Fifth—Henry Stiles, a repeater, voted many times, and some of the names he voted under, and was challenged for voting, were Daniel M. Cline, 2720 Twentieth Street, Fred Roberts, and James McCabe.

Sixth—Larry O'Conner, a repeater, voted the name of John F. King, 723 Shotwell Street.

Seventh— —— Fitzpatrick, a repeater, voted six times under my observation.

Eighth—Six other repeaters whose names are not known to me, but whose features became familiar through their repeated presence as voters at the polls, I repeatedly challenged for illegal voting, but no attention was paid to the challenge and they were allowed to vote again and again.

Ninth—Among the many repeaters who found spiritual refreshment and new names at the corner saloon was one who seemed unable to tell under what name he was seeking to vote, and was assisted to determine his new name by one of the inspectors, Frank Pendergast, by referring to the name written on a card held in the voter's hand.

This is infamous. Higgins and Buckley, the crookedest political bosses we have ever had, were never charged with practises any more reprehensible than this. From such men such things were expected, but not from Mr. Spreckels, who has no business in politics unless he propose to lend a hand at purification and improvement.

In another affidavit, signed J. H. Molema, is this statement:

The names of J. H. Roach, J. Mullin, J. Mathews, Robert F. Morris, Thomas McTiernan, H. Kisbeth, George Desrosier, of the twelfth precinct; John Young and James Young of the fourteenth precinct; Frank McGinn, W. H. Rynes, and Herman Brul of the eleventh precinct, were voted by "repeaters." John Young is at Lake Tahoe, and James Young now resides in Berkeley. All the others whose names are used are personally known to me. The name of Henry J. Ervin of the tenth precinct, who is known to me, was voted by a repeater and accepted by the acting inspector, Daniel Ervin, a brother of H. J. Ervin. The name of Doctor McLaughlin, a man sixty years of age, was voted by a repeater of about twenty years of age. I also witnessed the unsuccessful attempt of Inspector Ervin to change the ballot of Charles Smith and the successful one of changing the ballots of P. Meyer, C. Dietrieck, and another gentleman from the seventh precinct, whom I can produce.

The name of J. J. Davis was voted by Pat Spierman, who is known to me and who does not live in the district.

The Inspector ignored the rights of challengers, and allowed the repeaters to work unmolested. Many times no name was given by the voter, and the vote was accepted by the Inspector. A man who drove in County Committeeman Gately's cart voted, to my knowledge, more than eight times. Many others voted more than three times. Most of the time there was no judges nor clerks in the booth, the work being done by two boys, sons of the proprietor of the saloon in which the booth was situated.

If Mr. Spreckels wishes to retain the respect of this community, and the support of the decent men of the Republican party, he cannot afford to indulge in politics of this character. The lieutenants and men surrounding him, who advise to such a course, are not only enemies to the party, but are his own enemies and will encompass his undoing. Temporary victories, gained at such a cost, are not worth having. The community welcomes the participation of a Spreckels in politics simply because it promises something of decency. Let him depart from that line, associate with, and engage in, the politics of the pot-house politician, and his days will be numbered and his reputation destroyed. Perhaps Mr. Spreckels had nothing whatever to do with this infamous performance; perhaps, indeed, the charges are untrue. If this be so his public denial is most tardy. In either case he should hasten to give a quick and unmistakable denial, either of the truth of the charges or of his participation therein.

What result Mr. Spreckels's participation in politics will have upon the welfare of the San Joaquin Valley Railroad will be developed in the years to come. If past experiences of other railway corporations have any weight or bearing in framing a guess at the result, the future cannot be happy for Mr. Spreckels's railway undertaking. Probably the managers of the Southern Pacific Company would give a half million dollars to be absolutely free from the necessity of engaging in politics, and another half million to be free from the clutch of the newspaper fiend. They would probably make most any sacrifice to be rid of the two mill stones which weigh them down, yet we now have Mr. Spreckels cheerfully courting and embracing the very thing his predecessors would gladly put aside forever. No matter how honestly Mr. Spreckels may conduct his political affairs, he must make enemies. In fact, the more honest his course, the more apt is he to make dangerous enemies. By encompassing the present defeat of dishonest men he will engage their future hostility. The insistent dishonest politician will creep into office in spite of him and will embrace that opportunity of visiting punishment on him and his railway enterprise for his past attitude. The experience of one man seldom brings a lesson home to another. None but the most wise may receive instructions for self-guidance in the misfortune of his fellow.

THE LAW, WRITTEN AND UNWRITTEN.

In considering the right that the wife of John F. Martin had to shoot him, and the verdict of the Coroner's Jury exonerating her on the plea that his cruelty had driven her to insanity, no necessity arises for weighing the merits of this pretext for murder as it appears with distressing frequency in the courts. The case of Mrs. Martin may almost be termed unique. Its adoption as a precedent would assuredly be attended with danger.

The facts are familiar. Mrs. Martin had been a devoted wife, and her husband had treated her with wanton and long-continued abuse. As return for her dutiful offices he had heaped insults upon her. Accepting her kindnesses he had repaid them with sneers, had gibed at her womanly affection, and, finally, when she sought of him the bread he was in simple decency bound to provide, had spurned her with curses. Then she killed him, using a pistol procured, it is believed, with intent to end her own misery by suicide. The man was a brute and coward. The only question is whether or not these characteristics gave her the right to kill him. She assumed the right and has been officially upheld.

It is natural to defend Mrs. Martin. Such was the impulse of the jury. Yet, if an injured wife may take the law into her own hands there will be difficulty in determining just the degree of injury sufficient to accord the privilege. To fly to the divorce court is probably a safer course than to rely upon the trigger. Guided by the example of Mrs. Martin, another might seize upon a fancied wrong, or a trifling one, as the excuse for entering upon widowhood. Even a husband who falls to fulfill his part of the marriage contract may not be guilty of a capital offense. To leave him would generally be wiser than to violently end his career. If there are exceptional instances, to cite them would be a matter of extreme difficulty, and to leave them to the biased judgment of the aggrieved woman, a course tending to imperil any husband who is not perfect. Such is the aspect based on written law. There is another side.

The innate feeling of gallantry toward the gentler sex grants privileges that would be withheld if the stern letter of the law were the only preceptor. This same gallantry is the basis for a righteous indignation when a woman is made the victim of outrageous wrong, none the less if the guilty be the man who had vowed to cherish and protect her. It is for this reason that no jury of men could be summoned who would convict Mrs. Martin. They would shield her with the cloak of insanity, knowing full well that she is not insane; entirely conscious that when she fired her fatal bullets she was not insane, but that at last she had rebelled against inhuman treatment, had administered punishment for insults, neglect, heart-break, against which there is no real protection. She saw her life wasted, the future stretching out devoid of promise, save of new sorrow, every day to come charged with anguish unspeakable, and when she killed the man it was not that she was controlled by insanity but by a burst of reason, a mood much easier to understand than her patience under a long era of blows and privation, easier to understand and as easy to forgive. The instincts of humanity come to her rescue. Reflection shows that her act, shocking as it was because unusual, was kindness itself compared with the way she had been tortured. The man had richly earned his fate, but as arbiter of his destiny the woman took upon herself a weight of responsibility from which she cannot escape. The memory of her deed will be her only punishment and it will be punishment enough. There is no written law to support this view of the case, nevertheless support is not lacking.

THE SMALL DEALERS' FOE.

There exists to-day, in certain branches of our mercantile community, a feeling of curiosity, mixed somewhat with alarm, as to what results may follow, what harm or damage come, through the opening of a great department store in San Francisco. A store running into divisions and subdivisions of every branch of trade has never before been attempted in the West. First-class houses have little or nothing to fear from such an establishment; but the small dealer is the one who will suffer; and with him, his salesmen and shop-girl; and with them, the landlord. Centralization is the modern watchword of success. Modern progress declares for combination and consolidation. The great mercantile trusts, the sugar, oil, and leather combinations are the outgrowth of this idea. The small merchant is absorbed by the large, the small factory engulfed by its stronger competitor. Take it all in all, it is questionable whether or not this method of doing business is a good one for a community. Much of evil is apparent, and, at least during the period of readjustment, many must suffer seriously. Unfortunately, the losses, whatever they may be, must fall most heavily upon those least able to bear them.

In the very nature of things, a store dealing in diamonds and in domestics, in silks and in saltpetre, is not calculated to attract the strictly first-class trade of the community. More strongly is this the case in the West than in the East. In a purchasing tour for diamonds, or silks, or laces, one is not inclined to run to department stores, if one has a discriminating sense as well as money to purchase. It may be safely set down, therefore, that what we may term "strictly first-class trade" will look elsewhere; and the bargain counters and the like, will not look for the higher grade of customers, and will, therefore, likely not carry the higher grade of goods. A gentleman looking for hats or haberdashery would hardly go there to supply his wants, The trade such an institution will obtain, and the trade to which it must cater, is that of the masses. The lady who likes to mingle her purchases with the strains of a brass band on Saturday night, the lady who wears a silk plush coat and takes a delight in pricing remnants while the band plays "Annie Laurie," are the kind that will crowd a department store in the West. It will draw trade away from the small tradesmen, and many will be forced to the wall in consequence.

One may not compare this community with any other. Trade in San Francisco, strange to say, is very largely a matter of personal friendship and vogue. This is an imitative community, as well as a community not given over to small economies. Let it be known that all Society are buying one thing or another at this or that place, and the imitators will immediately fall into line, and buy the same thing at the same place. This might be aptly illustrated in the jewelry business, but the reader will not be at a loss to supply the illustration for himself.

Probably all the retail business of this city in every line, in household furnishings, in articles of wear and of adornment, could be transacted in a central building of the size of the Palace Hotel; yet no one will say that it would be a good thing to have it so. It would mean the abandonment of Kearny, Market, and the other retail business streets. It would mean the transaction of all the retail business of the community under one roof. This, confessedly, would not be a good thing for the community; property would depreciate in value fully seventy-five per cent, if such an arrangement was in force. The community would suffer without reaping any corresponding advantage. Of course, such a thing is impossible, but it is upon this theory that department stores are founded. One of the results of this new venture will be to elevate the retail trade done outside of its doorways, and the lines between the various classes of customers will be more clearly drawn than ever before; more clearly drawn here in the West than in the East, because, somehow, the Californian has not abandoned a certain sense of pride—foolish and false pride probably—that forbids an indulgence in small economies. There is a spirit here that demands "the best," and which rather glories in paying large prices therefor. This feeling is shared pretty generally by the community, and is indulged by those who can ill afford it. The Californian has not learned to look out for the pennies.

THE OPENING CAMPAIGN.

The two political events of the week have been the declaration by A. P. A. leaders that the organization would oppose the nomination and election of McKinley, and the presentation by Massachusetts and Rhode Island of Wm. E. Russell, ex-Governor of Massachusetts, as a Presidential candidate.

The strength of the American Protective Association is certainly sufficient to make its wishes matter of moment to the Republican party. If a determined stand is taken against Major McKinley by the A. P. A.'s, it may mean a change in the present drift of things Republican, though the organization seems not to be united as to its Presidential choice. That McKinley, a Methodist deacon, should feel the brunt of the Association's displeasure is an event unlooked for, and which the most far-sighted politicians could hardly have anticipated, though it has been hinted that the source of this opposition lay in the political headquarters of another candidate.

The boom for William Eustis Russell of Massachusetts has been launched in a dignified manner, and none too soon. The Democracy has been candidate hunting all winter, but has found few men who were willing to offer themselves as sacrifices in this unpropitious year. The real strength of the third-term talk for Mr. Cleveland has been the dearth of other available material. It is not to be supposed that the President has ever seriously contemplated accepting a fourth nomination, but it has no doubt been part of his policy to let the people believe that he might ask a third term, so as to hold his forces together while determining upon some man likely to win.

Secretary Carlisle has been the administration candidate to the extent that he has been regarded as the representative of its financial policy, but Carlisle is without political strength; he is without personal following, and has weaknesses of nature that would handicap him seriously in a campaign against a man of such clean life as McKinley.

It has been hoped by many Democrats that ex-Secretary Wm. C. Whitney would take up the standard this year, and it may yet be that he will accept, though he has twice declared that he would not. Mr. Whitney labors at once under the advantage and the disadvantage of being a very rich man. His father left him a small fortune, and his late wife, the daughter of ex-Senator Payne of the Standard Oil Company, added many millions. Mr. Whitney has had but two political positions in his life, Corporation Counsel for New York City, and Secretary of the Navy, and, in both, has acquitted himself with distinction. That he is a political manager of rare convincing power and skill at organization was proved by his handling of the Cleveland fight in '92, and that he is adroit beyond most men in politics, is shown by his popularity in both the Cleveland and Hill ranks in New York. But Mr. Whitney has the political weakness of a very rich man.

Ex-Governor Campbell of Ohio may secure his own delegation, and the admiration which he enjoys for his strong canvasses on the tariff question will bring him other delegates; but his reputation is almost entirely local and his record of no especial attracting quality.

Now enters William E. Russell, who carried Massachusetts three times for Governor against a national Republican majority of 20,000 votes. His campaign strength is his youth, the fact that he can carry Massachusetts if not other New England States and have the support of all Eastern factions of the Democratic party. He has the one element of weakness that all Eastern candidates will have so far as the silver states are concerned—he is not for free and unlimited coinage of silver. But there would be no hedging in Russell's campaign—he is a straight-outer and would make a lively and manly fight.

BLACKMAIL TITLES.

Few of our Western States have passed or even considered any legislative means to prevent the blackmailing of real estate owners. Yet each new State in turn is the object of the blackmailer's extortion. Perhaps this is owing to the fact that no particular individual is so greatly oppressed as to force him to take the initiative in the matter, and every one's business is no one's business.

The title blackmailer, following as close as practicable in the wake of the pioneer, has concerned himself chiefly with cities and closely settled communities, and now, after exhausting the larger field, makes a specialty of the small lot-owner in large cities. His work has been generally in one of three classes: first, cases where there there is some trifling defect in the title, which is, perhaps, discovered and the cure held by the blackmailing claimant; second, cases which are simply trumped up and utterly without support either on moral principle or in technical law; third, tax-sale titles. Persons dealing only in the last class are quite respectable beside their fellows, but, strangely enough, against them alone has legislation been enacted for the protection of land-owners. Many a forgetful farmer has been pinched by the speculator, who has purchased a tax title to a quarter of an acre of the home place, and often has the "tax-title shark" placed his own price on his half-inch frontage of some residence or business lot in San Francisco. Fortunately the last legislature practically put an end to these opportunities by declaring that property upon which taxes become delinquent shall first be sold to the State, and establishing by the same act a uniform rate for redemption.

A man is jealous of his land title and is as anxious that it be absolutely clear and flawless, as he is for a clear conscience—often more so. He is likely, when some title shark discloses a minute speck upon his record, to pay what he must and be rid of him and the offensive though tiny speck at the same time.

Such a creature, however, is an angel by comparison with the rascal who invents clouds and flaws, who either first creates the cloud, or there being no cloud present persuades you that there is, and then seduces or browbeats you into paying his own price to let him "clear it off." San Francisco has been abundantly cursed with these rogues, especially in connection with claims under Spanish grants. The claimant begins a suit under our generous statute "to quiet title." The complaint is probably unverified, and for that reason you can never expect to convict the perpetrator of perjury. Indeed, summons may never be served or even issued, but the record searchers incorporate some notice of the litigation in every abstract of title covering the property involved. When a sale is to be made, the "flaw" or "cloud" crops out and the timid buyer requests a quit claim deed from the plaintiff in the suit before purchasing; and the seller, that his sale may not be lost, generally accedes to this demand. The owner thus helps himself temporarily but hurts himself eventually. The blackmailer thrives by the operation. Such suits should be aggressively contested on principle, and so discourage future attempts of similar kind. The small holder generally bears the heaviest burden in these troubles. He is unfamiliar with legal procedure, has no legal adviser, and those most likely to deal with him concerning his property are generally of his own class. Through ignorance, lack of funds, and timidity, he eventually—almost universally—proves profitable to the adventurer.

Both the legislature and the courts should make a vigorous effort to put an end to this sort of robbery. As our laws stand at present any irresponsible person can throw the whole city into litigation by simply filing an unverified complaint, and if he chooses to make a show of fight can fleece the ignorant for several years thereafter; while, on the other hand, the acknowledged lawful owner cannot bring a suit even in the justices' court for the recovery of his five dollar a-month house from a defaulting tenant without swearing to the complaint, and again, if a man wished to sue the blackmailer for slandering his title he would be required to furnish a substantial bond in the sum of $500.

Such discrimination in favor of blackmailers is, to say the least, astonishing. Complaints in such cases should be verified, and strong evidence of good faith required at every stage of the proceeding. A bond might be found advisable and some criminal penalty should be provided for both client and counsel where good faith is found lacking.

There is a movement on foot to secure appropriate legislation upon the subject. The charge has been delegated to Mr. G. Whitfield Lane, who is alive to the enormity of the offenses committed against property-owners by these proceedings, and promises a series of proposed Acts, which, if adopted, will put an end to the apparently unending strife.

A gentleman who read our article of three weeks ago, regarding the efforts of the Southern Pacific Company to advertise California in the East, has forwarded a communication which embodies the report, by the late E. McD. Johnstone, of the first trip of "California on Wheels." Mr. Johnstone's report shows that the car on its first trip passed through 13 States, visited 134 towns and cities, aggregating a population of 5,000,000 souls. He reports, further, that the attendance between Omaha and Milwaukee, from December to August, was 625,800; the attendance at Boston, Mass., 22,000; at Newburg, 15,200; at Paterson, 9300; at Willamantic, 10,500, and so on. The report is written in the humorous vein in which the lamented E. McD. Johnstone was most happy. We regret that lack of space prevents a reproduction of a large portion of the very interesting communication. It is hard to resist quoting one paragraph, however, which says:

> I wish to second the suggestion regarding fruits, etc., to be given away, I mean, of course, sparingly. An orange makes the eye of an Nebraska boy bulge out until you fear he will have a spasm getting it back again. I have made a careful estimate, and find that one orange will go further and do more good as an advertisement than fifty maps.

The first year of the Cuban insurrection cost the Spanish government upward of $50,000,000. At present there are 130,000 Spanish troops on the island, whose maintenance under arms will demand an outlay of $100,000,000 for the current year. To these direct expenditures must be added the indirect losses in revenues, etc. Last year the receipts of the Cuban revenue offices were $8,000,000 below the average. Forty towns have been destroyed, and nearly twice that number partially burnt and sacked.

A Parisian chroniqueur discusses "How Women Walk." Of course, he awards the palm to his own countrywomen. Of the English lady, he says, "She doesn't walk; she travels. You might almost say that her limbs were moved by the engine of a steamer, and her feet have the motion—and the proportions—of an Atlantic liner." Quite as ungallant and uncomplimentary are the remarks of this saucy gentleman concerning the gait of women of other countries. For instance, "The German is heavy, and one feels the earth tremble beneath her tread"; the Spanish donna "prances," la belle Américaine resembles the pendulum of a clock, the Italian "skips," the Russian "skates" along, the Dutch woman "rolls," and the Belgian "tramps" about.

George Du Maurier is very sensitive over the success of Trilby, which in London is making Beerbohm Tree's fortune. An eminent critic of the metropolis has spoken of it as "that horrid foot and mouth disease, Trilbyitis." His intimate friends never allude to the craze in the presence of the novelist.

A DEGENERATE METHODIST.

"THE DAMNATION OF THERON WARE," BY HAROLD FREDERIC.

To the consideration of The Damnation of Theron Ware, the latest of Harold Frederic's novels, one brings the respect its announcements evoke, Certain critics have spoken of it as "the book of the year." It is really an important novel.

Like its predecessors, this is an American story. The action occurs in the town of Octavius (somewhere in Ohio, one imagines); the hero is a Methodist minister of American birth; the complications are those which the Methodist background imposes, and the contrast is afforded by the Catholic institution, which one of the factors in the drama, Father Forbes, controls. Theron Ware, the minister, a young countryman, innocent and unsophisticated, is suddenly ushered into a knowledge of the worldliness of religion and the doubts of science. His soul under the stress of this sudden illumination loses its bearings and his moral sense is shattered. The revelation and its disintegrating consequences form the motive of the tale, the manner and conditions of its making constitute the plot. Though the book is not religious in its tendency its medium is. There are two environments—Methodist and Catholic; Father Forbes and Celia Madden, the active though unwitting elements in Theron Ware's downfall, are of the latter faith; Dr. Ledyard, whose scientific scepticism accentuates the minister's disillusion, is the priest's friend. Sister Soulsby, the Methodist revivalist destroys by her manipulation of church politics and the frank explanation of her methods of arousing spiritual frenzy, the remnant of his fabric of faith. Jealousy, envy, and a spurious species of love complete the process of damnation. How effective it is may be realized by the contrast between the first chapter and the last. Theron Ware in the one is the brilliant pulpit orator, young, clever, full of ambition, who has worked his way into the ministry from the farm, is the husband of a charming and pretty woman, seemingly destined to a fortunate career. In the other he is revealed a failure, confesses his degeneracy and inadequacy, and with misguided optimism having abandoned the ministry, anticipates the conquest of new fields.

The story opens at the annual Nedahma Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which introduces Theron Ware as the hero of the occasion, uplifted as the choice of the people of Tecumseh, but cast down by the presiding bishop, who consigns him to the little town of Octavius. The scene is admirably handled, and sets the key for the story. The next chapter presents the young minister and his wife in their pastorate, and displays their mutual love and gaiety, unveils the guileless story of their courtship, of their pecuniary misadventures, and depicts them as a happy young couple, somewhat put out over the conditions of their new environment, but full of hope and determination to make the best of circumstances. The prison house begins to cast its shadows at the meeting of the three deacons—a fine piece of description, in which the three custodians of the Methodist Church, a miserly quarry man, a grasping cheese buyer, and a lawyer who loves fishing, are presented with fine and certain touches. There is revealed at once a lack of sympathy between the young minister and his patrons, which develops as time progresses. Typical down-easterners, these men in their manner and prejudices exemplify the characteristics of the pastorate in which a narrow but vehement form of Methodism is professed alien to Ware's experience and unwelcome to his disposition.

The town of Octavius is not by any means given over to Methodism, however. The predominant element in the population is Irish and Catholic, and the leading citizen is Jerry Madden, whose extensive wagon works are the important industry of the region. He is very wealthy and pious, and it is his beautiful and pampered daughter Celia who figures so prominently in the events which are subsequently unrolled. Theron Ware, brought up to dislike the Irish and fear Catholicism, is one day brought in contact with Father Forbes and Miss Madden, under dramatic circumstances, and at a moment when the influence of his surroundings had begun to depress his optimism. He witnesses the ceremony of administering Extreme Unction, and the impression is so sudden, so unexpected, so different, that it is in the nature of a shock. The two ministers engage in friendly converse, and we are properly introduced to the Catholic—a broad-shouldered, portly man, of more than middle height, with a shapely, strong-lined face of almost waxen pallor, and a firm, commanding tread. Miss Madden presents herself in an interesting guise—tall, stylish, dowered with brilliant red hair, and the movements of a goddess—her face, a lengthened oval with a luminous rose-tinted skin, full red lips, and big, brown, frank eyes with heavy auburn lashes. A notable personality, indeed, and, though her role is indefinite, she shares, after this introduction, the center of the stage with Ware.

The elements, having combined the plot, move irresistibly onwards. Ware invited to call on Father Forbes goes to his house to borrow such works as he may have on Abraham, whose life he had begun to write. The luxury of the priest's surroundings and the charm of his hospitality are an additional surprise, and he is introduced to Doctor Ledsmar, the scientist, who is expert on Assyriology and has written a book about snake worship. The first shock to Theron Ware's gentle and innocent faith is the kindly information that he takes Abraham too literally, that the modern research has wiped him out as an individual. They proceed to the discussion of eponyms and genealogies, and of Merodach, an ancient Chaldean divinity, (the old form of Marmaduke), of whom Father Forbes speaks as the original prototype of the divine intermediary idea, whence our "Christ myth" comes Ware tingled at this statement, he felt as though unarmed and at the mercy of criminals. Then the recollection that he is among educated people, and that the startling expression comes from a man who, like himself, is a minister of God, comforts him, and he is subdued. The effect on the fabric of previously conceived ideas is crushing. Retiring from the house, the crashing of the organ in the church announces to him the presence of Miss Madden, and he enters the sacred edifice yearning for solace and sympathy in his strange condition of unrest.

There seems no difficulty in the establishment of an understanding between this Methodist minister and the Irish daughter of Jerry Madden, and here is one of the weak points of the book. It but partially explains the condition which meets us, to say that the guilelessness of Theron Ware attracts these bolder spirits. However agreeable is intercourse with an innocent and kindly soul the pleasure inspired is contemplative rather than personal. Perhaps the girl's interest in the priest may be held to explain the sudden growth of her anomalous intimacy with the minister. The character of this interest, the manner of her relation with Father Forbes, is suggested so vaguely, so indefinitely, that one theory or another is tenable or confutable by the evidence of separate incidents. That Celia is sufficiently emancipated from conventionality to be friendly with whomsoever she chooses, may be true, but is not the selection of a Methodist parson as the object of devotion as improbable as the incident of a Catholic priest alluding in the presence of this same Methodist parson to the "Christ myth"?

However, the progress of the theme is tremendously accentuated by the work of this memorable evening, We next have Theron Ware reading Renan and various books of archæological research, drifting apart from his wife, drifting away from his moral moorings. Without protest he learns that Deacon Levi Gorringe has become a friend of Mrs. Ware, and is providing her garden with expensive cuttings. Indeed, the process of degeneration is so rapid that its velocity is unaccountable. This man is taken off his feet by the conversation of a priest and the sudden interest of a woman seen but twice. A few weeks before, we have him a loving husband, an earnest, if ignorant, Christian. Such way in the world as he has, his own brain and intelligence have won; he has impressed great audiences with his oratory, yet the fabric of his individuality, of his manhood, collapses at the suggestion of a doubt. It is reserved for Brother and Sister Soulsby to expurge his last, lingering illusions. The Methodist Church at Octavius has a debt which the authorities desire removed, and this twain, professional revivalists, are invoked to rehabilitate the finances, and reanimate the piety of the community. The process is vastly entertaining, and is described with admirable versimilitude. Indeed, the literature of this subject has nothing better than these chapters, which explain, step by step, Sister Soulsby's method of arousing the enthusiasm of her audiences, and the successive stages of devotional frenzy which culminates in the declaration of sinners, who rush forward to abase themselves at the altar rail. To the disgust of Theron Ware, whose feelings the exhortations of the revivalists have not excited, he sees his wife ascending the aisle moved by the mesmeric influence of the occasion. Behind her comes Levi Gorringe, and the spectacle so works on his feelings and his mentality, already debilitated by the shocks of the previous weeks, that he faints in the pulpit, and is carried to his home. Recovering later, the degree of his degeneration is revealed by the detestable trick he serves Levi Gorringe—which seems to have been instigated by revenge blended with hypnotic submission to the order of Sister Soulsby.

The explanation which follows between this twain is worth reproduction—she is the adviser; he repining his action, is determined to resign the ministry. She laughs at his scruples, assures him revivals are as necessary to religion as manure to a garden and that his disgust is merely that which one experiences seeing a play from behind the scenes rather than before the footlights. She asks what would be the consequences of abandoning the church, and proceeds then to tell him the story of her life.

"See here!" she exclaimed, with renewed animation, patting his shoulder in a brisk, automatic way, to point the beginnings of her confidences; "I'll tell you something. It's about myself. I've got a religion of my own, and it's got just one plank in it, and that is that the time to separate the sheep from the goats is on Judgment Day, and that it can't be done a minute before."

The young minister took in the thought, and turned it about in his mind, and smiled upon it.

"And that brings me to what I'm going to tell you," Sister Soulsby continued. She leaned back in her chair, and crossed her knees so that one well shaped and artistically-shod foot poised itself close to Theron's hand. Her eyes dwelt upon his face with an engaging candor. "I began life," she said, "as a girl, by running away from a stupid home with a man that I knew was married already. After that, I supported myself for a good many years—generally, at first, on the stage. I've been a front-ranker in Amazon ballets, and I've been leading lady in comic opera companies out West. I've told fortunes in one room of a mining-camp hotel, where the biggest game of faro in the territory went on in another. I've been a professional clairvoyant, and I've been a professional medium, and I've been within one vote of being indicted by a grand jury, and the money that bought that one vote was put up by the smartest and most famous train gambler between Omaha and 'Frisco, a gentleman who died in his boots and took three sheriff's deputies along with him to Kingdom-Come. Now, that's my record."

Theron looked earnestly at her, and said nothing.

"And now take Soulsby," she went on. "Of course I take it for granted there's a good deal that he has never felt called upon to mention, He hasn't what you may call a talkative temperament. But there is also a good deal that I do know. He's been an actor, too, and to this day I'd back him against Edwin Booth himself to recite 'Clarence's Dream.' And he's been a medium, and then he was a traveling phrenologist, and for a long time he was advance agent for a British Blondes show, and when I first saw him he was lecturing on female diseases—and he had his little turn with a grand jury, too. In fact, he was what you may call a regular bad old rooster."

Again Theron suffered the pause to lapse without comment, save for an amorphous sort of conversation which he felt to be going on between his eyes and those of Sister Soulsby.

"Well, then," she resumed, "so much for us apart. Now about us together. We liked each other from the start. We compared notes, and we found that we had both soured on living by fakes, and that we were tired of the road, and wanted to settle down and be respectable in our old age. We had a little money—enough to see us through a year or two. Soulsby had always hungered to own a garden and raise flowers, and had never been able to stay long enough in one place to see a bean-pod ripen. So we took a little place in a quiet country village down on the Southern Tier, and he planted everything three deep all over the place, and I bought a roomful of cheap good books, and we started in. We took to it like ducks to water for awhile, and I don't say that we couldn't have stood it out, just doing nothing, to this very day; but as luck would have it, during the first winter there was a revival at the local Methodist church, and we went every evening, at first just to kill time, and then because we found we liked the noise, and excitement, and general racket of the thing. After it was all over each of us found that the other had been mighty near going up to the rail and joining the mourners. And another thing had occurred to each of us, too—that is, what t[illegible]dous improvements there were possible in the way that amateur revivalist worked up his business. This stuck in our crops, and we figured on it all through the winter. Well, to make a long story short, we finally went into the thing ourselves."

"Tell me one thing," interposed Theron. "I'm anxious to understand it all as we go along. Were you and he at any time sincerely converted? That is, I mean, genuinely convicted of sin and conscious of—you know what I mean!"

"Oh, bless you, yes," responded Sister Soulsby. "Not only once—dozens of times—I may say every time. We couldn't do good work if we weren't. But that's a matter of temperament—of emotions."

"Precisely. That was what I was getting at," explained Theron.

"Well, then, hear what I was getting at," she went on. "You were talking very loudly here about frauds, and hypocrisies and so on, a few minutes ago. Now I say that Soulsby and I do good, and that we're good fellows. Now, take him, for example. There isn't a better citizen in all Chemung County than he is, or a kindlier neighbor, or a better or more charitable man. I've known him to stay up a whole winter's night in a poor Irishman's stinking and freezing stable, trying to save his cart-horse for him, that had been seized with some sort of fit. The man's whole livelihood, and his family's, was in that horse, and when it died Soulsby bought him another, and never told me about it. Now, that I call real piety, if you like."

"So do I," put in Theron, cordially.

"And this question of fraud," pursued his companion, "look at it in this light. You heard us sing. Well, now, I was a singer, of course, but Soulsby hardly knew one note from another. I taught him to sing, and he went at it patiently and diligently, like a little man. And I invented that scheme of finding tunes which the crowd didn't know, and so couldn't break in on and smother. I simply took Chopin—he is full of sixths, you know—and I got all sorts of melodies out of his waltzes and mazurkas and nocturnes, and so on, and I trained Soulsby just to sing those sixths so as to make the harmony, and there you are. He couldn't sing by himself any more than a crow, but he's got those sixths of his down to a hair. Now, that's machinery, management, organization. We take these tunes, written by a devil-may-care Pole, who was living with George Sand openly at the time, and pass 'em off on the brethren for hymns. It's a fraud—yes; but it's a good fraud. So are they all good frauds. I say frankly that I'm glad that the change and the chance came to help Soulsby and me to be good frauds."

"And the point is that I'm to be a good fraud, too," commented the young minister.

From incident to event the author continues the narrative of Theron Ware's damnation. After this curious interview with Sister Soulsby he is introduced into the home of Celia Madden, whose character takes on a more inexplicable air as the book develops. The scene in her strangely furnished rooms however unreal is fascinating and highly dramatic, and in the modulation of the attitudes of minister and girl, there is the highest literary tact. Passing from this to the scene at Thurston's, and the interview with Doctor Ledsmar, to the camp meeting, which is as strong and graphic a situation as the Revival, to the duologue between Ware, Celia, and Father Forbes in the wood, which culminates in Celia's kiss—then the warning of the dying Michael, who upbraids the minister's inconstancy and infidelity, and finally the trip to New York after Miss Madden and the priest—each accentuates the degeneration of poor Theron Ware. He is the victim of his own vain and hapless imaginings, a bubble on the wave of fate, tossed by events, and thrown, bruised and bleeding, against the rocks of worldliness.

The final scenes which follow the brutal awakening of the unfortunate Ware, when he flees, seeking to hide himself after the cruel speeches of the woman he so vainly adores, are expressed with rare power and restraint. Indeed, considering the book, there can be no question of its great ability, or of the vivid interest its narrative inspires. There is serious doubt, however, of the truth of the situations; we suspect the probabilities of such unconscious degeneration; it seems impossible that the conditions postulated should precipitate so involuntary a downfall. It seems so useless the game these various characters play against the unfortunate minister; his disillusion is so gratuitous, so merciless. One asks oneself what is the object of Celia's attentions and Father Forbes' interest—of Levi Gorringe's action?

Harold Frederic has left too many riddles.

[Chicago: Stone & Kimball, publishers.]

A DRAMATIC NEW WOMAN.

MISS ISADORE RUSH CONNECTS TAILOR-MADE GOWNS AND FEMININE ADVANCEMENT.

If you want to see anything as clear and crisp and up-to-date as Cleopatra, off the stage, you should meet Isadore Rush herself at home, not necessarily in one of her latest tailor-made gowns which are as naturally a part of her as are the chic and stately Cleopatra's, but as I saw her the other day in her room at the California Hotel, radiant in the gayest of silk kimonos, leaning back in a rocker, one softly rounded arm thrown up over her head, with its golden aureole of hair glinting above the broad white brow, and her large gray eyes lighting up an intensely magnetic face. Nothing slovenly about this déshabille de boudoir—simply the permissible negligé of a well-groomed woman. And then you should hear her talk of the "new woman," whom she portrays so charmingly in "The Politician."

"The 'new woman'!" she exclaimed, when some one broached he subject—"what do I think of her? I think everything of her. I like her—I believe in her—with her healthy, wholesome ideas—her reaching-out into new fields of thought and study"—this with all the earnestness in the world. "There's nothing so delightful, so charming as the really up-to-date 'new woman.' Now, don't misunderstand me." she went on; "I don't mean that I don't like a 'fluffy' woman, with all her chiffons and furbelows—I love a 'fluffy' woman, but I love the tailor-made girl, with her chic and her trig attire, just a degree or two better. When I speak of the 'new woman' I mean the tailor-made, up-to-date woman in all respects—not the old hen kind, you know, with corkscrew curls and shoes without heels, who goes about with bulging umbrella and a reticule on her arm, making speeches, and constructing platforms à la Mrs. Lease—loud-voiced, aggressive, ill-dressed—and I don't mean the bloomer woman, either."

"So you object to bloomers," I interpolated.

"Of all horrible garments, the bloomers are the worst," protested Miss Rush, raising her hands in holy horror. "When Rosenfeld came to discuss Cleopatra's costumes with me, he insisted upon bloomers in one scene—I insisted to the contrary, no bloomers for me—'let me dress Cleopatra,' I said, 'and if you don't like my costumes I'll agree to yours'; and I clothed her as I thought a chic, up-to-date, tailor-made woman should be clothed—free, untrammeled, with a mannish trick of coat and collar here and there, but still always womanly. Rosenfeld was satisfied, and there was no further talk of bloomers. I hate them," she continued; "why should women who go in for athletics, or for reading and thinking, make themselves hideous? That may have been the idea once, but——"

"Antre jours, antre moeurs," I suggested, "you see no reason why a woman should not dress well, and, at the same time, have an intellectual bank account to draw upon—isn't that it?" I asked.

"Yes," replied the young actress, smiling, "that is exactly my idea."

"The phrase 'new woman' is so variously defined," put in some one else, "tell us, Miss Rush, exactly what you mean by the term."

"What do I mean by the term 'new woman'?" she returned. "I mean the woman who has learned to take care of herself, who understands herself, who thinks for herself, who adds to the other benefits of education those which physical exercise and the care of the body bestow—one who is fond of outdoor sports, who can manage a horse or a boat, who can swing Indian clubs, or enjoy a ten-mile walk; with whom the morning tub is a daily habit, who keeps up with all the questions of the day, and is able to discuss them intelligently with men. Oh, yes, I know," she explained. "Men are not supposed to tolerate serious discussion with women, but bright-minded men really prefer bright-minded women as companions and help-mates to dolls. In short, the real 'new woman,' as we use the phrase in its best sense, is the one, of all others, whose mental, moral, and physical development should be of the very highest and shorn of the superstitions and mummified trammels in which she has been hitherto stifled. Added to this, she should neglect nothing in manner or appearance, which contributes to health or happiness, whether in herself or others."

This, then, is no half-awakened Galatea who plays the part of Cleopatra, but a woman of both brain and beauty, who feels intensely the part she is playing, whose graceful, winning personality is but a background for her conception of that latest development of the century, the "new woman."

E. D. H.

A SALVATION BOOM IN MATABELELAND.

BY FRANK NORRIS.

I think the story should be set down in this place because it is curious and worth its ink, and because it shows what strange manner of men are the Matabele—the music-mad, magnificent, brave, unspeakably cruel Matabele.

Ingodusi, who first told it, was an induna in Lobengula's pet regiment or impi, which afterward came to be the great Imbezzu impi. Since the tale is from such high authority, I think it must be true. Ingodusi is a ring-man and a head induna, and can have more than one wife, and can speak his thoughts aloud in the king's indaba.

It happened when Ingodusi was nineteen years old and was undergoing Mahunda with about a hundred other young Matabele, away up in the heart of Matabeleland, somewhere between Inyungo and the Umfuli River.

By some fearful mischance, at the very height of the Mahunda indaba, Otto Marks treked full upon it. But the matter must be told from Otto's point of view.

Otto was a sergeant in the Salvation Army. He came from Toledo, Ohio, to Mafeking in Bechuanaland, which is as far north as the railroad goes. Otto used to play the little organ every evening at the gatherings in the Salvation barracks at Mafeking until his superior officer decided to boom salvation in that mysterious wilderness of South Africa known indiscriminately as "Up country," or Charter-land, or Rhodesia, or Matabeleland.

Otto Marks started up in April before the rains were done, with a transport-rider named West and a little nigger voorlooper, a ten-year old Zulu boy.

Eighteen bullocks were spanned into their wagon; but their load was made up chiefly of two Estey parlor organs from Boston that were to help out-fit the barracks in some up-country settlement.

That was a strange sight—the eighteen lean Basuta bullocks, very slow-paced, led by the little Zulu voorlooper and the big, strange Transvaal wagon loaded only with these two boxed-up organs, the name of the Boston firm stenciled on the outside of the boards.

For two months Otto treked steadily northward, singing hymns upon occasion, and on Sundays spanning out all day long. At times he tried to revive the spirit of righteousness in his transport-rider, West, who blasphemed the bullocks hourly in more ways than you would believe possible, and at times he would try to convert the little voorlooper. The little Zulu was stunned and bewildered by Otto Mark's clamor, but Otto's swinging revival songs with their tambourine accompaniment sent him into a frenzy of delight, and he would invariably set to dancing, shaking his fists with vague and furious gestures.

After two months they were stopped by the Umnyati River, which was in flood, and were obliged to make a long cross-country detour, with the line of telegraph poles as their guide.

The huge wagon lurched down into the bed of the sluit, ploughed across through the scattered boulders, and took the rising slope of the opposite bank with the heave and crash of a stranding galley. West lashed at the wheel bullocks with the sjambok of rhinoceros hide, and then swore in Cechuana at the little voorlooper because he was not prodding on the lead bullocks, but was standing motionless at the head of the span, his hands dangling at his sides, staring stupidly across the bush. He was dumb with terror. The wagon slipped backward into the bed of the sluit, and the bullocks fell into confusion as the voorlooper came running back along the span, waving his arms wildly.

As was said before, Otto Marks had treked full upon an impi of Matabele, doing Mahunda, and when that happens to a white man he were best do himself to death as swiftly as he may. For a swift death, even if it be the kind that lies in the crook of one's forefinger, is better than the kind that comes slowly and in the midst of thick smoke, and screams and horrid twistings of the body. But Otto did not know this, and West, who should have known it, chose to think that they might even then escape. Otto climbed down from the wagon and he and West ran up the bank of the sluit and looked out far across the bush and saw the Matabele coming down on them slowly, in two long lines. But West observed that they advanced with a regular cadenced movement and that many of them staggered in the ranks, sometimes reeling almost to the ground.

"Drunk!" he exclaimed. "Drunk with Cape-Smoke; blind drunk and dancing. I've seen these niggers before, we may get off, but oh, it's a chance. Pray your God for a miracle now, Otto Marks, for there's little short of it going to get us clear of here. Drunk and dancing," he repeated; "yes, it's our only chance. Quick now, off with case of that melodeon."

Otto obeyed, at first stupidly and benumbed with fear, then, as West's crazy expedient flashed upon him, with an excess of frenzy tearing wildly at the stubborn boards, prying them up with his hunting-knife, wrenching them away with a strength that was born of the moment.

Meanwhile, West had started the bullocks again and the wagon was pulled up from the bed of the sluit and rolled out through the bush, heading directly toward the line of dancing natives.

"They're close in," shouted West in a few moments. Otto raised his head from his work and saw that it was so. Then the last boards fell away and the little American organ stood out under the African sun, shining bravely with veneer and scroll-work and celluloid.

"Play," cried West again. "For God's sake, play, play anything. They'll dance so long as you can keep it up." And Otto Marks flung himself at the instrument and dashed his hands upon the keys just as the rush came, and the green bush was shut from view by the scores of crowding brown bodies, glistening with sweat and all a-jingle with beads ahd wire-work.

Otto was hiccoughing with terror but he stuck to his work, playing away at the only kind of music he knew, the Moody and Sankey Gospel hymns that he had learned in Toledo, Ohio, and that he had found effective in the Salvation Barracks at Cape Town, and at Mafeking.

Then that strange procession began. The eighteen bullocks, headed by the little voorlooper, gray with fear; West, his face set rigidly to the front, walking by the wheel-bullocks; the creaking wagon following, and upon it Otto Marks toiling at the melodeon, playing Gospel hymns for the life he loved, while close pressed about them all, hemming them in on every side, the hundreds of naked Matabele, shaking their bull's hide shields and tossing their assegais and kirris high in the air.

Music-mad, as only the Zulu race can be, their minds all exalted and distorted by the self-imposed tortures of the Mahunda rites, dizzied and confused by the drunkenness of the Cape-Smoke, Otto's music caught them and held them and they danced and danced as though they would never tire, dazed and bewildered, working themselves into a fury, leaping and shouting aloud without knowing why.

Otto Marks struck into a fresh hymn with a veritable frenzy. The excitement and the strangeness of the thing was beginning to tell upon him as well. No barrack gathering had ever aroused such enthusiasm as this. By now he had come to > "Pull for the shore, sailor,

> Pull for the shore,
> Heed not the raging waves
> Though loudly they roar."

And after this without a moment's pause he dashed into

> "I am so glad that Jesus loves me."

When that was done he dug his fingers into the celluloid keys again, kneading them with all the strength of his two arms, swaying from side to side, and while his feet threshed out the rhythm upon the pedals, played:

> "Hallelujah 'tis done
> I believe on the Son."

Suddenly the Matabele began to sing, catching up the tunes with the quickness and facility of savages, singing to the airs of these Gospel hymns the words of the war-song of "Moselekatse," the chant of the Black Bull:

> "Yaing-g'labi
> Leyo n kunze
> Yai ukufa."

Then at last the tension broke. The thing was more than Mr. Otto Marks of Toledo, Ohio, was made to bear. All at once his nerves crisped and recoiled like the broken ends of an over-strained harp-string, and he leaped into the air, suddenly seized with hysteria, shrieking and laughing and banging his fists upon the keys.

With the cessation of the music the spell was broken, the droning chant stopped in a medley of discords and the dancing feet grew still.

"Go on, go on," screamed West, "go on playing." But Otto neither heeded nor heard, for he was out of his head with terror and excitement and was dancing upon the wagon, shrieking out snatches of Gospel hymns. He was waving his fists above his head. His eyes were as the eyes of a fish and he was bleeding at the nose.

An assegai struck him all at once full on the face and he spun about twice gripping at the air and then went over side-ways upon the key-board of the organ, his blood splashing the dazzling white of the celluloid keys.

They ran in and overwhelmed the wagon like an ocean bursting a dyke, and the little voorlooper found his death amidst the panic-stricken oxen.

West tried to shoot himself underneath the wagon but was dragged out by one arm and a leg, with his chin shot away.

And what was done with Mr. West?

"Maghwheena!" exclaimed Ingodusi, as he finished the tale, "He was an Umtagati, a crawling snake. Him we crucified upon a telegraph pole—by the arms only."

TYPES OF WESTERN MEN.

I.

THE COLLEGE MAN.

Well, to begin with, he is a good fellow, but by that I do not mean to say he is good. He is not good in that sense. In that sense I am very much afraid to say he is a sorry case. He loves his pipe and his glass and is given over to late hours and to riotous home-comings with a great noise of shouting, his pockets stuffed with spoons and beer glasses and individual salt-cellars and small tradesmen's signs which he hangs up in his room as souvenirs. One great difference between him and his Eastern brother is apparent here. The Eastern brother holds his diversions in his own rooms and calls them "smoke talks" or "low beers" or "punches" and gets his friends together and makes only so much noise as the Proctor of his hall will allow.

But the Western college man needs a larger horizon, a wider sphere of action, and goes out of the college precincts to seek it, from Broadway in Oakland to Kearny Street in San Francisco.

There are two varieties of the type, the variety that live at the college and the variety that live in the city and travel over the Bay daily to their lectures and recitations. You may see the latter variety on the ferry-boats early in the morning and late in the afternoon, and you may recognize it at once by the small red satchel it invariably carries; as a rule—of course there are saving exceptions—but, as a rule, it wears a black, cutaway coat of diagonal cloth, and a white four-in-hand "necktie" of the kind that wash.

The other variety that live at the college differ from the traveling variety widely, one might almost say, in "language, institutions, and religion." If you belong to this variety you must wear either a cloth cap or a battered "plug," you must smoke a briar pipe, must own a dog, must carry a cane, and believe that the captain of the football team can do no wrong. If you wear moderately good clothes, "josh" about everything and everybody, never talk about yourself, and understand athletics, you are voted "on to yourself," and are popular and join a fraternity.

The Western college man differs from the Eastern brother in still another point. He never has very much money, and that's a good thing, too. The Eastern brother has the long green; the Western man the small brown, and sometimes, yes, sometimes, he hasn't even that. It is no rare thing for the Eastern brother to bring his stable and his man with him to college, and to have a cellar and a suite of rooms. But the Western college man is a true bohemian, and smokes his chum's tobacco, and wears his chum's clothes, and borrows his chum's money—or tries to—without fear and without reproach.

There is still another variety. But this kind is not often seen in the streets of San Francisco. When it is seen, however, it is recognizable at once. It is generally large of build, and wears a brown Fedora hat with an enormous brim, and one of those negligé pink shirts with the very high turn-down collar. In the lapel of its coat is thrust a red flag-pin. This is the variety Stanford.

In his relations with the world of Society, the Western man differs still again from the Eastern brother. The Eastern brother gives "teas" to young lady friends in his "rooms," where his mother is the chaperon, and where his sisters serve the tea and help him receive, all very decorous and solemn. The Westerner orders the matter on a totally different plan; his fraternity is the center of his social life at college. He, with his fraters, keeps "open house" on public days (having made a carefully expurgated edition of his room beforehand) and fills the place with a lot of jolly people—girls from the city, and visiting cousins, and even "coeds," who eat salads and ice-cream in the smoking-room, and play Virginia reels and popular songs on the rented piano in the back parlor, and who come out into the kitchen to help the Freshmen with the chocolate and ice-cream freezers. It's not a Society "function," and you don't have to wear a black coat if you don't want to. The girls have "the time of their life," and send over sofa cushions and lampshades the next week to show their appreciation.

In the matter of spending vacations, however, I am led to believe that the average Westerner and his average Eastern brother are very much alike.

Neither of them are in very great evidence at the fashionable summer-resorts. As soon as Commencement day is passed there is great talk of guns and maps, and the portage weight of cameras, and portable tents and salmon-flies. For the next two months the college man of the West and East alike is lost to view. Both of them like shooting better than dancing, prefer the climbing of mountains to the leading of germans, and would rather lie all night in the wet grass waiting to get a pot-shot at an elk than to pass an entire morning reclining in tennis flannels on the beach, talking to a girl, under a red parasol.

In the fall our Westerner comes back from the mountains, or, perhaps, from the desert, with his hair long and his chin rough with an incipient beard and the skin burnt off his nose, and tells of the fearful and wonderful times he has had. Then he settles to the grooves of his college life again, and after the pastime of camping is over, returns to the serious business of the fall term, which is coaching the football team.

And his work?

Oh, yes, his work; we had forgotten that.

Well, he graduates somehow.

MARMADUKE MASTERS.

CORA POTTER, BICYCLIST.

VIEWS ON DRAMATIC TENDENCIES AND THE STAGE AS A PROFESSION.

A few days ago it was my good fortune to meet Mrs. Cora Urquhart Potter at the Oakland home of her parents, with whom she is staying while waiting for the Australian steamer.

Mrs. Potter is an enthusiastic wheelwoman, and as I arrived, was on the point of starting out for a spin. Very pretty she looked, too, in her biking costume—short, gray skirt, leggings, and sweater. As she wheeled away I noticed that she sat her machine without leaning forward over the bars, her body perfectly erect.

Her hair is still that wonderful flame-colored chevelure. "It is a kind of barometer," she said. "If I am well and in good spirit my hair sparkles, if I am in bad health or blue it becomes dull and lusterless at once. Isn't that curious?"

Colonel and Mrs. Urquhart cordially welcomed me into the parlors of the house, hung with the portraits of their two pretty daughters. Mrs. Potter in the many roles she has made famous, and Madame Raoul-Duval who married in Paris, where she lives permanently. The Colonel is very proud of his daughter; Mrs Urquhart and himself being entirely in sympathy with her dramatic ambitions. To them her work and profession are a constant interest and it is not hard to trace to her parents the pluck and enthusiasm which Mrs. Potter has shown throughout her stage career. It has seldom been my lot to see a family in which so much devotion and accord exists.

When Mrs. Potter returned from her ride we began to talk about the stage, and to my question as to the direction the public taste for the drama was taking, she answered:

"It would be hard to say, I fancy rather toward the romantic school. I think the new fashions are becoming old and the old ones new again. I hope it will be so. For my part I love everything that is old—like Mr. Hardcastle, and I hope to see a return to that literature and drama which has made the English language great. But the public taste is guided greatly in this country by the press, and there are many so-called critics in high places who are not honest in what they write about the drama, and set a bad example to the public who trust to them, by decrying the great and good and favoring a style that has neither grace nor elegance nor literary merit."

"About young girls going on the stage?" I ventured to inquire. "What do you generally advise?"

"I advise nothing," returned Mrs. Potter, "but I say this, that if a woman is in earnest and has the necessary qualifications for the calling, and does not seek the theater simply to gratify her vanity, she will find a profession that will repay her work handsomely and will develop her mind and body as will none other open to women."

"Do you think from a moral point of view that the stage is good for young girls?"

"That is a question that is an insult to the thousands of beautiful and good women who adorn the profession. I can safely say that no self-respecting girl will suffer contamination from the hard-working people she will meet in the theater.

Just then Kyrle Bellew joined us, accoutered in wheeling costume, and ready for a spin.

"What do I think about the tendencies of the drama?" exclaimed Mr. Bellew, laughing. "From time out of mind they have been telling us it was going straight to the 'demnition bow-wows.' They may be right, but the road seems rather long. Are you going for a ride, Mrs. Potter?"

"I love my wheel," said Mrs. Potter, as she prepared to mount again. "I think the bicycle will do much to make women happy in the future and get them out of the groove in which they have rolled for so many generations. I am no 'new woman'—at least, not in the generally accepted sense of the term, but I am a woman, and I do not see why I should surrender my rights as a human being. You will forgive my running away," concluded Mrs. Potter, as she mounted her wheel. "This is the time for exercise."

A. B. W.

PUBLIC PEOPLE.

CHARACTERISTICS OF CONTEMPORARY CELEBRITIES.

Edward W. Bok, editor of The Ladies' Home Journal, is described, by a lady who expected to find him with long hair and pale blue eyes, as muscular, well-knit, and manly; a magnanimous, straightforward, energetic person of dignity and suavity, who understands himself and his business, and is an ornament and a credit to Society

The Emperor of China, Kuang Hsii, never appears in public. When obliged to stir without, he is carried in a closely veiled sedan chair. His only knowledge of the outside world he obtains through his Chancellor. He has never ridden on a railway train, nor seen any of his own men-of-war.

Menelek, King of Abyssinia, is in constant fear of assassination, and employs a body-servant as taster of all the food he eats. He is especially fearful of his life during the present crisis.

Bismarck has no intimate friends. While he is cordial and affable in his demeanor toward all who approach him, he is so only with the idea of getting something out of them; and, consequently, he leads somewhat of an isolated life. His indefatigable brain is working constantly, like a printing press that has no more paper to print.

Queen Victoria takes her breakfast and lunch in private, only members of the family being admitted. The meals are remarkable for their simplicity. One might even say the queen dines en bourgeoise. A plain silver fernery ornaments the center of the table, offset at the nine o'clock breakfast by a silver kettle surmounting a tall stem. The tea and coffee services belong to the period of the early part of the century. The food is of the least complicated description, the luxuries consisting of a particular kind of biscuit, which for the last fifty years has been baked especially for the royal table.

Commissioner Eva Booth closely resembles in features her popular sister, though her face is somewhat stronger than Ballington Booth's. She is something over five feet in height and weighs about one hundred pounds. Her chief beauty lies in her eyes and hair, which are of the same shade of brown. The shape of the head is hidden by the ugly "salvation" bonnet, and a little fringe of curls softens the effect of a high forehead and large nose. Her mouth is large, and her lips thin. She has a typical English complexion, which shows signs of rebelling against the late hours and irregular meals with which it has long been contending.

Mr. George E. Raum of California who has been conducting excavations at the foot of the Sphinx is getting more than he bargained for. Not content with attacking the authenticity of his finding of the cap, the genuineness of his office is now impeached. It is claimed that he is not a colonel of engineers, but a plain American citizen who travels in Eastern Europe like any other tourist. Some one has suggested that he may be returned to us as Bey Raum.

No one takes a greater delight in practical jokes than the Prince of Wales. His great butt in times past was Sir Francis Knollys. It would take volumes to describe the number of apple-pie beds, booby traps, and hoaxes that the Prince has perpetrated upon his unfortunate secretary.

Canon Gore, in a sermon at Westminster Abbey recently, informed his congregation that much of the Bible must have been taken down in shorthand. He said that the speech of St. Stephen, Act VII., could only be recorded in that way.

The most notable of Cuba's heroines is Rosa Hernandez, the wife of Doctor Hernandez, of San Cristobel, who is in the field with her husband taking an active part in the fighting. She is young and beautiful, and had been married but a year when her husband was called on by Maceo to aid the cause of liberty. He came to his young wife, soon to become a mother, and told her what was required. She bade him go to battle, and in a week he had raised a regiment of five hundred men, who as they marched out of town shouted, Vive la reina Cuba! A week later, the Spaniards rode into the home of Hernandez on horseback, subjected his wife to insult, whereupon she rode off to her husband and since then has been in battle with him.

King Humbert of Italy is the most heavily insured man in the world. The amount of insurance he carries is over $7,000,000. The late Czar Alexander III. was insured for $5,000 000. The Prince of Wales carries different policies on his life to the amount of $3,250,000.

Robert Buchanan is about to set up as his own publisher, following Marie Corelli. It will be interesting to see what he makes of this course.

Turner's representation of lightning is scientifically exact, says Mr. Inwards of the Royal Meteorological Society. This can be said of very few painters, as they generally paint it as the conventional but impossible zigzag.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

THINGS AND PEOPLE

GENERAL Thomas Hamlin Hubbard, the new second vice-president of the Southern Pacific Company, comes of sterling American stock, and has a record sufficient to excite admiration. He is the youngest and only surviving son of John Hubbard, who was twice Governor of Maine, and is a graduate of Bowdoin College. In the year 1861 he was admitted to practise in New York, but at the outbreak of the war entered the Union Army as Adjutant of the 25th Regiment of Maine Volunteer Infantry, in which capacity he saw considerable service in Virginia. After the expiration of his term of service he returned to Maine and recruited and reorganized the 30th Regiment Maine Volunteer Infantry. As Lieutenant-Colonel of this Regiment he served in the Red River Campaign, participating in all of its battles. He was mentioned with especial commendation by Admiral Porter for his services at Alexandria, which resulted in the saving of a fleet of Federal gunboats at that port, was commissioned Colonel of his Regiment in May, '64, and was mustered in as Colonel in June of the same year. Under General Sheridan he served in the Shenandoah Valley Campaign, and subsequently in Savannah, Georgia. Notably a brave and efficient officer, he distinguished himself in every position in which he was placed. After the close of the war, General Hubbard resumed the practise of his profession in New York City, where his ability and character have won him a leading position at the bar. As a lawyer he is strong, able, and competent, highly accomplished, and deeply read, a man whose identity stands for all that is honorable and upright in the legal profession.

* * *

There have always existed between the family of General Hubbard and Senator Fessenden of Maine the closest and most intimate relations. Accompanying him on his trip was Francis C. Fessenden, son of William Pitt Fessenden, Maine's great Senator. He also was a graduate of Bowdoin College, and upon entering the army, was General Hubbard's superior officer. In leading his brigade at Monett's Bluff, General Fessenden lost a leg. He served as Mayor of Portland, Maine, in 1876, and declined a renomination. The war records of both these gentlemen were brilliant and creditable. They have maintained relations of the Damon and Pythias character ever since.

* * *

ADOLPH SUTRO is vastly tired of office. His sixty-day leave of absence may be strung into months. Indeed, it is doubtful if he will return to San Francisco until the term of his administration reaches its natural climax. His future participation in municipal affairs will, if my information is reliable, be in the role of the retiring dignitary, who turns over the insignias of trust to his successor. Down in the soul of Mayor Sutro there lurks an impression that his reputation has gained nothing in these latter years of political importance Elected to office by the errors of his opponents, he has clung to the role of mountebank as persistently as in the olden days he did to his friends' dollars. He has given us his cry of "Octopus" until even the long-eared of the community are wearied of its repetition. The assumption that only a madman would so cling to a campaign cry is reasonable, though hardly tenable, for those who insist the man is insane lose sight of his proclivities as a showman. He is a natural "spieler." His utterances, however loud and impotent, serve a purpose as advertising, and he is drawing interest on his personality with a circus at the Cliff House. Nor is his action in crying "Octopus" in order to regain possession of the affiliated colleges' site, significant of the imbecility which his colleagues allege. When Adolph Sutro evinces real generosity, when he gives to the community or to an individual land or book with no conditions attached, then will I believe his brain—or, rather, the sense of acquisitiveness which with him passes for mentality—has given way. In Sutro's absence Supervisor Taylor is to act as Mayor, much to the relief of every one concerned in the business of the municipality.

* * *

The Buckley movement is no more. Its ancient standbys are petitioning the Junta to be sent to the Democratic Convention at Sacramento, promising adhesion to its program and obedience to its leaders. When Joseph Napthaly and Walter Levy are ready to join issue with its opponents then is Buckleyism dead. The Blind Boss may preserve a semblance of vitality, may lie in state at his clubrooms and other meeting-places, but for all practical purposes his day is ended; his obituary has been written and read. Whether the opposing forces in the Democracy will go through the farce of holding a primary is doubtful in the face of advices from the country. The forthcoming convention will have no patience with aught that savors of Buckley, and his myrmidons are too good politicians to waste effort. Their sole hope lies in joining the Junta and participating in the politics the new organization makes, for otherwise their career is ended. In so far as the desire of Judge Levy and Joseph Napthaly to go to Sacramento, their object is the furtherance of Joseph Kelly's Congressional ambitions. It seems the misfortunes of the last campaign have not sated the appetite of Mr. Kelly and he proposes hazarding his fortunes once again. To as little purpose, I fear.

* * *

The chances of the new charter are better than ever. It has the Democracy sure and may have the Republican indorsement, the important dailies will favor it, and I'm inclined to believe now will be carried with a huge majority. This probability infuses supreme importance into the forthcoming Mayoralty contest, for under the new instrument the Mayor of San Francisco has more patronage than the Governor of California. The prospects seem to favor James D. Phelan for the role of Democratic standard bearer. The role harmonizes with his ambition, and the wisdom of his selection is unquestioned. J. D. Phelan stands well among both masses and classes, is a popular personality in the Native Sons, is sure of the Irish vote, and is certain of the support of the down-town element. He is young, industrious, respected, and against his integrity no one has ever yet breathed a doubt. The Republicans will find it difficult to name a leader uniting so many political virtues.

* * *

HOW MANY of the men who saw little Barrios at the Occidental Hotel during the years of his residence there, imagined him dictator of a Central American republic? Though the presidency of Guatemala is an elective office, Barrios sees to it that there is no opposition, for he models his administration and his policy on that of Diaz who succeeds term after term in controlling the destinies of Mexico. Like Diaz, Barrios is forcing his republic into prosperity in spite of itself. He engages in great enterprises, organizes public improvements, and is himself getting rich at a great rate. Of course the monopoly system is in vogue in Guatemala—for instance, there are but four banks and one of them the president controls. Naturally, whosoever seeks the Dictator's favor patronizes his institution. Indeed, Barrios has shares in everything that goes and his revenues are enormous. He is said already to have amassed some fifteen million of dollars, which is quite a comfortable fortune to retire on. Though everything pays tribute to his coffers, his government is so strong and stable that all other sins are condoned for the security which his sway affords. But Barrios, I am told, is by no means satisfied with the state of affairs in Central America. It is his cherished ambition to execute the great project of his uncle, the Dictator, and consolidate the various republics into a great and important State. He is just now engaged in the construction of a railroad across the mountains into Mexico to make connection with the Mexican Central system. Some sixty miles of the line is being operated and an active force is pushing through the Cordilleras. That means, I fear, the loss to San Francisco of Guatemala's trade, for then New Orleans will doubtless be the entrepot.

* * *

Who ever suspected little Barrios of such Napoleonic ability. Time and again have I watched him sitting silent and preoccupied in the office of the Occidental, reserved, restrained—courteous to answer you, but unresponsive, undemonstrative. With his pretty wife, whose head was crowned with a fluffy mass of soft blonde hair, he sat at luncheon and dinner—small of stature, swarthy, a tiny mustache concealing the tense lips. They were a quiet pair; he kept much to himself, formed no intimacies here, though his wife had a small circle of friends. Is it not curious to think that this little man, whom any one of the porters could easily have carried upstairs, is to-day the ruler of a rich Republic, worth millions, and recognized, next to Diaz, as the most active and progressive of the Central American presidents?

* * *

SELDOM has the death of a public man evoked such general expressions of regret as I have heard expressed over the demise of Denis Spencer. He had been in politics many a year, had a wide acquaintance, and among his own people he wielded considerable power. So his repute is not based on ignorance or misapprehension. But he was a most honorable and kindly gentleman—a generous and unwavering friend, and as brave as he was true. There is an epitaph for a career—not the tribute of acquaintance or the flattery of post-mortem resolutions, but the statement of simple facts. Denis was a rare character; he was a fine speaker—really an orator in his best moments; he possessed an excellent legal mind, and like some other great men had the faintest sense of the nature of money. Indeed he valued the dollar not for its sheen or weight or for the labor of gathering, but merely for what it would purchase. I have no doubt that had he been spared Denis Spencer would have enjoyed here as much prominence as he had won in Napa. His name was never mentioned in a slighting connection and his friends were determined the public should appreciate him at their own valuation. So he was coming to the front. Of his career, the best commentary is the grief of his county which he served as District Attorney for six years.

* * *

PROFESSOR Gayley, the head of the department of English at the University of California, will spend his summer vacation in the East. He is to edit one of a series of text books on the English Comedy for the Macmillans, and the offer, I am told, is an especially flattering one. Professor Gayley is an enthusiast as well as an authority on this subject, and I do not doubt but that his work will prove as valuable as interesting. His lecture courses on The Old English Comedy have always been popular amongst the seniors at the U. C.

* * *

I understand that San Francisco is to have a new magazine, whether a weekly or monthly is not yet known. I believe it is to be a magazine of criticism, however, and that Mr. William Doxey is to be its sponsor. A good magazine of this character would readily find a place in periodical literature, not only on the Coast, but also, I hope, amongst discriminating readers in the far East. I shall look forward to its first appearance with a keen interest.

* * *

They were talking about portents and prophesies in the grill-room. The solemn man had told a story to the breathless circle about a friend of his who had prophesied his own death during the month of March, "and sure enough," he wound up, triumphantly, "at noon on the thirty-first of the month he did die." "That's nothing," said the fat man, breaking the awe-struck silence; "I had a brother who prophesied his own death to the minute; and on that very minute he died all right. "That is interesting," said the solemn man, preparing to make a note of it. "How could he tell so certainly?" "The sheriff told him," said the fat man. And the rest was silence.

THE WITNESS.

ALWAYS!

It was a lovely Sunday evening—and they had sauntered out to cull kisses under the tender twilight of early spring at Viroflay. A certain expansive warmth lingered in the atmosphere, and filled all space, even up to the cool-looking sky, where little, soft, rosy clouds hovered among the early stars.

They walked slowly—with not a word spoken between them—the young leaves overhead nodded and twitted together, marveling at these young lovers, who seemed to know less of love-making than they In vain the mischievous branches approached each other, trying to drive these two closer together—to lure them side by side; even the soft moss beneath their feet became slippery, but to no purpose. Suddenly, through the branches, the pair caught a glimpse of water; it was a pond, starred with pond lilies. The young man bent down and plucked one, and as he tried, with awkward, stumbling fingers, to fasten it to her pretty waist, through which he felt the quickening pulsations rising, his passion got the best of him, and, catching her, he held her close, while he wildly murmured:

"Do you promise to love me always—always?"

And she, her heart throbbing tumultuously, dropped her head on the shoulder of this big blonde boy, and answered as their lips met:

"Always, André."

* * * * * * *

Stretched out upon her bedroom lounge the lazy little lady was reading a sad love story, which filled her heart with pity and her pretty eyes with tears. Just then out from the leaves of her book fell a pressed pond lily—a poor little love token, faded and forgotten. On a slip of paper fastened to the stem she read these words:

Picked by him,
Viroflay, April 3, 1889.

She raised her serene eyes to the ceiling.

"Let me see—'89—why that's two years ago. Who was him, then?" then suddenly: "Oh, yes, I remember, he was a little dark-haired fellow named Adolphe."—From the French of St. Madeline.

100 Visiting Cards Engraved in the Latest Style for $1.00, at Dodge's New Store, 112 Post St.

Our new store is our only one—112 Post St., next White House

A DELAYED MASTERPIECE.

AN AMERICAN NOVEL WHICH HAS ACHIEVED GREAT SUCCESS.

In The Singular Life Mrs. Elizabeth Stuart Phelps has surprised both her public and her publishers. After an author has composed and given to the world fourteen successful novels, his or her relative rank in the realm of literature is usually clearly defined; one feels that one knows what to expect. The merit of the forthcoming product of his or her pen can be rather accurately foretold. Even the veteran author himself, after ten or twenty years of literary effort, has settled down to certain lines of thought, certain habits of style and of expression that can be broken with only by the greatest effort of the will. The author's chef-d'œuvre is rarely made late in his literary career, certainly it is most extraordinary for it to appear at the end of a sequence of over a dozen strongly written tales. It is generally quite the other way. The chef-d'œuvre is usually the author's first, or one of his very first, published books.

The Singular Life is, no doubt, Mrs. Phelps's greatest work. With it she has made a fresh start. The story has all the strength, the vigor, and the "go" of unexhausted, almost untried, powers.

The milieu is that of religion, the characters those of a town's parish, the hero, the new minister, and the motif of the story, a vigorous and telling onslaught upon theological bigots. All this material is not new, but its very conventionality is but one more factor in the surprising effect produced. You lay down the book with the impression of having lived in a new literary atmosphere, of having passed through fresh scenes, of having met new people. But this is not so. The material and the machinery are old, old as the days of George Elliott and Charlotte Bronté. It is, of course, the manner of treatment, the style, the point of view that is so new, so fresh, so original. In some subtle, delicate way of her own, the author lures the reader into seeing her story, her characters, and her incidents from her own standpoint.

For instance, what can be more hackneyed than the following contrivance: A drunken bully is beating a little child, the by-standers are helpless to interfere, the new minister, young and athletic, intervenes and knocks the bully down; the bully gets on his feet once more, surveys the stripling in some surprise, exclaims slowly "Well I'll be d——d," and is forever afterward the young minister's very best friend. We have seen all this, under slightly varying circumstances, a score of times before, but as told by Mrs. Phelps and met with in its own place in the order of the story's events it comes back to us new, striking, even unusual. But not all the episodes of the story are of this character. Here is the conversion of the drunken bully:

"Suddenly Bayard (the new minister) dropped Job's hand and spoke in a ringing voice:

"'Job Slip, get down upon your knees—just where you stand!'

"Job hesitated.

"'Down!' cried Bayard.

"Job obeyed as if he had been a dog.

"'Now, lift your hands—so—to the sky.'

"As if the minister had been a cut-throat, Job obeyed again.

"'Now, pray!' commanded Bayard."

For some time Job demurs, then,

"'Pray!' commanded Bayard.

"'Oh—God!' gasped Job.

"Bayard took off his hat. Job's arms fell; his face dropped into them; he shook from head to foot.

"'There!' he cried;' I done it—I'll do it again. God! God! God!' . . . . . .

"'Save him,' cried Bayard. . . . 'Save me this one man! I have tried and failed, and I am discouraged to the bottom of my heart. But I can't give him up. I will never give him up till he is dead or I am. If I cannot do any other thing in Windover, for Christ's sake, save me this one drunken man.'

"Bayard lifted his face in noble agony. Job hid his own before that Gethsemane. . . . The rain dashed on Bayard's white face. He rose from his knees.

"'Job Slip,' he said, 'you have signed a contract which you can never break. Your vow lies between God and you. I am the witness. I have bound you over to a clean life. Go and sin no more,—I'll risk you now,' added Bayard, quietly. 'I shall not even walk home with you. You have fifteen rum-shops to pass before you get back to your wife and child. . . . You will not enter one of them . . . and to-morrow you will send me a written testimony from your wife, Mari, that you came home sober. Now go, and God be with you.'

* * * * * * * * *

"'This is to certify that my husband came home last nite sober and hain't ben on a Bat sence. God bless you ennyhow.

"'MARIA SLIP.'"

This legend, written in laborious chirography on a leaf torn from a grocer's pass-book was put into Bayard's hand at noon next day.

[A Singular Life, by Elizabeth Stuart Phelps. Houghton, Miflin & Co., publishers.]

THE NEW BOOKS.

Marie Corelli has published a new book which she rather self-complacently styles Cameos. The book is made up of ten short stories, highly colored, melo-dramatic, overwrought. The attitude which the author chooses to assume toward her reader is a cheap theatrical pose—a pose for the gallery. There is not the slightest effort made to conceal the fact that it is a pose, and while it may deceive the gallery, the effect it produces upon the reader possessed of the least degree of taste and literary judgment, is only one of exasperation; exasperation that the writer should believe him simple enough, crude enough, to be tricked into admiration for a single moment. Miss Corelli does not know the meaning of the word "restraint." She leaves nothing to the reader's imagination, gives him credit for no faculty of receiving suggestion. She relies for her effects entirely upon exclamation and hysteria. Of course, it is palpable which one of the greater authors Miss Corelli is trying to imitate, but the lamentable result is that we have all of Ouida's absurdities, all her rant and sensationalism without any of her great power of construction and her far-sighted preparation of effect. Cameos is on the level of the graduating essays of a seminary, has about the same truth in its views of life, and the same facility of composition and workmanship, but in some strange way Marie Corelli has "caught on," and no doubt imagines herself to be one of the foremost of the authors of this last quarter century, ranking with Caine, Howells, and Hardy. As a matter of course Cameos will have a large sale.

[J. B. Lippincott & Co., publishers.]

When Greek Meets Greek, by Joseph Hatton, is fiction of an entirely different style. There is no morbid, hypchondrical pose here. It is a rattling, roaring tale of love and adventure, of intrigue plot and counterplot, laid in the days of the French Revolution, crammed with action from cover to cover. It may not be the highest or most desirable kind of novel, but of its kind it is good, and there is a straightforward frankness and directness to Mr. Hatton's style that win's one's sympathy from the very first chapter. For the reader who prefers this kind of yarn of adventure the tale is well worth its price. The theory of the story, which is also the justification of its title, is one familiar to all students of history and sociology; namely, that war is never so bloody, never so vindictive and relentless as when waged by peoples and races closely allied by family ties.

[J. B. Lippincott & Co., publishers. For sale by J. A. Hoffmann.]

The Love Affairs of a Bibliomaniac, by Eugene Field, is a collection of charming little vignettes, struck off with a light and delicate touch, and with every possible grace. In each and every one we have a little essay, a little criticism, and a little love affair. Mr. Field represents himself as the bibliomaniac, a ravenous collector of books, new and old. Each new treasure that he adds to his library is associated alike with some phase of his life, his boyhood, or manhood, or early youth, and with some sweetheart, child, or girl, or woman. There is Captivity Waite and the New England primer in "My First Love," Fiametta and Boccacio in "My Romance with Fiametta." Fanchonette and the old French ballad-makers in "When Fanchonette Bewitched Me." In the whole of the little book there is not a dull line nor a heavy page. It is delightful rambling causerie from cover to cover. The author has observed no order nor fixed rule, and as often expresses himself in poetry as in prose. One of the best of these little poems is the one beginning, "My garden aboundeth in pleasant nooks."

[Charles Scribner's Sons, publishers.]

The Failure of Sibyl Fletcher, by Adeline Sergeant, is a rather cleverly told story of one of those, as it were, reactionary marriages, where the girl, jilted by a certain type of man, suddenly falls in love with and eventually is married to precisely the opposite type. In Sibyl Fletcher the two men are Atherley and Michael Drage, the latter being hardly more than better of peasant. The relations between Sibyl and Drage, the one a man of the people—and of the country people at that—and Miss Fletcher, a young woman of London Society, must of necessity be so incongruous that their treatment in fiction becomes a matter of the greatest difficulty. Miss Sergeant is not always equal to it; at times one feels the story is forced and highly improbable.

There is a noticeable lack of delicacy in the handling of certain situations, particularly in the scenes where Sibyl begins to perceive that Atherley is tired of her. It is hard to imagine a girl of her pride and self-respect so clearly betraying her grief before her faithless lover, and, for that matter, no man in Atherley's position would have, could have, been so brutal, so boorish. Miss Sergeant's grip on the reality of her personages is not firm here. There are plenty of amateurish slips here and there throughout the book, and Miss Sergeant seems to have a predilection for the romantic and the melancholy. As a whole, however, the story makes fair reading.

[J. B. Lippincott & Co., publishers.]

BOOK NOTES.

The announcement is made by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons that they have purchased the books of Robert Louis Stevenson heretofore published by Messrs. Stone & Kimball, including the Vailima Letters, Ebb Tide, The Amateur Emigrant, and Macaire; and that they have also concluded arrangements for the publication of his posthumous works. Weir of Hermiston they expect to publish the latter part of May, and St. Ives at a later date. The Scribners will thus be the publishers in this country of all of Mr. Stevenson's works.

An interesting coincidence, or an example of mental telegraphy, is that just at the time when Professor Roentgen was perfecting his discovery of the X-rays, but before the results were made known, there was published in Stella, by Charles S. Hinton, a romance, the plot of which was based on the fact of the permeability of the human body to rays of light. Stella was published in November of 1895, and it was not until some months later that the condition stated in the book, and seemingly so far beyond any likelihood of conjecture, became a scientific and demonstrable piece of knowledge.

Mr. J. Selwyn Tait, an Englishman, now living in New York and publishing books, thinks that the American author is not encouraged in his own country. He says that we prefer English writers, and that we will not accept our own until England has given them the cachet of her approval. There is some truth in this, and Stephen Crane is a modern instance. England shouted over him first and we echoed the shout.

J. M. Dent & Co. in England, and Macmillan & Co. in America, are about to publish a translation of the works of Alphonse Daudet. This edition, which will be illustrated, will be issued in monthly volumes, beginning with Tartarin of Tarascon.

S. R. Crockett has just completed a story of about 10,000 words, which will appear in the May number of The Windsor Magazine. Otherwise, he has been principally playing golf. Mr. Rudyard Kipling is expected in London during the Spring, but I believe that it is at least premature to say, as several papers have, that he intends to settle permanently in England.

Stephen Crane is being extensively wined and dined and is warned by the critical papers against the adulation which Society is conferring on him. The author of the Red Badge is decidedly in the ascendant among the litterateurs just now and his utterances are fraught with great importance.

The Easter poem, "Night and Morning in Jerusalem," in the April Harper's, is by Katrina Trask, wife of Spencer Trask, the well-known Wall Street financier. Mrs. Trask published a poem a few years ago called "Under King Constantine."

It is strange to discover how often the success of a really great novel is due to the merest chance. Many critics have agreed in calling Lorna Doone the best of all modern novels. But Mr. Blackmore himself is responsible for the following remarkable story. Eighteen times the book was rejected by as many publishers, and when finally accepted by a new firm did not sell. About that time the Marquis of Lorne's engagement with Princess Louise was announced. The public chose to believe that Lorna Doone had something to do with Lord Lorne, and at once the book began to sell. The public discovered nothing about the marriage in its pages, but found something better, a wonderfully charming tale. From that time until now the sale has been large and steady.

Good Appetite

Is restored and the disordered Stomach and Liver invigorated by taking a small wineglassful, before meals, of the celebrated . . . . . .

Peruvian Bitters

BYRON HOT SPRINGS

California's Greatest Summer Resort and Sanitarium.
Seven Famous Mineral Springs.
CONTRA COSTA CO

BYRON HOT SPRINGS

TAVERN OF CASTLE CRAG

QUEEN OF ALL MOUNTAIN RESORTS

The Tavern of Castle Crag, the most beautiful, attractive and accessible of all mountain resorts, will open for the reception of guests, June 1, and will close October 1, 1896.

GEORGE SCHÖNEWALD, Manager
ROOM 59, UNION TRUST BUILDING
SAN FRANCISCO

Blithedale

The nearest Summer Resort to San Francisco, and the most charming, is within five minute's drive from Mill Valley Station. Wooded hills shelter it from the wind and fog. Rose paths and beds of fragrant clover surround the houses, and all around are the redwoods—500 acres of woods. The cottages have porcelain bath tubs and electric lights and perfect sewerage. The never failing brook runs through the place. Table excellent—cream every day. Terms modcrate. For particulars, address—MRS PARRAR, who will be at Blithedale after April 15th.

The place will open on May 1st.

Napa Soda Springs California's Famous Mountain Spa!

HAVE YOU BEEN THERE LATELY?

1000 feet above Napa Valley. Climate unsurpassed. Views magnificent. Table supplied from orchard and ocean, field and farm. Hot and cold Napa Soda water baths. Telephone and Postoffice. Burros to ride. Bowling alleys, tennis, croquet swings and hammocks. New improvements every year. Gas and running water in every room. Relief for asthmatics. WARM WATER SWIMMING TANK. An ideal summer resort. Children's paradise, mothers' delight, husbands' rest. Address ANDREW JACKSON, Napa Soda Springs, P. O.

Wedding Invitations are properly engraved and in correct form, at ROBERTSON'S

SEA BEACH HOTEL, SANTA CRUZ, CAL.

The Ideal Summer Resort should offer gaiety for the gay, re-t for the weary, a beautiful country for the nature lover, a pleasant home and genial climate for all. These and many other attractions may be found at the Sea Beach Hotel, within easy reach of San Francisco. For additional information, address—

JOHN R. CHACE,
Proprietor.

THE THEATERS.

MANSFIELD'S RENDERING OF "RODION THE STUDENT."

To see the "Fat Joy Club" (this may not be the Samoan spelling, but it's phonetic), to see the Fat Joy Club holding its revels at the Morgue would not surprise me more than to meet a man who wanted to see "Rodion the Student" a second time. It is dreary, it is even dreadful, but it is not powerful enough to be horrible, except in tiny spots; for the most part it is simply depressing and unpleasant, like dining in damp skirts and overshoes with some one who keeps explaining that two and two make four, and reminding you that your favorite dishes are probably infested with germs of disease.

Until the fourth act (or scene, as it is called in this "serious play") I could not imagine why Mansfield selected this unmitigated tragedy; then, of course, the reason became obvious: he wanted to do the dream scene from "The Bells," but did not care to share the honors with the mesmerizer and the rest of the paraphernalia. As Rodion he has it all to himself, with nothing to divert the attention of the audience from him for a moment. To tell the truth it would take a good deal to divert one's attention during his pantomime of the Jew's murder—that is, after he clutched his imaginary pick. I felt inclined to smile at the jerky sawing of his right hand as he stooped for the pick in the second act, when he prepared for Izaak's murder; in fact I did smile, and so did several other people, for it was manifestly overdone in order, I suppose, that we would recognize the motions when repeated in his delirium. There was no trouble about that. They were too noticeably unnatural to be forgotten, and the smile spread again, but it was soon turned into a shiver as he lifted his arms above his head and gave those two quick, unflinching blows.

With the single exception of this exaggerated sawing of the hand, the fourth act is good. Rodion's terror, when he is told of the summons, is capitally done; good, too, the dialogue with the magistrate, and his subsequent delirium broken in upon by the shrill cry at the door of "Rodion, Rodion, Romanytch"; it lingers in the backgrouud of one's mind for days. The last act is flat, and it seems to me most unnatural for a woman who had been so hardly used as Sonia to have still had enough faith in God left to say "atone" to the man she loved when atonement meant death to him. Perhaps it would have been more convincing in other hands, for, though Beatrice Cameron does this act very well, through the words "Rodion, you are more miserable than I," her shrill entreaties for expiation need amending badly.

I have never before seen Mansfield do so unsatisfactory a piece of work as the second act—"the deed"—of this play. The illusion was not complete; you never forgot for a moment that it was acting, and not the real thing. I don't like the manner in which he renders the soliloquy, or the way he claws at the pick—it ought to have been a hammer any way, or something small, for he could not have kept his intentions from his victim an instant with so large a thing as a pick in his hands. The resolution, too, with which he mounted the steps, accorded but ill with his agitated and uncertain demeanor at the Jew's door. He ought not to have exposed himself so fully when listening to the conversation between Sonia and the Jew, and he ought to have covered ground a bit faster when he made his escape, with his white, backward-turned, haunting face. Even his best-rendered lines in this act are not so convincing as his "I lofe you," in "Prince Karl"—but—I lost my heart to him as the blonde's adoring German.

Though an inspector of insane asylums or a contortionist might not think Rodion's finger-gymnastics remarkable, they look very strange to less well-informed persons, and seem to mean—almost anything. They also attracted attention to Mansfield's vigorous and well-fed arms—arms as much like those of a half-starved student as law is like justice. Taken as a whole, Mansfield in this play is disappointing to his admirers, of whom I am a most sincere one. The machinery, the methods by which he produces his effects, are too visible. The fact was thrust upon me as never before, how little he owes to what we call inspiration—that is, the almost intuitive perception and use of the right geture and inflection—and how much to the strong will which, couched in that outthrust jaw and square chin, holds him to insistent effort. An actor does not reveal his native talent so much by his results as by his method of arriving at them, and we are seldom permitted to see that or to know what he may have had to overcome and acquire. One can fancy the labor which Mansfield must have undergone before he could coerce his rather irritating, dominant personality and unpliant nature to ape the sweetness and simplicity of a Prince Karl or the suave foppish insolence of Beau Brummel. It must have been something like trying to cover the high flavor of a crisp ruddy apple with the indeterminate one of an apricot or the slippery sweetness of a banana. That he has been so successful in disguising his essence and in ringing these changes shows the intelligence, the careful work and accurate, distinctly outlined methods of the man as nothing else could.

PEG WOFFINGTON.

MISS BOWES' CONCERT.

It did not further the interests of Miss Carrie Bowes to advertise her as an "eminent pianist," for to the class of people who usually attend concerts the meaning of the word eminent is quite patent. Miss Bowes has a good technic, a very pretty touch, and a fair share of temperament. At her concert of last week she was best in some short pieces of Bach, and in the "Dance of the Elves," a charming composition by Sapelnikoff, who recently made such a success in London. The Chopin concerto (e minor) and Liszt's Hungarian Fantasie are as yet beyond the powers of Miss Bowes. Doubtless, though, she would have appeared to greater advantage had the accompaniments been more satisfactory. The orchestra was small, poorly balanced, and decidedly off pitch. Mr. Howe was the conductor.

P. C. A.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Next Monday evening, April 27th, we are to hear Rivarde, the violinist, who has made such a stir among musicians in the East. There will be six concerts at the Columbia Theater on the following evenings: Monday, Tuesday, Thursday, Friday, Saturday matinee, and the last farewell concert, Sunday evening, May 3d. On each of these occasions Mr. Rivarde will be assisted by Mr. Lachaume, the pianist, Mr. Wm. H. Keith, the barytone, and an orchestra of forty musicians, conducted by Mr. H. J. Stewart, with John Marquardt and N. Landsberger occupying the first chairs.

Professor Bristol's wonderful trained horses begin an engagement at the Auditorium next Monday night. These equine thespians perform all sorts of remarkable tricks and are well worth seeing. The antics of the trick mule Denver are said to be very funny.

Ezra Kendall at the Columbia appears in the broad farce comedy "A Pair of Kids." The piece is so old as to be almost a back number by this time, but Ezra furnishes enough eccentric humor and funny situations to make it still very amusing.

The little Rossow brothers are the big feature at the Orpheum this week, and their boxing scene is one of the most amusing little "acts" the Orpheum has ever presented. The Hopkins Transoceanic Company is full of new specialties and will probably draw full houses during the period of their stay.

At the Baldwin on Monday, Tuesday, and Saturday nights Richard Mansfield presents "A Parisian Romance," in which he appears in his famous interpretation of the Baron Chevrial. As the old French rake, whose life has been spent in dissipation, Mansfield is seen at his best. On Wednesday evening the last performance of "The Story of Rodion, the Student," will be presented. "Beau Brummel" will be revived for the last time on Thursday night. Mr. Mansfield will give us only one opportunity of seeing him as the Reverend Arthur Dimmesdale in "The Scarlet Letter," and that will be on Friday evening. Beatrice Cameron is also seen in a role that allows of some strong situations, and between the star and his leading lady we are given some unusually brilliant work. "Prince Karl" will be the bill for the last matinee on Saturday.

"Blue Beard" is still a success at the Tivoli, a number of new specialties appearing this week. Gilbert and Goldie have a new act that is very taking, and Ferris Hartman is still singing "Dat New Bully."

"Special Delivery" is the title of the "Post Office" play now showing at Morosco's. It has an interesting and melodramatic plot, interwoven with some bright comedy. Lisle Leigh and Fanny Warren have become great favorites with the Morosco playgoers. The singing and dancing of Miss Warren are especially noteworthy. The play is well staged and is on the whole worth the price of admission.

Roland Reed's "The Politician" has achieved a distinct success at the California. The piece runs through all next week.

Mrs. Auzerais-Hoyte made her first appearance as a professional this week at the Alcazar in "The Setting of the Sun" and 'Everybody's Friend" and for a tyro upon the boards did very well, showing herself possessed of a good stage presence, an attractive figure, and an intelligent appreciation of the demands of her calling. Whether Mrs. Hoyte will develop into a star comedienne remains to be seen.

San Francisco & North Pacific Railway

SANTA ROSA ROSE CARNIVAL

Thursday, April 30th Friday May 1st
Saturday, May 2d

Tickets on sale at $2 for the Round Trip, Wednesday, April 29th, to Saturday, May 2d, inclusive. Return limit, Sunday, May 3d. On Friday, May 1st, the day of the Grand Floral Parade, only $1 for the Round Trip. On Saturday, May 2d, Bicycle Day, only $1 for the Round Trip. Children between 5 and 12 years, half the above rates.

On Friday and Saturday there will be two trains each way, leaving Tiburon Ferry, San Francisco, at 7:30 and 9:00 A. M., and on return will leave Santa Rosa at 3:35 and 8:00 P. M. For further information, apply at 650 Market St., (Chronicle Bldg.) or General Office, Cor. Sansome and California Sts.

H. C. WHITING, General Manager.
R. X. RYAN, General Passenger Agent.

GOLDEN GATE HALL

APRIL 30th, 8:15 P. M.

A CONCERT WILL BE GIVEN TO
MRS. CARMICHAEL-CARR
Prior to her departure for England
The following artists will assist—
Miss Sofia Newland, Mr. Willis Bacheller, Mr. J. H. Desmond, The San Francisco Quartette, a Double Quartette from the Loring Club, Mr. Beel, Mr. Josephs and Mr. Jaulus.
Tickets, including reserved seats, 50c, now to be had at Sherman, Clay & Co

Y. M. C. A. AUDITORIUM
Corner of Mason and Ellis Sts.

Wednesday Evening, April 29th, at 8:15 P.M.
FIRST RECITAL
GIVEN BY PEARL LADD
...THE WONDERFUL CHILD PIANIST...

Admission, 50c. and $1.00. No reserved seats.
Tickets may be obtained at the principal music stores, and at the Auditorium on the evening of the recital.

THE AUDITORIUM
Friedlander, Gottlob & Co., Lessees and Managers

Commencing Monday, April 25, every evening including Sunday, Saturday and Sunday, PROF. D. M. BRISTOL'S EQUESTRIAN CURRICULUM, the finest trained horses in the world. A most astonishing and wonderful exhibition. Amazing animal actors. Horse arranging school [illegible] horses in mathematical problems; horse distinguishing colors; horses in a swing; horses leaping over their fellows; horse churning; horses teetering; horses rolling barrels; horses fishing with rod and line; mule valet; mule clown; horses rocking; horses as [illegible] mail carrier; horse ball catcher; horse actors; horse leaping from flying swing to trapeze.
Reserved seats, 15, 25 and 50 cents.
Children [illegible]

FINEST ON THE MARKET
BEWARE OF IMITATIONS
EEL RIVER CREAMERY
SEE THAT THIS STAMP IS ON END OF SQUARE
A FINE CREAM DELICIOUS FLAVORED BUTTER
If you appreciate a DELICACY
Ask your Dealer for the BRAND

Racing! Racing! Racing!
California Jockey Club
WINTER MEETING
BEGINNING TUESDAY, MARCH 15TH
BAY DISTRICT TRACK
Racing Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday—Rain or Shine. Five or more races each day. Races start at 2 P.M. sharp. McAllister and Geary street cars pass the gate.
R. B. Milroy, Secretary. Thos. H. Williams, Jr., Pres.

BALDWIN THEATRE
AL HAYMAN AND CO. INCORP'D PROPS
Monday Next - [illegible] last week of [illegible] New York Comedy Theatre Stock Company
RICHARD MANSFIELD
Monday, Tuesday and Saturday Evenings
A Parisian Romance
Wednesday...The Story of Rodion, the Student
Thursday Beau Brummel
Friday (only performance)....The Scarlet Letter
Saturday Matinee.....Prince Karl
Monday May 4th EDDIE FOY
in "The Strange Adventures of Miss Brown"

CALIFORNIA THEATRE
AL HAYMAN AND CO. INCORP'D PROPS
Next Week Monday April 27th
A Great Big Hit
Second and Last Week of
ROLAND REED
IN THE POLITICIAN
Monday May 4th
PRIMROSE & WEST'S MINSTRELS

ORPHEUM
O'Farrell Street, between Stockton and Powell
Week of Monday, April 27th
Positively the Last Week of the Great Vaudeville Organization
HOPKINS' TRANS-OCEANIC CO.
THE ROSSOWS THE APPOLLO
HORACE BENNERS SHARP & FLAT
THE EVANS
CLAYTON, JENKINS & JASPER
TOM MACK
FORD & FRANCIS THE NAMEDOS
FULGORA

TIVOLI OPERA HOUSE
MRS. ERNESTINE KRELING, Proprietor and Manager
Last Nights of the Brilliant Spectacular Extravaganza
BLUE BEARD
Last time of the pretty ballets, the novel specialties, the coster-song medley, the medley of negro airs, the beautiful scenic pictures, the gorgeous electrical display, the wondrous rays of light dances.
Next Opera CHIMES OF NORMANDY
In Preparation—UNCLE TOM'S CABIN
First time in operatic form.
POPULAR PRICES 25 and 50 Cents

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE
Handsomest Family Theatre in the World
WALTER MOROSCO, Sole Lessee and Manager
Last Performances of—Special Delivery
MONDAY, APRIL 27th
The Author's Melodrama
LADY LIL

Columbia Theatre
FRED. ZECH'S METHOD OF [illegible]
Beginning Monday Evening, April 27th
Tuesday Evening, April 28th
Thursday Evening, April 30th
Friday Evening, May 1st
Saturday Matinee, May 2d
Sunday Evening, May 3d
SIX GRAND PERFORMANCES
Introducing here for the first time AT THE COLUMBIA THEATRE
RIVARDE The Great Spanish Violinist assisted by
M. AIME LACHAUME, The Pianist
MR. WM. H. KEITH, Baritone
And a Grand Orchestra of 40 Selected Musicians. Mr. H. J. Stewart, Conductor.
John Marquardt, Concert Master.
Prices, 50c., 75c., $1.00, $1.50 and $2.00
NOTE—At the Thursday Evening Concert, by request, MR. DONALD De V. GRAHAM will be the Vocal Soloist.

Reduce your obesity by taking Brooks's Phytolacca. Pleasant to take. Makes walking a pleasure. No diet necessary. Trial size 50 cents. Try it. Get it at 119 Powell Street. Mailed free on receipt of price.

Kelly's Corn Cure never fails. 25 cents. 102 Eddy Street.

SPLASHES.

SOCIETY, as I mentioned last week, is averse to fiestas, and if you speak of the affairs at Los Angeles and Santa Barbara as rustic festivities, you will find sympathy on Pacific Avenue and Broadway. In fact, there is nothing but marble hearts for rural queens. Swelldom wishes none of them, and as beauties, they are at a discount. Their fascinations are questioned, and, altogether, the local 400 holds aloof. This is the true San Franciscan spirit—a compound of envy and indifference. Instead of aiding in festivals that add interest to our life and add identity to our commonwealth, these unfortunately misguided fashionables prefer to remain at home, with no kind hand for other's enterprise. It's a poor spirit with which to rear a great State.

* * *

It is astonishing the number of new people who are developing ancestors. While there is no Herald's College here to discover armorial bearings or exhume genealogical trees, the imputation of lineage is effectively given by means of old furniture. The prevalent fad is that of conveying a remote air to new mansions, and this is done by means of alleged heirlooms, antiquated candlesticks, ancient mahogany sideboards, sofas, and settees; and in consequence of this craze, the proprietor of a certain old curiosity shop on Sutter near Polk is waxing rich. He has set up quite a number of homes with retrospective furniture, and is ready to pay excellent prices for memorial mahogany. I was in a strikingly modern villa residence and was shown a deadly old relic of Colonial days in the shape of a species of sideboard. "It's dreadful, isn't it?" said my hostess, whose history dates back to the discovery of California fruit, "but it has been in the family a hundred years and we could not think of putting it out."

* * *

There is precious little occurring these Easter days. So little, indeed, that Society has time to develop all its fads and fancies. Nowadays individuality is to the fore. To be prominent, it is not sufficient to go to entertainments, to make the rounds of teas, or to be a frequent visitor at Burlingame. One must possess a personality. This is accomplished in various ways. Certain young women attain significance by adhering to a single color or a solitary perfume; others by their fondness for a certain topic or a singular man. One girl I know wears nothing but black; a second has developed a reputation by her strict adherence to black and white; and a third maiden can only be persuaded to wear blue, but she adds contrast to this token of individuality by using no perfume but that of violets. These brilliant efforts after originality are, of course, to be commended, but it seems a pity the ambition does not take a more unconventional direction.

* * *

Baroness von Shroeder has given quite a number of dinners since her return from Europe, and is adhering strictly to the custom approved by the Prince of Wales, of limiting the menu. Instead of a variety of entrées, or an embarrassment of roasts, punches, and sweets, she confines the appetites of her guests to certain carefully composed plats, and her dinners are not allowed to last over an hour. This is the rule in the swell English houses which His Royal Highness frequents; though I believe Emperor William is fonder of a more extended cuisine.

* * *

It would be interesting to know why Mrs. Auzerais-Hoyte is consistently referred to by the dailies as a Society woman. She was called on the posters a "Society brilliant," whatever that may mean. I am sure Mrs. Auzerais never figured in Mr. Greenway's flock. Indeed, she never manifested any tendency in that direction; and, if she had cherished longing toward fashionable prestige, it is certain she made no special efforts at gratifying them. It is to be presumed Mrs. Auzerais is relying for success rather on her histrionic talent than on social reputation.

* * *

The 400, this season, does but little bicycling. The wheel, in so far as Society is concerned, enjoys no particular popularity. The excursions to the park, which were so popular a diversion of '95, are not thought of in '96. The excuse for the inconstancy involved in this abandonment is the popularity of the pursuit among damsels of lesser degree. It is alleged that every one wheels; that it is no more exclusive nowadays than walking, or driving; that no significance attaches to the pursuit, nor is it to be preferred to any other form of exercise. So swelldom reverts to its ancient pastime, and is happier than ever, doing nothing.

* * *

What does General I. F. Houghton propose to do with the Chanler house over at Piedmont? He recently became its owner, and there is considerable interest in Oakland to learn if he proposes to occupy it. Piedmont makes an admirable place for summer, and one can imagine the installation of the Houghton family there would tend to make the environment more popular. The Chanler house is a commodious house, is provided with a ballroom, and would be a capital place to entertain in.

* * *

There is a disposition on the part of Society to scatter far and wide this season. Besides the contingent that has gone East, or to Europe, there is a disposition in favor of the Southern part of the State, and quite a marked prejudice for Paso Robles. Indeed, quite a fashionable colony is established in that environment just now. The Webster Joneses are there, and the Goads also. Miss Blair has just returned, and J. A. Fillmore is about to make the hotel his headquarters during a prolonged vacation. The papers say he is suffering from diabetes. Mrs. Hager and Mrs. Morgan, who had secured rooms at Castle Crag, have abandoned their intention of residing there, and decide for Santa Monica this summer.

* * *

I learn that young Sam Blair, who has been traveling in Europe for his health, found the continent uncongenial. He experienced nostalgia in its most aggravated form, and determined to return to this side of the world without further ado. He is now in New York. This seems a pity, as it deprives Miss Jennie Blair of an interesting trip, it having been decided that she should join her brother in Paris.

* * *

Though the Colliers are in deep mourning over the loss of their youngest son, the catastrophe to their house at Lakeport is not to dissuade them from rebuilding. They have invited plans for a new house on the old location, and in the meantime have leased the Redhill place of Gardiner Hammond. Mrs. Collier and Miss Marquita Collier have been guests of Mr. Sheldon, and are now with Mrs. McCutcheon at Ross Valley. Subsequently, they go to the Bowies for a time.

* * *

In the acquaintance of all of us the eminent gourmet cuts a figure. In every circle there are several of these who turn up their noses at the average dish and hint how much better it would have been had they themselves prepared it. They are especially critical of oyster frys and welsh rarebits, and clever, indeed, is the chef who can satisfy them with either dishes. A clever restaurateur, who has recognized this tendency in a number of his friends, sees the opportunity for catering to these gentry, and is about to open a supper house on Market Street fitted out with a grill and other features. The novel feature will be a patent arrangement on every table, whereby, at the touch of a spring, a chafing-dish with electrical attachments will emerge into view, and the clever amateur cook, supplied with material from a sideboard, may prepare a dish to suit his cultured taste. The idea is a good one and ought to have a distinct appeal. It would be a good opportunity for Colonel Kowalsky to test his distinguished skill, though it may be said the Colonel has no superior in town at a clam chowder or an oyster fricassee.

* * *

In Boston just now the "X ray" fad is overshadowing everything else in the fashionable, as well as the scientific 400, and the one or two dealers in the Crookes tubes in that town are at their wits' end to secure a sufficient supply to meet the unexpected demand. So far as known, Society people are not attempting to photograph anything except their hands, at present, though it is probable as they progress in skill they will become more ambitious in this new photographic field. Mrs. "Jack" Gardner, the famous leader of the "swell set," is said to have secured some surprisingly fine pictures of her hands, which she has distributed as souvenirs among her most intimate friends.

* * *

Probably one of the most beautiful stained windows ever designed and executed on the Coast has just been finished by Bruce Porter and forwarded to its destination, the Episcopal Chapel at Coronado Beach. The window is in two panels; the panel containing the figure of St. John is an exquisite arrangement of colors, blues, and dull pinks. It was on exhibition last Saturday at the rooms of the Art League. Mr. Porter's success with his window is doubly commendable, since it is enormously difficult to obtain the proper quality of material, glass, etc., at this distance from the great art centers.

* * *

The Matinée Girl is disconsolate. She has discovered that Mansfield has weak eyes, wears spectacles off the stage, and—horror of horrors!—squints. This is a terrible accusation to make against so great an actor, but it is stated with due regard for facts, he is actually cross-eyed—the effect of relaxed muscles, I have been told. Of course, it is impossible to revere any man who squints, and it is sad that this disclosure should come at a moment when Mansfield was to be lifted into an object of worship by the Matinée Girl—and an eminently worshipful person he is, with his great artistic skill.

* * *

Some interesting gossip reaches me about our late guest Prince Luigi of Savoy. It seems he enjoys the distinction of having been born as a Spanish infant, or Prince of the House of Spain, a dignity which he retained only nine days subsequent to his arrival in the world. His birth took place in the week that preceded the abdication of the Spanish crown by his father, King Amadeus, who bore the title of Duke of Aosta in Italy.

* * *

The young Prince, who bears the title of Duke of the Abbruzzi, inherited a large portion of the immensely valuable estates which his beautiful mother possessed in Belgium, and he is accustomed to spend some time in that country each year whenever he can escape from his naval duties. Like his brother, the Count of Turin, Prince Luigi is of a gay disposition, inclined to mischief and, about two years ago, got into a rather serious scrape at Monte Carlo and Nice, which involved the expenditure of over $100,000 in addition to his losses at the gambling tables, before he could effect a compromise. This is one of the reasons why King Humbert manifests such aversion to Monaco and to everybody and everything connected therewith.

* * *

AS AT the final Assembly of last season, the attendance at the Friday Night Club's ball was meager; in fact, as somebody expressed it, so far as attendance went, the affair proved rather a frost. Yet no one denies it turned out the jolliest dance of the winter. Society grows indifferent to post-Lenten festivities, and just now there are not only many absentees, but quite a large contingent mourning departed relatives. The Eyres and Colliers were missing on account of bereavements. Chaperones were few and far between, and I believe there were but fifty girls on the floor. However, it was the younger crowd that was present, together with all the belles; there were two men to every maid, though in the case of pretty Miss Lucas of St. Louis, Miss Mary Belle Gwynn, Miss Mollie Thomas, and Miss Genevieve Goad, that degree of masculine attention was doubled. Miss Lucas in particular was decidedly in demand and rather carried off the honors. She is a bright, gay, and fascinating girl, who is going to be very popular this season. As for the hall, I have never seen it look prettier. The decorations were mauve, white, and silver, and parasols of ferns—a new effect—hung from the ceiling, intermingling their dark green fronds with the pale draperies. The supper was the best that Ludwig has served this winter, and altogether the affair had swing and verve, and is much more of a memory than its predecessors.

* * *

YOUNG MR. HOBART is no longer to figure as the hero of horsemen. His marriage sounds the knell of his racing career. It is a condition of the engagement, I am told, that he retire from the turf, and the race he rode on Ferrier the other day constituted his last appearance. In what manner Prince Fortunatis will dispose of his costly stable, I have not been told; but he intends to realize as soon as possible, gradually, probably, but inevitably. On the day of their wedding, he and his bride leave for Europe; they are to be absent at least a year. While away, polo ponies, roadsters, racers, and coach horses will be offered to the highest bidder. Young Mr. Hobart's love of horses has proved quite an expensive luxury. I am told his determination to have the best at any cost has made a hole in his resources. He cared little what he paid for a fine horse, and if his acquisitions represent a great deal of money, their quality is undoubted. He has done nothing foolish, and by means of shrewd handling he will recoup much of his outlay. Being cut off from the turf as a pursuit, it is presumable Mr. Hobart will find some other and more useful occupation for his surplus energies. Such a bright and ardent young man should develop a career for himself. He has energy and ambition enough to set the pace

The Original Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter Street, stands without a rival and has stood the test for years. The most delicious meals are served by gentlemanly attendants, and the management takes pride in having everything orderly. It is just the place for business men and ladies out shopping to lunch.

Chew Adams' Pepsin Tutti-Frutti. It is sovereign for Indigestion and agreeable to the taste.

Dainty and Refreshing

PAR EXCELLENCE

"THE UNIVERSAL PERFUME"

For the Handkerchief, the Dressing-table and the Bath.

Murray & Lanman's

FLORIDA WATER

Its fragrant, lasting sweetness exerts a subtile charm and never tires or cloys.

Ask your Druggist for the genuine Murray & Lanman's.

for Californians of leisure, and is quite capable, I believe, of showing a love for the best in other than equine directions.

* * *

The wedding of Mr. Hobart and Miss Williams is to be devoid of all elaboration. The two families are to have the ceremony to themselves. Miss Hobart will be the solitary bridesmaid, and Mr. Stetson as best man has the distinction of being the only stranger bidden. This privacy is due, of course, to the illness of Mrs. Williams. At first it was thought the ceremony would have to be performed in her bedroom, but she is sufficiently convalescent to be removed to the parlor where the twain are to be married with due formality and little festivity.

* * *

Mr. and Mrs. Winthrop Lester and Miss Hobart returned from the East on Sunday last. They entertained quite a delegation of callers last Sunday as all their friends looked in to congratulate them on their return. So far as the Lesters are concerned, it is not probable that Society may expect much from them in the direction of entertainments, as Mr. Lester is not given to festivity and cares little or nothing for society.

* * *

I note, with interest, the marriage of Miss Ida Irwin, who was so often a guest of Mrs. Joe Tobin, and who is well known here in San Francisco. She was united Easter week to Daniel Leonard Barnes, at the home of her father, Colonel B. J. D. Irwin, U. S. A., in Chicago. The marriage was quite a military affair, and after the ceremony the young couple departed for the Continent, where, indeed, every one with spare dollars is now going. Mr. Barnes is happily dowered with wealth, and occupies a prominent social position in the Chicago beau monde.

* * *

THE IMPORTANT event of the year at Burlingame is the polo tournament, which has positively been set for the afternoon of Saturday, May 9th. There are to be two meetings. On Friday the teams play at San Jose, with Baldwin, Hobart, McCreery, and Richard Tobin representing Burlingame. On the day of the match, however, the team is to consist of McCreery, Joe Tobin, Walter Hobart, and Richard Tobin. I am a bit surprised at the absence of Lawson, but I am told he decided not to participate. There is no questioning his skill on the field. Still, the team, I am told, is playing a splendid game, and its members are in excellent condition. The ground is better than it has ever been, inasmuch as irrigating pipes have at last been laid and there is the certainty of grass and an elastic surface. By the way, the Riverside team is composed of W. Maud, Bettner, C. Maud, and Waring. Arrangements about trains, etc., will be similar to those existing last year, a special leaving Third and Townsend at 1:45 and returning at 5:30.

* * *

The financial situation at Burlingame continues to improve, though the chances seemed all against prosperity last month. The institution made a profit of some three hundred dollars, and the kickers are now regretting their precipitancy in resigning. There is no doubt of the future prosperity of the institution, and the present auspices are eminently satisfactory.

* * *

THE ANNUAL REPORT of the Pacific-Union Club is better from the financial point of view than from that of growth and development. The profits were over five thousand dollars, which covers a loss of over nine thousand dollars on the restaurant. However, the total membership is but 485 against 510 last year, in which the loss was even greater, and the prospects seem to be that conditions will be worse rather than better next March. These figures include a gain of 19 members admitted during the year. Among other announcements, Presie dent Crockett states that the lease of th present premises expires next April, and that the Club has the privilege of renewal for ten years on the same terms—$1250 per month—by giving notice before November of this year. It costs money to run a big Club. The general expenses account amounted to about one hundred and eighty thousand dollars; of this sum, something like twenty-five thousand went to employees.

* * *

EVERY REFORM movement has its victims over whom the reformers must climb to the heights they desire to reach. In the Pacific-Union Club there are eight gentlemen who have just learned that they were used as stepping-stones to a reform in club politics. They are a little sore—being trodden upon figuratively is just as liable to cause soreness as a literal trampling under foot—and yet the martyrs seem to sympathize with the reformers. The fact is the members object to the black board style of nomination, to the excessive number of directors, to the high club dues, to the restricted membership list, and many other things. Without informing the candidates for positions on the board of directors of their intentions the reform party "put up the job" to elect one man only out of the nine, and so George A. Newhall appeared as a man of such popularity that he has not yet got over blushing at his success. The reformers have gained the first step, however, and a meeting of the club has been called at which they hope to push through the remainder of their cherished plans.

* * *

The new Board of Directors of the Bohemian Club has not yet given any indication of the "good-old-time" jinks that were to mark the return to power of Doctor Chismore, Peter, and others of that ilk familiar with the true Bohemian jinks as they used to be when the loving cup was of pewter, and the artist of the day made his sketches in the presence of the crowd with charcoal on rough paper.

* * *

Jeremiah Lynch made his appearance in the Bohemian Club dining-room on Wednesday evening after an absence of three weeks, which he has spent on the Comstook. He learned French in six weeks, and, precocious man that he is, he has learned mining in three. He has the lore of stopes, winzes, drifts, levels, etc., at his fingers' ends, and, strangest of all, he has really been enjoying the, to him, unusual exercise of hard work—which, like love in a cottage, may easily be a joy when it need only be indulged in as a fad.

* * *

In musical circles there is considerable interest over the forthcoming benefit of Mrs. Carmichael Carr. Sigmund Beel has had the program in charge, and it is, without question, one of the most interesting ever presented in San Francisco. No one has done more for music here than Mrs. Carr, and I bespeak for her entertainment a large audience. Apropos of music, I am informed Miss Ellen Beach Yaw, the California girl with the phenomenal voice, is to be out here June 1st. Another important event is the Rivarde concert next Monday night at the Columbia, when we will have the pleasure of hearing young Mr. Keith. Quite a number of theater-parties are arranged for the occasion.

* * *

Of course, the Concordia looked very gorgeous on Tuesday evening last with all its snowy decorations, for the Hirsch-Schweitzer wedding, but I question the appositeness of lilies and pale roses as a background for matrimony. There were St. Joseph and calla lilies in all their variations, together with snowballs and wedding bells, and the effect was very brilliant; but a little color would really have been more appropriate, if less expensive. The bride looked as charming as ever in her wedding gown of white satin, and her sister, Miss Edna Schweitzer, was maid of honor; there was no best man. Doctor Voorsanger, as usual, tied the knot, and performed the ceremony with that easy grace which he has developed by practise. The marriage proper was performed in the parlor. Subsequently, there was a dinner, after which the guests adjourned to the ballroom and danced the night through.

* * *

IN SPITE of my pessimistic aspersions on Lent, I understand that results were really achieved in certain quarters of Oakland. During the season of abstinence, some eighteen maidens of the young generation met around various Jackson-street houses, and devoted themselves to the preparation of various fancy articles, and on Saturday last these were sold at the residence of Mrs. Hyde on Tenth Street. Mesdames English, Bangs, and Brigham supervised the sale, and boxes, baskets, and other dainty articles were set forth on tables properly price-marked and arranged. An abundance of candy had been supplied by the fashionable dealers, and under the stimulating influence of charity, excellent prices were obtained for the objects sold. Indeed, after the expenses, there were some two hundred and fifty dollars for the Free Kindergarten, which, considering everything, is a very satisfactory result.

* * *

The Pope-Rossiter wedding gathered quite an assemblage at the Church of the Advent, at East Oakland, Thursday evening. It was really a brilliant affair, and the decorations were magnificent. The conservatories of Mrs. Frank M. Smith were despoiled of flowers for the occasion, and Mrs. Walter Scott and Mrs. Goodfellow set them out to the best advantage. The ceremony was quite an interesting one, and among the novel features was the rendering of the "Prize Song" from Wagner's "Meistersinger," by Sigmund Beel, as the guests were congregating. The ceremony was performed by Bishop Nichols. The bride looked very charming in her wedding gown, the snowy tints of which set off her brunette beauty to the best advantage.

* * *

This afternoon the University of California baseball team will cross bats with a picked team from the University Club. It will be interesting to note the kind of game the youngsters will put up against the Old Grads. The younger eleven are in full training, but if they win it will not be a walk-over. They will no doubt go up against nine old players, who, in prehistoric times, when they were sophomores and juniors, pitched or batted for their own 'Varsity nines. Who knows, an old Yale player or two might crop out at the last moment, and Yale—even out of training—is hard to beat.

* * *

The Commencement season rapidly approaches at Berkeley, and entertainments are being crowded into the brief space that intervenes between the moment and the holidays. Saturday last, Miss Duff gave a tea, and her guests consisted, for the most part, of University men. It was a very pretty affair, with charming decorations. Miss Garber and Miss Bertha Foote assisted the hostess to receive her guests, and Miss Foote, I am told, looked especially handsome in yellow lawn over white silk. She is certainly striking, and possesses that rare combination, blonde hair and dark eyes.

* * *

There is considerable curiosity in Society over the character of the reception for which Mrs. Stratton has sent out invitations. Her cards bear the date of the 28th and 29th, with "posters" in one of the corners. Is it a poster exhibition? and if so, wherefore?

* * *

Recent acquisitions to Oakland Society are Mr. and Mrs. A. Mosley, who have just moved into a residence near the corner of Eighth and Oak Streets. Mrs. Knowles had a tea for them on Thursday last, at which the Jackson-street set were introduced to the new comers.

* * *

One of the late events at Berkeley was the tea at Mrs. Wilson's. They have a capital house for entertaining in, spacious, well arranged, surrounded by ample grounds. Young Mr. Wilson is a student, and the guests were all of the University set. The Wilson house is a curious instance of modified architecture. The family is well-provided with the goods of this world, and, on deciding to settle in Berkeley, and having purchased the location, commenced with the erection of a stable. This was to be quite an elaborate structure, with stalls for a score of horses, and sleeping-rooms for a cortège of grooms. However, over the spirit of their plans there came a change, and the result is the conversion of the stable into a mansion and with singularly pleasant effect. The lower floor may be thrown at will into one great reception-room, though it is ordinarily divided into the usual compartments. However successful as a stable, there is no denying it makes a very comfortable residence. A later tea at Berkeley was that of Mrs. Professor Gayley, to some fifty ladies.

THE GOSSIP

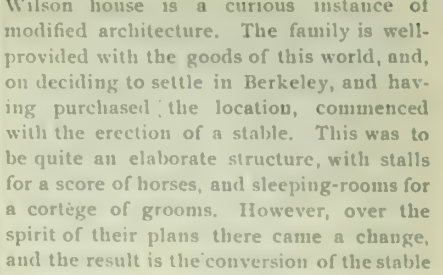
R. B. HAYDEN:

In this age of cheap whiskies, it is gratifying to know there are a few houses in Kentucky who place quality above everything else, and adhere faithfully to the methods of manufacture that have been the means of giving Kentucky Bourbon Whisky world-wide fame. Among these houses the Greenbrier Distillery Company, of Nelson County, Ky., is classed, and wherever its brand, R. B. Hayden, is used it is sure to make friends on account of its excellent quality and rich flavor.

SANTA ROSA CARNIVAL.

Active preparations are being made by the San Francisco and North Pacific Coast Railway Company for the accommodation of its patrons during the Santa Rosa Carnival. Tickets with stop-over privilege for three days at Santa Rosa are being sold for $2. All other information may be obtained at 850 Market Street, or at General Office, corner Sansome and California.

Mr. S. Strozynski, who for the past five years has been located at Ellis and Leavenworth, will remove on May 1st to a larger and more centrally located store at 24 Geary Street. Mr. Strozynski will continue to carry the finest stock of hair, and will continue to employ only first-class hairdressers.



WHEN YOU BUY A WHEEL

Buy one with a reputation one that won't break down when you're ten miles from home. Don't learn to ride, they are not substantial. The Sterling has been on the market five years. We guarantee it for one year, and also guarantee our Palmer Tires for the same period. Replacements made at our office in San Francisco. The Sterling costs $100. If you want to know more about it, send for our Art Catalogue, mailed free to any address, and you will buy the—

Sterling Bicycle

"BUILT LIKE A WATCH"

Address—

STERLING CYCLE WORKS

314 POST STREET

San Francisco, Cal.

WM. V. BRYAN,

Manager Pacific Coast Branch

CHARLES S. WHEELER ERNST H. LUDWIG

Ernst H. Ludwig & Co.

THE MODEL AMERICAN CATERERS

Supply Wedding Breakfasts, Luncheons, Dinners, Matinee Teas and Receptions on shortest notice. Also Terrapin Entrees. Luncheons and Dinners. Ice Cream, Cake, &c.

Telephone 2358 1206 SUTTER STREET

ITO, SOTOMI & CO.

JAPANESE GOODS

ART POTTERY,

CURIOS AND RUGS A SPECIALTY

116 Sutter St. Bet. Kearny and Montgomery San Francisco, Cal

Adams's Tutti-Frutti Chewing Gum for Indigestion.

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist, 806 Market St.

Gladness Comes

With a better understanding of the transient nature of the many physical ills which vanish before proper efforts—gentle efforts—pleasant efforts—rightly directed. There is comfort in the knowledge that so many forms of sickness are not due to any actual disease, but simply to a constipated condition of the system, which the pleasant family laxative, Syrup of Figs, promptly removes. That is why it is the only remedy with millions of families, and is everywhere esteemed so highly by all who value good health. Its beneficial effects are due to the fact, that it is the one remedy which promotes internal cleanliness, without debilitating the organs on which it acts. It is therefore all important, in order to get its beneficial effects, to note when you purchase, that you have the genuine article, which is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only, and sold by all reputable druggists.

If in the enjoyment of good health, and the system is regular, then laxatives or other remedies are not needed. If afflicted with any actual disease, one may be commended to the most skillful physicians, but if in need of a laxative, then one should have the best, and with the well-informed everywhere, Syrup of Figs stands highest and is most largely used and gives most general satisfaction.

PERRIER-JOUET CHAMPAGNE EXTRA DRY "SPECIAL"

Also specially selected stock of Clarets and White Wines on hand.

W. B. CHAPMAN, Sole Agent Pacific Coast
123 California Street

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco
33 Post Street, below Kearny, Mechanics' Institute Building
Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000
JAS. D. PHELAN, Pres. GEO. A. STORY, Cashier
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.
DIRECTORS—Jas. D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. P. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.
Interest paid on term and ordinary deposits.
Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.
When opening accounts, send signature.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE
OF LONDON
Incorporated by Royal Charter A. D. 1726
Capital Paid Up, $3,456,100 Assets, $21,584,413
Surplus to Policy Holders, $8,983,251
ROBERT DICKSON, Manager
NATHAN & KINGSTON, San Francisco Agents
501 MONTGOMERY ST.

Sun Insurance Office OF LONDON
Founded A.D. 1710 Cash Assets, $10,270,535
Oldest Purely Fire Insurance Office in the World
The Lion Fire Ins. Co. Ltd., OF LONDON
Established A.D. 1879 Cash Assets, $1,108,095
The Imperial Ins. Co. Ltd., OF LONDON
Instituted A.D. 1803 Cash Assets, $9,362,920
40 Years in Business on the Pacific Coast
Manager for the Pacific Coast, WM. J. LANDERS
205 and 207 Sansome Street, near Pine

Aachen and Munich Fire Insurance Co.
Of Aix La Chapelle, Germany. Established 1805
Capital, $2,250,000.00
Total Assets, $6,854,653.65
United States Department
204 SANSOME STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

COMET OOLONG
The oldest and most reliable brand of Tea on the market.
Sold only in ⅓ pound papers at 20 cents per paper.
All grocers keep it.

RIPPLES.

CHARACTERISTIC.

Ikey—Is brudder Jake very sick, mudder?

Mrs. Isaac—Yah, mine tear, and he may die.

Ikey—Must we pe awfully careful vith him, mudder?

Mrs. Isaac—Yah; and dot doctor says dot we must give him dose dainty dishes, ain't it?

Ikey—But vat vere dose dainty dishes, mudder?

Mrs. Isaac—Dose dainty dishes vas such as chickens, squabbs——

Ikey—Squabbs, mudder?

Mrs. Isaac—Yah, Ikey.

Ikey—And if he doesn't have th' squabbs vill he die, mudder?

Mrs. Isaac—He might, Ikey.

Ikey—I have two squabbs, mudder.

Mrs. Isaac—Yah, mine goot little poy.

Ikey—If I sold them in dot market I vould get dirty-five cents apair for 'em, mudder.

Mrs. Isaac—Yah, mine tear, little poy.

Ikey—But if Jakey vas real sick and might die, I vill give tem to you for Jakey to eat for twoventy-five cents.

Mrs. Isaac—Vell, if I puy them, Ikey, you must rememper dot dey von't belong to you any mores.

Ikey—And you vill cook them for Jakey?

Mrs. Isaac—Yah, and he vill eat them himselves.

Ikey—Vell, all right, if you vants them takes them away. (Sotto voco,) If he vas so sick as she tinks he vas he can't eat two whole squabbs, and I will have some mineselves.

PULLING HIM DOWN.

A young commercial traveler, who is away from his wife nine months in the year, has been in the habit, while on the road, of invariably answering all of his wife's long, endearing letters in the same language as the following:

MY DEAR WIFE.—Yours received. Am glad to know that you and the children are well. I am alive and kicking. In haste,
Your loving husband,
HARRY.

The loving little wife, after receiving several of these unsatisfactory communications, finally became out of patience, and wrote the following:

MY DEAR HUSBAND.—Your same old chestnut letter of the 7th inst. has been received. I note that you are still alive and kicking. I wish to state in this connection that I am also alive and kicking, and kicking like a mule because you have never anything further to say than that you are alive and kicking. It seems to me that you are always kicking. Hereafter, however, if you do not write me more news in your letters, in answer to my loving eight-pagers, you will find on your return home that your little wife will kick worse than she is now, and you will wish that you had kicked the bucket while on the road.

It is needless to say that the next letter the little wife received from her hubby was a letter that any woman might have been proud to place in a frame.

ANOTHER COUNTY HEARD FROM.

The following communication was recently received by one of our large daily papers, from a subscriber in one of the northern counties:

MISTER EDITER ESQUIRE.

deer sur.—i hav bean subskribin 4 you papper 4 nie onto 6 months and i like it furst rate but the ole woman doesnt an that settles it an she insists that i doesnt subscribe for it auy moor but to subskribe 4 the other papper what yu doesnt have anithing to do with. The reson the ole woman dont like you papper is cause it dont fit her kloset shelfes by 2 inches whitch the other papper does so pleas stop sendin you papper an i wil see that the other feller does. Hoppin that you papper wont bust up akount of mi quiting subskribin 4 it i am you frend, BILL JENKINS.

post skript. i think if you wil mak you papper bigger by 2 inches the ole woman wil want me to subskribe 4 you papper agin as she ses you papper is a better papper then the other papper, as it is thicker than hisn an lasts longer on the shelfes. hoppin that you and yous is well as this writin finds me of which i am thankful i am yous agan, BILL JENKINS post skript no. 2. its rainin like hell up yere how is it down you way. BILL.

VERY MUCH SO.

"Yes," remarked the absent-minded man, "when I wake up in the morning I have forgotten where I placed my clothes the night previous."

"Why don't you write down on a piece of paper the exact place you leave each article before going to bed?" inquired a friend.

"I have already tried it," replied absent-minded, sorrowfully, "but it's very unsatisfactory; I invariably forget where I place the paper. Can't you suggest something else?"

"Yes, sleep with your clothes on."

WHY NOT.

"That boy of yours is a great talker; what are you going to make of him, a lawyer or a barber?"

"Neither; he's going to be a prize fighter."

DON'T HAVE TO.

"Are you working, Jones?"

"No, I'm holding a Government position."

IN NEW YORK.

Major Bluegrass (indignantly)—I tell you, sah, it's a damn outrage!! The idea of a gentleman being unable, sah, to get a drink on the Sabbath, sah, in the metropolis of these United States. I tell you, sah, New York is going back. Yes, sah, going back, sah.

Resident—Of course it is, and when you visit New York you must do as the New Yorkers do—go back—to the back door. Come.

MORE MONEY IN THE BUSINESS, PROBABLY.

Clairvoyant—Yes, I can tell you the past, present, and future; give advice on business and locate you wealthy mines.

Visitor—What! inform me where I can obtain a rich mine merely for the location?

Clairvoyant—Yes, sir.

Visitor—Well, then, why in Tophet don't you locate one for yourself?

BOUND TO GET THERE.

Blinks (after a long absence inquiring after old schoolmates)—And Jones, he was always inclined toward the stage, has he still a leaning that way?

Jinks—I believe he has; the last heard of him was that he stood up a stage in the mountains about a month ago.

SMART BOY.

Teacher—Tommy, what are the duties of the President of these United States?

Tommy—To go duck hunting and fishing.

OF COURSE.

Blossom (as the band passes)—Which instrument carries the air?

Bloomer—The bass drum, you idiot.

BRUNO.

SHEARINGS.

Affable Book Agent (to little girl at front door)—Is your mamma engaged?

Little Girl (in astonishment)—Engaged! Why, she's been married for years.—Texas Siftings.

Dazlin—Look out for these; they're trick matches.

Blazlow—In what way?

Dazlin—They light the first time you scratch them.—Roxbury Gazette.

Friend—What a skilful touch your wife has, Binks.

Binks—You'd say so if you knew how much money she manages to get out of me.—Judge.

Employer—Vot's dot? Didn't I raise your salary a vile ago?

Office-Boy—It vos more as six months ago.

Employer—Vell, you t'ink I must gif you more vages efery time I make an assignment?—Puck.

Diana (the bride)—How do they know that we are bride and bridegroom? We have on our old clothes and I rubbed my wedding-ring in the ashes to make it look old.

Bridegroom—Oh, yes; but I knocked over the inkstand when I registered.—New York World.

Nervous passenger (on steamship that has run aground)—What on earth is the matter with this ship.

Captain (sorrowfully)—That's just it!—Puck.

Would-be Farmer—I am somewhat of a connoisseur in stock and I want only such as are young and in good condition.

Farmer—Well, buy this drove of yearlings.

Would-be Farmer—How old are they?—Texas Siftings.

Uncle Abner (from his almanac)—I allow them Chinese critters hain't sech senseless fools ez folks try ter make aout; they do their readin' back'ards.

Aunt 'Mandy—What's th' sense er readin' thet way?

Uncle Abner (irritably)—Ter sarcumvent them patent-meddycine advertisers. Nothin' on airth makes me so cussid mad as gettin' interested in a feller's hevin' a narrer escape from death, an' findin' aout thet Doctor Screechem's pills saved him!"—Judge.

Yeast—Do you know, sometimes I think it is wrong to play cards for money, and sometimes I don't.

Crimsonbeak—I suppose the times you don't are when you win?—Yonker's Statesman.

Western Train Robber—Hold up your hands.

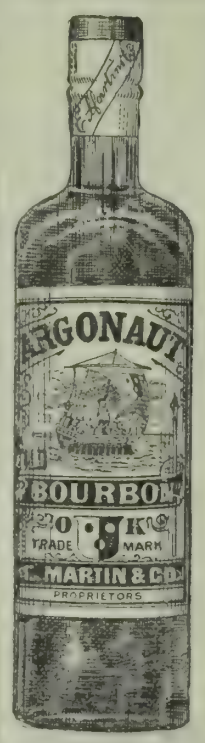
Reggie Languid—Aw—go to my man, deah fellow, he always awanges my twaveling bills.—Truth.

Brown's Bronchial Troches will quickly relieve Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrh, and Throat diseases. Sold only in boxes.

Beecham's pills are for biliousness, bilious headache, dyspepsia, heartburn, torpid liver, dizziness, sick headache, bad taste in the mouth, coated tongue, loss of appetite, sallow skin, etc., when caused by constipation; and constipation is the most frequent cause of all of them.

Go by the book. Pills 10¢ and 25¢ a box. Book free at your druggist's or write B. F. Allen Co., 365 Canal Street, New York.

Annual sales more than 6,000,000 boxes.



Argonaut OK WHISKEY
IS FIVE YEARS IN WOOD BEFORE BOTTLING
E. MARTIN
—AND—
CO.
411 MARKET ST.
SAN FRANCISCO

FOR GRIPPE IT'S A DANDY
VINA BRANDY
AND
It's Pure! That's Sure!
VINA DISTILLERY CO.
819 Market St., S. F.

GEORGE E. HALL
Agent and Importer of Foreign Wines
MUTUAL LIFE BUILDING,
222 Sansome Street

GEO. GOODMAN
Patentee and Manufacturer of—Artificial Stone
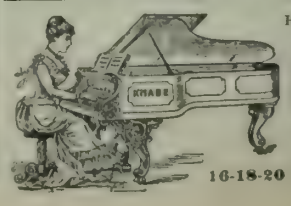
Schillinger's Patent In all its branches
SIDE WALK and GARDEN WALK A Specialty
Office, 307 MONTGOMERY ST. Nevada Block, SAN FRANCISCO



Established 1856
Benj. Curtaz & Son
Pacific Coast Agents
16-18-20 O'Farrell St.

Trees

live sometimes when girdled nearly around. Nature ever labors to repair damage, and after a time, the wounded surfaces are nicely healed. Some persons live and fully recover, even after consumption has made cavities in the lungs. In this struggle we can greatly aid nature by giving Scott's Emulsion of Cod-liver Oil with Hypophosphites. The oil supplies needed fat, and the hypophosphites tone up the nerves. The decline in weight ceases. A positive gain begins, and once again there is promise of life and health. It is never too late to try.

Scott's Emulsion has been endorsed by the medical profession for twenty years. (Ask your doctor.) This is because it is always palatable, always uniform—always contains the purest Norwegian Cod-liver Oil and Hypophosphites.

Put up in 50 cent and $1.00 sizes. The small size may be enough to cure your cough or help your baby.

THE WHITE FLYER IS THE MOUNT FOR '96

BARNES BICYCLES

HOOKER & CO.
16-18 Drumm St.
RETAIL STORE:
1640 Market St.
San Francisco, Cal.

THE WHITE RIMMED HUMMER IS THE COMER

A CARLOAD OF '96

PIERCE TRIED AND TRUE CYCLES

JUST RECEIVED

Many Superior Improvements. Ask to see the

Pierce Crank Hanger

Holbrook, Merrill & Stetson
Pacific Coast Agents
MARKET and BEALE STREETS
SAN FRANCISCO
Ask for Catalogue

A HOME PRODUCT

AXLE-EASE

THE VERY BEST
AXLE GREASE
Made by—
AMERICAN OIL CO.
SAN FRANCISCO

McCUNE CYCLES

Moderate in price—
—As good as the best
ARMES & DALLAM
COAST AGENTS 230-232 Front St.

THE WHEEL.

COMMENT AND CRITICISM ON CURRENT EVENTS IN THE CYCLING WORLD.

The excitement of the Relay has at last subsided, and for this week things will be quiet in cycledom. Then the National Circuit will open on May 1st in Oakland, and the race meets will follow close upon one another till the sixteenth. After that, there will be racing every Saturday afternoon and evening throughout the season at Central Park.

There promises to be a veritable boom in racing matters here this year. Three tracks are almost assured for this city—two of them actually in course of construction— and the ensuing competition for riders between the various promoters will necessarily result in the hanging up of liberal prizes. What the effect of this plethora of races will be upon the sport in general is a matter for future comment.

By far the most important event of the week, from the cyclists' point of view, was the meeting of the Cycle Board on Trade on Monday evening. That body, composed of all the principal dealers in wheels of this city, has announced as its main purposes, first, the repaving of Market Street with noiseless pavement, and, second, the lighting of the Park.

Both of these objects have the thorough support of every wheelman and driver of the city, and the Merchants' Association has promised every assistance in its power looking to their accomplishment. The League of American Wheelmen has thrown the strength of its organization into the scale, and it is a matter of easy prophecy that our next Board of Supervisors will be composed of men who will have unmistakably expressed themselves as in favor of these two measures.

As the number of wheelmen increases, the consideration shown them as street-users should increase in the same ratio. If every street-user was a wheelman, there can be no doubt that the pavements would speedily become specialized to the needs of the bicycle. It is, of course, true that the pavement that is best for the wheel is not the pavement that is best for the heavily loaded truck. There is evidently a conflict here that must be reconciled and adjusted. In general there are three ways in which this problem may be solved by municipalities; First—and this is the poorest method, yet the one most generally adopted—there is a compromise in the pavement itself, such a street-covering being selected as is not the best for teaming nor the best for wheels, but which will serve in a greater or less degree the uses of both. A second method is to set aside certain thoroughfares for the purposes of heavy teaming, reserving other and parallel streets for the use of light vehicles. In this way it becomes possible to use the pavement best adapted to each of the two classes of traffic. But in the case of our main thoroughfare, this second method is impracticable, partly because parallel streets exist only on one side of it, but principally for the reason that it is lined for the greater portion of its length on both sides with mercantile establishments, which fact necessitates the use of the street for teaming to a great degree. This condition of things renders necessary the adoption of the third method of compromise—that is; the reservation of a portion of the street to the use of bicycles and such light vehicles as would not injure the pavement best adapted to them, the remaining portion being so paved as to be best adapted for other traffic. To accomplish this, it has been suggested that the space between the tracks of the cable cars be bituminized, and that an ordinance be enacted restricting its use to wheels and light vehicles. It seems very probable that the cable railway companies would be heartily in favor of such a measure as this, as also would be the passengers upon their cars, for the reason that much of the delay, danger, and inconvenience in the operation of street-cars is occasioned by the indiscriminate use of their tracks by heavy vehicles.

C. MICHENER.

IS THE BICYCLE "BAGGAGE"?

BY CHAS. ALBERT ADAMS.

The passage of the "Armstrong Bill" in New York has revived the interest in the question "Is the bicycle 'baggage'?" within the meaning of the law requiring common carriers to transport a reasonable amount of baggage for each passenger. What is and what is not "baggage" has always been a mooted question, and in determining this question, the Courts have so variously construed the matter, that several apparently irreconcilable lines of decisions have been established. If the bicycle is "baggage," the Railway Company may be compelled to carry the wheel of a passenger without charge; if it is not "baggage," the Railway Company may refuse to carry bicycles except upon such terms and conditions as it may elect to make.

In this State, instead of the word "baggage" the English term "luggage" is used, but this word has been held to mean the same as the word "baggage." The Code Commissioners attempted to settle this vexed question by saying that "luggage may consist of any articles intended for the use of a passenger while traveling, or for his personal equipment"; but as pointed out by Judge Sharpstein, in a case decided by him, this provision of the Code has disincumbered the subject but little, if any, of the difficulty which previously surrounded it, and adds nothing to what had long before been understood as comprehended in the term "luggage."

By the term "luggage" or "baggage" is generally understood such articles of personal convenience and necessity as are usually carried by passengers for their personal use—as distinguished from merchandise and household effects. In one case it was said that "baggage" included only such articles as are of necessity for personal use, and such as the passengers usually take with them while traveling; but it was conceded that what articles would be so included would depend very much upon the habits, tastes, and resources of the passengers.

In a leading English case Chief Justice Cockburn decided the true rule to be as follows: "Whatever the passenger takes with him for his personal use and convenience according to the habits or wants of the particular class to which he belongs, either with reference to the immediate necessities, or to the ultimate purpose, of the journey must be considered as personal luggage. This would include, not only articles of apparel, whether for use or ornament, but also the gun case or fishing apparatus of the sportsman, the easel of the artist on a sketching tour, or the books of the student, and of other articles of an analogous character, the use of which is personal to the traveler, and the taking of which has arisen from the fact of his journeying. And on the other hand, the term 'ordinary luggage' being thus confined to that which is personal to the passenger, and carried for his use and convenience, it follows that what is carried for the purpose of business, such as merchandise and the like, or for larger and ulterior purposes, such as articles of furniture or household goods, would not come within the description of 'ordinary luggage.'"

This decision has been followed by many of the courts of this country, and the rule therein laid down adopted; and in a very late case which appears to have been well presented, the Supreme Court of Oregon, adopting the rule above stated, said "so that it would seem that 'baggage' in the sense of the law may consist of such articles as the necessity, convenience, comfort, or recreation of the passenger may require him to take for his personal use, according to the habits or wants of the particular class to which he belongs, either with reference to immediate necessities or the ultimate purposes of the journey."

If the gun of the hunter, the rod of the angler, the books of the student, and the easel of the artist are "luggage," it would seem that the bicycle of the wheelman, who is a passenger, ought to be likewise included. It is personal to his use; it is for his convenience, according to the habits or wants of the particular class to which he belongs, either with reference to the ultimate purpose of the journey; and is not carried for the purpose of business.

It is no answer to say, as has been said, that the bicycle is unwieldly, and because of its unusual shape is an awkward piece of [illegible] and it is therefore unreasonable to expect the Railroad Company to transport it on the same cars with passengers as baggage without imposing terms, for the reason that it is awkward to carry only because no proper provision has been made for carrying bicycles in the ordinary [illegible]. If baggage cars were fitted for transporting wheels, and only wheels, there would, perhaps, be no place to carry a trunk, but it would certainly not be contended because of this that a trunk of a passenger was not baggage.

Notwithstanding all this, it might be well to emulate the example set by the New York wheelmen, and secure the passage of an act of the Legislature, specifically including the bicycle in the term "baggage" or "luggage," as it is known in the law of this State.

The limits of this article preclude all consideration of the incidental questions of "checks" and compensation for injury or loss of the bicycle while being transported by common carriers. But these questions are comparatively well settled.

DEERE IMPLEMENT COMPANY - SAN FRANCISCO

SEND FOR -1896-
CATALOGUES

DEERE IMPLEMENT COMPANY - SAN FRANCISCO

"NATIONAL"
"MARCH" AND "DEERE"
BICYCLES

DEERE IMPLEMENT CO. 305 & 307 MARKET ST.
330 POST ST. SAN FRANCISCO

DEERE IMPLEMENT COMPANY - SAN FRANCISCO

-1895-
WHEELS
CHEAP

DEERE IMPLEMENT COMPANY - SAN FRANCISCO

USE THE CELEBRATED

C. D. CORSETS AND WAISTS

ALL FIRST-CLASS DEALERS KEEP THEM

SCHWEITZER & CO., San Francisco

Sole Agents for the Pacific Coast

SPRING OPENING

MISS I. E. CONNER

Late of E. E. Caswell

FINE FRENCH MILLINERY

36 GEARY STREET

MENNEN'S BORATED TALCUM

TOILET POWDER

Approved by Highest Medical Authorities as a Perfect Sanitary Toilet Preparation

For infants and adults

Delightful after shaving

Positively relieves Prickley Heat, Nettle Rash, Chafed Skin, Sunburn etc. Removes Blotches, Pimples; makes the skin smooth and healthy.

Take No Substitutes. Sold by druggists or mailed for 25 cts.

SAMPLE MAILED (Name this paper) FREE

GERHARD MENNEN CO., Newark, N. J.

—SPRING SEASON, 1896

GRAND OPENING

..OF..

FRENCH PATTERN BONNETS

AND—HIGH ART NOVELTIES

MARIA J. STACOM

531 Sutter Street - San Francisco

ANNUAL MEETING

..OF THE..

YOSEMITE COMMISSION

Notice is hereby given that the Board of Commissioners to manage the Yosemite Valley and Mariposa Big Tree Grove will hold its annual meeting in Yosemite Valley, at the Guardian's office, on Wednesday, June 3, 1896, at 11 o'clock A. M.

JOHN F. SHEEHAN, Secretary.

SAN FRANCISCO, APRIL 21, 1896.

NOBBIEST STYLES NEATEST FIT BEST MATERIALS

HARLOE

'FRISCO'S FAVORITE HATTER

237 KEARNY ST.

Phone, Red 361

MARSHALL F. JONES & CO.

—Merchant Tailors—

Novelties in Imported Wear. Bicycle Suits a specialty.

Room 115 . . PHELAN BUILDING

NEW YORK HAIR DRESSING STORE

MME. E. KLESSING, Proprietress

Artistic Hair Dressing and Shampooing. A new preventive for the hair falling out. Superfluous hair removed. 1704 Market Street, San Francisco

FASHIONS AND FRIVOLS.

There was a time when the stage decreed what woman should wear. It was in the long ago—the time so feelingly alluded to as the palmy days.

There were plays then—yes. And the leading lady set the seal of approval on the latest thing in skirts and basques—yes, and bustles.

But this generation has not looked to the stage—mirror of fashion though it be—for the correct thing in dress. The leading lady copies the fashionable leader, and orders her jupe with the very same flare, her corsage of the very same design, and as for the bustle—physical culture and sense have done away with it.

But in spite of this glaring array of facts, an actress is going to be responsible and stand sponsor for the corsetless—yes, and fashionable woman.

Every daughter of Eve who was fortunate enough to attend the matchless performance of Mansfield as "Beau Brummell," no matter how engrossed she was in the actor's masterly interpretation, had more than half an eye for Jennie Eustace, her gorgeous gowns, and her magnificent stayless figure. And if every one of them who is possessed of the smallest atom of love for the beautiful did not go home and try how she would look, then I know nothing of the vanities and ways of my sex.

That exquisite gown—satin, all embroidered in gold—that extreme décolletage, yet, on account of the absense of the corset, modest; and, above all, the easy, swaying, graceful figure, have done more to kill the corset than all the dress reform that has ever been thundered forth from the platform by coarse, fat, dowdy women.

The corset will eventually have to go, and if you would know how to dress and dress well without one, and have your gown fit as perfectly and a deal more gracefully than if it was one mass of stiff whalebone, see Miss Eustace and study her gown. The stage has surely once again triumphed over the long-waisted, hour-glass figure of the fashionable leader.

Speaking of handsome gowns, I must tell you of several I saw at Mrs. Hager's theatricals.

The handsomest gown of all was the one worn by Miss Lizzie Carroll. It was of most delicate Nile green silk and the corsage completely covered with a beaded net that shone and dazzled in the brilliant electric light. The sweetest gown, to my mind, was the one worn by Miss Carrie Taylor. It was of pink—the delicate pink of the sea-shell. The corsage was cut square and the décolletage outlined with marguerites.

The simplest gown, one of those expensive, sweet simplicity frocks that make a young girl look like an angel, that novelists dwell upon and men rave about, was worn by Miss Isabel McKenna. It was all white, with not a particle of relieving color, and fashioned of soft fluffy white tulle over a white silk slip. The décolletage was just perfect, neither too high nor too low, by the way, not such an easy result to obtain, and edged with a tiny ruffle of lace, simple, sweet, and costly.

As usual, Miss McKinstry was in black and looked perfect. If you get behind a perfectly plain black gown at a reception, ten to one its wearer is Miss McKinstry. Perhaps she will wear a single long-stemmed American beauty and perhaps she won't. But her gown will be almost destitute of trimming, fit superbly, and she herself will look majestic. If Miss McKinstry affects black, Mrs. Jos. Tobin affects black and white, and while on this subject let me show you what an authority has to say on this effective color combination:

"It has often been said that the best dressed women almost invariably wear black and white, and it cannot be gainsaid that these two colors have an individuality and tone that more glaring colors do not possess. However, black is not becoming to every woman; indeed, there is something very trying in black materials of any kind worn near the face. The lines are made much harsher and more pronounced, while the soft tints of the complexion are often curiously deadened.

"White with black, or vice versa, is absolutely different, and the combination is one that is always in fashion. This season the black and white stripes and checks are shown in more bewildering variety than ever. One pattern in particular has a white ground with hair stripes of black, three or four stripes near together, then a space, and again a cluster. Such a silk, made with a waist of black Liberty silk in the shape of a short jacket, with broad revers faced with the striped silk, and a crossed-over waistcoat of white satin, is charmingly becoming.

"The fancy waists, which we are being informed all the time are no longer fashionable, and which are being made up in every swell establishment, are very smart in black and white. A black and white checked taffeta has a broad square collar extending over the shoulders, and back of the waist and in front turned off in points. This is trimmed with a ruffle of accordion-plaited black mousseline de soié with a narrow white edge. The front of the waist is full and soft, finished with a narrow girdle of black silk pointed front and back, so as to give a long-waisted effect.

"The white silk ground with black satin stripes is too conspicuous for street wear, but for dinner gowns, or, again, separate waists, is always becoming and in fashion. When it is so desired, bright ribbons, satin, or velvet, are worn, deep crimson, scarlet, or blue velvet being especially suitable.

"For wash goods there is no end of fascinating patterns in black and white. Piqué and duck in stripes and a smart little check will be much used for costumes of skirt and jacket, and, after all, this style of wash gown is by far the most satisfactory.

"If the material is shrunk before it is made up, it can then be easily laundered; and as there is never any trimming beyond a band or two of flat embroidery on the skirt, and the colors do not fade, these costumes can be put in the tub every week if necessary, and still look well."

BABETTE.

One can save all the trouble of making children's clothes by taking the materials to Madame de Soto, at 414 Geary Street. Entire satisfaction is guaranteed.

Poets sing of "woman's crowning glory." To perpetuate a beautiful head of hair, to prevent it from falling out, to incite it to a renewed healthy growth, is the assurance that goes with every bottle of Quinonia. Should your dealer not have it, get it at Lederer's, 111 Stockton Street; thirty-five cents a bottle.

When you are selecting a wedding present, go to S. & G. Gump's, 113 Geary Street. They have a magnificent variety to choose from.

The lounge suit of this season is made with a sack-coat. The trousers are moderately wide, but not exaggerated, and a bit more narrow than those of last season. This sack-coat has a V-shaped collar with peaked lapels, and is single-breasted, with three buttons, which are of course, never buttoned. It tapers slightly from the waist, so as to give from the front the impression that it is going to be a cut-away, but it stops that tendency in the back by an orthodox uncompromising sack; it fits loosely, and its general length is about thirty inches. The waistcoat of dittoes has also a V-shaped collar with lapels, and is cut sufficiently low to show one shirt button. This is the dictum of J. A. Ulrich, tailor, Third floor, Crocker Building.

El Campo, the popular Bay resort, now open every Sunday during the season. Music, dancing, bowling, boating, fishing, and other amusements. Refreshments at city prices. Fare, round trip, 25c; children 15c; including admission to the grounds. The steamer "Ukiah" will leave Tiburon ferry 10:30 A. M., 12:10 P. M., 2 and 4 P. M. Returning, leave El Campo 11:15 A. M., 1, 3, and 5 P. M.

IN THE DAYS OF RALSTON.

One's memory need not run back to any great length to recall the days when Ralston and Reese and other of our prominent citizens walked to North Beach for the sake of an invigorating salt water plunge. That era, happily, has gone by. The Lurline Baths provide the best imaginable facilities for swimming, and the institution is almost in the very center of our city. The latest feature which the Olympic Salt Water Company has added to the luxuries of its menage is a Russian Bath with Needle Shower. This latest improvement is now in working order, and proves a great attraction. The price for the above, which includes the Swimming Bath, has been established at the low rate of fifty cents.

MRS. EDITH E. McLEAN

PHYSICIAN FOR THE HAIR

Has a Canadian Vegetable Tonic for the Hair that will make it grow when all else fails. Dandruff removed. Terms moderate. High-class references.

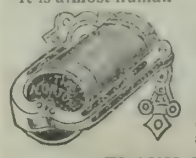
Office Hours 10 to 12 and 1 to 6. Rooms 45, 58 and 60 ST. ANN'S BUILDING SAN FRANCISCO, CAL.

LA GRANDE LAUNDRY CO. Telephone, Bush 12

Principal office—23 Powell St., Branch, 11 Taylor St., Laundry, Twelfth St., San Francisco, Cal.

All ordinary mending, sewing on buttons, etc., free of charge. Orders left at office will receive prompt attention. Work called for and delivered to any part of the city, free of charge.

It is almost human



"The Old Norton"

Door Check and Spring

BEST in the WORLD

The only Air Check in market. Will close doors without slamming. If you want a GOOD thing, try them.

FRANK D. MORRELL

595 Mission St., near 2d San Francisco, Cal.

No Air, No Life.

Pneumonia suffocates, because the swollen tubes get solid, and keep air from the lungs. Dr. Acker's English Remedy reduces the inflammation, so the patient breathes freely, and is soon well.

Miss R. Ray, 354 W. 22d St., N.Y., says: "When threatened with pneumonia, I took one bottle of Dr. Acker's English Remedy, and the pain and cough disappeared."

3 sizes, 25c.; 50c.; $1. All Druggists.

ACKER MEDICINE CO., 16 18 Chambers St., N.Y.

ELECTRIC..

Supplies
Construction
Repairs

CALIFORNIA ELECTRICAL WORKS

....35 MARKET STREET

A. D. CHESHIRE, Pres. and Manager W. O. MACDOUGALL, Secretary

CALIFORNIA UNDERTAKING CO.

Fine Funeral Furnishers

Telephone, Main 971 123 STOCKTON ST., Cor. Geary

Finest Funeral Parlors in the city

Embalming a specialty Open day and night

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT, IN AND FOR THE City and County of San Francisco, State of California, Department No. 9—Probate. In the matter of the estate and Guardianship of Emma Phyllis Clarke, a Minor. Order to show cause on application for Guardian for Order of Sale of Real Estate. It appearing to this Court from the petition this day presented and filed by Gustave H. Umbsen, the Guardian of the estate of Emma Phyllis Clarke, a minor, praying for an order of sale of certain real estate belonging to his said ward, that it will be beneficial to said minor, and expedient and advisable that such real estate should be sold.

It is hereby ordered, That the next of kin of the said ward, and all persons interested in the said estate, appear before this Court on Monday, the fourth day of May, A. D. 1896, at 10 o'clock A. M., at the courtroom of this Court, at the New City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, then and there to show cause why an order should not be granted for the sale of such estate.

And it is further ordered, That a copy of this order be published at least once a week for three successive weeks before the said day of hearing in THE WAVE, a newspaper printed and published in said City and County of San Francisco.

Dated April 3d, A. D. 1896.

J. V. COFFEY, Judge of the Superior Court.

F. D. MADISON, Attorney for Guardian.

IN THE SUPERIOR COURT, IN AND FOR THE City and County of San Francisco, State of California, Department No. 10—Probate. In the matter of the estate of Mary T. Thompson, deceased. Order to show cause why Order of Sale of Real Estate should not be made. A. J. Thompson, the Administrator of the estate of Mary T. Thompson, deceased, having filed his petition herein, duly verified, praying for an order of sale of all of the real estate of said decedent, for the purposes therein set forth.

It is therefore ordered by the said Court, that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased, appear before the said Superior Court, on Tuesday, the 12th day of May, 1896, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at the courtroom of Department No. 10—Probate—of said Superior Court, at the New City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said Administrator to sell all or so much of the real estate of the said deceased as shall be necessary, at public auction. And that a copy of this order be published at least once a week for four successive weeks, in THE WAVE, a newspaper printed and published in said city and county.

Dated April 9th, A. D. 1896.

CHARLES W. SLACK, Judge of the Superior Court.

ASSESSMENT NOTICE

GOULD & CURRY SILVER MINING COMPANY

Assessment..... No. 78
Amount per Share.....15 cents
Levied.....March 25, 1896
Delinquent in office.....April 28, 1896
Day of sale of Delinquent Stock.....May 20, 1896

ALFRED K. DURBROW, Secretary

Office—Room 69, Nevada Block, 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Charles Lyons London Tailor

Business Suits from $15.50
Fine Dress Suits from $19.50

1212-1218 Market Street 302 Kearny Street
908 Market Street, San Francisco

Hotel Del Monte

America's Famous Summer and Winter Resort

The Most Elegant Seaside Establishment in the World

"Where a leaf never dies in the still blooming bowers,
And the bee banquets on thro' a whole year of flowers"

G. H. ARNOLD,
—MANAGER—

Monterey, Cal.

Flower Festivals
Fiestas
Rose Carnivals

. . . and the like, will be the delight of California for the next two or three months.

Santa Barbara Flower Festival, the fame of which is world-wide, and the glory of which, like that of Solomon, is not half told, opens April 15. Queen Flora will reign 3 days an arbitrary and absolute despot.

La Fiesta de Los Angeles, now fixed in the chronology of California feasts, and not less illustrious than its older prototypes, commences April 22, and the riot of fun will spread over 4 days.

The Carnival of Roses, to take place in San Jose, May 6th to 9th, inclusive, though a more recent candidate for favors of the fun-loving world, yet because of the limitless possibilities of the Garden City for anything that is made of roses, is quite as full of promise.

REDUCED RATES

will be made by the SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY for all these brilliant events. Arrange your programmes accordingly, and call on agents for particulars.

COOLGARDIE GOLD FIELDS
(FREMANTLE) AUSTRALIA

ONLY SIX DAYS TO HONOLULU — S.S. AUSTRALIA

First-Class.....$220
Steerage.....110

Lowest rates to CAPE TOWN

S.S. "Australia," Honolulu only, Tuesday, April 28, 1896, at 10 A. M.

S.S. "Mariposa," via Honolulu and Auckland, Thursday, April 30, 1896, at 2 P. M.

Ticket Office—114 Montgomery St.
Freight Office—327 Market St.

J. D. SPRECKELS & BROS. CO.,
General Agents

PACIFIC COAST STEAMSHIP CO.

Dispatch Steamers leave San Francisco for ports in Alaska.

For British Columbia and Puget Sound ports, Feb. 19, and every fifth day thereafter.

For Eureka, Humboldt Bay, Wednesdays, 9 A. M.

For Newport, Los Angeles and all way ports; every fourth and fifth day, 8 A. M.

For San Diego, stopping only at Port Hartford, Santa Barbara, Port Los Angeles (Santa Monica), Redondo (Los Angeles) and Newport, every fourth and fifth day at 11 A. M.

For ports in Mexico, 25th of each month.

Ticket Office, Palace Hotel, 4 New Montgomery St.

GOODALL, PERKINS & CO.,
GENERAL AGENTS,
10 MARKET ST., SAN FRANCISCO.

THE LICK HOUSE

Occupies the block bounded by Montgomery, Post and Sutter Streets

IT IS——
——scrupulously clean;
——accessible to all street car lines and places of amusement;
——conveniently situated for business men;
——a quiet, model place for a family to spend the winter;
——moderate in price, yet first-class in every particular.

AMERICAN OR EUROPEAN PLAN

K. B. SOULÉ, Manager

For those who appreciate Comfort and Attention

A QUIET HOME
CENTRALLY LOCATED

OCCIDENTAL HOTEL
SAN FRANCISCO

WM. B. HOOPER, MANAGER

Pacific Towel Co.

Telephone 1780 — No. 9 Lick Place, San Francisco

GEO. E. MOORE, Proprietor

The Club Hotel — Hotel Metropole

5 Bund, Yokohama — 1 Tsukiji, Tokyo

First-class Hotels, centrally situated, well furnished. ENTIRE FOREIGN MANAGEMENT. Experienced English Matron in attendance. Excellent table under the superintendence of qualified foreign Chef.

The Hotel steam-launch attends steamers arriving and departing. Passengers are met at the Railway Station. Visitors have the option of messing either in Tokyo or Yokohama, without extra charge—The only Hotels offering such an advantage. Certified Guides are in attendance at both Hotels. European Hair-Dresser on the premises.

THE CLUB HOTEL COMPANY, Limited, Proprietors

E. C. SIOEN, Manager
YOKOHAMA

E. DEWETTE, Manager
TOKYO

THE GRILL ROOM SERVICE
OF THE
PALACE HOTEL

Has been extended to what was formerly the City Restaurant. This immense room, which has a direct entrance from Market Street is known as - - - -

"THE LADIES' GRILL ROOM"

NEW DEPARTURE—CHARACTERIZED BY PROMPT SERVICE—MODERATE CHARGES

$6.50 PER TON DELIVERED

COOS BAY COAL

SOOTLESS
SMOKELESS

ORDER YOUR CARRIAGES AND COUPES OF THE
PACIFIC CARRIAGE CO.
At Baldwin Hotel
200 Sutter Street, corner Kearny
48 Eighth Street, or
St. Nicholas Hotel, Market and Ninth Streets
Steamer and Train Service a specialty 'Phone 1950

THE PRESS CLIPPING BUREAU
510 MONTGOMERY ST., S. F.,

Reads all papers on the Pacific Coast, and supplies clippings on all topics, business and personal.

CRESTA BLANCA WINES

AWARDED
THREE HIGHEST AWARDS
AT

THE ATLANTA EXPOSITION

OF SIX MEDALS
AWARDED TO CALIFORNIA

Cresta Blanca Wines

OBTAINED THREE

WETMORE-BOWEN CO.

140 Montgomery Street
Under Occidental Hotel

Horses Pastured

$1.50 PER MONTH

GOOD FEED AND CARE. Send for circular.

F. A. HYDE, 630 Commercial St.

HIRSCH-KAHN & Co.
MANUFACTURING OPTICIANS
IMPORTERS OF OPTICAL GOODS
PHOTOGRAPHIC APPARATUS & SUPPLIES ETC.
333 KEARNY STREET
SAN FRANCISCO CAL.

BAJA CALIFORNIA

DAMIANA BITTERS

"Damiana" is a powerful aphrodisiac and special tonic for the sexual and urinary organs of both sexes and a great remedy for diseases of the kidneys and bladder. For weak nerves these bitters are invaluable, and leading physicians recommend them as the greatest invigorator known. Long-winded testimonials are not necessary. "Damiana" Bitters are known on their merits. (Send for Circular.)

NABER, ALIS & BRUNE, Agents
323-325 Market St., S. F.

Ask your Blacksmith to shoe your horse with

PHŒNIX HORSE SHOES

GIVE THEM A TRIAL

DR. THOMAS L. HILL
DENTIST
Office, Odd Fellows' Building,
S. W. Cor. Seventh and Market Streets
Office Hours, 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.
Consultation Hours, 4 to 5

ABRAMSON-HEUNISCH CO. (Incorporated)
IMPORTERS AND JOBBERS OF
Brewers' and Bottlers' Supplies, Corks, Druggists' Glassware, Etc.
26-28 Main St. San Francisco

REMOVAL

Rountrees English Chocolate, Kohlers Swiss Chocolates, and all brands of Foreign and Eastern Confectionery, imported by . . . .

W. L. GREENBAUM,

of 205 SUTTER ST., will, after December 1st, be found in large and commodious quarters at

128 POST ST., Bohemian Club Bldg.

TALES OF THE DAY.

It was a London diamond broker and he was trying to get into the social swim. At last he received cards for a certain imposing function, but unfortunately, about the same time, was forced to assume the leading role in an unsavory police court case. "You 'ave now done it," exclaimed his friends. "You vill get a leedle note te say der dance has been postponed, and you vill not be told when der day is!" "Nod so," exclaimed the Jew, "I have der invitation to Somerset House taken to get it stamped. It is now a contract."

A trainer of parrots had labored for weeks to teach a certain bird to say "Hear! Hear! Grand old man.—God save the Queen," etc,. etc. It was his intention to introduce the bird to Gladstone with the hope that the great leader would purchase him for a neat sum. But the parrot proved refractory and at times the dealer would exclaim, "I've lost my time and trouble over you." Finally the parrot learned the phrases. The great day came, but the trainer was disappointed. Mr. Gladstone glanced carelessly at the parrot, saying, "I've no use for him." But the bird promptly astounded his hearers by remarking, "I've lost my time and trouble over you."

Paderewski played a solo at the Norwich festival in England, and the next day wandered through the great cathedral. He happened to pass a schoolroom from which musical sounds were issuing, and saw there a number of choir boys gathered around the piano. An urchin seated on the stool had just announced, "Let me show you how 'Paddy' plays," and he proceeded to give a freakish imitation of the great Polish artist. When he had finished, Paderewski advanced, lifted him from the piano-stool, and said, "Now let me show you how 'Paddy' does play." He then sat down and rendered two pieces in brilliant style for the amazed youngsters.

That there are better uses for hip-pockets than as receptacles for revolvers is evidenced by the experience of a Cincinnati tailor who went into the mountains of Kentucky to take orders. He was measuring a big mountaineer, and asked incidently how large his hip-pocket should be made, thinking that a man of his dimensions would probably carry a forty-four caliber revolver. The mountaineer seemed to be calculating. "I guess a pint will be big enough for these pants," he said, "bein' as the're my Sunday ones."

George W. Smalley, the American correspondent of the London Times, who was recently suspended from the Metropolitan Club in New York for reasons which are not confided to the world, while representing the Tribune in London was very fond of the nobility; and it is said, he dearly loved to be seen with a lord. Vanity says that when an invitation was received by any of the correspondents to a "small and early" affair, it was generally supposed to mean an earl and Smalley.

Congressman Crane of Texas who at one time was a leader of the House, enjoyed the favor of the newspapermen, who always reported his speeches. One afternoon in the press club at Washington while discussing politics with a party of journalists he remarked on the fact that when some men spoke the gallery was cleared, but while he was on the floor he could be sure of an audience of pressmen. He begged that they would be present next day when he expected to make the speech of his life on the McKinley Tariff Bill. Next day the press gallery was full. Several speakers had been heard when Crane arose, but no sooner was he on the floor than all the newspapermen arose and filed out into the lobby. This was a joke on the Texan, but so disconcerted was he that he stammered, hesitated, cut his speech short, and sat down. Then the gang filed back into the gallery. The shock was so great that Crane never delivered another set speech, and, though a joker himself, seemed quite unable to see the fun of this on himself.

He had been drinking hard for three days and when he returned to the barracks after leave and fell asleep on his bed his fellow-troopers fastened one of his spurs to his naked heel. As they expected, the poor devil thrashed about heavily in his sleep but was soon broad awake and shouting at the things that were in his bed and biting him. He leaped out on the floor and saw the spur on his heel. "Well, if that don't make me out a bad case," he exclaimed; "when I went to bed last night I took off my boot all right but forgot to take off my spur. I'll never drink another drop again."—Youth's Companion.

Sig. Crispi and Cardinal Hohenlohe are close friends. When the Italian Premier was visiting the Cardinal one day he took up the latter's red hat, examined it, and finally put it on. "What a fine Cardinal you would have made if you had been a priest," said Hohenlohe, with just a shade of patronage. "Cardinal!" answered Crispi, "I should have been Pope."

FREE EDUCATION AND PROFESSIONAL TRAINING

"THE WAVE'S" LIBERAL SUBSCRIPTION OFFER.

The proprietors of THE WAVE have made arrangements with the most prominent schools and colleges throughout the State, and are now prepared to offer scholarships and courses in the leading educational institutions free of charge, for all who will obtain subscribers to this popular weekly.

UNIVERSITY COURSES.

A single year's course at the University of California, or at the Leland Stanford Junior University, for 185 annual subscribers. This offer includes room and board, and all other necessary expenses attached to the course. For 750 subscribers we offer a four years' course.

MEDICAL COURSES.

One year at the Cooper Medical College will be given for 125 subscribers. This includes books and incidental expenses attached to the course.

A single term at the Medical Department of the University of California for 100 subscribers.

For 500 annual subscribers we offer the full four years' course at the Cooper Medical College. This offer includes all incidental costs and fees, except board and lodging.

We offer the four years' course at the Medical Department of the University of California, for 400 subscribers.

The two year's course at the State Normal School at San Jose, for 600 subscribers. This offer includes board, lodging, and books. A single year for 160 subscribers.

The course at Hastings Law College for 250 annual subscribers. This includes books and other expenses attached to the College, for a period of three years, and the privilege of studying in a first-class law office.

A three years' course at the Mark Hopkins Institute of Art for 250 annual subscribers. A year's course for 85 subscribers.

A course in any department of Van der Nailen's School of Electricity and Engineering (except Department of Assaying) will be given for 125 annual subscribers. A course in the Department of Assaying) for 20 annual subscribers.

A six months' course in either the Business Department, or the Department of Stenography and Typewriting of Heald's Business College, for 50 annual subscribers.

A nine months' course in the Columbia School of Dramatic Art for 75 annual subscribers.

A three months' course at the Meisterschaft School of Languages for 40 annual subscribers.

The course at the California School of Elocution and Oratory for 35 annual subscribers.

Tuition in music, vocal or instrumental, from Francis Stuart, S. G. Fleishmann, J. H. Dohrmann, Sigmund Beel, Nathan Landsberger, Lesley Martin, or H. J. Stewart. A course of twenty lessons from any of these gentlemen for fifty annual subscribers. For 100 annual subscribers a course of twenty lessons each in piano, singing, harmony, or any other branch of music.

—A—
SAFE GUIDE

No man knows all there is to know about advertising. The subject is too profound, too complex, too perplexing, for any single person, or for any dozen persons, for that matter. The path to success in advertising is full of dangerous places. All business men would do well to engage a safe guide to conduct them past the danger spots—to tell them what to do and what to avoid doing.

PRINTERS' INK

Is a weekly journal for advertisers, published at 10 Spruce St., New York. It is a magazine of ideas, of suggestions, of advice. Advertisers the world over read it and write for it. It is the advertising authority of America—probably of the globe. Business men will find it a safe guide. To secure its services as guide costs $2 a year. A sample copy costs nothing.

J. R. SMITH & CO.

230 BUSH STREET
And Room 7, Rotunda, Mills Building

W. HALL, Successor

MERCHANT TAILORS

Will make garments to order
—At Great Reduction for Cash—

J. R. SMITH - - Manager

BICYCLE and GOLF SUITS

H. S. BRIDGE & CO.

Merchant Tailors

Many Novelties in Imported Wear. Shirts to Order a Specialty.

622 Market Street, San Francisco
(Up-stairs, opposite Palace Hotel)

BEST SUITS ON EARTH

26 MONTGOMERY STREET

TO ORDER $15.00 AND UPWARDS

J. W. HAWES, Formerly Crocker Bldg.

COTTON SAIL DUCKS

22-inch, in all numbers. Medium, Soft and Hard

ALSO

Heavy Naught, Wagon and Draper Ducks
From 30 to 120 inches wide

Monumental and Imperial Ounce Ducks

Manufactured by Mount Vernon Company Baltimore

Murphy, Grant & Co. Pacific Coast Sole Agents

BONESTELL & CO.

Dealers in PAPER

Fine Coated Papers a Specialty

401-403 SANSOME ST.,
San Francisco, Cal.

THE WAVE CLUBBING LIST

FOR 1896

By special arrangement with the Publishers, THE WAVE is prepared to offer the following list

SUBSCRIPTIONS MUST BE PAID IN ADVANCE

THE WAVE and	CENTURY	$8 00
"	ARENA	5 00
"	LITTELL'S LIVING AGE	7 75
"	ART AMATEUR	5 75
"	LIPPINCOTT'S MAGAZINE	4 50
"	MUNSEY'S	3 50
"	ATLANTIC MONTHLY	5 75
"	YOUTH'S COMPANION	3 75
"	NEW ENGLAND MAGAZINE	5 00
"	HARPER'S MAGAZINE	5 50
"	HARPER'S WEEKLY	5 70
"	HARPER'S BAZAAR	5 70
"	HARPER'S ROUND TABLE	4 00
"	SCRIBNER'S MAGAZINE	5 00
"	REVIEW OF REVIEWS	4 50
"	ST. NICHOLAS	5 00
"	OVERLAND	4 75
"	COSMOPOLITAN	3 50
"	FRANK LESLIE'S MAGAZINE	4 90
"	PUCK	6 50
"	JUDGE	6 50
"	LIFE	7 00
"	LIFE'S COMEDY	3 50
"	LESLIE'S WEEKLY	5 70
"	DEMOREST MAGAZINE	4 00
"	SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN	5 00
"	SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN SUPPLEM'T	6 50
"	N. Y. DAILY SUN	8 00
"	" SUNDAY "	4 50
"	CASSELL MAGAZINE	3 75
"	ARGOSY	3 50
"	PUBLIC OPINION	4 50
"	SUNDAY WORLD	4 75
"	CRITIC	5 50
"	FORUM	5 00
"	NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW	6 50
"	TABLE TALK	3 25
"	NINETEENTH CENTURY	6 25
"	CONTEMPORARY REVIEW	6 25
"	FORTNIGHTLY REVIEW	6 25
"	BLACKWOODS MAGAZINE	6 25
"	TRUTH	6 25
"	DELINEATOR	3 50
"	VOGUE	5 50
"	TOWN TOPICS	7 50
"	DAILY JOURNAL	5 00
"	SUNDAY JOURNAL	3 75
"	ILLUS. AMERICAN	5 75

This Paper not to be taken from the Library

CALIFORNIA STATE LIBRARY

THE WAVE

VOL. XV. NO. 18. SAN FRANCISCO, MAY 2, 1896. PRICE, TEN CENTS.

THE WAVE

Is published every Saturday, at the Crocker Building, corner Market and Post Streets, San Francisco.

SUBSCRIPTION, $3 per year, $1.50 six months, $.75 three months. Foreign subscriptions (countries in postal union) $5 per year. Sample copies free on application. The trade is supplied by the San Francisco News Co., 210 Post Street; East of the Rocky Mountains by the American News Co., New York.

THE WAVE is kept on file and is for sale at Brentano's, 17 Avenue de l'Opera, Paris, France; 31 Union Square, New York City; 1015 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.; and 206 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

ADVERTISING rates and all other matters pertaining to the business of the paper, address Rooms 220-221-222 Crocker Building. Eastern Agent, E. Katz, 230-235 Temple Court, New York.

HARRISON M. PARKER, BUSINESS MANAGER.

Entered at San Francisco Post-office as second-class matter

THE WAVE PUBLISHING COMPANY.

SAN FRANCISCO, MAY 2, 1896.

CONTENTS.

EDITORIALS—
The Bee's Fallacy 1
The New Statesman 1
The Thirteenth Juror..... 2
The Week in Politics..... 2
The Lady Who Replied 2
The Campaign of the Women 3
THE FIESTA AT LOS ANGELES—By Juliet Wilbor Tompkins.. 4
THE DEATH-SPANCEL—By Katherine Tynan..... 4
POLITICAL PERSONALITIES—Characteristics of Presidential Candidates 5
TYPES OF WESTERN MEN—The Plumber's Apprentice—By Frank Norris..... 6
THE DUEL IN GERMANY—As Interpreted by the Courts of Honor is Legalized Murder.. 6
THINGS AND PEOPLE—By The Witness..... 7
A LITERARY RECEPTION—Conversational comments on some New People by their creators—By Raymond Roth. 8
THEORY AND REALITY An Old Author and a New Writer consider the same problem—By F. N..... 8
THE THEATERS—The Improbabilities of Baron Chevrial—Professor Bristol's Horses—By Peg Woffington..... 9
MUSIC—Rivarde and Lachaume—By P. C. A..... 9
THE WEEK IN SOCIETY—By The Gossip.....10, 11
RIPPLES—Presumably Humorous—By Bruno.....12
THE WHEEL—Comment and Criticism on recent events in the cycling world, by C. Michener—Riding the Slot, by J. E. Harvey—A Bit of Touring, by Walter N. Bush.....13

MISCELLANEOUS.

May Magazines 8
Dramatic Notes..... 9
Model Households—By Babette .14
Tales of the Day.....16

THE "BEE'S" FALLACY.

The Sacramento Bee is inviting, by letter and marked copy, editorial discussion of a "most infamous and damnable law," the enforcement of which has cost that journal some five hundred dollars. So far as our observation goes, the "infamous and damnable" thing of which the Bee complains is a principle of law which protects every individual in his reputation, by holding newspapers liable for publishing, in advance of trial, false statements, harmful and derogatory to the good name of one citizen who has been arrested upon the complaint of another. The Supreme Court, in affirming the judgment of the lower court in the Bee's libel suit, in effect held that a newspaper cannot, with impunity, publish the tales told by a complaining witness derogatory to the character and reputation of the man under arrest. This protection to the citizen, the Bee regards as altogether unwarranted; and it proposes to batter down the very thin shield of security which the law and the court has set up between a man's reputation and the harpies of the press. It calls upon the editors of the State to "look well into this matter, with a view of correcting this infamy at the hands of the next legislature, for, as it stands, this is a law for the benefit of the scoundrel and the throttling of the press."

To be arrested is not to be a scoundrel. The Bee's position, however, would render every man such immediately the law took him within its custody. Even if the arrest were procured by a blackmailer, or a malicious foe willing to say anything injurious to the character of the victim, under the code of procedure advocated by the Bee, the press, in the exercise of one of its "sacred rights and prerogatives," would be justified in publishing the unwarranted and unsupported statements of such an irresponsible, simply because he had the hardihood to swear to the complaint. The principle of law of which the Bee makes complaint is intended for the protection of the honest citizen, not the rascal. The ruling of the court with which the Bee finds fault does not prevent the daily newspaper from printing sworn testimony that stamps scoundrelism upon the reputation of the citizen. It merely interposes its objection to the press setting that stamp upon him before he has been tried, and that upon the mere statements of the complainant who, perhaps, is the worst enemy of the accused, and perhaps a blackmailer to boot. Even though guilty as hell itself, until so proven, the accused is innocent in the eyes of the law. The presumption of innocence, indeed, is more sacred than all of the so-called rights and prerogatives of the daily press. If the thing for which the Bee contends were the law, then the mere filing of a complaint by some irresponsible citizen would serve to give license to the press to publish such damaging tales as the victim's enemies might, in complete safety, see fit to relate, and the assailed would have no recourse against them. Nothing that a newspaper might publish as coming from the lips of the complaining witness will hasten the conviction of a scoundrel, while that which it may say of the innocent might work grevious injury. It would be difficult to discover the benefits coming to the scoundrel under this decision, but the benefits to the innocent are manifest, and manifold as well.

The Bee's troubles arose in about this way: Upon the representation of a certain Mistress Truitt, who was characterized by the Bee as "a woman having every appearance of honesty," adown whose cheeks rolled tears as she told her story, the Bee published as emanating from her what it was pleased to call "a damaging tale against a Sacramento merchant." The woman charged the merchant with actions of the grossest character, which, if true, would have entitled the accused to a long sojourn at some state prison. The article appeared in the paper one hour after the filing of the complaint. The accused was held to answer by the committing magistrate, but, on subsequent proceedings had before the Superior Court, was released on habeas corpus. Suit for libel was then commenced against the Bee. It was tried without a jury, and a judgment of five hundred dollars awarded to the merchant. The trial court, among other things, found that "the publication was false, defamatory, malicious, and unprivileged," which finding, needless to say, badly handicapped the Bee in its litigation. The Supreme Court affirmed the judgment of the Court below; and, following the general rule of practise, did not disturb its findings. It is difficult to see how the Supreme Court could have rendered any other decision; but this is what the Bee has to say upon the subject:

> This paper has fought this shameful case to the end, and can do no more with the Courts. It can, however, point out to the newspapers and to the people of California an infamous travesty upon the liberty of the press and an arrogant and tyrranous outrage perpetrated against the most sacred rights of free speech and a free press, and done within the law as laid down by the highest judicial authority within the State of California.

There is a good deal of nonsense about this "liberty of the press." There is no liberty so much abused, no privilege so inhumanly exercised, no sacred right so often turned into a weapon of offense, as the so-called "liberty of the press." Honor and virtue are as nothing beside the insatiable greed of the daily scandalmonger. The press is the handmaiden of blackmail. Many a citizen to-day pays tribute to the blackmailer, coerced thereto by the knowledge that the boast of his enemy is true, that the press will scarify him if he does not submit. What does it matter to the sensational press that the story be false! It "makes a story." This is enough for them. It is an old maxim in the newspaper world, not to interview the man who can deny a story until after it is published. When the Bee calls upon "every good citizen within the State to work for the correction of the law" that prohibits this species of journalism, it threatens to awaken "every good man within the State" to the fact that there may be some possible hope of checking further encroachments by "the liberty of the press" upon the rights of the individual.

The interior papers are responding pretty generally to the request of the Bee to discuss this subject, and pretty generally, too, agree with the Bee's side of the controversy. It is highly probable that when the Sacramento journal comes to pay the merchant the sum of five hundred dollars for injuring his good name, that Mr. Gilman will have earned the money and become notorious from San Diego to Siskiyou, and from the Sierras to the sea.

THE NEW STATESMAN.

The incident of Jameson's raid has closed with the sentencing of John Hays Hammond and his fellow conspirators of the Johannisberg Reform Committee. Out of it all but one man has come with glory, and he is the pudgy and blear-eyed president of the Transvaal Republic, Mr. Paul Kruger, called by his people "Oom Paul." The world respects this Dutchman. It is not often that one meets with a statesman and a diplomatist of superior order among a people of modest territory and obscure situation. We look for the great men to come from the great countries, and feel, somehow, that it is presumptive for the little out-of-the-way corners to claim that they can produce men of affairs capable of grappling with those the countries of first rank produce. But even England must realize by this time that she has met with a very coarse and unpolished farmer of South Africa, who has played the great Chamberlain of England as a cat might play with a mouse. Kruger ranks among statesmen. It can be said of him as was said of Washington, while no one could say how great a general he was, no one could deny that he was equal to every demand made on him, and this is a test to which few can respond.

It was not so long after the unfortunate dash of Doctor Jameson and the younger sons that Mr. Chamberlain announced, as a triumph over his enemies, and as a reproof to the audacious German Emperor for his sympathetic letter to Kruger, that the Transvaal President was to visit England. And all England admired Chamberlain for his brilliant stroke; for every one thought that England's hospitality would be but a bribe to the South African, a diplomatic saying of grace before the British lion proceeded to swallow the little Republic. The whole unhappy business was to be smoothed over and the traitorous Uitlanders were to have their way after all. Kruger was to be fêted as the Shah of Persia is now and then, and his small watery eyes treated to sights that would so astonish as to hypnotize and entrance the poor countryman. But the weeks and the months passed, and President Kruger remained in the Transvaal. He had a previous engagement, he wrote Mr. Chamberlain. Other business was to be done, and that business was to put the laws into force against the men who had sought to destroy the Republic that was dear to those ungainly Dutchmen, as this Republic is to us, or as any other country is to men who have fought to make it what it is. There was no haste about the business. A foreign judge was called in, and the men were given the best counsel the country held. Then the prisoners found that the proof was too strong. They pleaded guilty and received the capital sentence as the law made necessary, knowing, however, that the condemnation was but a fiction. They were sentenced to death—these Englishmen and the one American, and it was only the entreaties of the two greatest countries on the globe that saved these men from being hanged by this obscure Dutch farmer, who has given notice to the world that he can play the little game of diplomacy quite as well as the skilled masters of Europe. President Kruger has been firm, resolute, active, yet humane and politic. He was equal to the crisis of the raid, when his country was filled as full of traitors as the Trojan horse was full of Greeks. He was equal to the handling of Jameson and his men. And now he has proved that he could maintain the majesty of the law and yet be true to the best sentiment of the world.

There are few men who would not have been carried off their feet at some stage of this critical incident. The whole thing seems trivial and very easy of handling from this distance, but to the men of the Transvaal it doesn't seem so, we may well be assured. To restrain his own people was alone a task of no small dimensions.

Many a man would have had a horrible massacre on his hands just after the Jameson raid. But Kruger had his people's confidence, and the Uitlanders—those who had grown rich through his hospitality and who had planned to repay him with a revolution—even these foreigners seemed, after the first burst was over, to feel that Kruger would do the manly, the big, the right thing, and went back to their work of digging gold. It is not every year, nor even every ten years that the world discovers a really big man of the Lincoln school of awkward genius, so we hail President Paul Kruger as a hero and a statesman.

It is no doubt destined that the Transvaal will become British. But it won't be in Kruger's day. He has made too many friends for England to attempt it either directly or indirectly for many a year to come.

THE THIRTEENTH JUROR.

Some weeks ago the Examiner and the Call were noisily abusive of the courts because a trial judge has set aside the verdict of the jury in a criminal proceeding against one Knutte, on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to support a verdict. These journals denounced the proceeding as an "innovation" and a "usurpation," and unkindly referred to it in language indignant and explosive, such as the daily press usually employs when charging at a windmill. There was nothing novel in the ruling of the court of which the daily press complained. Indeed, as "The Wave" pointed out at the time, it was as old as the jury system itself. Recently, this same ruling, which then fretted and worried the Examiner, has been invoked in favor of that journal; and Judge Sanderson, than whom there is no more careful and painstaking judge on the superior bench, was requested to, and did, scale down a verdict of $1500 recently rendered against the Examiner, and ordered a new trial in the case unless the plaintiff agreed to remit $1350 of the judgment and accept $150 in satisfaction thereof. We do not hear the Examiner or the Call protesting against this interference of the judge with the prerogatives of the jury. Judge Sanderson, in rendering his opinion, speaking of the power of the judge to interfere with the verdict of the jury, gave voice to some views which are well worth reading, not only by the lawyer, but by the layman as well. For that reason, we reproduce, in part, his remarks. The Judge said:

I would not take either the time or the trouble to discuss this matter here, were it not for the fact that the rulings of both the trial and the Supreme Court, in this case of People vs. Knutte just cited, have been the subject of much recent adverse criticism in the public prints of our State, under the impression, probably, that this was a novel and dangerous doctrine, and in which some members of the bar participated. No person, though, be he lawyer, layman, or newspaper man, who will take the trouble to investigate this subject, will find this rule either modern or vicious, and no right-thinking person will, in my judgment, ever wish to see the rule abrogated which confers and imposes upon the trial Judge the right of the duty of interposing and exercising his power as a Judge whenever the life, liberty, or property of a citizen is menaced, impaired, or invaded by the erroneous or unjust verdict of a jury.

The court critics denounce this as new law and dangerous doctrine. It is neither. It is as old as the history of jury trials in this republic, and consistent with reason and simple justice. Certainly no trial Judge in a criminal case would allow a person whom he thought innocent, or who was convicted on insufficient testimony, or on testimony he believed to be perjured, to be punished by the erroneous or unjust verdict of a jury. The same is equally true of verdicts in civil cases. No trial Judge would or should permit a person to be despoiled of property, when he believed a jury had based their verdict on false or insufficient testimony. Subject, of course, to have his judgment set aside, on appeal, if it be shown that he has abused his discretion—which is rarely done. The trial Judge is the final arbiter in jury cases, as well as those tried without a jury. As shown above, this should be done, in common justice to all litigants, otherwise improper and unjust verdicts would oppress the losing party, and there would be no relief therefrom.

Unquestionably the province of the jury is to find the facts in dispute. They are likewise to pass upon the value and effect of evidence. Their judgment, though, is not arbitrary and conclusive. They are to exercise sound and reasonable discretion. If their verdicts rest upon such reason and discretion, then a trial Judge rarely, if ever, disturbs their verdicts, and under such circumstances he certainly should never do so.

It is said that if the Judge have the power to set aside or modify verdicts at his pleasure, then the people might as well dispense with the expense and inconvenience of jury trials. This sounds plausible, particularly in this day and age, when Judges are elected, as with us, by the people, instead of being appointed by the crown, as in times past. But trial by jury is of great antiquity, and an important part of the machinery of our judicial system, which our people, it is highly probable, will never be willing to part with, since it guarantees a decision as to the facts in dispute, both in civil and criminal cases, by neighbors of the parties in interest.

Theory is one thing, but practise often demolishes its application. Though the rule in this State be as elsewhere, that the trial Judge must in the end decide whether the verdict of the jury shall stand or be set aside, yet it is only in rare cases, and those of the plainest, where the jury has given an erroneous or unjust verdict, that the trial Judge interferes. This department of this Court may be aptly cited in corroboration of this statement. For the past five years and upward this department has almost exclusively engaged in the trial of jury cases and mostly for damages, and during that time hundreds of cases, I may say, have been tried by juries, and yet only in one case have I granted a new trial, and in only four or five cases, and this among them, have I modified their verdicts. The jurymen accepted to try these cases have been men of integrity and good sense, and their verdicts mainly based upon logical deductions that might with reason have been drawn from all the evidence submitted to them.

Doubtless if these cases had been tried by the Court, without a jury, the damages given in some of them—perhaps in many of them—might have been for other and different amounts, either greater or less, than those given by the jury in these same cases, as the weight, value, and effect of the evidence given might have impressed or persuaded the Court differently than it did the jury; but that would be no good cause to disturb the verdict of the jury, when there was any reasonable view of the evidence on which to support the verdict. Most of the verdicts rendered by juries for damages are the result of a compromise of diverse though honest views entertained by the individual twelve jurors. Jurymen, as well as judges, differ and doubt, but their verdicts and decisions are in the main founded on some reason, more or less cogent and convincing, and as correct as can reasonably be expected from finite beings who must hear conflicting evidence, deduce conclusions, and render conscientious decisions therefrom.

THE WEEK IN POLITICS.

Thomas B. Reed must have shivered and shook when he got word on Wednesday that Vermont had deserted him and fallen in line behind the banner of Major Wm. McKinley of Ohio. New Hampshire made a most unsatisfactory straddle on the matter of favorites. This broke the solid New England delegation that the Czar was to have. But he consoled himself doubtless with the thought that New Hampshire would be true when she found all her Puritan friends loyal to the Maine man. And now to have Vermont desert—this is positively disheartening. Where lies the advantage in being a Czar if an undersized ex-Governor of Ohio can come right into your own presence and steal away your own game? Better had it been if he had made McKinley Speaker and himself led in the tariff fight on the floor and had the tariff measure called the Reed bill. What is to profit a man for standing off the whole Democratic party through three Congresses if the very next State to his is to go off after false gods. Surely Brother Reed has something to worry him these days besides the funding bill.

Can any one tell what the secret of McKinley's strength with his party is? How exceptional this man's popularity is may be known by this, that never did James G. Blaine have so many delegates pledged for him as McKinley now has. One favorite son after another has gone down, until the only serious candidates in the field are McKinley, Reed, and Morton, and Morton is only serious in our eyes, for to Platt Mr. Levi P. Morton is a sacrificial offering to be laid on whatever altar pleases the New York boss best. Bosses that have tried to sell their delegations in advance have had to wire for a release: "Goods can't be delivered. McKinley has the market." In this city Mr. Spreckels has had to unload Senator Allison rather than be swamped himself. And Mahoney and Kelly are shouting themselves red in the face for "that pure and brilliant statesman, William M. McKinley of Ohio."

For all these strange phenomena no one seems able to give an explanation. Cleveland became the natural candidate of the Democracy in '92, and swept things before him at Chicago because he had given the party the issue on which the campaign of '90 had been won. But McKinley is no more the representative of the high tariff policy than is any other Republican, except that his name is attached to the Republican measure. That bill, it will be remembered, was not satisfactory to Blaine, and but for him its main feature, that of reciprocity, would have been omitted.

But politicians may rave and candidates may curse, for McKinley has the Republicans who do the voting, and they are determined he shall be the man. They know one good thing of him—that he is owned by none of the national bosses and they want a candidate who owns himself.

Pennsylvania came forward this week with ex-Governor Pattison as a candidate for the Democratic nomination. If it were possible that Matt S. Quay could be nominated on the Republican side, Governor Pattison might be treated as a "Democratic possibility." The man who captured Pennsylvania twice, and the last time in a distinctly recognized duel with Quay, would seem to be the very man to defeat the ambitious Matthew Stanley. But neither of the gentlemen from Pennsylvanian can hope for more than a good-sized compliment from their conventions. This is not a Pennsylvania year.

That was a very sensible statement of his position made by ex-Governor Russell of Massachusetts early in the week. While his own State had honored him by suggesting his name to the country, he wished no delegations pledged for him and would make no campaign whatever, leaving all delegates free to do what they thought best for their party and country when convention time came. This is characteristic of young Russell. He is not of the scheming and self-pushing kind. There is real patriotism in him, and he believes in the general idea that the people will do what is right in the long run much more heartily than most men in public life.

Senator Teller now joins Senator Carter in declaring that if the Republican platform does not declare for free silver and name a free-silver candidate he will bolt the party. When such men speak thus decidedly, we may expect an exciting time before the fall arrives, for the convention cannot please both New York and Colorado, and unless this seemingly impossible thing is done there will be a Republican "split"; and quite as surely will there be a Democratic smash-up over the same question. The man who knows what ticket he is going to vote in November is a soothsayer and a seventh son. There may be six electoral tickets in the field—Gold Republican and Silver Republican, Gold Democratic and Silver same, Populist and Prohibitionist—or there may be but any two of these. We submit a political puzzle apropos of these possible conditions: Find a ticket which would get the support of John P. Irish, M. M. Estee, and T. V. Cator.

THE LADY WHO REPLIED.

One difficulty of entering into discussion with a woman is that the feminine mind not prone to shrink from controversy is apt to object to being hampered by facts, is apt to ignore logic, and to bury under a mass of words the idea that may inspire it. Aside from this, one called upon to reply is conscious of a feeling of delicacy lest wounds be inflicted. Perhaps this is due to that gallantry to which "H.W. C." makes such strenuous objection, and being such is doubtless a fault. Hence for a moment let it be brushed aside.

The delicate chirography of her letter, and the absence from that letter of any coherent attempt to prove anything betrays the sex of the writer even if signature were absent. Beyond question, she is sincere. Probably there is concealed somewhere in her missive an idea, but so deftly has it been concealed that to ferret it out is a task far more laborious than to answer it could possibly be. Had she stated her various propositions clearly, not making them cumberous with side issues and irrelevances, to reply to them would have been a pleasure rather than a mere duty performed without hope of reward; without hope as to H. W. C., for the settled prejudice that marks every line of her work, and the spaces between, cannot be shaken by any earthly power.

Throughout the letter runs the absurd notion that women are in bondage. Anybody entertaining this notion has room within a mentality usually small, and invariably occupied by fads, for little else. Far from being in bondage, women are at least as free as men. They are even crowding their ways into the professions, and, in many lines, crowding the men out, because ready to work for less. In the home they are supreme. Perhaps the babes keep them busy, but a man toils willingly and long, that he may sustain this home. He is a veritable slave to business. He objects to his wife's voting, not because he deems her unworthy, but because he deems her too good to be reduced to his own plane; not because he deems her lacking in intelligence, but that he knows she is fitted for the higher fields of wifehood and motherhood, and in them has a far nobler opportunity for expending her intelligence. The claim that opponents of woman's suffrage consider women inferior to themselves is not only foolish, but so groundless that it falls, nor needs any attack to overthrow it. Its own witless weight carries it down. Miss Shaw and Miss Anthony are both women of brains, and amply equipped to do much for their sex did they not find it profitable or pleasing to waste their splendid energies in the fighting of a Bogie.

"Give the women the ballot and let them defend themselves," exclaims H. W. C. after devoting considerable space to assailing facts as to suffrage in Wyoming, Colorado, and Utah. But against whom shall they defend themselves? Against men who have always been their protectors? And how? By casting votes that unworthy women shall be at liberty to offset? No problem seems to have been solved by the somewhat hysteric suggestion. If women needed protection men would give it and be proud of the chance. If they needed some peculiar protection that could only be secured by placing the ballot in their hands, the ballot would have been theirs long ago, and without the asking.

H. W. C. objects to the allusion to "distant and idealized woman," and to the motive ascribed to the men of Wyoming when they granted this woman suffrage. It is her privilege to object, but simple objection never overthrew the truth, and the facts related, and that roused within H. W. C. something akin to ire, are indubitably facts to this day, and really there appears no method of altering them. She is as far wrong when she speaks of Utah, where, though she probably does not know it, women were the stanchest advocates of polygamy, and while here and there one rebelled, the mass made no outcry. The new element that went into the Territory, however, had not accepted the tenets of Mormonism, and was afraid of them. This element, with a show of right, demanded the ballot and got it. But the case, as "The Wave" stated before, was and is unique.

When H. W. C. speaks of the desire of women to war against the men who lead girls astray, she expresses a sentiment wholly proper, a sentiment of which every honest person must approve. But a vote could have nothing to do with the matter. Home is the place where girls and boys must have inculcated the proper estimate of such villainy, and home is woman's domain. There no one disputes her sway. There is no wisdom in speaking of "a civilization that encourages men in the name of friendship" to crime of this sort. No civilization like this exists. Such encouragement as may be is entirely social and not subject to regulation at the polls. But to follow H. W. C. through her maze of verbage is hardly necessary. When she alludes to domestic familiarity breeding contempt, she is getting back into the rut from which her kind seldom escape—the theory that men who do not want their wives and daughters to vote are guided by a contemptible and wholly unnatural frame of mind, and what she construes into contempt is admiration and regard. She thinks that women have the privilege of seeking happiness according to rules prescribed by men, climax of pitiful illusion! A woman may seek happiness in her own way, and the men associated with her by ties of family or affection gladly contribute to it. But the woman who conceives no way to happiness save by the ballot has eyes that do not see. Has man found the ballot a source of joy? Hardly. Has he been able to legislate away evils that crowd upon him? Would the women who pine for a chance to vote be able to accomplish more than has ever been done? There is nothing to indicate their prowess in this direction. And it must be remembered that the average woman does not want to vote. The agitation is left to the Shaws, backed rather feebly by the H. W. C.'s, with an occasional Perkins-Stetson, and a semi-occasional Lease.

REJUVENATION AT BERKELEY.

The daily papers have lately blossomed out with gorgeous perspective views of the "approved plan for State University buildings at Berkeley." From a hasty glance at the explanations that accompany some of these spirited upheavals of the architect's art, it would appear that the University of California is an embryotic affair, about springing into existence on paper, with some possibility, with encouragement, of a life elsewhere. Perhaps some of our tourist journalists think this is the case. Perhaps the present honorable, but slumbrous, Board of Regents, headed by the active but misguided Mr. Reinstein, think it ought to be the case, so that to them might greater glory come in the upbuilding of a great institution. The idea, as paraded, is to start in fresh in erecting the material shell of this University, where quiet but effective work has been going on for the past twenty-seven years. The present ten buildings that have cost somewhere near $1,500,000 are to be relegated to limbo, and "structures"—not buildings—"permanent, grand, and harmonious," are to be arranged for. Architects from all over the world are to be asked to compete, and $10,000 in prizes will be paid them to give us, in this wild western land, a few tips as to how a university ought to be built.

Assuming that the tax-payers of the State will cheerily agree to this roseate scheme, which sounds much like an extract from a circular of our late Midwinter Fair, the Regents have given unanimous approval, according to published reports, to a general plan drawn up by an architecturally inoculated member of the Berkeley Faculty. In all the seductive blandishments of points and pigments, this plan sets forth the stunning details of the proposed California Acropolis. Not a trace of the present buildings remain. Even the new electrical and mechanics' hall, just built at a cost of $150,000, with all its granite and marble and pressed brick, has been wiped out. The chemical laboratory, that cost $75,000 to complete three years ago, has gone to the Berkeley junk-man. And the new conservatory, better and more modern than that of Golden Gate Park, has gone glimmering before this relentless movement toward harmony and bizarre reformation. The old central buildings, around whose ugly exteriors cling thousands of memories dear to the hearts of all early graduates, were the first to go in this scheme of paper rejuvenation.

As dainty as a fly-curtain design for Frederic Warde's "Cæsar" is the idea of this university of the future. Towers, spires, fountains, domes, and peri-styles loom up like the mirage that seems to reveal the Holy City to the Mohammedan pilgrim. There are miles of classic corridors and every professor apparently will be given a dome for his own exclusive use. Fountains play merrily, but it isn't explained how the long-vexed water supply problem for the grounds has been so triumphantly solved. And the trees—the noble wide-spreading oaks, that now give the chief charm to Berkeley's classic shades—nowhere appear on the new design. Must they, too, go? And then there is a mausoleum arranged for in a central location. No one can well object to Berkeley taking some ideas from Stanford University, but is not this going a little too far? Is there anything in the equipment of the modern university that requires a well-regulated mausoleum? True, the Berkeley faculty or the Regents may have use for one, or perhaps the mausoleum may have use for some of them, but it is certainly an innovation whose popularity remains to be demonstrated. All these new buildings are not to be erected at once, but from time to time, the harmony of the whole grouping and the general architectural features to be preserved in all. The tax-payers and the Legislature will press the button and the Regents and Mr. Reinstein will do the rest.

All this is extremely pretty and there is in it a grain or two of sense, but there is also much rubbish and mind slickens. No one with half an eye for the true and the beautiful can but be horrified at some of the architectural monstrosities on the State University grounds. They were built, as have been many of the public buildings of this State, on the plan that artistic design is entirely secondary to the amount of money for the contractor. But they have filled a useful place for the past quarter century, and have turned out just as brainy men as if they were the gold-tipped palaces of Araby the Blest. The work of these older buildings is done. New buildings should replace them as occasion and the condition of the times may warrant. There is no reason why a competent California architect should not be regularly employed by the Regents to have general supervision over all new buildings and all repairs. There are plenty of San Francisco men easily able to furnish the brains that will give to the Regents and Mr. Reinstein the harmony desired in all the buildings of the future. No need is there to vaunt abroad a poverty that has no existence. Several of the buildings are good for a half-century—solid, practical, and unobtrusive in style and eminently fitted for the purpose they serve. There is need for a main building to occupy a site to the west of all the present buildings. This has been long talked of and doubtless the next Legislature will provide the desired funds. With this main edifice and the present North and South Hall buildings replaced by buildings in harmony with it, the general effect of the University architecture would be vastly improved, and, generally, all that need be desired.

No colleges of the world, except the very recent, that were created, ready-made as it were, like Chicago University or Stanford, or the Catholic University at Washington, have buildings that present any sort of harmony in grouping or in architecture. And the fact is, that most of the educators who manage these old universities, or the men who are graduated from them, do not care a rap whether they have fountains and domes and minarets or not. The college or university is made up of men, not of buildings. The scholar will attract and instruct in a hut as well as a palace, although palaces are more in fashion to-day. The little university of Aberdeen, and the old college of Dartmouth are examples of institutions with honored names, whose buildings would doubtless make Mr. Reinstein smile. Some of the structures at Johns Hopkins at Baltimore are far from being up to date or architecturally pleasing. It is a common complaint of visitors of artistic sense that California is too new and has no history. If there is any place where sentiment and reverence for old associations ought to obtain it is at a college. The buildings are the home of the student. They shelter his loving Mother, or Alma Mater, as the phrase goes. If the buildings be moss-grown and tumble-down, they are still loved and honored. It really seems a question for the Regents and Mr. Reinstein and the tax-payers to talk over this scheme to set imitation Greek temples or Moorish halls or bogus mosques down among the poppies on the Berkeley hillsides.

American capitalists have purchased the entire street railway system of the City of Mexico, including the sole right of way over most of the desirable streets in the city. The purchasers are reported as negotiating for extensive water power, and propose to equip the lines under their control with electricity. The number of passengers carried over the lines purchased, in 1895 exceeded seventeen millions, at fares ranging from six to thirty one cents per passenger. The parent road has always paid dividends of from six to seven per cent, besides maintaining a sinking fund out of its earnings sufficient to purchase all competing lines except one small and undesirable single track road of four miles length.

THE CAMPAIGN OF THE WOMEN.

ONE WOMAN'S VIEWS ON WOMAN'S RIGHTS.

A lady in Eureka taking exception to our editorial on woman's suffrage send us the following communication. We regret that its excessive length precludes its publication in its entirety. We submit it herewith with apologies to the lady for the necessary excisions:

The heading of the editorial mentioned is very general in its sweep. "The Campaign of the Women" refers to the cause of woman; no matter how narrow in view the editorial may be in scope and substance. The whole page will remain a monument in black letters to the indiscretion and imperception of the writer, if not of quite a large body of men in their stand against woman suffrage. It is very easy to read between the lines, and trace the causes which have led to certain results, causes put into operation by men themselves, and results for which women are held to blame. The writer deludes himself. He either labors under hallucinations or imposes his theories on the credulous and thoughtless hoping that class may be in the majority to defeat the movement.

The opening paragraphs, which affect the machinations of the voters of whole States, and go so far as to declare the motives which prompted such acts, form a serious charge that demands recognition and proof. It is stated in effect that Wyoming, Colorado, and Utah did not confer the ballot upon woman, but shoved it at her and made a cat's-paw of her for the purpose of gaining certain ends. This may be true in part, but if so, it is a lasting shame to men and a blot upon the escutcheon of those States.

"Colorado," "The Wave" says, "took the step, owing to the determination to fight a life and death struggle on the subject of free coinage." We are asked here to believe that deep rooted selfishness was the motive; negroes, Chinamen, or idiots would have served the purpose just as well, but only women happened to be "available." A man in his extremity once cried, "Lord, save me from my friends!" and so women might often say, "Lord, save us from our protectors!"

As a diversion, please certify your assertion that "no member of the scarlet sisterhood failed to vote," and also inform us what members of the scarlet brotherhood voted. Again, why suppose that all of the former "caste" would vote in the interests of their enslavers. The world has good reason to believe that many of these women would be glad to cast a vote and fell the arm that brought them down to poverty, misery, and shame, glad to strike at the root of a civilization that encourages a man in the name of friendship to lead an innocent girl astray, and keep her in bondage without hope of return.

Now turn to Utah, in which State is claimed the situation was "unique." "A brand of shame was on the brow of the territory. Women there at one time were in a situation worse than ordinary serfdom." Men wanted the brand effaced. They hoped to make up by going to the opposite extreme, as we are to believe. Is it to be credited that people become serfs of their own volition! If women still possessed the privilege granted them by the Federal Constitution would they be likely to vote themselves serfs? Wherever slavery has existed, the strong, whether of size or number, have enslaved the weak and unresisting. The savage respects only his conqueror. So the ballot became the "reputed pledge of safety" to the women of Utah, as is stated. It is averred that "in no other part of the United States could a case in any degree analagous be cited." Let us see. The negroes were given the ballot, not because they were wanted or needed as voters, assemblymen, electors, or presidents, but because they needed it for their protection at the close of the war; and black, illiterate, poverty-stricken, and homeless as they were, they voted, and in voting are becoming "intelligent." The situation is quite analagous, in fact, it covers the case and goes away beyond it. The distinction without a difference is that one was a form of industrial slavery, the other of sexual slavery. The latter strikes at the root of health, happiness, and domestic and national prosperity. Women should have the right to assist in making certain sex laws, and provide for their infraction. Reason and justice are often subservient to the baser propensities of men, and property is protected by more stringent laws than virtue, as the "age of consent" laws attest.

Women are modestly stating their case at this moment all over California. The independent voter gains immeasurably in his own estimation, and wins the respect of his colleagues. He cannot lower himself by expressing an honest opinion in writing, nor in putting it on record, nor by putting it in a box to be counted. It is his expressed and recorded desire and defense, and if ever this country goes to the "bow wows," as they call it, men will have themselves to blame, for they go down with their votes in their hands. But what is this weapon? An ingenious contrivance of iron and steel, heavy to handle and easy to explode, and for this reason denied the physically weak but morally strong? No; it is only a bit of paper, on which is printed a modest opinion and a feeble desire for justice. Have drink, licentiousness, love of leadership, arrogant regard for power, and disregard of the character, and future of the unborn, blinded men to nothing but the basest ideals? "Distant and idealized women," in bondage at that, seems to be the only kind admired. Is it necessary for their own mothers, wives, and daughters to get upon some high peak, to be worshiped afar off, and given a kind of theoretical justice suited only to an ideal state of existence? The drunkard, the libertine, the false friend, and the coward are contemptible enough, and so are such insinuations. The conclusion is that domestic "familiarity breeds contempt" instead of love and respect.

Shall affairs become worse, and how, by giving woman the right to express an opinion that counts? Do women suffragists "lack sex"? "Sex" is the too predominant characteristic of their masculine opposites, and so is "stomach." This is why a certain class of women exist, and why the wine vats are full, to be soon emptied. And yet the hope that purity will come upon the land is a "shadowy dream." As women have not voted the existing evils are of man's own choosing and making. These hundred years are not wasted if only this is clear. The franchise to women is not the cause of all the divorces which cumber the courts, nor of the multitudinous and verbose laws which "lumber up" the statute books. It was stated that all women would vote one way. How shall it be proved, or that impossible reform laws would pile up and restrict the passage of wiser ones?

Still let us admit that the women of the United States are as happy as anywhere else in the world. The method of seeking happiness is prescribed for them, rules of restraint are now in full force, which women now are hoping to change.

"Uniform environment and sameness of influence" will cause husbands and wives to vote alike. Well and good, yet we believe there are thousands of men broad-minded enough to vote as they please and allow their wives to do the same.

It is the nature of women to be happy while "cleaning up" rubbish. The streets cleaned by women municipal officers are clean. This fact might be taken as evidence of reforms that might take place in the intellectual realm.

Many men are not able to vote at elections. The State prisons contain in all about three thousand prisoners, a few are women. Sailors on the high seas and drummers are not always able to vote. The pioneer forester and miner and the sheep-herder on the lonely ranges do not always vote. The migratory tramp does not stay long enough to claim a residence. Yet he and the foreigner, the negro, and perhaps the native-born Chinaman vote the destiny of the loyal American woman and nullify the votes of her husband and son. About four hundred children are born every month in San Francisco. The population is about two hundred and fifty thousand. A few women are in jail, perhaps, for neglecting their offspring, but a great many men are at large who should be in jail for deserting their families, and the law does not or cannot reach and punish them. If a number of women fail to vote then, why demur. The mother of children breathes a prayer for the future of her little one while her sisters and brothers cast their votes for mother, child, and State. Respectfully,

MRS. H. W. C.

Eureka, April 25, 1896.

THE FIESTA AT LOS ANGELES.

BY JULIET WILBOR TOMPKINS.

"But what is a Fiesta?" persisted the childish voice.

"It's what you're looking at. Now shut up," was the maternal answer; and so we who shared the curb-stone were left to work out our own definition. What is a Fiesta, anyway?

It means sidewalks packed to overflowing, elbows in your eyes, and babies under your feet, blocks on blocks of solid, good-tempered humanity. It means processions and floats and blonde ladies in sea shells and splendid, rousing brass bands, and backaches and headaches. And, of course, the flowers. They go without saying, and indeed, after one has read a few yards of the local drivel about Flora and the orange flame of the poppy, one is tempted not to mention them at all. And the joyous revelry, the innocent pranks, the bursting loyalty to the Fiesta Queen? Yes, of course, they are here, too. They must be, for the papers are full of them. Viva la Fiesta!

The Festival was formally opened Tuesday night, when the Mayor (probably feeling very foolish) made a somewhat fancy speech beginning, "Most gracious Majesty: Again we greet thee," and gave up the keys of the city to Mrs. Mildred Ho—forgive me, to her most gracious, humbly adored, extremely pretty, and highly temporary majesty, La Reina de Los Angeles. O democratic American people, who aren't going to have any dukes and earls sitting around on your cracker boxes, is this what you have come to? Or is it merely a safety valve for the unexpressed side of your natures, the impulse to bow down and worship all things great and titled? The quick Southern blood in the American composition would shout Huzza! and Viva! and Bravo! if the chilly English admixture didn't refuse to sanction anything so bad form. And then the native sense of humor always steps in with its dread of the ridiculous. It is no use, we are too complex as a people to take our pleasure simply. The Italians can masquerade and fling confetti to their hearts' content; the Chinese can dance the monster sea serpent to their naive music and trot their gorgeousness solemnly through an applauding multitude; the Indians can show their war paint, and the Mexicans dash about as fringed caballeros, and it is all very pretty and interesting: but an American in pink satin and powdered wig dancing attendance on a mock royal family is a sorry spectacle. He can't go into it with childish abandon, but must wonder if he isn't a little absurd and feel somewhat like a fool when he catches a derisive American eye, and so, as a masquerader, he is not a success. He can't lose sight of the fact that the chivalry is warmed over, the loyalty only make-believe. A mood of joyous exaltation is not of much use when you have the sense to be ashamed of it.

Nothing in a procession is much more attractive than the brass buttons. The National Guard and United States Marines led off on Wednesday, followed by some ornamental soldiery. Then the caballeros dashed by with much shouting and whirling. One fascinating little fellow—only he was probably a girl, to judge by the length of his hair—rode standing in the saddle till opposite the royal bleaching-boards, where she jumped down and made a deep reverence, then stepped in front of her pony, who put down his head and hooked her over it back into the saddle. It was as prettily done as it was unexplainable, and brought a volley of applause for the little equestrienne.

Ignacio Something or Other Garcia followed, leaning proudly back in his carriage under a placard announcing his hundred and fifteen years. When he rose to take off his hat to the Fiesta Queen, he didn't look a day over ninety, and the public cheered him loudly. He was interesting, but who wants to see nasty fat half-breeds, whose shirts consist of striped paint and nothing else, not even a collar button? The refined outcome of this decorative style of negligee was seen in a Mexican girl on the sidewalk, the string tie of whose shirtwaist was nicely cut out of white paper, with little bands of green painted around the edge of the bows; neat and simple, and not beyond anybody's means. Another of her countrywomen walked in the procession carrying a pair of ample calfskin shoes in her hand to rest her feet, or perhaps the better to show the world that she too had the correct footgear. We all have our little vanities.

The same huge, unwielding, joking, laughing crowd pushed and wedged its way into Athletic Park Thursday afternoon for the games. There the militia marched, and drilled, and fired cannon, and threw itself flat on the ground behind imaginery earthworks, regardless of the indignant "Get up!" that rose from the bleaching-boards. There were half a dozen bicycle races, one between a little scrap of a fellow, barely five years old, on a miniature wheel, and the winner of the last race, who had to go around twice to the mite's once. Of course the baby won—it would have been too cruel to beat him—and he was carried off, not on the shoulders of the crowd, but in the arms of a proud papa, to be rubbed down and cared for just like a grown-up scorcher. There were running races and dashes, too, and the Pueblo Indians showed the Pale Face how the Red Man of the forest can cover the ground in white pajamas, with a turkey red fillet binding his flowing hair. Man-Afraid-of-His-Job was announced to have come in first, Pain-in-The-Face next, and the rest straggled along at their leisure, Man-With-One-Shirt bringing up the rear, a quarter of a mile away. For any one who once loved Cooper, and can still see the long, lithe savage skimming lightly over the ground, graceful as a deer, and swift as the Sunset Limited, it is as well not to see the Pueblo Indians race. They are short and fat, muddy brown instead of dusky red, and look supremely foolish as they paddle around the course. Romance can't stand it. The Spanish caballeros on their patiently bucking and kicking horses were far more picturesque, even though some of them were suspiciously blonde. The little equestrienne with her unique way of mounting was there, charging recklessly at the crowd whenever it spilled over into the field. If any one displeased her, she whirled her horse around with his right hind leg toward the offender, who, if he was wise, left the neighborhood as quickly as possible, for the kick that followed was suggestive of a seven years' grudge. She is tough, this little rider—gloriously tough—but as graceful as the young Indian of fiction, and she knows a thing or two about riding.

Nobody but a parent expects much of a Children's Parade, and some of us went to the Friday afternoon exercises rather half-heartedly, to find them quite as attractive in their way as any part of the program. There were such dear little girls and sturdy boys, and so many of them, all too eager to get a good look at a real, live queen to think much of their own finery. One could imagine the excited, "She looked right at me!"—"She did not, she was watching us!"—"I don't care, she kissed her hand when we went by," that was sure to follow when the ranks broke. They marched unusually well under the leadership of determined girls and boys, whose shrill, childish "Company halt! Guide right! Forward-marruch!" made a droll contrast to the deep bass of the bands. Of course there were hitches: one little girl would pull up her stocking in the middle of "Company, Salute!" and several times the ranks showed signs of dislocation at the excitement of a royal smile. But it was all as pretty as possible, and if a little boy got out of position, it was a great deal simpler to poke him in the middle of his jacket with the end of the banner than to wait for a tiresome court martial to straighten him out. The silk flag that was to be raised in Central Park went surrounded by forty-five little girls, none of them over seven, and each as pretty as nature and a little white gown could make her, and having the best time of her life. No wonder they looked happy; for when you consider that, having rained all the morning, it might have rained all the afternoon, it makes you shudder.

Saturday afternoon brought the grand climax of the Fiesta, the floral parade. It was the prettiest event of the week, and the most Californian. Coach after coach drove slowly by, banked and canopied with roses, carnations, sweet peas, wistaria, snowballs, orange blossoms, and a thousand other flowers. Then came carts and phaetons, people on horseback and on donkeys and on bicycles, little traps drawn by dogs and Shetland ponies, and even a young Jersey bull harnessed to an ox-cart, each one a mass of blossoms. The horses wore saddle blankets of flowers, their riders great mantles of carnations or marigolds, while over the bicycles were parasols of roses. It was a floral debauch.

Saturday night was mad and merry, with the kind of fun that blows a tin horn in your ear and smashes your hat down over your head. The streets were full of maskers, and it was a brave man who ventured into them wearing his every-day face and clothes. He was not likely to keep either intact. They evidently enjoy it, this yelling, tooting multitude, and every one to his taste of course, since this is free America. One sometimes wishes it wasn't. This night of license only proves the more fully that the American is not a carnival animal. Where the descendant of a Latin race would show delicate esprit, he "joshes," and therein lies the contrast. He would far rather throw flour than pretty paper confetti, which can't do any damage. In fact, clever though he is, humorist unsurpassed, he hasn't the graceful art of being lawfully lawless. It was far wiser for the stranger within the gates to hurry away after the flower parade, taking with him a picture of three little girls driving a tiny cart buried in buttercups rather than a painted clown in a gingham sunbonnet. But this is free America, and every one to his taste.

The question as to where Franklin erected his first lightning-rod is agitating all the archeological societies of the suburbs of Paris. The Historical Society claimed that this conductor was erected upon a house in the Rue Singer, but a rival society now asserts that honor should be claimed by the chateau Beausejour, formerly inhabited by le pere Lachaise. M. Pascal asserts that an English collector has actually purchased the rod used.

THE DEATH-SPANCEL.

BY KATHRINE TYNAN.

High up among the dusty rafters of Aughagree Chapel dangles a thin, shrivelled thing, toward which the people look shudderingly when the sermon is of the terrors of the Judgment and the everlasting fire. The woman from whose dead body that was taken chose the death of the soul in return for a life with the man whom she loved with an unholy passion. Every man, woman, and child in that chapel amid gray miles of rock and sea-drift has heard over and over of the unrepentant deathbed of Mauryeen Holion. They whisper on winter nights of how Father Hugh fought with the demons for her soul; how the sweat poured from his forehead, and he lay on his face in an agony of tears, beseeching that the sinner whom he had admitted into the fold of Christ should yet be saved. But of her love and her sin she had no repentance, and the servants in Rossatorc Castle said that as the priest lay exhausted from his vain supplications, and the rattle was in Dark Mauryeen's throat, there were cries of mocking laughter in the air above the castle, and a strange screaming and flapping of great wings, like to, but incomparably greater than, the screaming and flapping of the eagle over Slieve League. That devil's charm up there in the rafters of Aughagree is the death-spancel by which Dark Mauryeen bound Sir Robert Molyneux to her love. It is of such power that no man born of woman can resist it, save by the power of the Cross, and 'twas little Robert Molyneux of Rossatorc, recked of the sweet Christ who perished that men should live—against whose Cross the demons of earth and the demons of air, the malevolent spirits that lurk in water and wind, and all the witches and evil doctors, are powerless. But the thought of the death-spancel must have come straight from the King of Fiends himself, for who else would harden the human heart to desecrate a new grave, and to cut from the helpless dead the strip of skin unbroken from head to heel, which is the death-spancel? Very terrible is the passion of love when it takes full possession of a human heart, and no surer weapon to the hand of Satan when he would make a soul his own. And there is the visible sign of a lost soul, and it had nearly been of two, hanging harmlessly in the rafters of the holy place. A strange thing to see where the lamp of the sanctuary burns, and the sea-wind sighs sweetly through the door ever open for the continual worshipers.

* * * * * * * *

Sir Robert Molyneux was a devil-may-care, sporting squire, with the sins of his class to his account. He drank, and gambled, and rioted, and oppressed his people that they might supply his pleasures; nor was that all, for he had sent the daughter of honest people in shame and sorrow over the sea. People muttered when they heard he was to marry Lord Dunlough's daughter, that she would be taking another woman's place; but it was said yet again that it would be well for his tenants when he was married, for the lady was so kind and charitable, so gentle and pure, that her name was loved for many a mile. She had never heard the shameful story of that forlorn girl sailing away and away in the sea-mist, with her unborn child, to perish miserably, body and soul, in the streets of New York. She had the strange love of a pure woman for a wild liver; and she thought fondly when she caressed his fine, jolly, handsome face, that soon his soul as well as his dear body would be in her keeping—and what safe keeping it would be!

Sir Robert had ever a free way with women of a class below his own, and he did not find it easy to relinquish it. When he was with Lady Eva he felt that under those innocent, loving eyes a man could have no desire for a lesser thing than her love; but when he rode away, the first pretty girl he met on the road he held in chat that ended with a kiss. He was always for kissing a pretty face, and found the habit hard to break, though there were times when he stamped and swore great oaths to himself that he would again kiss no woman's lips but his wife's—for the man had the germ of good in him.

It was a fortnight to his wedding day, and he had had a hard day's hunting. From early morning to dewy eve they had been at it, for the fox was an old one and had led the dogs many a dance before this. He turned homeward with a friend, splashed and weary, but happy and with the appetite of a hunter. Well for him if he had never set foot in that house. As he came down the stairs fresh and shining from his bath, he caught sight of a girl's dark handsome face on the staircase. She was one of the servants, and she stood aside to let him pass, but that was never Robert Molyneux's way with a woman. He flung his arm round her waist in a way so many poor girls had found irresistible. For a moment or two he looked in her dark splendid eyes; but then as he bent lightly to kiss her, she tore herself from him with a cry and ran away into the darkness.

He slept heavily that night, the dead sleep of a man who has hunted all day and has drunk deep in the evening. In the morning he awoke sick and sorry, a strange mood for Robert Molyneux; but from midnight to dawn he had lain with the death-spancel about his knees. In the blackness of his mind he had a great longing for the sweet woman, his love for whom awakened all that was good in him. His horse had fallen lame, but after breakfast he asked his host to order out a carriage that he might go to her. Once with her he thought all would be well. Yet as he stood on the doorstep he had a strange reluctance to go.

It was a drear, gray, miserable day, with sleet pattering against the carriage windows. Robert Molyneux sat with his head bent almost to his knees, and his hands clenched. What face was it rose against his mind, continually blotting out the fair and sweet face of his love? It was the dark handsome face of the woman he had met on the stairs last night. Some sudden passion for her rose as strong as hell-fire in his breast. There were many long miles between him and Eva, and his desire for the dark woman raged stronger and ever stronger in him. It was as if ropes were around his heart dragging it backward. He fell on his knees in the carriage and sobbed. If he had known how to pray he would have prayed, for he was torn in two between the desire of his heart for the dark woman, and the longing of his soul for the fair woman. Again and again he started up to call the coachman to turn back; again and again he flung himself in the bottom of the carriage, and hid his face and struggled with the curse that had come upon him. And every mile brought him nearer to Eva and safety.

The coachman drove on in the teeth of the sleet and wondered what Sir Robert would give him at the drive's end. A half-sovereign would not be too much for so open-handed a gentleman, and one so near his wedding; and the coachman, already feeling his hand close upon it, turned a brave face to the sleet and tried not to think of the warm fire in the harness-room from which they had called him to drive Sir Robert.

Half the distance was gone when he heard a voice from the carriage window calling him. He turned round.

"Back! back!" said the voice. "Drive like hell! I will give you a sovereign if you do it under an hour."

The coachman was amazed, but a sovereign was better than a half-sovereign. He turned his bewildered horses for home.

Robert Molyneux's struggle was over. Eva's face was gone now altogether. He only felt a mad joy in yielding, and a wild desire for the minutes to pass till he had traversed that gray road back. The coachman drove hard and his horses were flecked with foam; but from the windows Robert Molyneux kept continually urging him, offering him greater and greater rewards for his doing the journey with all speed.

Half-way up the cypress avenue to his friend's house a woman with a shawl about her head glided from the shadow and signalled to the darkly flushed face at the carriage window. Robert Molyneux shouted to the man to stop. He sprang from the carriage and lifted the woman in. Then he flung the coachman a handful of gold and silver. "To Rossatorc," he said, and the man turned round and once more whipped up his tired horses. The woman laughed as Robert Molyneux caught her in his arms. It was the fierce laughter of the lost.

"I came to meet you," she said, "because I knew you must come."

From that day, when Robert Molyneux led the woman over the threshold of his house, he was seen no more in the usual places of his fellow-men. He refused to see any one who came. His wedding-day passed by. Lord Dunlough had ridden furiously to have an explanation with the fellow and to horsewhip him when that was done, but he found the great door of Rossatorc closed in his face. Every one knew Robert Molyneux was living in shame with Mauryeen Holion. Lady Eva grew pale and paler, and drooped and withered in sorrow and shame, and presently her father took her away, and their house was left to servants. Burly neighboring squires rode up and knocked with their riding-whips at Rossatorc door to remonstrate with Robert Molyneux, for his father's sake or for his own, but met no answer. All the servants were gone, except a furtive-eyed French valet and a woman he called his wife, and these were troubled with no notions of respectability. After a time people gave up trying to interfere. The place got a bad name. The gardens were neglected, and the house was half in ruins. No one ever saw Mauryeen Holion's face, except it might be at a high window of the castle, when some belated huntsman, taking a short cut across the park, would catch a glimpse of a wild face framed in black hair at an upper window, the flare of the winter sunset lighting it up, it might be, as with a radiance from hell. Sir Robert drank, they said, and rack-rented his people far worse than in the old days. He had put his business in the hands of a disreputable attorney from a neighboring town, and if the rent was not paid to the day, the roof was torn off the cabin, and the people flung out into the ditch to rot.

So the years went, and folk ever looked for a judgment of God on the pair. And when many years were over, there came to Father Hugh, wringing her hands, the wife of the Frenchman, with word that the two were dying, and she dared not let them die in their sins.

But Mauryeen Holion—Dark Mauryeen, as they called her—would not to her last breath yield up the death-spancel which she had knotted round her waist, and which held Robert Molyneux's love to her. When the wicked breath was out of her body they cut it away, and it lay twisted on the ground like a dead snake. Then on Robert Molyneux, dying in a distant chamber, came a strange peace. All the years of sin seemed blotted out, and he was full of a simple repentance such as he had felt long ago when kneeling by the gown of the good woman whom he had loved. So Father Hugh absolved him before he died, and went hither and thither through the great empty rooms, shaking his holy water and reading from his Latin book.

And lest any in that place, where they have fiery southern blood in their veins, should so wickedly use philtres or charms, he hung the death-spancel in Aughagree Chapel for a terrible reminder.

[From an "Isle in the Water," by Kathrine Tynan. MacMillan & Co., publishers.]

FLIGHT.

BY EARNEST MCGAFFEY.

A hickory-tree in the valley grew;
The snows and the sun and the spring rains found it;
And shrill-voiced winds from the northward blew,
And the dews in the night-time fell around it.

Deep into the earth its fibres crept,
And pierced the flint in the depths down under,
Till the lightning out from the cloud-ways leapt,
And the hickory fell and was split asunder.

And there by its side the shadowy marsh
A crane's nest held by the curving river,
Where the tall grass mingled, coarse and harsh,
With reed-beds broad and the sedge a-quiver.

And the tree and the egg and the stone lay there,
But shreds and shards at the dim earth's portal,
As common things that could never dare
The higher realm of the far immortal.

But an Indian wrenched from the tree a shaft
And struck a flint from the rock-ribbed ledges,
And a crane's quill picked from a tangled raft
Of reeds and weeds by the brown marsh edges.

And the arrow sped from its twanging bow
Till the lone blue vault of the sky was riven.
And that which was humblest here below,
Now at the last was the nearest heaven.

THE SONG OF THE SHIRT WAIST.

"How should a stenographer dress?"—Second to None.

With fingers nimble and strong,
With eyes that are sparkling and keen,
A young woman sits in a womanly rig
With her pencil, her pad, and machine.

Scratch, scratch, scratch,
With speed; not fussy with haste;
No poverty plaint, nor even a patch
Or smirch on her neat shirt waist.

Write, write, write,
From the business hours of nine;
And write, write, write,
Till time to lunch or to dine.

Then it's oh, for a jolly laugh!
With a bone of a Turk to pick,
Where sister workers meet and chaff
In the respite hour from click.

Click, click, click,
Merrily line upon line;
Click, click, click,
And the shirt-waist wavelets shine.

Quick-witted to catch the thought,
To correct each grammatical lapse,
Not sentimentally taught
By Balzac; but better, perhaps.

Click, click, click,
As eager at work as at play,
Click, click, click,
The sheet rolls up and away.

E's and $'s and Y's,
Y's and $'s and E's,
Picking them up with her twinkling eyes,
And rattling them off the keys.

Write, write, write;
All womanly work elevates:
Write, write, write,
Esteem on faithfulness waits.

Oh, women with brothers dear,
Oh, women with husbands and sons,
Heed not their sneers
At your sisters and peers,
Nor the talk of the morbid ones.

Right! right! right!
A just independence to gain,
And right! right! right!
Be it yours to help her attain.

—New York Sun.

POLITICAL PERSONALITIES.

CHARACTERISTICS OF PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATES.

Senator Teller is one of the most cultured men in either branch of Congress. He is a great student and a fine linguist. He says he learned to read French when young, but after he got into active life he forgot all about it till, years later, it became necessary for him to consult a book on finance which had never been translated into English. He set to work to read it in the original. It was tough work, but he kept at it with dictionary and grammar, and by the time he had reached the end he had recovered all his early facility, and a great deal more. Now the French tongue is as familiar to him as his own, and so are three or four other modern tongues, besides. Of all languages, however, he prefers the Greek.

Mr. Mark A. Hanna, whose duty it is to nourish and foster the McKinley boom, is—as he needs must be—a man of tremendous physical capabilities. He is possessed of a short burly frame, a round head, and a countenance expressive of bull-dog determination. In his manner he is direct, to the point of curtness, bluff, straightforward as one having little time to choose his words. He is less a politician than a thorough-paced business-man, managing the campaign more through correspondence than through emmisaries and political agents. It is said of him that he reads every letter relating to affairs political that comes through his offices and (which is almost beyond belief) that he can remember their contents.

The chief and only distinction accorded Cannon of Utah is that he figures as the youngest member of the United States Senate. He is just a little over thirty-five. His profession is journalism, and his political experience was gained at home and as Territorial Representative. His colleague, Senator Brown, is neither young nor handsome. He had never held political office till he made his leap into the Senate, but he had been fighting the men of many wives tooth and nail for years. The first polygamy case that ever reached the United States courts was taken there by him—and won. The moment he reached Utah he took the question of polygamy into politics and agitated it till the President declared the many-wife system an offense to the law. Senator Brown believes polygamy to be as prevalent as ever if it is more secretive.

President Cleveland was considerably annoyed by the reports recently sent out concerning a serious disagreement between himself and a member of his Cabinet. At one of the Cabinet dinners last month this subject of trouble in the official council came up in conversation. President Cleveland did most of the talking. Turning his head slightly to one side, as is his habit when in a certain frame of mind, he said: "There is one thing that I feel more proud of than of anything else connected with my experience in the White House. During the time when we were here before, and this time (in this way the President habitually refers to his two administrations) there never has been the slightest trouble in the Cabinet. We have had no quarrels, no rows, no bickering. We have always been a happy official family, and when I retire to private life that is one feature of my public career to which I shall always be able to look back to with delight."

Mr. Allison has grown old gracefully and has maintained throughout a long and turbulent period of political history a reputation for geniality and urbanity which distinguishes him among all the other candidates for the presidency. Nor, from a physical point of view does he show any manifestation of the crabedness of old age. His figure is still erect, his step firm, his manner alert, and his eye still bright with the light of a strong and vigorous manhood. Mr. Allison's enemies—few though they be—are apt to call his good nature weakness. But Mr. Allison could not be a weak man and survive—politically—as long as he has in the fierce stress of latter-day politics. More than this, Mr. Allison's State (Iowa) has been more subject to wilful and capricious changes of policy during the last quarter century than any other State in the Union. It has been the home of political fads, greenbackism, grangerism, tin-pan-free-tradeism, and anti-bank follies. Yet, in some way Allison has kept his grip through it all and is stronger than ever at this present moment, an impossible achievement if he were the weak man his detractors would have us believe.

"That," said Secretary Morton, as he pointed out a little brick house at the east end of his building, "that brick house holds a most valuable result of scientific research. It cost Uncle Sam $20,000, and an army of scientists hunted for the thing from Alaska in the North to Darien in the South. Do you know what the thing is? It's a bug. He's not much of a bug to look at; his habits are indolent, and his face, when you catch him under the microscope, is sullen and morose and lacking in sociability, and yet that bug cost the United States Government $20,000. One of our scientists had a theory about mating the gypsy moth from Europe with his American cousin, sort of a mésalliance, you know, to degenerate the race. Well, he got his foreign moths all right, and kept them in a little mosquito-net cage while he went out to gather in the prospective bridegrooms. While he was gone the foreign gypsy moths broke jail and spread over the land and multiplied and waxed exceedingly numerous. They ate up every green thing they lighted upon, till the locusts of Egypt became abstemious by comparison. This was but a few years ago, yet the Legislature of Massachusetts has already been driven to appropriate over $400,000 to do battle with these gypsy moths, and save as much of the State from them as may be.

A reserved, quiet, calm man, a man of much manner and dignity, such seems to be the popular verdict of McKinley's personality. A chooser of words and a phrasemaker, perhaps, in the matter of conversation. Nothing flippant about the man—too much of the solemn Scot in him for that. A religious man to boot, deeply so. Not rarely were the less orthodox Congressmen surprised to hear him humming a hymn as he went about his business in the corridors of the Capitol. He is a lover of home life as well and enjoys the society of the invalid wife (that unhappy woman about whom we shall hear so much as the heat of the campaign grows apace, her maladies destined to be used as a political machine). The great man dresses but fairly well. He has even been known,—oh, grief!—to have worn a crocheted necktie. It would appear that it is unwritten law that all eminent American Statesmen must wear a Prince Albert coat. McKinley bows to that law, but be not deceived, the coat is not one of the narrow-waisted, long-tailed, rough cheviot variety, but is, we fancy, of good plain old-fashioned broadcloth, short, tight-fitting, long over the cuffs, and invariably closely buttoned. There is much of the machine about McKinley, calm, slow, methodical, impassive, and absolutely resistless. But there are certain times—so say his friends—when this impression is broken up; and markedly so. His well-wishers declare that one of the best sides of the man's character is shown when he is pushing his wife about in her invalid-chair. Then there is nothing of the politician about him, nothing but the loving and attentive husband. He is almost boyish then, and the observer feels like forgiving him his alleged belief in the statements of his backers and agents; i. e., that he will make the greatest President since the days of Washington.

TYPES OF WESTERN MEN.

II.

THE PLUMBER'S APPRENTICE.

His name is "Jonesee," and he is a tinner and gas-fitter during six days of the week, or at least attempts to persuade his brother in-law, into whose shop he has been received, that such is his serious occupation. Jonesee tried to impress the fiction upon himself during the first days of his apprenticeship, but the strain of sustaining the character increased in proportion as the novelty of the work diminished, until he has come by gentle degrees to keeping up appearances only during the times when the boss is in, and they are literally "appearances" even then. He never works unless he is absolutely driven to it, and he probably never will as long as he can live at home and exploit his father—who is an annealer in the mint—for enough change to keep him in beer and "cigareets."

In the back room of the grimy tin-shop on Polk Street Jonesee languishes and chafes by turns. The only ornaments on the walls are a couple of pictures cut from bill posters of the "Danites," and a dirty map of San Francisco, on which the location of the tin-shop is at once betrayed by a worn and soiled spot, the result of frequent contact with greasy finger-tips. Jonesee hates the place, and is much more content when he is sent out to do an odd job in the neighborhood.

At such times one sees him on the front platforms of cable cars, his hand-furnace for heating his soldering irons between his feet, together with his solder-sticks, plyers, clamping tools, etc., wrapped in their carpet case, his pockets loaded with brass faucets, short sections of lead pipe, and tweezers.

On these occasions he wears a suit that has once been black, but has now faded to a shade of green, except upon the trousers above the knee, where, by constant friction with lead and grease and dirt, they are thickly coated with a glazed and shining varnish of black. His battered derby hat is of a blackish green as well, and is marked with sweat stains around the band. He is always smoking the butt of a "cigareet," which sticks to his lower lip even when he opens his mouth to talk.

He is even more contented when he goes out to lunch at noon in the Polk-street restaurant, in the window of which one sees three china pigs and a plaster of Paris cow knee-deep in a thick layer of white beans. He likes to gabble and lounge at length among the postmen, car-conductors, and barbers who frequent the place, and hear the latest word on ward politics and prize-fights, or shake dice or match nickels for cigars.

Sunday, however, is Jonesee's great day. It is the one day of the seven when he is released from the work of seeming to work. He is not in evidence till the afternoon. Then sometimes he goes out to the Park or to the Cliff House, or sometimes, on rare occasions, rents a horse and buggy with a friend and drives there, sometimes he goes "across the Bay" on a public picnic, or sometimes "takes in" the races, or balloon jumps or high dives as opportunity affords.

But his favorite and characteristic occupation of a Sunday afternoon is general and promiscuous loafing, posing, trying to be tough, showing himself off in his cheap finery, for at such times he is dressed with scrupulous attention.

His soft felt hat is pushed back upon his head far enough to show his hair parted very much to one side, neatly oiled and plastered and brought down over his temple in a beautiful flat curve. He wears an inexpensive "Prince Albert" invariably unbuttoned to show the flowered design of his waistcoat. In the lapel of this coat he wears a tube-rose. His stand-up collar is very low and overlaps in front, while around this collar and often getting above it is a crocheted four-in-hand "necktie" of salmon pink silk, tied very tightly and transfixed with a scarfpin representing a palette and brushes, with four colors in variously tinted Rhinestones. He fastens this necktie to the side of his shirt so that it traverses diagonally the whole of the triangular expanse left by the vest. His trousers fit him very tightly and are of light brown cloth with broad chocolate colored stripes. The cuffs around his thick red wrists are frayed and in one of his freckled fists he carries a cane, a slender wisp of ebony with a gold head, won at the Tinners' and Gasfitters' Prize Masquerade Ball.

Thus arrayed, and attended by odors of tobacco, beer, hair oil, and German cologne, he lounges with three or four others of his stripe about the entrances of corner groceries, where a Milwaukee beer sign decorates the salient corner and where you may see displayed advertisements for cheap butter, eggs, and tea, painted in green marking ink upon wrapping paper. Here, together with his friends, he will while the time away, talking loud, swearing, spitting, scuffling, and joshing the girls that pass in twos and threes. Now and then he and his friends will go into the bar behind the store and have a "steam" or sometimes himself and a comrade will take off their coats, go into the middle of the street and with frequent cries of "all de way now" pitch curves at one another with an adamantine ball. Toward the close of the afternoon he will sometimes go with them to Golden Gate Avenue and watch the "turn-outs" coming home from the park, commenting upon the horses, and joshing the girl bicyclists. In the evening he goes to a cheap theater, and occasionally closes the day's enjoyment by becoming drunk and disorderly.

FRANK NORRIS.

RIVARDE, THE VIOLINIST.

AN AMERICAN ARTIST WHO LOOKS A SPANIARD AND TALKS LIKE AN ENGLISHMAN.

A graceful and fascinating figure is Rivarde as he stands before his audience—tall, slender, dark, his hair hanging in thick, black, wavy masses on his shoulders; his eyes—poetic, soulful, Southern eyes—scanning the orchestra with quick comprehensive glances. Slight, supple, young, the ideal image of a musician, he enchains the eyes of the gathering before he charms their ears. De Koven, who writes critiques in the World, insisted the vogue he had in New York was due to his appearance rather than a tribute to his talent—a conclusion subsequently retracted after the critic had heard Rivarde render the great Beethoven concerto, in which he developed unsuspected power and depth of feeling, Merely because the young violinist wears rather more of a chevelure than the ordinary citizen, unless he be a football player, dares indulge, it is not necessary to imagine him affected or effeminate. It seems the custom among foreign musicians to deny their heads to the barbers' shears, and the consequences are rather typical of the art than characteristic of their individuality. Rivarde is so bright, quick-witted, and so utterly unpretentious, that one forgets, in the charm of his companionship, the fact of abnormal hair or unique talent. He has lived his life among the musicians we read of, and whose pictures are ever in the papers—the high lights of the great art world, whose gleams sometimes beam on these far-distant shores. Paderewski he knows well, and Ysaye, and Joachim, and the long array of men who make history and compose music for the rest of the world.

Strange though it may seem, Rivarde is an American, though he looks the typical Spaniard of poetry and pictures. He was born in New York—his father a Spaniard and his mother an Englishwoman. From the first he inherited the swarthy olive of his complexion, the mold of his profile and the poetic fire of his genius; from the second, an English accent and a decidedly English manner.

"Yes," he said to me, "I first saw light in New York and commenced the violin at the age of seven. My people had no idea I should make music a profession; au contraire, it was to be an accomplishment. But music came to me easily, and I could play well in no time. Indeed, my talent developed so rapidly that when I was only a little over twelve and one-half years old my mother took me to Paris. I was received into the Conservatoire, and at fourteen won the medal. Ondricek, who is at least six years my senior, was there at the same time, studying with Vieuxtemps, and we shared honors. My master was Danela, and not Marsick, as has been stated."

Rivarde is not a miracle of industry, as is Paderewski. Music is too easy for him, and he plays without effort—by the grace of God, it seems; that beautiful, true tone he evokes is a natural gift. From Paris he returned to New York, abandoned the violin temporarily, and commenced to repair his neglected education. Rivarde, Sr., took the boy in hand, and for several years, until the death of his mother, instilled as much learning as possible into his gay and frolicsome brain. Then, arriving at the age of eighteen, he set off again for Europe to complete his musical studies.

"Alas!" continued Rivarde, "I did nothing but amuse myself, and enjoyed life. I never touched the violin, never opened my case, even, in all that time, and, when my father came, he was angry to find how I had wasted my time. 'Now, young man,' he said to me, 'you must henceforth look after yourself. You have lost your best years and spent my money. Do as you please after this—support yourself.' It was pretty hard on me," said the artist, laughing. "It seemed a terrible blow at the time, but I went to Paris, took up my violin again, and in two weeks all the old facility seemed to have returned. I obtained the position of concert master in one of the big theaters, and the rest seemed easy. Incidentally I practised, but not for some time did I take music seriously. Then I began to study and work—especially on Beethoven—and I surprised all my confreres by announcing a recital at which I proposed to play Beethoven's 'Concerto' and the 'Chacune of Bach.' Yes, sir; they amused themselves greatly at my expense," he laughed, "and, on the night of my recital, gathered in parties to have fun over my failure. But I didn't fail. I was a success and a few weeks after that, Villiers Stanford, the great English director and composer, was in Paris, called on me, and engaged me to play in the great Bach festival in London. Since then," he continued, smiling, "I have often played in England, at the various festivals, and under the greatest leaders."

As I said, Rivarde's genius is not a tremendous capacity for taking pains. It comes very easily, his music. He seems to desire to express the ideas, to realize to the utmost the melody and beauty of his theme.

"It is nonsense," he said to me, "for the newspapers to say I am the successor of Sarasate. We have nothing in common—except, perhaps, a Spanish appearance. He is a different type of artist entirely, is a virtuoso, who imposes on all composers his own ideas, and who renders music as it appears and appeals to him, rather than as the writer intended. He is great and fascinating, but, to my mind, the greatest artist is he who interprets most accurately the thoughts of the composer. Therein lies the supremacy of Joachim. Though the power and fire of his great genius have faded with years, his performances of the violin classics are incomparably greater and broader than those of his rivals."

"Who is the greatest of modern violinists?" I asked.

"To me, Ysaye," he replied. "He has a strong personality, a fine tone, and is a great romantic player. He has worked hard, and undoubtedly, after Joachim, leads the world. But I place Joachim first."

We talked of technic. "I cannot practise a great deal," said Rivarde. "I'm not strong enough to spend seven hours a day at work, as Paderewski does, for instance. I think, too, he injures his health and his playing by the excess of his devotion to finger-exercises. How pale, exhausted, melancholy he looks. His nervous forces are destroyed, run down."

"Brilliant execution, then, is not the goal of your endeavor?"

"No; music is what I aim to produce. I try to form a conception of my composer's meaning, and express my idea of it. There should always be an idea in a performance; it is that which distinguishes it—individualizes it."

Rivarde is now twenty-eight years of age and knows certainly how to enjoy life. He amuses himself wandering around the city; has already made many congenial friends, and been the guest of honor at several entertainments.

ETC. JR.

It is astonishing the number of royal folk who earn their living in the most democratic fashion—not even drawing the line at the circus ring and music hall. The Princess Galitzin is a bareback rider in a French circus troupe. Prince Krapotine is a cabman in Moscow; Prince Solbikoff is a porter in a St. Petersburg meat market. Among the English nobility the Earl of Roslyn has achieved considerable success on the stage. The Honorable Roger Molyneux, brother of the Earl of Sefton, adopted the stage as a profession under the name of "Reginald Martin." He was a Captain in the First Dragoons, but retired to take up theatrical life. Other English aristocrats on the stage are a nephew of the Duke of Richmond and a grandson of the fourth Marquis of Londonderry. The Viscount Hinton, accompanied by his Countess, grinds a hand-organ through the streets of London with a touching announcement tacked to the instrument to the effect that his father has cut him off without a penny.

In London the way of the transgressing cyclist is hard. Sir Claude Champion de Crespigny recently lost control of his machine going down a steep hill and was fined for furious riding. A German Baron, appropriately named Seicllit, was fined for riding on thewrong side of the street. Mr. George Curzon, Under Secretary of Foreign Affairs, nearly ran down a new member of Parliament in Palace Yard, which is reserved for the use of members, and had to explain who he was to avoid arrest.

It is estimated that the coronation of the Czar and Czarina will cost the Russian Government $10,000,000. The trade among gold and silver smiths has never been so active in Russia as at the present time. Not even in the days of Catherine II.

Highest of all in Leavening Power.—Latest U. S. Gov't Report

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

THINGS AND PEOPLE

"JIM BUDD" is a racehorse, his owner is among the army of men who had regarded the Governor as a fine fellow before election. Indeed, the christening of a promising colt after a political celebrity is as generous a tribute of admiration as it is possible for one gentleman to give another. Before November '94 "Jim Budd" proved a winner, and many a time and oft landed pots and purses to the credit of the stable. But soon after the Stockton candidate had been ushered into Sacramento the power went out of his equine namesake. He lost race after race. About the same time his owner had undergone the accustomed turning-down, and in the language of politics had "soured" on the Governor. He was also grieved over the failures of "Jim Budd" and the inclination to contrast the two performances was so strong that it was assumed at the track when he cursed either he meant both. He was particularly blue one afternoon, when Dr. Mizner met him and fell discussing the demerits of the racehorse. "Hoodooed without doubt by his name," was the physician's comment, and he asked, "Why don't you change it?" "Good idea," said the owner. "It's hard on the horse, that name. What do you suggest for a substitute?" Mizner pondered. "Suppose," he said, "you call him 'Ingrate,' and he'll appear in the handicaps and on the programs as 'Ingrate, formerly Jim Budd.'" They cracked a bottle of champagne over the idea, and, next day, the owner announced his intention to President Tom Williams, demanding the required authorization. Now, the Governor has considerable potency in the racing world, for the managers are much in dread of hostile legislation and it behooves that his favor be preserved. Still they were powerless to prevent "Jim Budd's" owner from altering the title of his racehorse, and the by-laws compelled that the steed be entered as "Ingrate, formerly Jim Budd" and nothing else. In this quandary they bethought themselves of an obsolete rule, which allowed a charge to be made for all such changes, and the required permission was granted, but it was with the proviso that "Jim Budd's" owner should pay fifty dollars for the expense involved. He insists the gratification in question is not worth fifty dollars and so Jim is still Budd on the cards.

* * *

SO THE Examiner now has an editor—at least, I presume that will be Mr. Hawley's role, though his official title is publisher. He is chief of the works, not only of the shop on Mission Street, but also of the business office, and his will sways. Too long has it been customary on Mission Street to divide and shift responsibilities. Every editor ruled supreme in his own little kingdom, and the council which met each afternoon was simply the stalking ground for the various jealousies. The man who had last seen Mr. Hearst was supposed to have a specific inspiration, and until he was superseded by some later arrival, his voice dictated the policy. If the house divided against itself must fall still holds as a rule, then the stability of the Examiner constitutes a violent exception. Though Mr. Hawley is not as young as the Call misrepresented, his years are on the sunny side of forty, and his manner is not impressionable. He is shrewd, quiet, collected, most courteous, and so unpretentious that you would never imagine he had built up a big paper property in Denver, or figured among the engineers of the great deal which consolidated the Times and the Herald of Chicago. I am not conversant with dates, but it is only a few years since he descended on Denver from Minneapolis, purchased the Times, an old fogey evening journal of limited circulation, and so handled its columns as to convert it into a vigorous opponent of its morning rivals. He sold out at a splendid profit and shifted the field of his endeavor to Chicago. Engaging there with the sons of Carter Harrison in reviving the Times, he assisted in the deal which converted two newspapers into one, and was subsequently invited by Mr. Kohlsatt, who, at Jim Scott's death, became owner of the Times-Herald, to act as his managing editor. This honor he declined, however.

* * *

Various are the rumors about Mr. Hawley's connection with the Examiner; it is declared he has an option on the journal from Mr. Hearst and may become its owner should it seem to him an advantageous purchase. These stories are as often denied however. The new publisher ascribes his engagement to the interest which the California Napoleon's journalistic career had excited in him. Of course Mr. Hawley is removed from the necessities of striving for a living, having already made a fortune. As for the Examiner the intimates of Mr. Hearst declare he does not love the Monarch less because he gives more time to the Journal, that his earliest venture is still near to his heart, and that nothing but death or bankruptcy could part them. This is good theory of course, but young Mr. Hearst has a peculiar individuality and even his friends cannot always interpret his desires. One admirable trait characterizes him—liberality to his men. As an employer he is generous, even prodigal, most appreciative and considerate. No one in journalism responds so heartily to good work, though it must be admitted that he is quicker to recognize a smart "fake" than a good story. Still, Mr. Hearst is a successful journalist, and what is newspaper work but clever faking?

* * *

WHEN THE OPERATIONS of the Debris Commission sent John B. Hobson adrift off the Iowa Divide, he found himself a disappointment and his life a failure. For years had he tried after gold, and though Fortune smiled twice on his efforts, her averted face seemed to sentence him to poverty, with but slender hope of recuperation. This was less than half a decade back. Last year this victim of the blind goddess took out $400,000 worth of gold from the great Placer diggings at the headquarters of the Fraser River, in British Columbia. Such is the irony of fate. These stories of gold mining which I give space to here, to my mind represent the romance of this environment. What could be more interesting than the acquirement of a great fortune by a man just escaped from the grip of want? At once the world spreads out her treasures for him, Society flings her doors wide open before him, life becomes full of joy and color and attraction, and he a factor in all its glories. Some one told this Hobson of the great gold deposits awaiting the explorer in the remote fastnesses of the Fraser, and thither he traveled, and found a great tract of auriferous gravel, some thirty miles in length, on the borders of a chain of lakes. A peerless ground for hydraulic mining truly, and in British Columbia there are none of those regulations which render this form of development illegal in California. But he had to travel back to Vancouver, and there state his intentions to the Gold Commissioner, a functionary in that country whose powers are supreme in the direction of mining.

* * *

Within his jurisdiction is the regulation of all disputed claims, the determination of lines, the settlement of differences between employers and laborers. He is invested, also, with criminal powers which make him a most powerful personage. But his sway is most discreet, and so efficacious that mining is aided immeasurably. This Gold Commissioner accompanied Hobson to his great gravel mine, traveling with a wagon train of supplies and some score of strong-armed young laborers. They found it possible to commence washing on an immense scale, for the water power available was of terrific volume, and the splendid result of twelve months of washing but index the possibilities of the second year's operations. Hobson has arranged for the purchase of more apparatus and proposes now to attack his deposit with stronger streams.

* * *

Along the Pacific watershed, I learn that hydraulic mining is being conducted with considerable profit. A French company, which, some time ago, took up gravel lands along the Salmon River, operated at a gain of $80,000 last season. Private individuals are washing along the Klamath, and in most instances, are obtaining generous returns. So it seems gold is being taken out in rich quantities in spite of hard times.

* * *

INCREASING YEARS add not to the amenity of Richard Mansfield's disposition. He is hard to deal with, but sadder to act with. No actor on the boards cherishes so profound an egotism, nor a finer sense of the center of the stage. He must be in full view of his audience or he is unhappy, and wo betide the luckless wight who dares interfere with his perspective. For his support Mansfield has recognition, tempered with intervals of forgetfulness, in which the acquaintance of a day before is literally given the "glassy eye" in the form of a sustained, lymphatic stare with no suggestion of remembrance in it. If the truth really be told the eminent actor lacks those qualities of courtesy and gentility which adorn genius as much as they elevate mediocrity. He permits no one around the theater to speak to him, had the Baldwin doorkeeper soundly berated for daring to hand him a letter; he has a sarcastic manner when announcing his orders, and is full of all such affectations as seem to him impressive or suggestive of his importance. Naturally, his unpopularity is unbounded. The failure of Mansfield's season here is attributed solely to his repertoire. "Rodion," the only new piece he brought to us, is a dismal production, valuable because he has the solitary role which demanded action. "Arms and the Man," George Bernard Shaw's clever play he refused to give, because, I believe, the part calls rather for fine legitimate acting than elaborate mincing and make-up. Though he presented it in Chicago, Mansfield did not consider us worth appealing to, and refused the request of the management that he put on the play. However, the community has replied to his contempt by abstaining from patronizing his performances. Indeed, his season at the Baldwin has been a sorry one for the theater, and it is positive he can obtain no re-engagements until he adds to his depleted repertoire.

* * *

The question of picture prices has been successfully grappled by the Art Association directors. At the several exhibitions it is customary for the artists to put on their canvases preposterous prices—figures which would not be unreasonable for paintings of veritable reputation and which they have no expectation of obtaining. For instance, Ochre Brown asks $250 for a bit of landscape which he painted in a morning, and that he would gladly give you for $25 in his studio; or take the instance of Miss Ruby White, who, following the custom, sets $100 opposite her little sketch, which a bit of eulogy would obtain as the reward of appreciation or a $5 offer would purchase. This year, however, each artist has been asked to set the price on his work which he really believes he should have—the rates they would accept in their studios. With this they have complied, and if you fancy a canvas at the exhibition, Secretary Martin is able to quote a rate that may tempt you into a purchase.

* * *

The lesson of the passing of Jimmy Page was admirably painted in an Examiner article, which detailed the career of that ill-fated rounder from its inception to its sad end. Strange, the transition from honor and prominence to the felon's cell. Yet, Page may blame no one for his downfall but himself. He is the author of his own undoing—accomplished his own fall. At one time was he a creditable and honorable citizen; his successes were the achievements of popularity and a pleasant manner—the delusive handshake and the transient smile. The story in question was written by Tom Sullivan, and was a capital piece of journalistic work. Apropos of Page, Sullivan went to interview him after sentence had been passed, and addressed the prisoner ere he was conducted from court.

"I don't know you, sir," returned the ex-District Attorney, sharply.

"On which side are the congratulations, Mr. Page?" retorted the newspaperman.

* * *

AN INTERESTING contest is outlined in the Democracy between W. W. Foote, Stephen White, and E. B. Pond, all of whom have designs on the role of delegate-at-large to the National Democratic Convention. Superintendent Daggett has flung his beaver into the ring at the mention of Mr. Foote's name, and declares him ineligible and other opprobrious terms. I don't imagine this declaration of hostilities is liable to foment a new contest in the organization, but it will promote a few interesting sparring contests, in which the ex-Railway Commissioner will manage to say cutting things about the Superintendent of the Mint. In the meantime, Democratic politics are humming, for Congressman Maguire is soon to be home, and the Gallaghers and the Tracys and the Donovans are preparing to welcome him. Not, indeed, that the thanksgiving will be confined to those enthusiastic protegés of the unsuspecting Congressman, for there are other office-holders who cherish hopes on whom it will devolve to parade with the Gallaghers, Tracys, and Donovans on the great occasion of his return.

THE WITNESS.

The British Trade Journal some time ago stated that the Japanese Consul, at Tacoma, Washington, had officially announced that he had been commissioned by his Government to select a port on the Pacific Coast best suited for the arrival of Japanese steamers; it being stated at the time that the Japanese Government intended to pay substantial subsidies to a steamship company which would make regular voyages between Japan and the Pacific Coast. Mr. Kurino, the Japanese Minister to the United States, gives a pointed denial to this rumor.

Clement Shorter, editor of the Sketch and other London publications, is really the first to have recognized the promise of Stephen Crane's writing. Long before the Red Badge had captured an audience, he published several short stories by its now celebrated author. He was introduced to it by the Bacheller syndicate.

Great Book Sale at Dodge's New Store, 112 Post St.

THE YELLOW STORE
NEXT WHITE HOUSE

A LITERARY RECEPTION.

CONVERSATIONAL COMMENTS ON SOME NEW PEOPLE BY THEIR CREATORS.

"Come," said I to the General Reader, "here are some people who desire your acquaintance. They want you to like them."

"My tastes are capricious you know," answered the General, "but trot 'em out. Who's the first?"

"Here is Anthony Hope, to be sure," said I, as the gentleman of that name entered, "and the General Reader needs no introduction to him, of course."

Mr. Hope and the General shook hands. "I have been pleased to know Mr. Hope a long time," said the General, "and am glad to see you again in The Comedies of Courtship. But where are your people, the dramatis personæ of the comedies?"

"My people do not matter much," answered Mr. Hope. "They are just the ordinary people of the world like you and me, so I did not think it necessary that they should be in evidence here to-day."

"Their talk is delightful talk," said I.

"Thanks," he answered, "but it's the situation I'm after. My people only develop the situation."

"Now if it were the other way about," said I.

"How do you mean," enquired Anthony.

"If the situation developed the people."

"Ah," he answered, immediately, "then the people would be the important thing."

"Then we should have to have characters."

"I hope you will like the people and the situations in the Comedies," said I to the General. "They are equally delightful, especially in The Philosopher in The Apple Orchard. The people are well-bred, nicely poised and they bring about a state of things not too complicated, you know, but just intricate enough to be piquant. It is so in every one of the stories."

There was a great tramping and swearing outside, mingled with the clattering of a huge cavalry saber, and the Brigadier Gerard strode into the room, ushered by Mr. Conan Doyle.

"Tonerre de Bon Dieu," exclaimed the Brigadier, and there was no mistaking the ring and vitality of the oath. The fellow was alive to his finger tips. He went directly the hand, almost shouting "Touchez, la camarade."

"He's a fine fellow," said I to the General. "I like him at once." (For, of course, the Brigadier does not understand English. His exploit of How the King held the Brigadier proves that. "We congratulate you Mr. Doyle," said I, turning to the author of the Brigadier's being. "Your latest offspring promises to be a good brother to Mr. Sherlock Holmes."

"I hope so," answered Mr. Doyle. "Since Sherlock's death I've been a bit alone in the world. The General, here, I think, has missed him."

"Yes," answered the General Reader, "though he can never quite replace Sherlock in my affections, I think I may say that I shall like Gerard."

"Tell the Brigadier," said I to Mr. Doyle, "that the General and I—who am the Weary Critic—both like him very much. There is a heartiness about him, a frankness, a humanity, I may say, that appeals to us at once. We like him for his splendid swagger, his magnificent egotism, as well as for the very interesting exploits he tells us about."

Mr. Doyle translated, and the Brigadier drew himself up to the salute, and gave a self-satisfied twist to his enormous mustache.

"Tell us more about him," said I to Mr. Doyle, after Gerard had passed to a little distance.

"Well," answered Mr. Doyle, reflectively, "he's not a fellow of very great depth, but, of course, I did not intend that. You liked Sherlock for what he thought. This chap's a little more on the surface; if you like him at all, it's for what he does, and for the way he tells it. I wanted Gerard to be full of life and energy and vigor—to be strong in a word, a fellow that you felt you could know. Don't you understand? Do you think I have succeeded?"

"In my poor opinion," I replied, "admirably; but I should say that his greatest charm is in his manner of speech. It is the way he tells of his exploits that pleases more than the exploits themselves. I would call your attention, General Reader, to one admirable trait. Notice how the Brigadier's character reveals itself in his talk. Mr. Doyle tells us never a word of him, and yet by listening to the Brigadier relate one of his exploits, we know him through and through. Yes, on the whole, General, I recommend him to your acquaintance. May we hear of him again, Mr. Doyle."

"Who's next?" enquired the General Reader.

The next one to be introduced was Marie Corelli. She came in snugly enough, dressed out in some of Ouida's old clothes, and wearing many of Ouida's paste diamonds and pinchbeck jewelry, all sham and delusive glitter. For the moment the General was dazzled and exclaimed:

"Ah! here is something fine. Who are the members of her family this time?"

"The name of my new family is the Mighty Atom," answered Marie, and she brought them in.

How different from the Brigadier Gerard! The Brigadier might have had his faults—was, in fact, full of blemishes, but he, at least, was alive. He was strong, vigorous, and independent of Mr. Doyle.

But Miss Corelli's characters of the Mighty Atom were of a different order entirely. One whom Marie said was the hero of the story was a shade, a ghost; we could barely make him out. He had scarcely strength enough to stand alone, and his author continually had to boost him up. Talk he could not; he had not life enough for that. Miss Corelli spoke for him, thought for him, acted for him; when he opened his mouth it was she that spoke. His ideas were hers; his movements only those that she chose to have him make.

"Lionel," she said, "is a very wonderful child: he is only eleven, but he is a profound thinker. He reasons like Hegel."

Mr. Doyle, who had remained with us, spoke up at this.

"It's quite possible, Miss Corelli. Of course, being his literary parent you have a right to say what characteristics he shall have. But the boy is not flesh and blood, he is not real, he does not live. He does not, as one might say, convince us."

"He does not convince me," said I. "How about you, General Reader?"

But the General paid no attention to the boy, being attracted by the cheap glitter of Marie's pinchbeck jewelry. Marie was pleased with this of course. It seemed to be what she was striving after.

"Here are four others of my new family," she said, and brought them in to us.

"This is John Valliscourt, this is Jessamine, this is Reuben Dale, and this is Professor Cadman-Gore."

"Well, I declare" exclaimed Conan Doyle, as he saw them. Lionel had been shadowy, colorless, but the four others were mere puppets, stuffed figures, misshapen mannikins that moved and "worked" only when Marie pulled their strings or wound them up. John Valliscourt was labeled "Cruel Father," Jessamine "Little Girl That's Dies," Reuben Dale "Rough-Diamond," and Cadman-Gore "Crabbed Professor."

"Well, they're four puppets," observed Mr. Doyle, "and I suppose—as in the case of Lionel—you are at liberty to label them anything you choose."

"They are not puppets," cried Marie Corelli, indignantly. "They are characters. Reuben Dale was made from life, from a man named James Norman, who 'sat' for the portrait."

"That may be true," said I. "He is not as real for all that as this old swearing, ranting, swash-buckling Gerard, a child of Mr. Doyle's imagination. It isn't the fact that he has really lived that will make Reuben Dale real. It's the way you draw him. He's all right in real life. In the Mighty Atom he's a puppet."

"Well, I don't care," returned Miss Corelli flippantly, "I've caught the General Reader's eye at any rate, that's the main thing, isn't it?"

"Surely," said Mr. Doyle to the General, "surely you are not going to be imposed upon by these puppets and lay figures?"

"Don't do it," said I, "go and find real people somewhere."

But the General Reader still gazed steadily at Marie Corelli's tawdry glittering ornaments and her smart cheap dress, copied from Ouida.

"I feel that its all sham," he answered, without withdrawing his eyes, "but it dazzles me for the moment. I like it. I told you I was capricious in my tastes."

RAYMOND ROTH.

Another Lark is hatched and sings its quaint and curious carol for the month of May. Surely no more fascinating little pamphlet ever was published. The cartoon is just as good as ever being last months cartoon seen from the back, the letters of the jingle reversed. Mr. Burgess's poem "A Daughter of the North," is a dashing Norse ballad with a splendid galloping movement that carries you along with it whether you will or no. It is full of delicate suggestion and of the free unrestrained spirit of the true ballad. The Lark's Salon: Catalogue Illustrié: is very funny, though there is danger that the casual reader will miss its real meaning. The prose story of the Romance Association is one of the best things of its kind we have yet seen in the Lark—which is saying a good deal. It is in this story that we are finally introduced to Vivette.

The Banquet Hall at the Maison Riche is the largest and best equipped in San Francisco.

Ladies when down town shopping should not fail to get luncheon at the Maison Riche.

THEORY AND REALITY.

AN OLD AUTHOR AND A NEW WRITER CONSIDER THE SAME PROBLEM.

There have recently appeared two books, both dealing with the same very delicate sex problem, a problem so delicate in fact that it is almost impossible to consider the books critically. One of these books is by Mr. W. D. Howells and is called A Parting and a Meeting. The other is by Mrs. J. R. Jarboe of this city and is called Robert Atterbury. Each book has to do with the "ultimate physical relation of man and woman." A dangerous subject truly.

Mr. Howells touches it lightly, delicately, handling it with the greatest subtlety and finesse. Mrs. Jarboe rushes in where Mr. Howells fears to tread, grapples the subject by the throat, sledge-hammers at it, tears the veil from it boldly, uncompromisingly.

Mr. Howells tells a story; Mrs. Jarboe develops a theory. The Parting and Meeting is a little tale of how a certain young man of some seventy years ago attempted to prevail upon his sweetheart to join the Shakers with him and to live out the remainder of their lives keeping the relations of brother and sister. In a scene of exquisite delicacy and sympathetic insight, the girl refuses. The man joins the Shakers and the girl marries elsewhere. Sixty years afterward they meet, and though Roger is so old as to be almost in his dotage, he recovers intelligence enough to say, "I'm not so sure but I'd have done about as well to have gone with you, Chloe." That is all; this is the whole story, a touch, a suggestion, a hint.

According to Mrs. Jarboe's theory "there is no love which can justify marriage as it is at present understood. There is no law, no blessing of priest or church, which can render it anything but legalized prostitution. It is a crime against nature, against the race, against God." The author proposes as a remedy the Malthusian theory of restraint, a theory, beautiful upon paper but which practise and good political economists have long since demonstrated beyond question to be as delusive and impossible as the Ptolemaic system of astronomy. That the increase of the family after marriage should be restrained and limited is a fine and admirable ideal, but the idealists will close their eyes to the fact that men and women are after all only human. Even this word "human" is misleading. Is it not even truer that so-called humanity still is, and for countless generations will be, three-quarters animal, living and dying, eating and sleeping, mating and reproducing even as the animals; passing the half of each day's life in the performance of purely animal functions? This is lamentable, no doubt, but the grandest theory ever conceived by the mind of the most prodigious thinker is powerless to better the condition of the race, in this respect, as far as immediate results are concerned. There is no prospect for betterment except in the gradual evolution of the type through infinitely vast periods of time.

Mrs. Jarboe, however, does not apply her theory to her hero and heroine—Atterbury and Sara—even after all its elaborate development throughout the first part of the story. In their case the two young people made a virtue of necessity, since one was a consumptive and the other under the shadow of hereditary insanity.

In the case of two healthy, natural young people in real life, or in a good realistic novel, Mrs. Jarboe's fine-spun web of logic would have been rent at the first breath. The greater author of the Parting and Meeting knew his real life better. Chloe even refused to consider a union of her life with that of her lover's, conceived upon any such morbid, Utopian principles, and even Roger acknowledges its futility in admitting that, after all, he would have done wiser to have gone back with Chloe.

Mrs. Jarboe presents her subject unskilfully. However admirable her theory—as theory—may be, it is not clearly and convincingly expressed in the pages of Robert Atterbury. No matter what its purpose or how great a lesson it purposes to teach, the novel should be a novel; first and foremost, it should tell a real story, of real people and of real places.

In Mr. Howells's story, even the old chaise horse becomes a character, "making snatches at the foliage and from time to time champing thoughtfully on his bit as if he fancied he might have caught a leaf in his mouth," and Chloe and Roger are flesh and blood characters from first to last. It is what they do and what they say that interest the reader. In Robert Atterbury, however, the people are little more than names and stand for nothing but the various mouthpieces for the author's theory. Chloe and Roger live and act by themselves, while Mrs. Jarboe shifts about the characters like a showman pulling the strings of his puppets. We forget Howells at once in the fortunes of his dramatis personæ. We cannot lose sight of the author of Robert Atterbury for a single instant.

F. N.

THE MAY MAGAZINES.

The May Century is certainly a fine number. There is a discriminating article on Diaz, the great artist, followed by a beautifully illustrated description of the coronation of Alexander III., apropos, of course, of the coronation of Nicholas III., which is to take place in Moscow shortly. This article is by Mary Grace Thornton and is certainly readable. James Bryce writes the first of a series of papers entitled "Impressions of South Africa." The installment of Napoleonic history is as interesting as usual. Among the stories is "The Harshaw Bride," by Mary Hallock Foote, with pictures by the author, pictures that are among the best in the number, being full of intelligence and charm. "In Bohemia with Du Maurier," illustrated by that artist pencil, is another feature. There is also a clever little story, "Cinderella Up to Date," by Elizabeth Pullen. There is symposium on the photographing of the unseen, in which quite a number of eminent scientists take part. Papers and essays on other interesting topics are also included, and one cannot but admit this to be quite the best of the May numbers.

One of the features of Harper's Magazine for May is an article on Mark Twain by his long-time friend, Reverend Joseph H. Twichell. The paper abounds in anecdotes, and is embellished with a frontispiece portrait of J. M. Clemens. "England and America in 1863" is the title of another article of great interest, illustrating, by means of correspondence between William E. Gladstone and Cyrus Field, the attitude of England during our Civil War. Jacques de Morgan, the Egyptologist, describes his important discoveries in a paper called "The Dashur Explorations." The paper is richly illustrated. The other noteworthy contributions comprise "the Penalty of Humor," by Brander Matthews; the concluding chapters of Mr. Black's "Briseis"; "Three Old Sisters and the Old Beau," by Mary E. Wilkins; and a fascinating fin de siècle ghost story called "The Bringing of the Rose," by Harriet Lewis Bradley.

Next month's Atlantic begins a series of letters from Dante Gabriel Rossetti to William Allingham, edited by George Burbeck Hill. Kendrick Charles Babcock discusses "The Scandanavian Contingent." The third one of his papers on the foreign element in American life. An out-of-door flavor is given to this issue by Mrs. Olive Thorne Miller's carefully prepared article on "Whimsical Ways in Birdland." Lafcadio Hearn is represented by a discriminating Japanese sketch "A Trip to Kyoto," and Henry James by further installment of "The Old Things."

BOOKS RECEIVED.

"The Exploits of Brigadier Gerard" by A. Conan Doyle. D. Appleton & Co., publishers. For sale, Wm. Doxey.

"The Mighty Atom" by Marie Corelli. J. B. Lippincott & Co., publishers. For sale, J. A. Hoffman.

"Comedies of Courtship" by Anthony Hope. Chas. Scribner's Sons, publishers.

Lady Sholto Douglas has been playing at the Olympic in Chicago, and the Times-Herald says:

Lady Sholto Douglas closes her two weeks' stay in Chicago to-night, and has fairly earned the reputation of drawing more money into the house than any other single performer during the season, a fact which her engagement emphasizes.

QUEEN LILY SOAP

BEST ON EARTH
FOR LAUNDRY USE

Patronize Home Industry

THE THEATERS.

IMPROBABILITIES OF BARON CHEVRIAL—PROFESSOR BRISTOL'S HORSES.

Is it, after all, possible for the French mind to conceive of some other reason for a wife leaving her husband besides "another man," or his money? Or is the adapter responsible for most of Marceles farewell words in the third act of "A Parisian Romance"? She tells us that she elopes with Juliani in order to make money by her voice; that she will "return and change this hovel into a palace"; that she is also flying from Baron Chevrial and "temptation," though, on my life, the woman would be low and desperate indeed who could be tempted to transgress by such a horror, however incrusted he was with gold and clothed in power. To have made her flight natural, or even possible, she ought to have been indifferent to her husband and decidedly smitten with Juliani, while the "private door" to the street, so frequently and pointedly referred to, positively demands an intrigue of some sort, that is, on the stage; in real life it would probably be frequented by the butcher and baker and candlestick maker.

It is in this act that Beatrice Cameron's deficiencies are particularly noticeable. Though nothing could be more revolting than the gluttonous avidity with which the old roué presses his lips to her hand, she fails completely to give any reality to her disgust or to her fear of what her desire for the luxuries of life may lead her to do. However, as I have said before, it is very difficult to imagine a woman in danger when her tempter is such an exceeding unpleasant and decrepit old creature as Mansfield's Chevrial. His voice, his walk, the make-up of his face are all fearful and wonderful; he is the perfect picture of an aged Heliogabalus—an old debauchee with his life written on his body. I know of few more depressing scenes than that of the Baron's petit souper; it is strange how often it floats before one's eyes, and how often the old man's satirical, "Yet, I am loved," knocks at one's ears. Underneath the noise and chatter of the ballet girls—do ballet girls always go with a hop, skip, and a jump, I wonder?—and the seeming gaiety of it all, Mansfield makes us feel the grim specter approaching, so that his dreadful toast to the only deity he had ever acknowledged or kneeled to, is received in a tense silence.

As for the rest, the evening party at the De Targys' was quite a success—for a stage party—Miss Bennett looking very stunning and vigorous—and why isn't she given a better part?—and Miss Eustace, almost beautiful. Of course she is somewhat on the Venus Anno Domini order, still, she is divinely tall, with a throat beautiful enough for a goddess, and other good points too numerous to mention. She has also taste in dress, though it is not so noticeable in this play as in Beau Brummel. The support was very fair, Harkins making an excellent family physician, Florence Ethel a very pretty "Rosa Guerin," while Beatrice Cameron was, as always, careful, conscientious, "nice," and the mistress of a charmingly supple, well-poised courtesy. I do wish, however, that she would comb out those unbeautiful curls of hers, for—as far as it is possible to do so—they destroy the refinement of her delicate little face.

From Mansfield to Professor Bristol's trained horses is a far cry, but after all there is a certain relation between them, as they are without doubt the two best shows in town. True, the horses are not half so well groomed as Miss Rush, or so good-looking, and the little donkey, "Denver," "the funniest mule on earth," is not in it with Roland Reed, but nevertheless the combination at the Auditorium is infinitely more amusing and interesting than "The Politician," though it's very good fun, too. The performance begins a little late and ends a little early, but there is not a single dull moment from the time little Denver makes his bow in the beginning to the military drill at the end. The unique point about the affair is that the animals do everything that the advertisement announces, and do it well, too. The trapeze pony, Tony, actually jumps from a moving swing to a table and back again; Comanche imitates a rocking-horse; the saucy Denver swings standing and sitting and tossing his head aloft like the wrecked barge in the poem which enlivens the program. In fact, he seems to have been the author's inspiration, so accurate a description is it of his motions. With a few slight changes it reads—

> He heaved and sot and sot and heaved,
> And high his head he flung;
> And every time he heaved and sot
> A higher swing he swung.

He is a funny little creature, that mule, and worth his weight in—well, silver to his owner.

You must not imagine, however, that Denver is the only star, for the horses are one and all wonderfully intelligent and carefully trained, four of them being quite Denver's equal in every respect, save sauciness. The show is doubtless interesting to any one, but if you have ever loved and petted one of their kind, these gentle, intelligent brutes will give you "a pure morning joy."

PEG WOFFINGTON.

MUSIC.

RIVARDE AND LACHAUME.

Surely one at least of the violin classics has become sufficiently familiar to San Francisco, since every visiting artist of the present season has played it. This, the Mendelssohn concerto, is the work with which Rivarde chose to open fire. While as a virtuoso Rivarde is not to be compared with Ondricek, yet his interpretation of the concerto is scarcely inferior to that of the great Bohemian. In brief, the work has not been played with any particular warmth or breadth since the memorable performance of Ysaye. Still, the slow movement was played with the greatest delicacy and finish, and the staccato passages in the finale (the allegro vivace) were most effectively rendered. Rivarde has a fine, though by no means large tone and an adequate technic. He is musical, too, far more musical than Marsick, although he naturally has not the experience of the latter. On Monday evening he was probably best in a Spanish Dance of Sarasate's and in the well-known "Svendsen Romance." The Spanish Dance, while not invested with the fire of a Sarasate, was nevertheless given with a dreamy peculiar charm, eminently in keeping with the character of the composition. The "Airs Russes" of Wieniawski were not so well-played, but the accompaniment was doubtless party responsible for this. It is a great pleasure to listen to Rivarde, for he is truly an excellent artist. Speaking of him as "the legitimate successor of Sarasate" is merely a foolish newspaper comparison, since in style he is quite unlike the older master. Rivarde is probably next to Sarasate, the greatest Spanish violinist before the public.

Apparently much was expected of Mr. William Keith, barytone. Doubtless Mr. Keith has a fine voice, but he is wanting in musical intelligence. The sentimentality with which he invests his work is at times distinctly disagreeable. This was particularly noticeable in Massanet's "Vision Fugitive," a fine composition of decidedly Wagnerian tendency. Mr. Keith was rather better in the "Sancta Maria" (Faure).

Best of the trio of visitors, however, is M. Aime Lachaume, the pianist. This fine artist has improved wonderfully since his appearance here with Ysaye. Still he was scarcely noticed at Monday's concert, probably because his name is in small print on the posters and programs. How he must have suffered because of the orchestra! which body by no means fulfiled the expectations awakened by the performance of the "Oberon" overture and the advertising. The overture while not given in a finished manner, was nevertheless generally well done.

But in the opening bars of the Weber Concertstück, it was evident that there was a marked difference of pitch between piano and orchestra. Certainly the conductor should have stopped immediately. Why torture the listeners with such violent discord for eight or ten minutes? But Mr. Stewart did the next best thing—he stopped after a while and announced that the piano had been changed since the rehearsal. M. Lachaume filled in with an admirable performance of a Chopin Ballade. It was a most unfortunate affair, but Mr. Stewart, as conductor, has only himself to blame. Moreover, the wood and brass were badly out of tune throughout the evening. None of the accompaniments were at all well played. The orchestral numbers were more satisfactory. Mr. Stewart is not at home with the orchestra. This was very evident in the accompaniments, for he was uncertain with the violin numbers and floundered not a little in the ill-fated piano solo.

Unless there is a decided change for the better in matters orchestral, visiting artists will come to have a justly poor opinion of musical San Francisco.

P. C. A.

DRAMATIC NOTES.

Primrose & West's minstrels have the stage at the California on Monday, May 4th. They have a very good show this trip and some exceedingly clever people.

Another week of Professor Bristol's trained horses at the Auditorium. It is evident the equines have caught on. The show is certainly worth seeing. Matinees on the afternoons of Tuesday, Thursday, Saturday, and Sunday.

Messrs. Friedlander, Gottlob & Co. announce that the entire tour of Duse has been temporarily canceled, owing to the great actress's illness. She gave her farewell performance in New York City last night, and sails for Italy next week.

The change of bill at the Orpheum next week will include Charlotte Parry, known as the American Yvette Guilbert; John W. Ransone, the New York comedian; Carr and Jordan who have some new farce comedy sketches; the Aerialists Morton and Mack, and many others.

The military drama "Lady Lil" is now on the boards at the Grand Opera House. It is a romantic dashing play, full of movement and episode, and is drawing crowded houses. The play is full of good situations in which the company do excellent work. Next week Mr. Edmund Colliers in Virginius.

Eddie Foy in "The Strange Adventures of Miss Brown," opens Monday night at the Baldwin. The play must be entertaining as it had a run of 150 consecutive nights at the Standard Theater and a similar success in Boston. It has reached its 250th presentation in London. The original cast comes to us.

The Morrison Company in "Faust" is the attraction at the Columbia this coming week. There are some admirable scenic effects in the presentation, especially in the Brocken scene where there is much lightning and thunder. The well-known actor, William D. Roberts plays "Mephisto," Miss Olive Martin plays "Marguerite," Miss Annie Lewis "Sycorax," and Mrs. E. J. Vandenhoff plays "Zendoe."

Arrangements have been perfected for a special production by the students of the Berkeley University on Saturday evening, May 2d, at the Columbia Theater, of Congreve's comedy, "Love for Love," which was revised for the participants by Professor L. D. Syle, and the prologue and epilogue by Mr. Isaac Flagg. The performance given at Shattuck Hall last week was thoroughly successful.

Roland Reed's "Politician" is full of life and go, and is playing to good houses at the California. The play is strong in humorous situations, and the dialogue crisp and sparkling. As General Joshua Limber, Mr. Reed had an excellent chance to show himself at his best. Miss Isadore Rush took the part of Cleopatra Sturgess, the up-to-date young woman, with plenty of dash, and brought out all the humorous possibilities of the role. Her make-up was excellent and within the lines of good comedy.

"The Bells of Corneville" will be sung at the Tivoli Opera House, with a superb cast, picturesque scenery, beautiful costumes, and appropriate accessories. The cast will include Ferris Hartman as the scheming miser Gaspard, Fred Kavannagh as the merry notary, Kate Marchi as the good-for-nothing Serpolette, and Carrie Roma as the lost Marchioness Germaine. After this will be sung, for the first time in this city, Dellingar's romantic opera, "Lorraine." The cast will include a new baritone of good voice and experience, Mr. W. H. Tooker. Preparations are being made for an operatic revival of the favorite dramatic work, "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

Mary Hampton is the latest victim of a mania peculiar to successful players, and T. D. Frawley is learning that the management of two leading ladies in one company is fraught with trouble. Frawley engaged Miss Hampton for his Columbia Theater (San Francisco) stock company, informing her at the same time that there would be another leading lady. Miss Hampton made no objections until Maxine Elliott was engaged, and then she burned the telegraph wires with dispatches to Frawley, announcing that she must have the choice of parts. Manager Frawley promptly responded that he reserved the right to cast plays as he pleased, and Miss Hampton's contract was canceled yesterday. Amy Busby may succeed to the vacant place.

The Maison Riche serves an elegant dinner at popular prices.

Reduce your obesity by taking Brooks's Phytolacca. Pleasant to take. Makes walking a pleasure. No diet necessary. Trial size 50 cents. Try it. Get it at 119 Powell Street. Mailed free on receipt of price.

Kelly's Corn Cure never fails. 25 cents 102 Eddy Street.

FINEST ON THE MARKET

BEWARE OF IMITATIONS

EEL RIVER CREAMERY

SEE THAT THIS STAMP IS ON EACH END OF SQUARE

A FINE GRAIN DELICIOUS FLAVORED BUTTER

If you appreciate a DELICACY Ask your Dealer for the BRAND

PACIFIC KENNEL CLUB'S

FIFTH ANNUAL Bench Show

MECHANICS' PAVILION

May 6th, 7th, 8th and 9th, 1896

Admission, 50 cents
Children, 25 cents

BALDWIN THEATRE (AL HAYMAN AND CO. INCORP'D PROPS.)

ALL NEXT WEEK

The Comedian EDDIE FOY

THE STRANGE ADVENTURES OF MISS BROWN

NOTHING BUT LAUGHTER

CALIFORNIA THEATRE (AL HAYMAN & CO. INCORP'D PROPS)

Two Weeks—Beginning Monday, May 4th

Primrose and West's Big Minstrels

40 Whites—30 Blacks—70 in all 3 Military Bands

Columbia Theatre.

Commencing Monday, May 4th
Matinee Saturday

Morrison's famous scenic and dramatic production of . . FAUST with its wonderful scenic, electric and calcium effects.

The marvelous "Brocken" scene with genuine flashes of lightning and the magic rain of fire. Produced here in its entirety. Reserved seats, 25, 50, 75c.

ORPHEUM

O'Farrell Street, between Stockton and Powell

Week of Monday, May 4th

An Entire and Remarkable New Company

20 Celebrated Artists—20

JOHN W. RANSONE, the ruler of New York, the World's greatest topical comedian.
CHARLOTTE PARRY, the American Yvette Guilbert, in imitations of the World's greatest celebrities.
CARR & JORDAN, the brilliant farce comedy sketchists.
3 THE NIGHTONS 3, sensational European acrialists.
MORTON & MACK, Irish pipers, singers and dancers.
THE MIMIC FOUR, burlesque comedians and singers.
And a Host of Famous Artists.

TIVOLI OPERA HOUSE

MRS. ERNESTINE KRELING, Proprietor and Manager

Last times of the brilliant spectacular extravaganza
BLUE BEARD

Every evening next week Careful production of Planquette's romantic comic opera
CHIMES · OF · NORMANDY

In preparation, Lorraine—Dellinger's lovely opera
Uncle Tom's Cabin—In operatic setting

POPULAR PRICES - 25 and 50 Cents

MOROSCO'S GRAND OPERA HOUSE

Handsomest Family Theatre in the World

WALTER MOROSCO, - Sole Lessee and Manager

Last Performances of Lady Lil

MONDAY, MAY 4th Mr Edmund Collier, in ..VIRGINIUS..

FLORAL FESTIVAL

—AT—

HEALDSBURG

ON

Wednesday, Thursday and Friday
May 6th, 7th and 8th

Tickets will be sold by the SAN FRANCISCO AND NORTH PACIFIC RAILWAY from all points to Healdsburg and return, from Tuesday, May 5th, to Friday, May 8th, 1 96, inclusive, at the rate of—

ONE FARE AND A THIRD FOR ROUND TRIP

Return limit, May 9, 1896. On Thursday, May 7th, trains will leave San Francisco at 7:30 A.M., return will leave Healdsburg at 7 P. M.

SPLASHES.

ARCHBISHOP RIORDAN officiated at the marriage ceremony which made Miss Belle Cohn Mrs. Ernest Brandt. The happy pair were to have been made one at St. Mary's Cathedral, but the religious convictions of the groom are not Romish, and in consequence the De Young drawing-room was made the altar of the occasion. It was certainly a pretty wedding; the decorations, composed of small yellow roses, were charmingly arranged, and the general effect was exceedingly pretty. The bride looked very dainty and graceful in her wedding gown. She is a bright, accomplished young lady, who has had a most excellent education in Paris, where, I believe, she met her husband. He is a mining engineer of many acquirements, a son of Doctor Brandt, the fashionable physician of Nice, and is notable for his linguistic acquirements, for he speaks seven languages with facility. He is interested in the San Andreas exploration corporation, in which Prince Poniatowski and William H. Crocker are engaged, and is now developing a number of mining schemes for European corporations. George Hazelton was best man, and Miss Ida Callaghan stood up with the bride. It was altogether a delightful and very happy marriage, and after the ceremony the company adjourned to the art gallery, where tables were set for the dejeuner. The room was beautifully decorated, the frames of the pictures and the tables being profusely adorned with orange blossoms. Mr. and Mrs. Brandt will reside for the time being at San Andreas, and subsequently are to go to Paris.

* * *

The latest international engagement to be announced is that of Miss Josephine Delmas and Mr. Lionel Fitzgerald Kenny, a nephew of the Earl of Westmeath. This is veritably an achievement of Cupid, for Mr. Kenny and Miss Delmas met accidentally in Florence, and proceeded without any preliminaries to fall head over heels in love with one another. He is Irish, and decidedly good looking, and is possessed of a comfortable income. I have not heard the date of the marriage, but the event will doubtless keep the Delmas family on the continent for some time to come.

* * *

ENGAGEMENTS seldom come singly; the announcement of one often precipitates the declaration of others. For instance, the novelty of Miss Alice Gerstle's betrothal has hardly worn off before the engagement of her brother, William L. Gerstle, to Miss Sadie Hecht is proclaimed. It is safe to believe this will be a very happy pair, for fortune has endowed them both with wealth and good looks. Miss Hecht is a charmingly pretty girl, who has carried off the honors of belledom the two seasons she has been out. She is dark, with magnificent eyes, a rich olive complexion, and a slender, graceful figure. This happy twain met in Europe some years ago, and being separated, encountered one another again at the marriage of the bride's sister, Miss Hilda Hecht, who is now Mrs. Marcus Gerstle. Since then the courtship has been active, and I believe the marriage will take place in the early future. Mr. Gerstle, of course, is rich by descent. Colonel Hecht, the father of the bride, figures as A 1 on the Mercantile Registers, and it is highly improbable that either of them will ever experience the luxury of an ungratifiable desire. The engagement presents are already pouring in rapidly, and will be followed, I suppose, in due course, by marriage gifts.

* * *

Is it not time this rather senseless system of engagement presents was put an end to? It is a great drain on the resources of friends, and decidedly an exaction, considering that the gift does not exempt the giver from a proper indulgence in wedding presents. Some brave young lady should put an end to it by announcing she will receive no engagement gifts. It is only among the Jewish people that this custom prevails. There is really no reason to justify this indulgence and it deserves frowning upon.

* * *

An interesting engagement is that of Miss Selma Loupe, who figures as one of the most popular of the younger set of the Concordia Club, and Theodore Goodman, who, I believe, is a wholesale tobacco dealer. Miss Loupe is the daughter of L. Loupe, the well-known merchant, once prominently connected with William Haas, of the Haas Bros. and the Cassle Bros. Both being exceedingly popular, congratulations and presents have poured in upon Miss Loupe in profusion. I believe they are to be married quite soon.

* * *

Miss Hilda Newman, whom Paderewski recommended to go to Vienna and study under Lechitichsky, is to have a recital in the room of the Century Club, on the afternoon of May 7th. Miss Evelyn Henry and Doctor Gilbert Graham are to assist her. Miss Newman is quite a brilliant pianist, and has very fine executive talent. It is hard, indeed, to secure a piano-forte audience with Paderewski, but she succeeded, and seems really to have impressed the great artist. By the way, I perceive, in his final interview, that Paderewski says he enjoyed his stay in California better than elsewhere in the United States.

* * *

Doctor and Mrs. Hatch, née Greenbaum, having returned from their wedding tour, left this week for their future home in Jackson, Amador County. They are about to build a house and make themselves as comfortable as the environment admits of.

* * *

Society was well represented at the Rivarde concert on Thursday night, when Donald Graham was the vocalist. It was quite a brilliant program. The great violinist played with much charm, and Mr. Graham's voice was at its best. He was generously applauded.

* * *

Among the distinguished visitors at the Palace recently were Mr. and Mrs. Pierpont Duryea, whose names are familiar to those who read of the doings of New York Society. They are immensely wealthy, indulge in their own yacht, and are now on the way to Honolulu. En route they must be content with the luxuries of the Oceanic Steamship Company, like the rest of us, but in Hawaii they can indulge all their tastes to the degree of their income—something like three-quarters of a million, I believe. Mrs. Duryea was the widow of William Weld, an immensely rich Bostonian, who, at his death, left her his share of the great Weld fortune. She is a tall, handsome woman, of fine figure and presence, whose red hair and blue eyes distinguished her amid a crowd of guests in the café of the Palace. They are accompanied by Mr. H. Madison Jones, a somewhat languid young millionaire, who is traveling with two valets and many trunks.

* * *

Mrs. Donahue and Mrs. Martin are getting ready to move into their new house down on Broadway. It is not probable they will entertain there, though, before the fall season; but their reception is liable to be the first event of the autumn, and it will be followed by a series of dinners.

* * *

Mrs. Tim Hopkins gave a big dinner on Tuesday night at which a number of society people were entertained. Afterwards, Estrella Belinfante, the blind Italian vocalist, rendered several songs in charming style. This vocalist sang at the Century Club recently.

* * *

There is joy among the younger set over the return of Emil Bruguiere, who is once more on the boulevard in a suit that commands the admiration of all "True Bohemians." The boys declare that Emil has become a student of "Him" in Vogue, and is about to inaugurate an interesting career as a leader of fashion.

* * *

The Knights Templar are tendering each other receptions. Commandery No. 1 entertained the Grand Commandery last Friday night, in Odd Fellows' Hall, with music, dancing, gorgeous decorations, and feasting. The Sir Knights were arrayed in their gorgeous uniform, and the California corps went through their evolutions with great exactitude. There was dancing later, with many handsome matrons and maids on the floor. A little before midnight, supper was served. Following the custom among the Knights, the feasting was mingled with talking. Among the orations, that of Rev. Dr. Walk was given the palm for eloquence. It was quite a fine speech, and created a strong impression among the Knights, who are given to oratory, and love decorated perorations as they do their uniforms.

* * *

The season at San Mateo promises brilliantly. The hotel this season is in the hands of Mr. J. S. Vallely, who understands the gentle art of running a summer caravansary, and promises the menu will leave nothing to be desired. Most of the rooms are engaged, and the cottages, all but one, are taken. The summer program includes a dance every Saturday night, with a band from town. The Encinal Yacht Club is to be there on the 16th and will have a special entertainment in its honor.

* * *

Society, or at least a section of it, was given an opportunity of seeing the interior of the George Whittell Florentine villa on Tuesday last. This is the mansion on the corner of California and Jones Streets, over which the manager of the late Nick Luning's millions had so much trouble with his architect, and compromised between good taste and his own sense of economy by means of a wooden porch and a machine made railing. The particular occasion, however, was an extensive luncheon which Mrs. Whittell gave to some forty of her friends. There is no denying the spaciousness of the mansion. The rooms seem immense, and look bare, for the tables and chairs and couches are carefully ranged around the walls, and the center of each apartment is as barren as the Sahara. Perhaps the decoration is as yet incomplete, but this is the effect the style of adornments has on the visitor. The lighting system is novel, incandescent globes being set around the frieze in the manner which concert hall architecture effects. The floors are polished and are covered with huge rugs, but the views from the windows are so magnificent that no absence of artistic beauty inside could detract therefrom. As for the luncheon, that was quite an elaborate affair. The tables were set in the form of a Maltese cross, were decorated with a profusion of red and pink roses and looked decidedly pretty.

* * *

THE MOST enthusiastic convocation we have ever had were the Hotel men, who insist they never enjoyed themselves more, were never made more of, and never left a region with greater regret. Certainly, everything was done for their entertainment, but they have no eulogies strong enough to express their appreciation. The swellest event of their stay was undoubtedly the banquet at the Palace, which Manager Kirkpatrick says was the finest ever given in California; and the guests say it was even a more enjoyable and brilliant spread than that they were given at Delmonico's last year, which had figured as the finest they ever sat down to. They saw Del Monte under the best possible auspices, with F. S. Douty for a Cicerone. They took the Cypress Point drive, saw the seals, and for that occasion old Sol shone clear and bright bringing out the verdure of the lawns and the color of the flowers.

* * *

THE CONDITION of affairs at the Pacific-Union Club continues to excite conversation. The progressive element hopes to obtain a majority of the new board, and propose, I believe, to elect James D. Phelan president. Though conservative, and rather to be found among the old heads than with the young, Mr. Phelan has a progressive spirit, and is quick to support new ideas. There is much to be done in the club this year, for the impression is general that the institution should be installed in a building of its own, of architectural pretensions befitting its importance as the leading club of the West.

* * *

The Cosmos Club is conducted with such a degree of conservatism, and all the conventionalities are so rigorously observed there that it seldom gets into the papers. However, there are spasmodic intervals of activity celebrated by means of suppers and other festivities; and they are arranging to give a big dinner to Jack Cunningham who soon leaves for Europe, and the guest of honor has asked that the affair take place on Saturday night next. It will be a great occasion, for Mr. Cunningham is one of the most popular members of the Club, and has been its president.

* * *

The new Board at the Bohemian Club proposes to have a jinks in the month of May. Dr. Rosenstirn is to be sire, and a number of brilliant papers, together with several interesting features, are promised.

* * *

A MOVE which is interesting to clubmen, especially to those whose names are on the Pacific-Union roll, is a project to make the membership, in certain of the leading clubs throughout the country, interchangeable. A prominent New York gentleman, a member of the Union Club, whose traveling has acquainted him with the disagreeables of hotel life, is agitating this scheme, in accordance with which members of certain stipulated clubs, on arrival in another city, being properly armed with credentials from their home institution, become, on presenting themselves, fully accredited members of the leading club there. This plan abrogates the necessity of cards of admission, invitations, and other formalities, but the members are required to pay the regular dues. It is a capital idea, and is so feasible that it is curious no one arranged it before. The clubs involved, so far as I know, are the Union of New York, the Maryland of Baltimore, the Chicago of Chicago, the Art Club of Philadelphia, the Somerset of Boston, and

The Original Swain's Bakery, 213 Sutter Street, stands without a rival and has stood the test for years. The most delicious meals are served by gentlemanly attendants, and the management takes pride in having everything orderly. It is just the place for business men and ladies out shopping to lunch.

Chew Adams' Pepsin Tutti-Frutti. It is sovereign for Indigestion and agreeable to the taste.

institutions of equal rank in several of the large Southern cities.

* * *

THERE IS much indignation at the Pacific-Union over certain minor economies which the house-committee has put into practise. The customary procedure, from time immemorial, when members ordered plain drinks, has been to send from the sideboard a tray on which was a decanter of the desired brandy or whisky ordered, together with siphon and other paraphernalia which permitted every man to help himself according to his capacity. However, this is no longer allowed. Conceiving that the old arrangement was unprofitable, and that it promoted undue liberality in the use of strong liquors, the committee proceeded to inaugurate the "jigger" system. Now-a-days, when Brown or Robinson orders whisky, the waiter brings him a little bottle containing a stipulated quantity of his favorite brand. This figures as one drink; if he desires a second or an additional supply, he must order a second jigger and pay for it. Naturally the arrangement is unpopular; not, perhaps, because the jiggers hold an insufficient quantity, but because the members feel their discretion is abridged. There is, of course, a good deal of fun on the subject, especially because the committee, in its strivings after economy, purchased too few of these bottles, and the consequence is that the members are quite often kept out of their evening drinks just because the available "jiggers" are in use.

* * *

It is not generally known that William Greer Harrison, for some reason a persona non grata of the last Bohemian Club administration, was re-instated as a member from the date of his resignation, by the new Board as the latter's first official act. This same august aggregation has been called upon to hear charges against George Malter, the Fresno vineyardist, of interfering with the prerogatives of the constitutionally illegal "kitty." The latter is recognized by the house rules and denied existence by the constitution. George and a number of his cronies play solus, a game of cards in which the stakes are absurdly small, and kitty's share is disproportionately large. George objected to the heavy toll levied under the house rules, and vowed he would not contribute to kitty's support. Then Bill English and a number of others drew up a formal bill of complaint charging genial George with tampering with the rights of kitty. Mr. English was accommodating; he signed his own name to the complaint, and the names of a number of other club members who do not know solus from a glass eye. The document was made up in proper form and handed in to the directors.

* * *

There is to be a reception at the Bohemian Club this evening, tendered by the members to the distinguished violinist, Achille Rivarde, and his equally able associate, Aime Lachaume. This will be the first entertainment of the new Board, and though there is no set program, considerable interest is felt in what may be provided. Those who claim to know assert that Rivarde is, socially, Ysaye's superior.

* * *

The Philomath had quite an interesting debate on Thursday, and before it appeared as champions of Old versus New Comedy, Miss Florence Praag and Miss Friedlander; the latter upholding the comedies of Henry Arthur Jones, Sidney Grundy, Belasco, Clyde Fitch, and others, as against the productions of the days of Queen Anne and Charles II., claiming they have greater artistic merit, more interest, and, in many cases, higher literary skill. Miss Praag opposed this view with considerable earnestness, but the Philomath agreed with Miss Friedlander, and the verdict of the debate was in her favor.

* * *

The California State Floral Society is to hold its Thirteenth Semi-annual Exhibition and Rose Show at the Palace Hotel in the near future. Judging by their premium list the Exhibition will be an exquisite collection of color, roses, carnations, Pelargoniums, etc. The committee of arrangements include Professor Emory E. Smith of Palo Alto, and Mrs. W. S. Chandler, Mrs. M. Grothwell, Mrs. B. E. Henriksen, Mrs. L. O. Hodgkins, and Mrs. Orville D. Baldwin, all of San Francisco.

* * *

THE VERY LATEST FAD that Oakland is experiencing is dressmaking. Unaccountable as it may seem, Society has turned to needlework as a diversion. On Jackson Street and along Alice, there are sewing circles whose afternoons are devoted to plying the needle. A Mrs. Sitzgrave is responsible for this latest craze. It seems she has patented a system of cutting and fitting by chart, and, by following certain measurements and rules, women may model themselves garments whose folds cling and hang as though proceeding from the ateliers of Worth or Felix. Of course, results come only after practise, but the experimenting is interesting, and besides affording topics of conversation, gives much work for idle hands to do. The dry goods' stores are ransacked for challies and dimities to practise on, and I fear there will be much sorrow in the ranks of the professional modistes, though it is thoroughly understood the fad will not be of long duration. I am told there is a good deal of fun over the manner in which the inexperienced ply the untried needle. Indeed, the funniest feature of the craze is the fact that it is the rich set which has taken it up. Among them are the Watts, Knowles, Dunhams, Glasscocks, and many more; and even Miss Nellie Chabot has taken it into her head to design her own costumes.

* * *

A MISGUIDED MALE, who had been talking about the Oakland 400, suddenly found himself unpopular. He is requested to remember that, though the boundaries of Alameda County are wide, eligibles are few and far between. In fact, it is proper—in alluding to what Mr. McAllister spoke of as the 400, and Mrs. Ogden Mills calls the 150—to say the 90. This dictum comes to me from an elevated social source, and it is to be regarded with the utmost respect. It means there are but ninety ladies and gentlemen (young or old) entitled to rank among the smart set. Perhaps it may be contended that the lines have been drawn rather closer than the occasion necessitates Think of it! Out of the fifty thousand composing the population of the burg across the Bay, only ninety beings really and absolutely select. Is this not a striking reflection on the others who are ineligible for various causes? It would be interesting to know on what grounds the 90 segregate themselves from the rest. We, over here, have always believed Oakland Society sufficiently miscellaneous to be interesting.

* * *

Though one craze subjugates Oakland, others fall lame and impotent. No one imagined the vogue the needle has attained, but it is disappointing to learn that the gymnastic idea has been received so coldly. Mrs. Stebbins's effort to persuade the Jackson-street set in the direction of muscular development proved unsuccessful. Apparently, there is no tendency in that direction, just now, the ambition to cultivate sinew having departed with the decline of the bicycle. However, next season the conditions may be different, for then will the woman's suffrage question be disposed of for four years to come, and dressmaking must surely have followed the fate of its predecessor fads.

* * *

I learn with pleasure of Harvey Wiley Corbett's success in the French Capital. Mr. Corbett is a young San Franciscan, and a recent graduate of the State University—class of '95. At the U. C. Mr. Corbett won the hardly earned reputation of the most brilliant mathematician of his class, and, since his graduation, has been studying architecture in Paris. The news has just been received that Mr. Corbett has successfully passed the examinations for the Ecole de Beaux Arts. Three hundred and fifty competed for the honor which is annually accorded to but forty. Our congratulations to Mr. Corbett. Mr. Corbett is well known in Society on both sides of the Bay. At the U. C. he was a member of the fraternity of Phi Gamma Delta and of the Skull and Keys Society.

* * *

Miss Maud Howard is at Palo Alto attending lectures. She took a party to Mrs. Carmichael-Carr's on Thursday evening, but returned at once to the University. Carl Howard has been at the "La Paloma" Mine where he is associated with Mr. Mark B. Kerr. In the meantime, the Howard house on Alice Street is closed. About the fifteenth of this month Miss Howard and her brother go East for the wedding of Mr. Shafter Howard and Miss Mollie Hunter, which is to be celebrated later on at Newport.

* * *

Considerable interest has been developed over Miss Ethel Cohen's picnic party, which is to be given at Ferncliff this afternoon. Miss Cohen returned recently from the East, where she had been the guest of her sister, and is ready to occupy the place in Society which she vacated at her departure. She is a bright, handsome girl with lots of vivacity and quite a tendency at repartee. The picnic, which is to be quite a novel affair, is to be given in a vacant mansion on the Cohen estate, and is to have all the familiar characteristics of an outdoor entertainment. The house has been transformed to suit the eccentricities of the occasion; the luncheon is to be strictly picnicky, and the music by the Presidio band. Alameda County will be represented, of course, in the guest list, but San Francisco has decidedly the preference.

* * *

Over in Berkeley there is much anticipation of the joys of commencement week. Class-day is to be celebrated by an infinity of luncheons and suppers, all the Fraternities having sent out invitations. Miss Head has a dance, and, of course, the "Set" will entertain in proper abundance.

* * *

The Ebell Club's concert can hardly be acclaimed a brilliant success, for, though several morceaux on the program were played with artistic insight—notably the piano-forte work of Mr. Tolmie and the singing of Miss Wall—it would be impossible to praise the rest and preserve regard for veracity. Rather a feature, though, was the performance of the Hus Quartet. This is composed of the children of Dr. Hus, who certainly show considerable musical talent. The eldest boy plays the cello; the second, a son, also, performs on the violin; the daughter, who is not much more than nine, is quite a clever pianist; and the youngest, a little girl aged seven, is quite adroit at second fiddle. The eldest boy, indeed, is but sixteen years of age. They played several things quite prettily, and undeniably interested the audience.

* * *

East Oakland is still acclaiming the Pope Rossiter wedding as the prettiest in the annals of the environment. The use of oak branches for decorative purposes is a novelty, and as such is eulogized. Certainly, Mrs. J. M. Smith's hothouse flowers, with which the chancel was adorned, were of the rarest and most beautiful varieties, and in their abundance, an evidence of millionaire-dom's conservatories. At the Pope residence a charming effect was attained by the snowy flowers that formed the table decoration; they contrasted admirably with the pink roses which covered the chairs. Seven floral wedding bells hung over the table, forming an exceedingly pretty canopy for the bride and her maidens and ushers.

* * *

Miss Snook, who married Mr. Ed Williams last week, is an exceedingly pretty girl. She is a niece of Mrs. J. A. Folger, and a cousin of the charming Miss Austin. The wedding was a very quiet affair, only the immediate friends being present. The happy pair have gone East for the honeymoon.

* * *

Mrs. Shelby Martin has returned from her wedding tour, and from all appearances will be given a hearty welcome by Society. Miss Catherine Haruub had a luncheon for her recently, which has been declared the forerunner of a number of similar entertainments. The bride looks brighter and prettier than ever after her wedding trip.

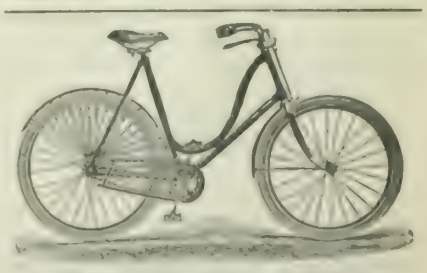
THE GOSSIP.

Who does not know the Maison Riche! Though it was not the earliest established among San Francisco restaurants, it is perhaps more celebrated than any of them. Within its rooms important banquets have been held, and glowing entertainments given. It has the finest chef in town, and the most admirably appointed kitchen. It has a fine cellar, in which the choicest products of the Cote d'or repose in cool seclusion—but then every one in California knows the Maison Riche, and it is unnecessary to announce its characteristics. However, it is interesting to learn that Justin Ladagnous has now become sole proprietor, and has reorganized the institution; is doing his own buying, composing his own menus, and, altogether, is giving the institution his particular personal attention, which is a good thing for those who care for good eating.

The Maison Riche resembles a private hotel rather than a conventional French restaurant in which the accommodation is for the evening only. Up-stairs are suites of rooms, while on the top floor are located the famous quarters which Will Hearst had decorated, and which Talbot Clifton now occupies. These are, perhaps, the most beautifully appointed rooms in San Francisco—the dining-room in Dutch style, with leather panels, sanded floor, and ancient, leather-covered armchairs. The sitting-room is in French style and light tones, while the library is a beautiful apartment with stained-glass windows and carved shelves, and the most luxurious divans and reclining chairs for Mr. Clifton whenever he desires to read. The other rooms are handsomely furnished and fitted up with bathrooms and connecting dining and sitting rooms. For those who don't care to put up at an hotel, but prefer the seclusion and the exellent cookery of a French restaurant, the Riche has undeniable attractions. It has, of course, a number of regular boarders, and is also headquarters for [illegible] elsewhere on their way through San Francisco.

The restaurant proper is back in its old quarters on the second floor. The room has been redecorated and retinted, and with its array of tables covered with snowy damask and shining glassware, presents a brilliant picture, especially at noonday when the gathering of business and club men, who gather there daily, assemble for lunch. In the evening, the usual table d'hote dinner is set out; and, I believe, Mr. Ladagnous has rearranged the scale of prices, and serves what is really the finest lunch in town at noon for seventy-five cents, and dinner, with the best grade of California wine, for one dollar.

Use only Richardson and Robbins Canned Meats at picnics



WHEN YOU BUY A WHEEL

Buy one with a reputation one that won't break down when you're ten miles from home. Don't learn by experience; they are not substantial. The Sterling has been on the market five years. We guarantee it for one year, and also guarantee our Palmer Tires for the same period. Replacements made at our office in San Francisco. The Sterling costs $100. If you want to know more about it, send for our Art Catalogue, mailed free to any address, and you will buy the

Sterling Bicycle
"BUILT LIKE A WATCH"

Address

STERLING CYCLE WORKS
314 POST STREET
San Francisco, Cal.

WM. V. BRYAN,
Manager Pacific Coast Branch.

Wedding Invitations are properly engraved and in correct form, at ROBERTSON'S

Adams's Tutti-Frutti Chewing Gum for Indigestion.

Dr. C. W. Decker, Dentist, 806 Market St

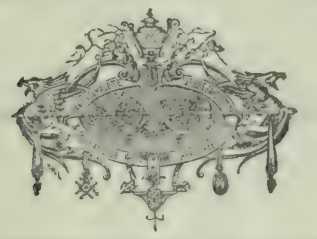
MOORE'S POISON OAK REMEDY
Cures Poison Oak and all Skin Diseases.
Sold by all druggists.

Gladness Comes

With a better understanding of the transient nature of the many physical ills which vanish before proper efforts—gentle efforts—pleasant efforts—rightly directed. There is comfort in the knowledge that so many forms of sickness are not due to any actual disease, but simply to a constipated condition of the system, which the pleasant family laxative, Syrup of Figs, promptly removes. That is why it is the only remedy with millions of families, and is everywhere esteemed so highly by all who value good health. Its beneficial effects are due to the fact, that it is the one remedy which promotes internal cleanliness, without debilitating the organs on which it acts. It is therefore all important, in order to get its beneficial effects, to note when you purchase, that you have the genuine article, which is manufactured by the California Fig Syrup Co. only, and sold by all reputable druggists.

If in the enjoyment of good health, and the system is regular, then laxatives or other remedies are not needed. If afflicted with any actual disease, one may be commended to the most skillful physicians, but if in need of a laxative, then one should have the best, and with the well-informed everywhere, Syrup of Figs stands highest and is most largely used and gives most general satisfaction.

PERRIER-JOUET CHAMPAGNE EXTRA DRY "SPECIAL"



Also specially selected stock of Clarets and White Wines on hand.

W. B. CHAPMAN, Sole Agent Pacific Coast
123 California Street

Mutual Savings Bank of San Francisco
33 Post Street, below Kearny, Mechanics' Institute Building
Guaranteed Capital, $1,000,000
JAS. D. PHELAN, Pres. GEO. A. STORY, Cashier
S. G. MURPHY, JOHN A. HOOPER, Vice-Pres.
DIRECTORS—Jas. D. Phelan, S. G. Murphy, John A. Hooper, James Moffitt, C. G. Hooker, Frank J. Sullivan, L. F. Drexler, Robt. McElroy, Jos. D. Grant.
Interest paid on term and ordinary deposits.
Loans on approved securities. Deposits may be sent by Postal Order, Wells, Fargo & Co., or Exchange on City Banks.
When opening accounts, send signature.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE
OF LONDON
Incorporated by Royal Charter A. D. 1726
Capital Paid Up, $3,416,100 Assets, $21,584,413
Surplus to Policy Holders, $8,980,251
ROBERT DICKSON, Manager
NATHAN & KINGSTON, San Francisco Agents
501 MONTGOMERY ST.

Sun Insurance Office OF LONDON
Founded A.D. 1710 Cash Assets, $10,270,535
Oldest Purely Fire Insurance Office in the World
The Lion Fire Ins. Co. Ltd., OF LONDON
Established A.D. 1879 Cash Assets, $1,108,095
The Imperial Ins. Co. Ltd., OF LONDON
Instituted A.D. 1803 Cash Assets, $9,362,920
40 Years in Business on the Pacific Coast
Manager for the Pacific Coast, WM. J. LANDERS
205 and 207 Sansome Street, near Pine

Aachen and Munich Fire Insurance Co.
Of Aix La Chapelle, Germany. Established 1805
Capital, $2,250,000.00
Total Assets, $6,854,653.65
United States Department
204 SANSOME STREET, SAN FRANCISCO
VOSS, CONRAD & CO., General Managers

COMET OOLONG
The oldest and most reliable brand of Tea on the market. Sold only in ½ lb. papers at 20 cts. per paper.
ALL GROCERS KEEP IT

RIPPLES.

EATING.

This is a subject of which I am very fond. Some people live to eat, and others merely eat to live. If I couldn't eat I wouldn't want to live, and I don't think I would; that is the reason I eat.

Eating is merely a habit. Some people eat according to their purse, and some people eat according to the other fellow's. You will also find many that drink the same way.

Some evening when you are calling on a neighbor you will hear the host say, "Oh, yes, I eat very often at the Maison Bologne," or some other high-priced caterer's, leading you to think that it is almost a daily occurrence with him, whereas he has probably eaten in a first-class place once in twenty-seven years and then at the expense of a friend from whom he has purchased a large bill of goods for the firm of which he is an employee. And if you should happen down in the neighborhood in which he is employed about noontime and would condescend to enter a little chop house close to his place of business, you would observe that his luncheon consisted of coffee and sinkers with a bottle of oil, vinegar, and a dirty mustard pot on the side. Yet he will talk glibly of more high-sounding dishes of which he has partaken that it was ever the misfortune of a waiter in a French restaurant to have dreamed of.

Speaking about eating puts me in mind of the time when I was grossly insulted in a restaurant within the walls of this beautiful city of Sutro.

I was in the habit of wearing my hair somewhat long, after the style of a Circassian beauty. Entering the restaurant, I removed my hat, and, through habit, ran my fingers through my hair to keep it off my brow. Having seated myself and given my order, I curiously glanced about the room in search of a familiar face, when I observed a patron on the other side of the house conversing laughingly with a waiter, with their eyes fixed on me. It seemed they were greatly amused about something, and that I was the cause of their amusement. Being somewhat annoyed I motioned the waiter to my side and asked the cause of their joyfulness.

"Well, sir," replied the waiter, "that gentleman over there wanted me to ask you if your name was Pad——"

Assuming my most ferocious look, I glared at the person who had sent the message, and said quite loudly: "Tell fellow that my name is not Paddy Whisky or Paddy Brandy, but it's Paddy Ryan, the ex-pugilist, and that I'll see him after I have finished my luncheon."

I thought that would knock him silly, but it didn't; for he replied back much louder than I had spoken:

"You're a blank liar. I am Paddy Ryan, the ex-pugulist, and I'll see you before you finish your grub."

But he didn't; for I escaped from that restaurant before he had a chance to get up from his table.

There is a time for everything. That's the reason I don't believe in mixing your eating with fighting.

TOMMY'S VERSION.

"What did you learn at school to-day, Tommy?"

"Didn't learn nothing."

"Didn't learn anything, Tommy?"

"Naw, never learn anything at school."

"Why, don't you learn to read and spell at school?"

"Naw."

"What do you do while at school, Tommy?"

"Recite what I've learnt at home; they don't teach you nothing at our school."

A WONDER.

